‘Oh no! Father never stays after he’s had his tea,’ cried Nelly. ‘Now Mr Storm, do finish your sentence!’

‘I only meant,’ Richard went on, cursing himself for having launched into the topic at all, ‘that it’s queer how women scold so bitterly and vindictively people that they’re really all the time actually in love with.’

Mrs Shotover put back her head, dropped her lorgnette, and dropped into a cackling high-pitched laugh. Then she leered at Richard with her head on one side like some wicked very old fowl. ‘Do they do that? My goodness! You notice, Nelly, what experiences Mr Storm has had.’

Richard glared at her angrily. ‘I’m afraid it wasn’t an original remark of mine,’ he retorted. ‘It’s that old well-known poem of Catullus I was thinking of. I hardly liked to bore you with it in Latin.’

‘In Latin!’ Mrs Shotover clapped her hands. ‘Oh Nelly, do put down that cake. You know you don’t want it. And listen to Mr Storm quoting Latin.’

But Nelly’s face was very serious. It would never do for Mrs Shotover and Richard to quarrel at this juncture. ‘You two dear nice people!’ she cried, rising to her feet in order to deal more adequately with the situation. ‘How you do fight over these absurd problems! As Mr Storm says, I don’t think we need much experience to know what people are like when they love and hate at the same time! But I don't think it's only women who torment the people they care for. I'm sure men do it. I don't know whether you'd count Father as an example? But he certainly does it. Well? Shall we go round the garden?'

As they moved away Nelly thought to herself – The poor absurd darling! how sweet he looked when he got angry because she laughed. And how solemnly he began that old tiresome business about loving and scolding.

What pompous vain conceited things the nicest of men are! But oh I'm so glad to see him again – and there's the same feeling between us – just the same – he feels it and I feel it. How wonderful it is!

And Richard thought in his heart – That vulgar impertinent old woman! Trying to make me look a fool before Nelly! But the sweet thing came to my rescue instead. Bless her heart! She may be innocent, but she's got more intellect, any day, than that old harridan with false teeth and a grin like a hyena! Bless her heart! I was a silly ass to keep away all this time. What days I've wasted!

And as he followed the old and the young woman round that pleasant little garden he smiled to himself to notice how naïvely and simply he had thought of those even days of work at the main purpose of his life as 'wasted' – because he had hidden himself away from a girl of twenty-two.

Chapter 7

RICHARD DID NOT succeed in securing any private word with Nelly before he felt it incumbent upon him to say goodbye. The ‘laughing hyena’, as he named Mrs Shotover to himself, grinned her obstinate determination to ‘stick him out’ and be left alone with her young friend. He was only thankful she had a coachman and dog-cart; so that there was no question of his having to walk back with her to West Horthing. He cordially detested her; and made up his mind to attack Nelly on the subject, and express his wonder as to what she could see in such a spiteful and silly old creature!

That’s the worst of England, he thought. It’s such a confounded individualistic country, that a horrible old woman like that as long as she has money and ‘knows the neighbourhood’ can go on indefinitely making herself a general nuisance. In America, he supposed, she would have been put into her place and forced to mend her manners. Well! Well! After all, perhaps, there was something to be said for a system that encouraged everybody to grow into a ‘Character’, either a charming one or the reverse! It was better perhaps to have ‘laughing hyenas’ than monotonous herds of sheep!

The next day was a day of pouring rain and Richard made no attempt to do more than visit the cathedral. He took the opportunity of carrying his notebooks there and reading to himself what he had written. On the whole he was not displeased with the result of his week’s work. He had composed about two hundred lines of this uneven dithyrambic ‘litany of the earth-soul’, its slow growing into consciousness, its use of the sentiency of all living things, its vague ‘dreaming on things to come’.

He became conscious how deeply he had abandoned himself to these English fields and lanes and hedges, to these mossy walls and historic buildings, to these old quiet immemorial traditions.

His return to his native land had stirred a thousand atavistic feelings in him, tastes and prejudices, devotions and queer old attachments.

The lines he had written were full of the sounds and scents of the English country, and the more conscious, more human element in them was religious in the calm reserved English way and was rootedly, but not feverishly, pagan. Dithyrambic in its broken ebb and flow the poem might be; but the music of it was rich and slow and a little heavy – not by any means a song of air and flame! The thing might not be passionate and exciting; but the bleating of flocks was in it, and the sweet breath of cattle, and the patient labours of simple people under the sun and the rain, and the faint sad strange murmurs, like the winds at night, over summer grass, of the dead generations that found their survival in those who came after them.

He returned to his inn late that night, having wandered far through the fields as the evening cleared, along the old canal bank, towards the sea. It had come upon him, as he walked there, especially in passing a particular group of poplar trees, pale and soaked with rain, shivering in the night wind like something human against the orange-coloured skyline, that he had known all this before. Yes, long before, under some other name perhaps, in the unending sequence of the great wayfaring, he must have stood, just as he was standing then, watching those trees whispering to each other with sad tender voices!

And that night he pulled his chair close to the open window and sat for a long while looking out into the silent wet garden, where the darkness itself seemed to exhale an old forgotten fragrance, carrying the mind back to dumb deep-buried memories.

It was one of those hours when a man feels the presence of all the days he has lived through, gathered up and folded together like the crowding of soft innumerable wings; an hour when what is to come hangs palpably imminent, like a vast pregnant shadow, before him, beckoning to those sheltering wings that they should let him go, let him move forward to his fate.

Winnowed and purged by his days with the secrets of words, their mysterious alliances and treacheries, his soul seemed, as he sat at that window, reluctant to break the spell, hovering consciously between a past that was over, its wounds healed, and a future on whose threshold he wavered and hesitated, full of unknown things – beautiful, terrible, pitiful!

He left the window at last with a sense as though he had made, for good or for evil, some great decision; as though at some dark crossroads he had chosen his way, and now could never, through all that should subsequently happen, retrace his footsteps.

Never had Richard sunk into so deep a chasm of dreamless unconsciousness as he slid away into, almost as soon as his head touched the pillow. He awoke the next morning with a feeling as though he had slept not for seven hours, but for seven centuries; he wondered vaguely if he would ever sleep quite in that way again. Was it the very sleep of the ‘earth-soul’ he had been writing about into which, like a child entering the spaciousness of a mother’s dreams, he had been allowed to pass?

He had the queerest feeling as he washed and dressed as though it were necessary to move very quickly, very stealthily and solemnly, about the room. Was some shadowy dead self, some phantom corpse of everything he had been before, actually lying on the bed he had quitted?

He ran downstairs anyway with a distinct feeling of relief from psychic tension and oppressipn. And on the table in the breakfast room, lying on his plate, he found a letter from Nelly. He opened and read it standing by the window, while Trixie Flap, the Crown housemaid, watched him shrewdly, her hand on the mahogany sideboard.

The letter was brief enough.

‘Dear Mr Storm, Please come over and see me. At once, if you don’t mind? It’s impossible to tell you more in a letter. I must talk to somebody. I am very worried, so please come as soon as you get this. In the morning if possible. I’ll look out for you. I am sorry to trouble you.’

And the letter was hurriedly signed, ‘Nelly’.

Richard looked at his watch and then at the self-conscious back of Trixie Flap who was now fidgeting with something on the sideboard.

‘Let’s have some tea at once, Trixie, please,’ he said, seating himself at the table and beginning to cut the loaf. ‘Never mind about the porridge. I’m in a hurry. I’ve got to go somewhere.’

When he next looked at his watch it was after ten and he was already halfway to Littlegate. He could not have given any lucid account of what trees or beasts or rustics he had passed on his way. He might have passed much more remarkable things than early flowering knapweed and they would have been unnoticed. That phrase I’ll look out for you with its pathetic confidence in his friendship had stuck a dart into his heart whose sweet rankling made him oblivious of all outward objects.

He came upon her quite suddenly, leaning against a gate, staring with woebegone eyes in front of her, without hat or gloves. She turned when she heard his step and leaped forward to meet him, her cheeks burning.

She gave him her hand. She made a little hesitating movement as if she would have given him both her hands. Instead of that she gave him the loveliest smile that Richard had ever seen on a human countenance. ‘Thank God you’ve come!’ she said with a sigh of content.

They instinctively moved to the gate which Richard rapidly opened, untwisting its rustic defences with a trembling hand.

‘Let’s get off the road,’ he said. ‘Then we can talk better.’

They risked the wrath of the farmer and crossed the field to the shelter of a large ash tree which grew in the hedge bank. At the foot of this tree they were isolated from the whole world.

It was a hot, still, thundery day, the sun having a semitropical feeling in it owing to the rain that had fallen.

‘I’m afraid the grass is damp,’ said Richard. ‘With that thin dress …’ He looked at her tenderly. ‘Oh, I know!’ he cried impulsively, and taking off his coat he spread it upon the ground.

The girl looked grave. ‘After getting warm walking …’ she murmured, ‘I don’t think you ought to—’

‘But just feel how hot the sun is – burning hot!’ And he made her sit down by his side; even going so far as to give her a little friendly pull closer to him when she seemed shy of taking more than the minutest share of the tweed jacket spread out beneath them.

Nelly sat with her legs stretched straight out in front of her, Richard with his knees under his chin; and when he told her that it was like sitting together on a magic carpet that only needed one talismanic word to transport them both to some Happy Valley out of reach of all annoyance, she nodded in contented agreement.

The hot thundery heavy sunshine fell upon them like an actual stream of attenuated gold, as though the very father of gods and men were blessing them with full hands.

‘Well – now we are alone and safe,’ said Richard, hugging his knees with his clenched fingers and letting his eyes rest on the childish indoor shoes she was wearing, strapped with a thin leather strap above the instep, ‘let’s hear the worst. Out with it Miss Nelly! I can tell you in advance, by a sort of presentiment, that I shall be able to find a solution. Out with it Miss Nelly!'

'You may drop the Miss – if you like,' said the girl in a low voice, plucking a long feathery grass blade and pulling it to pieces on her lap.

'Well, out with it, Nelly!' he repeated.

She drew in her breath as if for a great burst of volubility; and then suddenly, instead of telling him anything, she broke into a flood of tears. Richard longed to take that fair forehead with its pearl-white transparent skin, its delicate blue veins, its exquisite arched eyebrows, and those wet cheeks hidden in her hands, and comfort them with caresses; but it seemed somehow as if it would be stealing an unfair advantage of her just then. So he just laid one of his hands lightly on her shoulder. 'Come, come, little one,' he said. 'I'm certain we can settle all these things if you only tell me.'

She made a gallant effort and stopped crying, turning to him a look of almost frightened apology. 'Don't be angry with me,' she murmured. 'I really don't often give way like this. I think it must be the thunder in the air. It's so hot and close isn't it?'

Richard hurriedly assented. 'Oh awfully close! But do try and tell me now. I'm sure I'm the right person to be told.'

'It's about Father,' she said quietly. 'He's written several times to London lately and he's written to Selshurst. And now it's all decided. They've accepted his resignation. Someone's coming from Selshurst to take the service. And there's to be a new vicar. He's not to be allowed to officiate in the church again. In fact it's more like being turned out than resigning. There'll only be one more quarter's salary coming in; and that's the end. After that we've got nothing! And we've not saved a penny. God knows what we shall do. What hastened all so and brought things to a head was some parishioner from over the hill complaining to the bishop – no Littlegate person would have done it. I believe it was the foreman at Toat Farm. He's a silly officious old fool. He's always been a trouble. He must have told them about Father's leaving out prayers and things. Whenever it says God in the service he changes it to Christ. It's very, very cruel – happening like this. But I suppose it was bound to come sooner or later. I suppose it would sound odd if a stranger heard him. He didn't always change it to Christ. Sometimes he changed it to Lord but he always changed it – except when he was thinking of his butterflies or something, and then he forgot and said it like anybody else. I suppose it couldn't go on like that, could it? Though the people here didn't seem to notice any difference.'

She stopped breathlessly and looked at her companion with appealing eyes.

Richard felt compelled to confess to her that it did seem a little strange for a priest to expurgate the syllable God out of the Christian worship. He admitted that he did not very clearly see how it could 'go on' quite like that.

'But cannot your Father make any special use of his scientific knowledge? He seemed to me a man of unusual mental power. Couldn't he get a biological position in some college?'

Nelly frowned just a tiny bit at this, and thought in her heart, How curiously stupid the nicest of men are! Any woman who'd seen Father would know at once that he was quite hopeless in things like that. I suppose the truth is all men are a little hopeless themselves. How any of them do any practical work I can't think!

And she sighed and smiled, and then frowned again.

'No. I suppose that's out of the question,' said Richard and stared helplessly at the little crossed ankles lying in the grass beside him, over which the ash leaves above their heads threw a tracery of delicate shadows.

Sitting there in his shirtsleeves he felt as though he were prepared to undertake any quixotic labour on behalf of this young girl. But what form could it take?

'I think perhaps I ought to tell you something else,' said Nelly gravely. 'Perhaps you've guessed I'm engaged to be married to Mr Canyot?'

'Yes,' said Richard with a beating heart.

She was evidently making a tremendous effort to be entirely frank with him and he felt a wave of vibrant pity for her in her manifest embarrassment.

'Mr Canyot's been so different since he lost his mother. He misunderstands things. I mean he confuses things. But it's all too much my own fault!' She pulled up a large handful of sun-warmed grass and threaded it around her fingers.

Richard could not help noticing that she still wore the ring which he had from the first day assumed to be her engagement ring.

'I ought to tell you that we had a bad quarrel that day when we walked back together from Selshurst.'

Now we come to it! thought Richard.

'And the quarrel,' she went on, 'if you want to know, was absurdly enough about you!'

'About me?' cried Richard, putting a good deal more astonishment into his tone than he actually felt. What he really felt was something much more like the edge and fringe of extreme foolishness; for he began to fear that he had exaggerated altogether the link between her and himself.

She is treating me as her father confessor, he thought. She is talking to me about her love affair. And a very cynical and rather bitter emotion passed through him.

‘Yes, it was about you, about us,’ the girl went on. It was a faint comfort to him to remark that she did blush – she blushed so quickly; it was the misfortune of her transparent complexion – at the word ‘us’.

‘He was troubled in his mind because I liked you, because we liked each other. He said I looked at you and talked to you differently from the way I did with him. Well! you are different, a lot different, from Robert, aren’t you?’

Richard dryly admitted that he did differ from Mr Robert Canyot.

‘We quarrelled over that all the way home. He was rude to me. He was really angry. And I’m afraid I got angry too and said things that hurt him.’

‘I said I had a right to choose my own friends. I said … more than I ought to have said!’ And she gave Richard that same indescribably lovely smile that he had received from her three times before.

I wonder if she looks at Canyot like that? he thought. If she doesn’t, I’m blessed if he is her choice! At any rate as long as she gives me that look I know we’ve got something very deep between us.

‘I said,’ she went on, looking down now at the grass-blades twisted round her fingers and smiling to herself a quaint elfish enigmatic smile that seemed to separate her in some queer way from all possible lovers and turn her into a mocking sexless thing of childish unapproachableness.

‘I said I did like you very much indeed; and that, if he wasn’t careful, I should fall in love with you, and fall out of love with him – I said that, on purpose, to annoy him. I wanted to annoy him as much as I possibly could.’

‘I see,’ said Richard. ‘You said that to hurt your lover as much as ever you could, to punish him for being, as you say, so absurdly jealous.’

Again there flickered over her downcast face that peculiarly detached, mischievous and elfish ripple of merriment.

‘And what did he do?’ inquired Richard, feeling like a man who squeezes a nettle tighter and tighter in the hope that the smart would diminish if he only squeezed hard enough. ‘What did he do when you said that to him?’

She laughed aloud then, a ringing peal of reed-throated laughter like a blackbird in the rain. ‘You won’t be too horrified if I tell you?’ she asked.

He promised hurriedly to receive, any account of this incident with complete equanimity.

‘He shook me!’ she cried with another ripple of reed-like merriment. ‘Shook me ever so hard. Till I rattled like a pea pod.’

There was really nothing for Richard to say or to do in response to this – unless he were prepared to shake her himself.

A little unkindly – but he surely had some excuse – he brought her back to the point from which she had commenced this narration. ‘You say his mother’s death has not improved things between you?’

She did become grave at this; very grave and quiet. ‘Poor Robert!’ she sighed. ‘Yes, it upset him completely. He made it difficult for me to go to the funeral. And he has been writing me such strange letters since.’

Her face assumed an unhappy and puzzled expression. ‘You don’t suppose,’ she said, turning to Richard with that peculiarly wistful look that had disarmed him at the beginning, ‘that the death of a person’s mother can really unsettle a person’s mind?’

‘I hope not, I’m sure, Nelly,’ was all he found himself able to say to this. Then the temptation arose violently in him to tell her about the letter he had himself received from Canyot. He fought this down with resolute energy. No! it would be a caddish thing to do – I must play fair in this business.

He recompensed himself for this piece of virtue by a very mischievous move.

‘Do tell me,’ he said, ‘while we’re talking so frankly together, what you told Mrs Shotover about me. I’m sure you must have given her your most real impression. There was no reason for pretending things to “annoy” her.’

If he had wanted to cause his companion agitation and discomfort he certainly succeeded. Nelly pulled up her knees beneath her frock, gave a little twist away from him, dug one of her hands into the ground to support herself, and jumped up on her feet.

‘I don’t think you ought to have asked me that,’ she said, frowning down upon him like an accusing angel.

Richard jumped up too, and picked up his coat.

‘I don’t see why not,’ he retorted. ‘You admitted she’d been teasing you about me. People don’t tease people about things like that out of a blue sky. Besides, you said she called me funny nicknames, making puns on my name.’

There were burning spots of colour in Nelly’s cheeks by this time; but they were roses of anger much more than roses of shame.

‘I don’t think you ought to have said that to me. I don’t think you treated Mrs Shotover at all nicely. She’s an old lady. She’s nearly seventy. And you spoke quite crossly to her in that silly argument. It isn’t that I minded your having different opinions – but you needn’t have been rude.’

‘I thought it was your friend who was rude,’ retorted Richard.

By this time they had, as if by mutual consent, left the friendly shelter of the ash tree, and were retracing their steps towards the lane.

‘I don’t know why it is,’ observed Nelly, addressing her remark to the air and the grass and the hot thundery sunshine which beat down on them with a benignant indifference to their dissension, ‘but men seem so tiresomely serious and pedantic in their arguments sometimes. I think it’s absurd to quote Latin at a tea party.’

To cover her retreat from his ill-timed reference to her friend – oh! how she wished she had never said a word to Mrs Shotover about him! – Nelly had certainly succeeded in reducing their happiness to a low ebb.

He trailed along at her side so sulkily and morosely now that she was tempted to give him yet another stab.

‘It was silly of her, of course, but one couldn’t expect her to like you after your being so brusque to her. But she did go a little far. She said you had a clerical way of talking – that you reminded her of a certain archdeacon she knows.’

Richard burst out at this. ‘She reminded me,’ he cried, ‘of a certain animal I know! I think she’s a most unpleasant old person. I can’t understand your making a friend of her.’

The girl turned clear round. ‘I choose my friends as I choose,’ she cried, her grey eyes turning quite dark with anger; ‘but I see I must ask leave in future from Mr Storm!’ They had reached the gate by this time and Richard without a word moved forward to open it for her. He closed it again meticulously behind them.

‘Well?’ he said, looking straight into her eyes. ‘I suppose I’d better say goodbye now.’

She gave a little gasp and moved back a step. For an infinitesimal moment of time they looked darkly and strangely at one another, as if measuring swords. But the man had already played the winning card, the old eternal masculine trump card in these contentions.

She thought to herself, puzzled, startled, bewildered, frightened, He cannot surely mean that? He cannot mean just to go away, without a word?

‘Goodbye—’ she whispered in a low voice scarcely moving her lips, and stepped back yet further. Then, still facing him, she leaned against the gate, stretching out her arms behind her so that they rested on the top bar. Her wide-open eyes, darkly blue now in her alarm, fixed themselves upon him out of an immobile white face.

‘Goodbye,’ she repeated. And the whispered syllables went floating away over the leafy hedges and the tall waving grasses.

The situation had reversed itself, like the sudden turning of an hour-glass.

She had had complete advantage over him in her unscrupulous power of wounding. He regained the ascendency in his equally unscrupulous power of just leaving her alone.

Neither of them at that moment had the mind to analyse these things. Their whole consciousness was absorbed in their indignation against each other. His emotion was complicated by the great woolly flock of interior vanities and self-respects which he had to protect from outrage. Her emotion, far deeper than his, had nothing to complicate it.

The situation hung suspended in this way for a perceptible moment. Then the masculine diplomatist in Richard, with its heavily acquired sense of order and decency and its hatred of shocks and scenes, led him to take the line that really was the meanest and most cowardly he could take.

Had he accepted her little tragically whispered ‘goodbye’ and gone straight back to Selshurst, he would have struck that white face a remorseless blow; but the account between them would have been balanced up, and the look in her eyes which would have gone with him would have given him no peace.

Instead of that, he proceeded to override her with a forgiveness that was no forgiveness; to secure himself against remorse and yet to keep his grudge intact and the hurt to his vanity unhealed.

He moved up to her side. ‘Come, Nelly, we two are just making fools of ourselves quarrelling like this. Are you going to ask me to lunch? I want to meet your father again so very much. It would never do to come as far as this and go back without seeing him. I didn't see half his collections, you know – only the butterflies.'

She had to submit to this. There was no other way. And thus led, as it were, captive, harnessed helplessly to that elaborate social propriety which women are supposed to be responsible for, but which in reality is man's protection from the passionate sub-civilized woman-soul, she meekly walked by his side, passive, quiet, subdued, unhappy, along the road by which she had come that morning hoping for unspeakable comfort.

'I ought to tell you,' she said as they went along, 'what Mr Canyot has proposed for us; because Father is sure to talk about it and you'd wonder I'd said nothing. So you must let me bore you with just one or two more family details.'

'Don't be sarcastic, Nelly,' he said gently. 'How can I give you advice if I don't know the situation? And you did ask me to help, you know!'

She flashed at him one quick look of bitter mockery; and then went on in quiet unemotional tones.

'Robert suggested – he and Father talked about it without my knowledge – that when we were married, which he wanted to happen very soon, we should live in Hill Cottage – that's a place you haven't seen yet to the north of the village – and my father live there with us. Robert had nearly finished furnishing it when … when you came. It's a pretty little house. It would really suit us very well as far as I'm concerned and Father would be happy there.'

She stopped speaking and they walked on for a second or two in silence. 'Please go on,' said Richard. 'Please tell me everything. You don't know what a magician I can be sometimes! Let me know every aspect of your difficulties.'

‘And then you came,’ the girl burst out; ‘and then his mother was killed. And now his poor head seems to have got the wildest notions into it. I can’t understand his letters!’

‘He told me at the hospital,’ threw in Richard, keeping that ‘threatening letter’ from approaching the tip of his tongue only by a resolute effort, ‘that it was about an exhibition in America that his mother came to see him. Has anything more come of that?’

Nelly looked round sharply. ‘I didn’t know you knew that,’ she said. ‘Well, I expect, as you say, if you’re to give me advice you must know everything. Yes. He talks now of going to America quite soon; in two or three weeks in fact. But what’s going to happen to Father while we’re gone, heaven knows!’

‘Then he wants to marry you at once and carry you over with him?’ Richard threw back at her, in a hard, firm, unemotional voice.

Nelly saw that she had been pushed into a corner. She had been tempted, she hardly knew why, to fling at him that assured ‘while we’re gone’. It was a sort of raft of refuge for her at the moment, that significant ‘we’, but she had no sooner uttered it than she felt as ashamed as if she had been caught in a palpable falsehood.

She wasn’t in any sense conscious of playing off one man against another. Whichever way she looked she saw perils and disasters. But it was intolerable to have to admit to Richard that Canyot had sent her a practical ultimatum, telling her she must choose between them and announcing that he would ‘come down soon to hear her decision’.

It was being left stranded like that, thrown out of her home without a moment’s notice, with her father on her hands, that created this misery, these wavering equivocations.

She, like Canyot himself, had no wish to be taken by anybody ‘out of pity’. Her painter, she knew, needed her, wanted her, loved her single-heartedly, loved her passionately – his wild jealousy proved that – and as long as she leant upon him her pride was quite unhurt. But the idea of having to confess to Richard the drastic nature of those letters she had been receiving, with their refrain of ‘choose’ – ‘choose’ – ‘choose’, was altogether unbearable. No girl could say to a man, ‘I must have one of you – now, which is it to be?’

The whole thing seemed to be a welter of bitterness and misery. And it had been so beautiful, so thrilling, that first encounter with Richard! This miserable problem of money, of necessity, of her father, put her into a completely false position. It spoilt all her happiness with Richard. It made her irritable; it made her say things to hurt him; it made her hate him.

She felt convinced that he didn’t believe that all was as well in her relations with Canyot as she had tried to make out. She had practically lied about it. Canyot had never suggested taking her to America. And she divined that Richard suspected her of lying. But what could she do? She had, at all costs, to protect both Richard and herself from the humiliation of her being driven into his arms by Robert and her father!

Life was certainly much more cruel to women than she had had any idea of before these last months. And it had been so lovely, so indescribably lovely, that first delicious vague consciousness that there was ‘something’ between herself and Richard different from anything else in the world!

And now this wretched money business, and the question of her father, had come in to spoil it all! And of course, poor darling Robert. But curiously enough it wasn’t, just now, her anxiety over any broken heart of Robert that filled her with gloom. She had a queer instinctive feeling that she could always ‘deal with’ Robert, whether she married him or not; ‘deal with' him and quiet him and satisfy him and make him happy or at least content. It was as though she felt that merely for her to be alive on the earth at all was in a sense enough for Robert!

The case of Richard was completely different.

And what, when it came to that, had she appealed to Richard for in her desperation? He had come to her and they had quarrelled. He was so tiresomely touchy and vain. And was that to be the end?

What was it, when she had written that letter, that she had had in her mind? He was by her side now and she must protect him from herself, from pity for herself, by making it seem that all was well between her and the painter. Why must she do this? Because she was a woman; and women were not allowed to say straight out, from a clear unclouded sky, 'I, Nelly Moreton, love you, Richard Storm.'

Instead of this they had to protect these impulsive susceptible creatures from their own emotions, from their emotions too! Why had they to do this? Why was the whole weight and burden of everything put upon them? Because they were women; and life had been arranged in that manner, by God, by nature, and by men!

'Well,' she said to her companion as they observed the figure of her father crossing the garden to meet them, 'you must give me your magician's advice very quickly; because I know Father intends to walk back with you to Selshurst after lunch. He has to make his final settlement today with the people there.'

She turned to him as she spoke and he noticed that though she lifted her eyebrows with a touch of quizzical humour her underlip was trembling.

'The magician's advice to the enchanted princess,' said he, 'had to be given in parables: It's better to get drenched by the rain than to shelter where the lightning is attracted. But it's best of all to wait under the nearest hedge till the rain is over.'

Her response to this was that same puzzled, bewildered, appealing look that had followed him in his first departure from her after she had watched him light the candles in Littlegate church and they had waited behind the bolted door.

Chapter 8

The look with which Nelly had received his evasive parable haunted Richard all the next day and the day after.

He set himself to examine his own feelings and to try, if he could, to sound hers.

He was unable to write a line; and was thankful enough when his correspondence arrived from Paris and gave him something definite to do apart from poetry.

He had learnt from what John Moreton said, as they walked to the town together, that in no less than a month's time they would have to move from the vicarage, so that the place might be made ready for his successor.

It was a wretched situation and the one thing that would have made his own way clearer, if not quite clear, a definite knowledge that Nelly really cared for him and did not care for Canyot, remained as obscure as ever.

He saw shrewdly enough the diabolical trap in which the girl was caught, with nothing except immediate marriage as an escape from a struggle for bare life with a helpless parent on her hands. He saw too that whoever did step in and rescue her, whether it were Canyot or himself, there would stiil be the difficulty of her pride and that horrid suspicion – was it out of pity?

On the third day after his walk with the old man, Richard set out, in the morning, to see Nelly again. He was in a bitter, miserable frame of mind; for a letter had reached him from Paris with that signature he knew so fatally well and he had broken his resolution by reading it. He had meant to destroy it, but he had read it, and it punished him cruelly now with its sweet passionate clinging sentences, soft and electric, like the fingers that had penned it.

This letter and the vibrations it had stirred, coming on the top of his trouble about Nelly, wrecked completely his peace of mind.

He tore the great dancer's characteristic syllables into tiny bits and flung them from him into the hedge as he went along.

The contradictory emotions that swayed him – Nelly's white face and great childish eyes and those monumental heathen gestures of the body born to kindle undying desire – broke up his whole inner integrity.

In vain he sought to associate first one and then the other with his new mystical faith.

'I am nothing in myself,' he said to his heart, seeking to quiet its angry agitation. 'I am merely one momentary pulse of consciousness of the great earth-life that struggles to purge itself, to free itself, to enrich itself with a thousand new subtleties, to pass into the something else for which there is no name but the name of God.

'This perilous woman and this rare child are mere incidents in the love life of a wretched chance-driven wanderer. I take one. I take the other. I leave them both. It matters nothing in the final issue. All that matters is that this personal life of mine should lose itself in the larger life that flows down the generations; that I should become that life and let it become me. And then that I should express its beauty, its tragic wonderful cool-breathing eternal beauty, in such words as I can hammer out!'

He said these things to himself as he strode the now well-known lane. But these things brought him no peace. That white face with the troubled eyes remained more important to him than any earth-soul. And those noble limbs moving in incomparable rhythms against the black curtains of the Théâtre des Arts refused to be reduced to the temporary and the irrelevant.

They pressed upon him, that girl’s face and that woman’s form. They demanded that his philosophy should include them, account for them, reconcile them. Ah! it could never reconcile them. That was, he thought with a bitter smile, precisely where philosophy broke down.

He half expected, as lovers do, that he would meet the girl where he had met her before; but he arrived at the vicarage without having caught a glimpse of her.

He found the door of the house open and he could see the buxom Grace at the further end of the kitchen garden pulling up lettuces.

He knocked. There was no answer. He knocked again. Still there was no answer. He wondered if he should shout to Grace and command her to announce his presence. He looked at his watch. It was a quarter to twelve.

‘They must both be out,’ he said to himself. Then it occurred to him to look into the church, where he had first seen her.

Yes! There she was; kneeling in the very spot where he had sat when he had lighted those candles to the memory of Benjamin and Susanna.

The old atheist priest – if so reverent a worshipper of Christ could be called an atheist – was celebrating what was certainly an unorthodox and probably an illegal Mass. Maybe for the last time too! thought Richard, as he slipped quietly into the building and knelt down at the girl’s side. She had lifted her head at the sound of his footsteps and as he took his place and she moved further into the pew to make room for him she gave him a smile so radiant, so full of spontaneous happiness, that it redeemed in one moment all the past days. It was certainly from a sincere and contrite heart that he muttered his ‘mea culpa, mea maxima culpa’ during that ancient rite, the one flawless work of art, whatever else it might be, of the passionate mutterings of the old man – and Richard noticed how often his heretical old lips blundered inevitably into the great word he loathed – it seemed to both of them that in a sense beyond anything they had ever felt they were lifted above the troubles of brain and flesh and nerves. 'Lifted into what?' the man asked himself, as they remained on their knees, with the passion of the thing upon them, as the unfrocked priest carried away the vessels he had used. 'Not into any mere soul of the earth! Into something that belonged to the whole stellar system. Yes! and beyond that! Into something that belonged to the life which was behind and within life, from whose unknown heart the souls of men and gods and planets and stars drew the rhythm that sustained the universe.'

By a mutual impulse they moved out together without waiting for the old man. Nelly showed him her mother's grave, upon which the orchis maculata now put forth tiny red buds. 'Cecily', murmured Richard, 'what a delicious old-fashioned name! It seems to smell of herbaceous borders and box hedges!'

'It's my name!' cried Nelly, laughing. 'Eleanor Cecily Moreton,' she repeated solemnly.

'I should like to have known your mother,' he said earnestly.

'You'd have liked her much better than me,' she responded. 'She would have never said horrid things to you.'

They moved on to the grave of Benjamin and Susanna. It gave them both a peculiar satisfaction to feel how they were linked by this churchyard.

'Why didn't they call you Talbot?' she asked.

'They must have known what a rebel I was going to be. It wouldn't do for a friend of revolutionaries to be called Talbot.'

'Are you a revolutionary?' she inquired. 'You seem to me most awfully conservative – much more conservative than I am.'

'I don't know what I am,' said Richard. 'I met a man in Paris who'd have made a Red of me if I'd seen much more of him. I'm afraid I'm too easily influenced.'

'I like people who can be influenced,' she said gravely. 'Father certainly can't and I don't think Robert can – except by me!'

This last phrase was thrown in after a pause and was accompanied by that mischievous elfish smile which had puzzled Richard before.

Leaving the grave of Dr Storm they moved together towards the house, Nelly silent and preoccupied, pondering something.

Suddenly she turned to him with shining eyes. 'Do you know what I'm going to do with you?' she cried. 'I'm going to take you for a picnic! I often do that with my best friends – with Mrs Shotover for example–' and she shot a whimsical glance at Richard which was received, this time, very amiably. 'Grace will look after Father. He hates picnics. Besides, he'll want his rest after lunch. And we'll go off and have all the afternoon to ourselves till tea time! Shall we do that? Would you like to? Unless you'd prefer to look at the painted ladies again!'

Richard's contentment at this proposal was so evident that it did not need his feeble joke, 'I prefer them unpainted!' to show her what he was feeling.

Gay and radiant, with a happiness in their hearts only permitted once or twice in a lifetime to the sons and daughters of men, they went together into the kitchen and assisted Grace, who leered at them both like the sly Shakespearean wench she was and even winked at her young mistress, in preparing sandwiches and cake and bread and butter and jam.

Hearing their voices and laughter the old naturalist came in too after a while. Richard was surprised at the friendly humorous chuckles he bestowed on the expedition and at the alacrity with which he added to their basket of provisions, a flask of wine from his study cupboard.

'A shame to leave any of this for the good man who comes after me!' he said, with chuckling unction and maliciously twinkling eyes. 'It's what I use in my Mass; and if you young people drink it up, there won’t be any left for the Eidolon Vulgaris!’

He escorted thme to the gate and wished them good luck with such mellow and ironic benevolence that Richard could not help thinking of the dignified bonhomie of the Rabelaisian Grangousier.

Nelly did not hesitate for a moment as to the direction they should take. She led him along a little secluded path bordered by blossoming elders which emerged after a mile or two of circuitous ascent upon a high ridge of arable upland, covered at the season by a waving sea of green rye and barley.

She led him across these cornfields, walking with swinging youthful steps in front of him along the narrow chalk path; every now and then stopping and turning round to point out to him how red-bright the fumitory was and to indicate to him some little plant associated with her earlier memories.

When they reached the further brink of this ridge, where the ryefield ended in a thickset hedge and the path in a three-barred well-worn stile, Richard cried aloud with delight at the beauty of the valley that lay stretched before them. It was enclosed on the further end by a wood of oaks and hazel; and the edges of it, sloping down by soft degrees to a grassy level floor, were covered with thyme and cistus, milkwort and trefoil.

‘Don’t you like it?’ cried the girl in a voice of such thrilling happiness that it made even the turtle dove’s crooning seem less golden in contentment. ‘I call it the Happy Valley. I never come here unless I’m in my best mood of all.’ And she added after a pause, ‘I haven’t been here for two years!’

Richard helped her over the stile and they lifted the basket across. ‘How heavy it is!’ she said with a quick frown of solicitude. ‘I oughtn’t to have let you carry it all that way. How thoughtless I am! I quite forgot the old thing. Here, let’s hide it under the hedge. We don’t want it yet do we? We can come back for it when I’ve shown you the Happy Valley.’

Richard was certainly relieved to get rid of the weight when it actually was out of his hands, but he had not been conscious of it as a burden. He felt that day as if all the baskets in the world might be piled on his back and he would be oblivious to it.

They ran down the thyme-scented slope hand in hand, and when they reached level ground he pressed her fingers so tightly in his own before releasing them that poor Canyot’s engagement ring hurt her severely.

It may have been the sharpness of the ring bringing melancholy thoughts, or it may have been the shy happiness of a heart too full for expression, but she walked very silently by his side through the rest of the Happy Valley. It was Richard, not she, who exclaimed with astonished delight at the huge masses of budding honeysuckle that overspread the bushes above them. It was Richard, not she, who pointed to the sprays of wild roses, the first he had seen that year.

When they reached the end of the valley, where the path they were following entered the wood, they stopped by mutual consent and leaned over the old weather-worn gate covered with a minute grey lichen and looked into the cool leafy shadows.

‘Why don’t you take off your hat?’ he said suddenly, in a voice that to himself sounded strange and forced. ‘Like you did in the Selshurst garden,’ he added in a louder tone, making an effort, so it seemed to himself, to conceal the wild beating of his heart.

As he spoke he flung down his own hat and stick on to the bracken fronds beside them.

Her breath came unevenly, in funny little gasps. She put her hands feebly up to her head and pulled out the hat pins one by one; and then holding the hat on the top of the gate stuck the pins she had removed into it, one by one again, her fingers visibly trembling. High up in a beech tree above them a little invisible warbler kept uttering its own name in a monotonous chant, as if drunk with the sunshine and the pride of its well-hidden nest. ‘Chiff-chaff! Chiff-chaff! chiff-chaff!’ that invisible owner of those leafy solitudes kept repeating.

Richard took her hat and laid it gently down, balancing it carefully upon a last year’s plant of hart’s tongue fern, still glossy and unfaded.

As he did so one of those weakly fluttering pale-coloured moths, which frequent shadowy places and move so helplessly when they’re disturbed, flew against his face.

When he turned to her again he noticed that her eyes were so large and bright that it was as if a disembodied spirit was gazing into his very soul. The slight movement he instinctively had made towards her was stopped suddenly by that look and he clutched the top of the gate and drew a deep breath.

Then it was that the brightness in her eyes softened, melted, grew infinitely passive and tender, and by an impulse that seemed to come from some power outside themselves they threw their arms around each other and clung together, their lips joined and their hearts beating as if they were two hearts in one body.

‘Chiff-chaff! chiff-chaff! chiff-chaff!’ repeated the little invisible lord of the sanctuary they had invaded, giving to their encounter the winged blessing of the very Eros of the woods.

Very gently the girl released herself and a sigh of happiness that seemed beyond even the happiness of that place of enchantment rose from her lips and floated away among the leaves.

Then she nestled against him, her head bent so low that he could not see her face.

For a long space they stood thus silently together, he leaning against the gate and she leaning against him. Then with his hands on each side of her fair head he lightly lifted up her face as if it had been a delicate white flower and holding it away from him kissed her with a long silent kiss that seemed to throw so strange a trance upon them both that even after he had released her and she leaned, with her head on her hands, against that confederate gate-bar, and he rested motionless beside her, his arms about her body, they seemed like people drugged, spellbound, magnetized, ‘entoiled in woofèd fantasies’.

‘Chiff-chaff! chiff-chaff! chiff-chaff!’ repeated the relentless warbler; and neither of the two to the end of their lives forgot that particular sound. It blended with the faint, relaxed, indescribably sweet languor that took possession of the maiden, and it blended with the infinitely tender if less deep emotion that filled the heart of the man.

At length she moved aside from his caresses and put up her hands against him as he tried to kiss her again.

‘Give me my hat, dearest one,’ she said. ‘We must be good now. We’ve so much to think of. I feel as if I ought to think of everybody now, for the rest of my life. I’ve been so happy with you, my dear!’ She surprised him by suddenly lifting up one of his hands and pressing it against her lips. The gesture touched him more than anything she had ever done. A great wave of tenderness rose up in him, so that at that moment he would have willingly marched straight to death for her sake.

But as she dropped his hand her old mocking-elf’s smile flickered over her white face. ‘Poor old Robert,’ she murmured. ‘Look! I’ve still got on his ring.’

She held up her fingers so that he might see his rival’s gift. It was a simple enough matter – a little turquoise set in pearls; but Richard regarded it with gloom. It brought back to him with a rush of painful thoughts all the troublesome circumstances that hemmed them round.

‘Are you going on wearing it now?’ he asked as she put on her hat and they turned away together leaving the little chiff-chaff in possession of his leafy paradise.

‘I’m not going to take it off today’ she answered. ‘It’s unlucky to take off one ring till you’ve got another!’ And she laughed a naughty child’s laugh at his discomforted face.

Her response irritated him. It seemed the sort of thing that a well-bred girl oughtn’t to say. It was a silly servant-girl remark, he thought, and he teased himself in sulky silence over it till they were halfway back through the Happy Valley. It somehow made him think of Mrs Shotover. Had that confounded old woman really corrupted the girl? Had she put coarse, common, cynical notions into her head?

Observing the effect of her words, Nelly gave way to an irresistible temptation and did what she could to make it worse. ‘How do I know,’ she said, with a mocking little laugh, ‘that you won’t feel quite differently tomorrow? I’d better not throw Robert away too quickly.’

If she had intended to wound him she certainly succeeded. His swarthy face darkened and he raised one of his brown thin hands to his mouth, an instinctive habit of his when seriously annoyed. If the gesture was caused by a desire to hide a certain ugly, cruel, revengeful curve of his lips, it hid nothing at all from her; and she went still further …

‘Robert has faith in me,’ she said, ‘whatever I do and whatever I say, too. Oh you don’t know what things I’ve said to him! And he’s taken them all like the dear lamb he is. Poor old Rob! I’ve been a bad girl to him I’m afraid.’

‘What a wonderful mass of honeysuckle!’ Richard cried in a sort of desperation, anxious to do anything to put an end to this miserable estrangement. ‘I’m going to get you some.’ And he proceeded to clamber up the bank and make his way into the middle of the brushwood. He derived a savage pleasure from the nettle stings and thorn pricks through which he struggled. He felt as though in forcing his way through these obstacles towards the resplendent fragrant clusters above him he were fighting back to those delicious moments of love which her teasing had spoilt.

But how could she drag in that business of ‘dear old Robert’ and his turquoise ring? A ‘lamb’ did she call him? A confounded old tiger! But how could she, after kissing him like that and being kissed, drag things down to banality and commonness and silly servant-girl superstitions? Or was she, after all, quite a different person from what he had imagined, from the Nelly he had fancied himself so fond of? Was she, really, playing the two of them off against each other and ready to take which ever seemed the more desirable catch? He was able for the moment – perhaps the thorn pricks and nettle stings helped him – to think of her thus grossly without the Feast shame; and he thought to himself how queer it was that the fact of men and women being thrilled by one another’s caresses did not in the least really bring them together. They seemed indeed to pay the penalty for that momentary unity by a more absolute relapse into their separate hostile identities when the rare moment was past.

Then he thought within his heart, But after all I love her. But this ‘love’ or whatever it is, seems to have no influence upon our clashes with each other, as fierce separate units of nature, each struggling for its own purposes! He derived, as men of his type do, a revengeful satisfaction from this sort of pedantic analysis.

That he could analyse the girl thus and detach himself from her so quickly after their first embrace gave him a malicious satisfaction and soothed his vanity like a costly ointment.

On the strength of it he tore and rent at the reluctant tangles of yellow and rose-pink sweetness, pulling down huge trailing sprays of it, heedless of scratches upon face and hands, and gathering it in his arms in massed confusion, all mixed up with bindweed and bryony.

From the grassy level below Nelly watched his movements. 'Bless his heart!' she said to herself. 'I love him! I love him! I love him! This is not a dream. This is really true. I am standing in my Happy Valley watching my man pick me honeysuckle.'

Then she thought, 'I mustn't tease him. I won't tease him. I'll be sweet to him when he comes back. But how could he get so angry when he's just found out I love him? When we've just been together like that?

'How peculiar men are! Everything seems on the surface with them – how you behave, how you look, what you say. As if it mattered what you said! Don't they ever say things by opposites? Don't they ever rage and stamp and scratch and bite and tease without it meaning anything at all; anything except – oh! I don't know – a sort of stretching out of one's arms and legs, after sitting in the same position too long? No I suppose they don't. I suppose they can't be superficial, however much they try! I suppose their surface is the same as their depth. I suppose they're all surface!

'Mrs Richard Storm. It sounds rather nice. I don't think I shall want to keep him in Littlegate. It would be lovely to have a flat in Paris. But Father can't be left. Oh how annoying it is not to be entirely alone in the world! No! Father can't be left. And I must make Robert completely understand that I really shall belong to him much more when I'm married to Richard than I am now. Because he gets on my nerves now with everything unsettled and I can't love him as much as I do really without his wanting to marry me. But when I'm married to Richard he can't want to marry me, so I shall be free to be as lovely to him as ever I like. For I won't stand it if Richard gets jealous. If he has me altogether that must be enough for him. I won't allow him to be jealous! I won't have it.'

When Richard did finally come scrambling down the bank to her side his arms were so full of honeysuckle that he looked like a moving bush.

'Though Birnam Wood be come to Dunsinane!' cried the girl running to meet him, and with feminine mischief kissing his face through the masses of honeysuckle before he could catch hold of her. 'Well done! How perfectly beautiful! How sweet they are – intoxicating.' She pressed a spray to her face and inhaled the heavy fragrance. 'Oh Richard how happy I am! What a day this is. Oh! my dear, my dear—'

Her words died away, as dropping the great scented bundle at their feet, he clasped her slim form tightly to him and kissed her on the mouth, cheeks, eyelids and chin. Then, while he held her close with one arm round her body, he passed his free hand caressingly over her forehead.

'You do really love me, sweetheart?' he said, searching half-angrily, half-tenderly, for that absolute conviction of certitude in those soft feminine eyes for which the whole human race since the beginning has sought in vain.

She answered with so passionate and clinging a kiss that it was difficult to retain the questioning mood, and with the masses of golden-pink sweetness, like an offering to them from her own special gods of her Happy Valley, held in both their arms, they moved slowly back to where they had left their basket.

Their meal was unspoilt by any further difference. Bareheaded they sat opposite each other on a bank of thyme and milkwort; the now un-analytical Richard insisting on twisting a spray of his treasure trove round her head, and round her neck too, while in eager solemnity she untied the provisions.

They ate hungrily and happily, enjoying themselves without thought of past and future, dividing lettuce sandwiches and jam sandwiches between them with the laughing greed of lovers who can afford to play with the lower appetites, as children play with toys.

Having drunk to the very dregs the liberal bottle of milk supplied by Grace they discovered at the bottom of the basket, lying by the side of the vicar’s flask of port wine, nothing less than Nelly’s silver christening mug.

‘Let’s christen our meeting with this!’ cried the girl; and jumping to their feet they filled the little cup to the brim.

The sun shining upon the red wine made it glow like the blood of a god; and when they had both drunk of it and kissed each other ‘with purple-stained mouth’, they poured out what was left as a heathen libation to the powers – whatever they might have been – who had brought about their encounter.

In queer unlovely places, many months after this, in sordid streets, in depressing offices, on crowded pavements, Richard Storm had many occasions to remember that moment of his life, when wreathed with honeysuckle, round head and neck and waist, this girl, the very incarnation of youthful passion, poured out the wine cup upon the earth.

Chapter 9

ROBERT CANYOT SHOWED himself more of a man over the affair of Nelly's marriage than anyone who had known him would have expected. He put off for several weeks his voyage to America so that he might himself give the bride away.

Mrs Shotover denounced the whole business and refused to be present at the wedding. She was positively rude to Nelly on the subject; accusing her, in very pointed language, language more suitable to the age of Fielding than of Hardy, of having made up her mind to keep both the men. There was certainly this much justification for the old lady's wrath, that Nelly refused to give up her former fiancé's ring – the turquoise with little pearls – and wore no other except the thin golden one that proclaimed her a wedded wife.

The old woman only got one chance of giving vent completely to her feelings and that was not to Nelly but to her husband.

If she was 'eighteenth-century' in her explicitness to the bride, she was positively 'Elizabethan' in her outpouring to the bridegroom. Richard however was far too content with his lot at that moment to do more than lead the woman on and tease her with an exaggerated serenity.

He was as a matter of fact perfectly serene. It suited him in every respect, this devoted and very practical waiting upon her of his bride's former betrothed. It was precisely one of those situations that Richard's peculiar nature was eminently adapted to sustain with aplomb and indulgence. He felt thoroughly sorry for his defeated rival and it eased his conscience in the only way his conscience could-be really eased by giving him every facility to make the best of the rind, so to speak, while he enjoyed the fruit.

A man is never displeased to see his mistress adored by another when he feels she is entirely his own; and there was not the remotest shadow of doubt that Nelly was his, just then, from the top of her head to the sole of her foot. The sweetness of her complete abandonment to him during those first days was indeed the most thrilling and delicious experience he had known in his whole life – so wonderful and flawless that he felt it would be an ingratitude to the gods not to dispense in his turn as much happiness as he could. Canyot's shadow on their pleasure would have been much worse than his real presence, for the painter seemed to have the power of reducing the pain of his loss to a minimum as long as he was not driven away and forgotten.

The truth was that neither Richard nor Nelly had the least idea of what was going on in the young man's mind. He showed no outward sign of bitterness or moroseness or jealousy.

He was gentler in the expression of his opinions, quicker-witted it almost seemed in his response to their high spirits; and there was not the least tendency on his part to take advantage of the serene indulgence with which Richard tolerated and indeed encouraged his friendship with the bride.

They were married in Littlegate church by the old naturalist, and the service that united them was the last he was permitted, as priest of the church, officially to perform.

They went down to Fogmore for seven days' honeymoon, during which time the devoted Canyot helped Grace and the old man to settle into Hill Cottage.

On their return from Fogmore the painter informed them that he had decided to put off his voyage to a yet further date, giving as a plausible enough reason that he would be too late now for the Philadelphia exhibition of his work, and that the New York one was not to occur till five or six weeks later.

Instead of leaving them therefore to enjoy their vita nuova in complete isolation the extraordinary young man proceeded quite calmly to settle down again at Wind Shuttle Farm.

This unexpected move of his was not entirely agreeable to Richard but it would have been much more disagreeable to him to have seen the least cloud on his young wife's face; and she, it appeared, was entirely pleased with the arrangement.

He could not altogether find the clue to her attitude to her old lover, but he contented himself with putting it down to Nelly's maternal instinct and her girlish desire to soften as far as was possible the boy's feeling of loss in Mrs Canyot's death.

'She wants to "mother" him,' he said to himself. He derived a certain self-flattering moral unction from the thought that he was being singularly and unconventionally magnanimous to them both.

Thus did those golden June weeks pass by, in almost perfect felicity, for Richard; in whatever mysterious happiness a young girl derives from the satisfaction of her heart's passion, for Nelly; and in fierce persistent wrestling with new problems of his art, for the recluse at Wind Shuttle Farm.

The only cloud upon the horizon, if it could be called a cloud, was the estrangement between Mrs Richard Storm of Hill Cottage and Mrs George Shotover of Furze Lodge. But this cloud had already broken in two rainstorms of strange language from the latter lady; there now seemed no reason to doubt that among the scanty parishioners of the newly appointed vicar of Littlegate none was more clearly marked out for an unruffled life than the daughter of John Moreton.

It was only the scurrying white-tailed rabbits and the great black-winged rooks haunting the long summer twilights between Furze Cover and Horthing Down who could have predicted any sort of evil omen upon the wind; and these could only have done it had they possessed enough superstitious intelligence to give credence to the angry mutterings of a lonely old woman, deprived by nature's tricks of the one thing she loved.

The weather continued to bestow upon the newly married couple, as the season drew on towards the longest day, its most wonderful largess of ample sunshine and cool-breathing balmy air. A few heavy showers in those moonless nights kept the light chalk soil from becoming over-dry.

In the lower pastures the lush grasses were already laid level with the ground; and the murmur of the mowing machine, like a great invisible bumble bee laden with summer spoils, made a constant background to the crooning of the doves in the massive-foliaged trees.

On the uplands the green rye was already up to the height of Nelly's waist as she went afield to gather the first red poppies, while the green barley was up to her knees and the wheat well above her ankles.

The blackbird's reedy cry was heard seldom now; its place in the feathered orchestra of the lanes and fields was taken by the thicker-throated 'muggy' and the hot sun-burnt ecstasies of finches and buntings.

There was a perceptible change in the mood of Robert Canyot as the time drew near for his departure to America.

He saw less of Nelly and hardly anything of Richard.

He went out, morning after morning, for the whole day taking his lunch with him and not returning till late in the evening.

It was always to Toat Farm that he went, for he kept his precious easel-picture, now near completion, of that sluggish pond and those sombre ancient walls in the cottage of Sally-Maria's aunt. He had become a close friend of this woman, a person almost as silent as her dumb niece; and Charley Budge and Mr Priddle had grown so accustomed to his presence that they gave him their most familiar nods and 'how-be-gettin'-on-then' as if he were an established institution like old Miss Stone or the grocer's cart from Selshurst. When it was a Sunday that he was there, there used sometimes to be quite a group of farm hands round his picture, Charley having brought Tom Rattle and Jimmy Roebuck to see 'how 'twaren't like a common school-marm job – more like what 'un sees in shop windies and them show places'.

And on these occasions the men in their tightly fitting, uncomfortable cloth suits, with a flower stuck in both buttonhole and cap, would poke at the picture tentatively with their sticks as though it had been Farmer Patchem's dangerous sow.

Canyot had put the very 'body and pressure' of his soul into this picture and the rustic wonder it excited gave him more pleasure than any virtuoso's praise. He held, like Molière, that the first test of good art was that it should arrest the attention of the simplest. He had concentrated all his powers upon the reflection in the water of that rank herbage and those mossy walls, indicating as well as he could the shadowed presence there of a spirit of the spot, carrying the mind down a long dim vista of obscure memories, gathering itself, out of the colours and shapes of the moment, into a kind of eternal vision – a platonic archetype, that was more than a crumbling wall and a bank of hemlocks.

It was on Canyot's last Sunday in England that he presented himself soon after breakfast at Hill Cottage and bluntly asked Nelly to accompany him that day to his favourite haunt. He wanted to put the very final touches to his picture and he wanted also, so he told her, to make her acquainted with Sally-Maria, so that he should feel that the child was not left quite friendless at his departure.

His abrupt request fell like a sharply flung pebble into the smooth waters of the little ménage.

Richard had been enlarging upon the fact that they had not yet revisited their Happy Valley and he had secured a promise from Nelly that they should walk over there that afternoon.

He looked at her therefore very emphatically, when in their small garden, among the phloxes and sweet-williams, Canyot sprung his intrusive request. Nelly looked silently and nervously from one to another. Her mind recalled Mrs Shotover's upbraidings. Was she really, as the old woman had said, behaving as no decent girl ought to behave in 'hanging on to two men'?

'I'm afraid I can't, Robert,' she said; 'you see we've arranged to go out this afternoon and take our tea out so as to give Grace a free day. I shouldn't like to disappoint Grace, you see. And if we left Richard alone she'd never let him get tea for himself. She looks after him better than I do. No, Robert, I'm afraid it's impossible.' The little invention about Grace and her 'day out' had brought the colour to her cheeks; and the young painter did not hesitate to fix his eyes sternly and passionately upon her.

She looked tantalizingly soft and sweet, hovering there in her embarrassed hesitation.

She looked the very incarnation of English girlhood, some idyllic blending of earthiness and innocence such as might well make a jilted lover 'grow pale and spectre-thin' with unsatisfied longing. Canyot was neither thin nor pale at that moment, however. His muscular form was very erect and straight. His tanned, corrugated face scowling gloomily at her showed no inclination to be the only sufferer that day. His empty sleeve too had its own voice in the matter. He was one of those who had left ‘something’ behind in France; as he stood before her, subjecting her to the concentrated reproach of his gaze, there was that about him that made it very difficult for Nelly to hold to her decision. She felt a sudden immense pity for him and her heart nearly yielded. The freemasonry of youth was between them, adding a curious poignancy to her maternal instinct, and the very tenderness and softness of her mood just then, though due to her abandonment to Richard, made it all the more difficult for her to be hard and austere in dealing with her former lover.

‘My wife will be delighted to see your picture some other day, before you leave us,’ remarked Richard, conscious for the first time since his marriage that he and Nelly were at cross-purposes.

Nelly had looked up with a quick flush when he began to speak but her eyes dropped and she bent down over the flowers when she realized the import of his words. Why couldn’t he have been generous just then? She would have rewarded him for it. She would have loved him with an added love. Why couldn’t men understand these things? Why must they always be so legal and exacting, when what was wanted was the impulse of self-effacement?

She kept her head bent down for a perceptible moment of embarrassing suspense, inhaling the heavy scent of the phloxes until it became a thing that was no longer a perfume at all, but a thought – a wild reckless thought in her brain.

The beauty of the yellow day-lilies against the curves of her bending figure made Canyot sigh bitterly and worked like a sort of angry fever in his blood.

‘Well,’ he said, almost roughly, ‘I’ve got to go back anyway to Wind Shuttle to get my things. I’ve got to pass by here again. It’s on my way. So if you change your mind look out for me. Do you understand? I’ll be back in half an hour but I won’t worry you if you don’t want to come. I’ve only a week more, you know. Then I shan’t trouble you any more.’

He took no notice at all of Richard’s movement to open the gate for him but strode surlily off down the slope of the hill.

At that moment the little gate swung open again and the ex-priest entered.

‘What’s that, Father?’ cried the girl, noticing a letter in the old man’s hand.

‘It’s for your husband, my sweet,’ remarked the naturalist. ‘I met the boy bringing it up. It came by some extra post. It’s a foreign one.’

Nelly snatched the letter from him. ‘Oh! it’s from Paris. I do love the French stamps. They’re so much more exciting than ours. Here you are!’ She handed it over to her husband who, seeing the hand it was written by, placed it unopened in his pocket.

Nelly put on her spoilt-child air at once, the air so natural to youthful twenty-two married to middle-aged forty-five.

‘Don’t hide it away!’ she cried. ‘Nelly wants to see it. Nelly likes foreign letters!’

Richard turned just a little bit pale. This was a most unlucky trick of the imps of chance! ‘It really wouldn’t interest you, sweetheart,’ he said; ‘it’s not an exciting letter. A friend of mine – not anything thrilling.’

The old man who had been watching this scene, with a shrewd interest unusual in him, now broke in. He laid his hand on his son-in-law’s arm – ‘Show it to her, boy; show it to her,’ he said. ‘Never keep letters away from them. They don’t like it. It’s a bad beginning.’ And he sighed heavily, thinking of one of his own early quarrels with his dead Cecily.

Richard turned paler still. He found himself stammering some quite fantastic irrelevance, about its being a literary secret.

Nelly made a quick movement and snatched the letter from his pocket. ‘You make me curious,’ she said. ‘I must have just a tiny little peep.’ And she made as though she were about to open it.

When he recalled later every little detail of that scene it seemed to him as if a terrible eternity elapsed between that movement of hers and what he did next. During that eternity of seconds he seemed conscious of jet-black icebergs crashing together in a darkened sea.

Then, in a desperate inspiration, he acted.

He snatched the letter from her and tore it, unopened as it was, into four thick pieces. ‘There!’ he said in a husky voice. ‘Come here, Nell!’

She glanced at her father and raised her eyebrows a little.

The old man made a gesture as much as to say, ‘Go in with him, my dear, but it’s a bad job!’ And then she followed him into the house. ‘Here, Nell!’ he called and she followed him into the kitchen.

He lifted the round iron cover of the kitchen grate, with the implement appointed for that purpose, and thrust the four torn pieces into the fire. Then he replaced the iron lid.

Grace was quick to notice by both their faces that something was amiss. ‘Lord, Miss Nelly!’ she cried. ‘What be up to then? Burnin’ weddin’ scrips and holy promises? Lord! Mr Richard, sir – look to her now! Goodness save us! what fine cantraps and unlawful doin’s is this? Miss Nelly darlin’, now don’t ‘ee be takin’ on like that! Don’t ‘ee, dearie!’

And she put her stalwart arms round her mistress who had suddenly turned a deadly white and was supporting herself against the table.

Grace almost lifted her on to a chair. ‘Don’t stand starin’ like as you a’ seed the Devil, Mr Richard. Get the dear darlin’ a drop o’ water!’

He put a glass hurriedly under the tap, obeying the wench ‘meek as any dazed sheep’ as Grace commented afterwards. ‘Gi’e it to I!’ she cried. ‘Bless the man! it’s the hot water tap ‘ee’s a-turnin’. Here, gi’e it to I!’

But Nelly waved away the glass. ‘I’m all right now,’ she said, ‘thanks all the same Gracie dear!’

And certainly her colour began coming rapidly back.

Richard stood anxiously and wretchedly before her, twisting his fingers backwards and forwards and slowly nodding his head, as was his habit when utterly nonplussed.

She raised her eyes to his face and smiled a bitter, cruel little smile. It gratified and pleased her to see him look so entirely foolish.

Then she sprang to her feet. ‘All right now Gracie!’ she said. ‘It was the heat, I suppose.’

‘Hope ‘tweren’t no wills nor testaments nor birth certifications you’ve a-throwed away like that and burned to cinders? I keeps this ’ere stove as hot as Pharaoh’s Furnace, I do, else the darned thing don’t cook nothin’; but I ain’t a-heatin’ kitchen fires for to burn weddin’ dockiments and citations!’

‘That’s all right, Gracie. It was nothing. It was just a letter from a friend. It was nothing important.’

‘Well, it be ashes now, sure enough, whatever it were!’ Grace returned to her cooking with a philosophical wink.

The husband and wife went back to the front of the cottage. They found the old man anxiously awaiting them in the porch.

‘Nothing serious I hope,’ said he. He looked at Richard gravely. ‘Never keep letters from them. And never explain anything to them. Obey your own conscience. Go your own way. And if they want you to change your mind, just you hold your tongue and go on as you are. They'll come round all right, sooner or later. But never argue with 'em. Do what you have to do; never hide your letters, and never argue!'

'There's a lot in what you say, sir,' said Richard very solemnly, propitiating the old man.

When the ex-priest had returned to his own room, the husband and wife moved by common consent into the garden. They both seemed conscious of a craving for air and sun. But the magnetism of their quarrel held them together and drew them towards each other.

'So you still keep up with at least one of them?' said Nelly, bending down, precisely as she had done half an hour ago, to smell the phloxes.

'Yes, I keep up with one of them,' answered Richard. 'If to "keep up with" means to burn letters unopened.'

She lifted up her head at that, and her eyes flashed from her flushed face like two steel-blue blades. 'Don't lie, Richard! It's not worth it. You know you've never burnt one of that woman's letters before! And you wouldn't have burnt that one, if you hadn't been scared of my reading it. It's no use lying. We may just as well face it. If you must keep these things going on, you must, I suppose. If you're made like that, well! you are. But it's rather a shock to me, my dear – just at first – you know.'

Richard had never felt so miserable, so uncomfortable, or so much of a complete fool as he did at that moment.

He did not know whether to be angry or relieved when the figure of Canyot, carrying a basket, appeared outside the gate.

Nelly gave him one quick glance – and then she waved to him and shouted: 'Wait, Robert! Please wait! I'm coming with you.'

He waited just where he was without making a sign. He began picking the long grasses out of the hedge and sucking the sweetness from their stalks. He whistled as he did this and flicked away the flies from his forehead. He took no more notice of Richard than if the man had been one of the posts of the gate.

‘We’ve thought better of it, you see,’ said the writer, after a moment’s pause in which he gathered all his wits together to carry the thing through somehow.

Oh how he hated these tense undignified scenes! In France, he thought, misquoting Laurence Sterne with a miserable inward laugh, they do these things better.

‘I’m sailing on Saturday,’ was the only response he got from Canyot, who now began nibbling the little sticky leaves of a briar rose.

Richard turned and went into the house. He knocked at the door of the room he shared with Nelly.

‘I’m just coming,’ the girl called out. ‘May I come in?’ Richard pleaded, turning the handle of the door. The door was locked from the inside – for the first time!

He walked back into the garden feeling thoroughly miserable. He had hoped for one swift all-obliterating all-forgiving embrace. She had deliberately forestalled this intention. She intended to go off for the whole day with Canyot, leaving the rift between them raw and unhealed.

There was his rival, stolid and impassive, an ugly one-armed sentinel at the gate of their lost paradise. He had the end of a dockleaf in his mouth now. Would he eat up the whole hedge?

Nelly came flying past him with tripping steps. She pretended that the haste of that moment was extreme so as to avoid having to give him a farewell kiss.

She was out of the gate before he could open it for her, and instead of pausing then she ran past the young painter and up the hill-path crying as she ran, ‘Come on, Robert, we shall never get there if you’re so slow. Come on! I’ll race you to the top!’

Canyot picked up the picnic basket provided for him by Mrs Winsome and strode after her. About ten yards away he stopped and looked back, waving his stick at Richard. ‘Sailing on Saturday!’ he shouted and turned again to pursue the girl whose light mauve dress was still visible from the garden moving rapidly among the elder bushes and furze.

Richard waited till they were out of sight and then went straight into the kitchen. ‘Grace!’ he shouted, but Grace was in the rooms above and did not hear him. I can’t stand a lunch alone with the old man, he thought and began mechanically putting together some bread and cheese. This he crammed into his pocket along with some small cakes. ‘Grace!’ he shouted again. This time she heard him and came running down, her heavy West Country tread shaking the whole cottage. ‘You must look after Mr Moreton, today, Grace,’ he said, in the most offhand, easy manner he could assume. ‘We shall all be out.’

‘Nothing wrong, Mr Richard, I hope, begging your pardon? Nothing to do with burnin’ any certifications or such like? ’Tis a queer world and summat of the likes of they things do bring terrible trouble on folks’ heads. I knew’d ‘ee and Miss Nelly had had a bit of a ruption. And what’s more I could have told ‘ee ‘twere comin’, this very mornin’, if ‘ee’d a listened to I. ’Twas that girl hedge pig the Master brought in the house. I never did hold wi ‘bringin’ the like of them stinking pricklies into Christian families. I knew’d it ‘ud mean trouble soon as I set eyes on ‘un. Master ain’t as careful as ‘a should be over these ’ere pick-ups.’ A kind o’ forgets that ’tis you and Miss Nelly’s kiss-luck time, when men and maidies be growin’ into married folk like, and lovin’ natural and unthinkin’ by night and by day. ‘A shouldn’t a’ done it. ‘Twere a temptin’ them as is Above. A girt lousy prickleback, with a snout like Satan and little squimsy eyes. Do ‘ee tell ‘un of it, Mr Richard, do ‘ee tell ‘un of it. I can’t abide them stinkin’ things. Sparrerhawks and flitter-mice be all very well. They be honest fellow creatures, they be; but them hedge pigs,’ tisn’t behavin’ right to the Dear Lord to go meddlin’ wi’ the likes o’ they!’

‘I’ll do what I can, Grace,’ said Richard when the woman stopped for breath. ‘But you know what Mr Moreton is. Well! you’ll be able to see for yourself that he only collects lucky things today. I may be back by tea time and I may not. Goodbye, Grace.’

‘Don’t ‘ee go bein’ sour and angered agin’ our young leddy,’ whispered Grace. ‘Don’t ‘ee get argufying with ‘un. The way to manage us womenfolk is to be one thing or ‘tother. Kiss us soft and sweet or let’s have it hard so us knows what’s what. None of this burnin’ o’ dockiments and bidin’ the time. Out w’it, straight and forrard; that’s what I do say to my Jim.’

‘You say very well, Grace,’ responded the writer. ‘I’m sure I hope you’ll always be with us to keep us in the right path.’

‘And don’t ‘ee let Miss Nelly go gadding off with young Mr Robert. There ain’t no maid nor wife in God’s kingdom what’s perfect sure of ‘erself when’t do come to them carryin’s on. We be all meanin’ for the best; but girls be girls and young fellers be young fellers and ’tis hard to be stiff as a poker on haymaking days.’

Richard looked gravely into the young woman’s face as if he were on the point of asking her what she really thought about his wife’s attitude to Canyot. But he turned away with a smile. ‘Well! Grace,’ he said, ‘you and I must make her so happy here, that she won’t be in need of any friends but us. Goodbye Grace!’ And he left the house and began walking gloomily and thoughtfully in the direction of the Happy Valley.

*

Old Mr Moreton was not altogether pleased when he found he was destined to spend a lonely Sunday. On weekdays he never expected much society. It seemed quite natural that they should all be occupied with their own affairs. But on Sundays it was rather different, because he felt a vague tradition in the air against going on just the same with his scientific work; and it was pleasant, as a change from that, to see something more of those he lived with.

He ate the admirable meal prepared by Grace in rather melancholy silence which was not made any more cheerful by the servant's comments on the events of the morning.

'It ain't nice of Miss Nelly and Master Richard to leave 'ee lonesome and solemn-like of a fine Zunday. It don't seem kind o' natural; and I be lorn to see 'ee so. I just out and told 'un straight how it do seem to I. There'll be sad goin's on, present, I sez to 'un, when the Missus and that young man get too fond like. Kiss and be friends, I sez to 'un, and don't fall into the sin o' pride.'

'Your mistress is in a difficult position, Grace,' said the old man; 'and I'd rather you didn't talk about it. Mr Canyot has always been very considerate and civil. It's a difficult position for her. But the young man is going away in a few days so we shall be quieter then. We shall go on quietly and as usual then. But Mr Canyot is always very civil to me—' John Moreton sighed heavily – 'very civil and considerate.'

When the meal was over and he was thinking of returning for his usual rest, Grace, who came to take away what was left of the gooseberry tart for her own consumption, surprised him by saying, 'Why don't 'ee go and see Mrs Shotover, over to Furze Lodge, sir? She be an old friend of your'n I reckon and a good friend o' Miss Nelly's. Maybe she'd be able to hearten' 'ee up a bit, in a manner of speaking.'

The old man raised his head and stared at the maid. ‘Eh? what’s that, Gracie? Go to see her again?’ He blinked with his deep-set grey eyes and knitted his shaggy eyebrows. ‘But she and Nelly have been quarrelling since she was last here. But after all, that doesn’t matter; that’s nothing to do with me! I go quietly on my own way whatever fuss the womenfolk make, don’t I, Grace? Well perhaps I will walk up in Furze Lodge direction when I’ve rested a bit. I do feel as if I needed a little change today. One can’t work seven days a week.’

Well pleased with the result of her audacity the Dorsetshire maiden retired to the kitchen.

‘’Twill do the Master a gallon o’ good,’ she said to herself. ‘What with one thing and another the poor old gentleman do look mighty doddery. ’Twill hearten ’im up like, to pass the time o’ day with that old rappity-tappity.’

The afternoon of that June day proved hotter than Mr Moreton had anticipated. The old man found the way long and exhausting. It was most of it uphill and bare of trees; the scorching sun struck fiercely upon his lean black-coated figure.

He stopped frequently to rest and sat down at last in the middle of a cornfield, overtaken by a fit of dizziness.

As he sat there, seeing the green world of innumerable waving stalks about him, the world as it must always appear at that season to field mice, partridges, hares and rabbits, the old naturalist felt a profound melancholy enter his heart like some jagged piece of iron.

He knew nature too well to be able for long intervals to enjoy her external charm in the epicurean manner familiar to his son-in-law. As he hugged his dusty-trousered knees and blinked out of his deep-set eyes at those myriad green stalks, there came into his nostrils the smell of death. By shifting a little upon his haunches he was able to detect the cause of this smell; and what he saw did not diminish the prod of that iron in his soul.

Near him lay on its side the dead body of a small rabbit gazing horribly and vacantly into the burning sky out of a great eye socket which was nothing but a dried-up hole of rusty blood. The old man knew at once that he was looking at one of the normal atrocities of creative nature, a rabbit killed by a weasel.

He got up laboriously to his feet and tottered on, the beautiful sun-bathed world about him darkened for him and poisoned as if by a universal smell of murder. As he struggled forward in the fiery heat, the soles of his boots as hot as the cracked chalk earth beneath them, it presented itself once more to his mind that the only religious symbol in the world capable of covering and including the pain of this cruel chaos was the symbol of the Mass, where the wounded flesh and the spilt blood of the God-Man becomes an eternal protest, for those who enter into it, against all this blind suffering.

At the gate of his old friend’s drive he was compelled to sit down once again to rest himself and he sat down on one side of the drive, resting his back against a sycamore tree. Here in his exhaustion he dozed off into an old man’s heavy sleep. He was aroused by a high-pitched feminine voice and he saw himself confronted by Mrs Shotover. The lady was bare-headed and carried her favourite tabby-cat in her arms. She was taking the air after her early tea. She scolded Mr Moreton for attempting that walk in the heat. She scolded him with the familiarity of an old friend and with the burnt-up malice of an old ‘flame’.

‘So you’ve come at last,’ she said in a gentler voice when, having got him safely into her drawing room, she made fresh tea for him which he drank with avidity. ‘I thought you and I would never see each other again.’

He smiled feebly at her, his old half-ironical half-benevolent smile; but he was too tired to reply.

‘It isn’t quite like old days is it, John Moreton?’ she said. He nodded, smiling still, and then shook his head and sighed.

‘When you and I worried the life out of my George and your Cecily – dear innocents that they were!’

He refused her offer of anything to eat with a wave of his hand. ‘You’re the same as ever, Betty,’ he said.

He looked so bedraggled and helpless, lying against her cushions, so caught by the red-tongued hounds of the years, that she stepped up to his side and kissed him on the forehead. ‘Poor old John!’ she murmured, running her jewelled fingers through his stubbly grey hair.

He grew a trifle more rested as time went on; and the obscure shadows across his face receded before the ancient cajolery of her voice.

‘What a world it is, Betty!’ he sighed at last. ‘What a world! You know I’ve come to a stage in my life when, except for hearing Nell laugh and seeing her look happy, I don’t care much what happens. My work interests me still, in a way, Betty, in a way. But not as it used to. If it wasn’t for the church and the Mass I couldn’t go on, Betty. I should just give up.’

‘But they don’t let you do that any more, you poor old heathen, do they?’ asked Mrs George Shotover.

He gave her out of his cavernous eyes a most whimsical look. ‘Someone must remember the rabbits killed by weasels and the sheep slaughtered by man and the trees killed by ivy and the mice killed by owls and the flies in spiders’ webs. Someone must remember these things, little Betty!’

‘And the butterflies, too,’ he said. ‘But they would have died anyway,’ he added. ‘And my killing-bottles only send them to sleep, you know. I wish you’d put me into a killing-bottle, Betty!’

‘But surely they don’t let you say Mass any more, you dear old lunatic? I can’t imagine the Reverend Sugary Salt, as I call him, allowing such a thing!’

The late Vicar of Littlegate regarded his hostess with a glance full of suppressed and chuckling amusement. ‘Have you never heard of a Midnight Mass?’ he said.

The old lady’s face grew very grave. ‘That’s what you’ve been up to, John Moreton, is it? Well! You just listen to me. That sort of thing’s got to stop. Do you hear? Got to stop and stop at once!’

She paused and looked at him very anxiously, with tears in her eyes. ‘So it’s pranks of that sort has brought you downhill so fast, is it?’

She got up out of her chair and stood in front of him, scowling at him with knitted brow and quivering lips.

‘John Moreton! John Moreton!’ she cried, waving her forefinger at him. ‘I’m afraid you’re no better than a muddle-headed old fool!’

But he smiled at her so reassuringly and made his next remark in so quiet and normal a manner that she relaxed her tense expression and resumed her seat.

‘Dear old Betty!’ he said. ‘It’s not such a very nice world, after all, that old people like you and me should want to live on indefinitely. Why don’t you smoke your cigarettes, Betty, as you used to? You haven’t reformed, I hope?’

Comforted by his tone she did light a cigarette then.

‘John Moreton,’ she said after a pause, sending a puff of smoke through her daintily curved nostrils, ‘do you believe in a life after death?’

Her ancient admirer looked at her rather wistfully.

‘As keen on life as ever, Betty, I see! Oh, my dear, I don’t know! And to tell you the honest truth I don’t greatly care. The whole thing is such a bitter sorry business that we should all be well enough out of it, to my thinking. But there may be another life. Oh yes! certainly there may be. I think Christ is alive. If I didn’t think that, I should go crazy.’

They chatted on, after that, on less serious topics; till at last Mrs Shotover spoke what was rankling in her mind. ‘I shall never forgive Nelly,’ she said. ‘I shall never forgive her. To turn on an old friend for the sake of a man! And what did I say to her? Nothing but the plain truth; that she’s turning your house into I don’t know what, with her husband and her lover!’

The old naturalist rose slowly to his feet. ‘I must be walking home now, Betty; and you mustn’t talk like that.’ He staggered a little as he spoke and leant against the table.

‘Of course I shall have Thomas drive you back,’ said the lady. But you may take this from me, John Moreton: it’s your fault; it’s your going and getting yourself turned out of your living that has brought your girl down to this miserable mess-up. You may say what you please but the truth is you have driven that girl into all this. Canyot is a ruffian and this other fellow is a sly, sneaking, self-satisfied, conceited prig. And here the silly girl is, married to one of them, and hanging on to the other! You’ve brought about a pretty kettle of fish, John Moreton, by your pranks and your manias!’

The old man wilted under her storm of words like an ancient hollyhock bowed down by a cruel wind. He made a feeble movement with his hands and sank back upon the sofa.

‘Ring for your Thomas, Betty dear,’ he gasped. ‘That walk’s been too much for me. I am no doubt very much to blame – very much to blame. But we must forget and forgive, Betty; forget and forgive.’

Chapter 10

NELLY WAS GLAD that it was Canyot's way to make her walk fast by his side. She was glad that it was his way to be silent when he was strongly moved. The effort of keeping pace with him soothed her; and his silence made it possible for her to collect her thoughts and arrive at some sort of understanding with herself.

It had been the most unpleasant shock she had ever known, this business of the letter. It was not only a blow to her love, to her pride, to her happiness. It was a blow to something deeper than these; to that innate respect for life as a thing of quite definite aesthetic values, which made up the very illusion of her soul.

Except for the young man by her side now, she had never known anything of love or lovemaking; and though Mrs Shotover had riddled her with cynical advice she had not really been roused from her illusion by the old lady's words.

She kept going over in her mind every incident of the scene. It must be some woman that he cares a good deal for, she thought, otherwise he would have shown me the letter and just laughed at its sentiment. It must have been one particular letter in a long correspondence; or his surprise at seeing an unexpected hand would not have disarmed him. He must have known that it would reveal to me the whole story. He must have been thoroughly terrified of my seeing it.

'Not quite so fast!' she was compelled to cry out to her companion when, having reached the smooth turf of the crest of the hill, Canyot quickened his pace still more.

He turned round and looked at her.

They were alone in the midst of a wide treeless expanse, an expanse unbroken by any other human being, unbroken by bush or shrub or animal. Above their heads the larks sang; large cool shadows, one after another, floated over them, thrown by slow-travelling clouds, and from the little patches of thyme at their feet arose that peculiar faint sun-burnt pungency which more than anything else seems to be the attribute of the Downs.

The immense undulating upland, along the crest of which they were now moving, was like some huge wave of the sea struck into immobility. This great green wave held up their two figures, isolating them completely from the rest of the world; carrying them through infinite blue ether on the planetary motion of the round earth.

He stopped at her words and looked at her. Her cheeks were flushed and she was drawing her breath in little gasps.

‘Let’s sit down here,’ he said.

They sat down side by side, the smell of the thyme becoming vividly distinct and little groups of blue butterflies chasing one another backwards and forwards across their feet. Her hands lay on her lap and Canyot possessed himself of one of them, holding it grimly, tightly, passionately.

She could hardly release it without an exertion of moral force for which at that moment, as she panted for breath, she lacked the energy.

She had not realized· how easy it would be for Canyot to repossess himself of such a privilege. She had not realized how the mere physical habit of lovemaking may outlast the emotional importance of it.

He on his part took what was a mixture of pique with Richard, physical exhaustion, the revival of old habitual gestures, and real· affection for himself, for something much deeper in her. He had grasped her fingers so fiercely, just because he had not supposed for a moment that she would let him retain them. She did let him retain them; and his passion gathered intensity.

'I hate human beings,' she said after a few minutes' silence. And in her heart, she thought, What does it matter if I do let Robert hold my hand? Richard has got some woman in Paris who writes to him letters that I'm not allowed to see. He is evidently entangled still with her or he would have told me the whole story. And it doesn't seem fair that I should keep Robert at a distance when he goes on with his Paris entanglements.

'I hate all human beings,' she repeated, 'because they always spoil everything. I do it myself, I know. I spoil things for myself.'

Canyot gazed in a kind of sombre ecstasy at her downcast profile.

'You've spoilt everything for me, Nelly,' he said; 'but I don't hate you for it. I like things to be spoilt! There's something in me that is glad when things are spoilt. I'm glad you're married. I'm glad I've got to leave you in six days. I'm glad you are tormenting me at this moment with your speeches and your ways.'

His tone was too familiar to her, and the peculiar mood he was in too reminiscent of former times, for Nelly to be shocked or startled.

She gave him a little flickering smile. 'Dear old Rob!' she said.

He lifted her hand to his lips but did not release it.

'I don't know whether you can possibly understand me,' he continued. 'You probably can't. But the fact is I've come to the conclusion that if you can't be glad of everything that happens to you, of everything that happens in your life, you'd better kill yourself at once. It's one or the other, Nell.'

'It's certainly one or the other with you, Robert,' she answered; 'but you needn't hurt my hand, whichever way it is.'

He did not release her fingers even then; he went on in the same strain.

‘You can’t get back from me, you know, any of the things that have happened between us. Every kiss you’ve ever given me still remains mine and no one else’s.’

‘I see you put my kisses with all the other horrid things you’re glad to have happened to you,’ remarked the girl, in a voice full of a teasing affectionate mockery; ‘but to keep true to your present theory, what you ought to remember best are the times when I’ve been most bad to you.’

‘You’ve never been bad to me,’ he said. ‘You couldn’t be. You can hurt me and hurt me and hurt me. You can marry a hundred Richards. I shall only like you the better. And it’ll be part of what I have to put into my paint box.’

‘Oh there’s a ladybird!’ cried Nelly suddenly. ‘Do look!’ She took advantage of his disarmed attention to release her hand.

‘What do you mean by your paint box?’ she inquired when the ladybird had flown away.

‘I mean,’ said Robert, making a futile effort to regain her lost fingers, ‘that my painting draws its life from every single thing which destiny takes away from me.’

The girl looked at him in whimsical gravity. ‘Then if you had had me,’ she said, ‘I shouldn’t be in your paint box any more?’

‘The Nelly part of you wouldn’t,’ he answered solemnly, ‘but your soul would – because I should never have got hold of that!’

‘But the Nelly part of me is my soul,’ she protested; ‘that’s what I am really and truly.’

He looked at her grimly and sardonically.

‘No! No! my dear,’ he said. ‘This is Nelly,’ and he touched her shoulder. ‘And this is Nelly,’ and he touched her knee. ‘But the thing in you which says “I am I” isn’t Nelly at all. It isn’t even a girl. It isn’t even a human being.’

She smiled somewhat uneasily. ‘What is it then?’ she asked. ‘I don’t at all like the idea of being something that isn’t myself.’

‘It is yourself. It’s the self that nobody in the world can ever take away or invade or imprison, as they can this Nelly,’ and he gave her propped-up knees a vicious little shake. ‘But it’s something that I could never, never get hold of, even if I had you absolutely for my own.’

She looked frowningly at the hot grey-green turf at her feet where a heavily winged brown butterfly was fluttering aimlessly.

‘What is it you really care for in me?’ she suddenly inquired.

The thoughts that had led her to this were queerly complicated. That discovery that Richard corresponded with some Paris woman and received letters which he dreaded to show to her had stained with a sort of muddy tincture the whole outlook of her mind. It not only spoilt Richard for her. It spoilt herself for herself. It muddied up, as it were, the whole business of love between human beings. It made her doubt her own integrity, her own charm. If she didn’t satisfy Richard, if her love couldn’t work the miracle of making them really one – mustn’t that be because there was something wanting in herself? She felt a horrible suspicion of her own nature. She realized for the first time how cruelly alone everyone is in the world; how one doesn’t evoke love simply by being what one is without any effort.

It was at that point in her train of thought that she said, ‘What is it in me?’

Her question completely broke down Canyot’s self-control. He jumped up from the ground. He took her by the wrist and swung her up upon her feet. He threw his arm round her and embraced her passionately; kissing her so brusquely, that he kissed the tip of her nose, and her open mouth and her lace collar, in one rapid series of indiscriminate hugs.

When he let her go he was pale and trembling and hardly dared to look into her eyes. But the effect of his violence upon Nelly was not to make her in the least angry with him. She saw his remorse. She bent forward and gave him a quick affectionate little kiss upon his cheek. Then she smiled sadly and tenderly. ‘You’ll only make yourself unhappy by that, Robert dear, and it doesn’t do any good. I do love you; but I could never like your doing that. So what’s the use?’

He stood staring at her, like an animal that has been punished for some unknown fault. The colour, coming slowly back into his face, covered it with funny red blotches.

‘I’m a fool,’ he muttered, ‘a damned fool! Let’s go on now.’ And they resumed their rapid stride, side by side.

They reached Toat Farm without any further personal conversation. The weight of the basket of provisions he carried wearied him and reduced his speed; so that when they arrived at the place the girl was quite cool and collected and able to be nice to Sally-Maria and Sally-Maria’s aunt.

They ate their lunch in the woman’s cottage and she made them tea. The dumb child seemed hostile to Nelly, for she refused to accept a morsel of food while they remained there and a queer inarticulate anger against them both was obviously smouldering in her sullen eyes. ‘She is jealous, poor little thing!’ whispered Nelly as they went out, and the whole complicated misery of human emotions swept over her in one drowning wave. Was there no such thing in the world as disinterested love?

But Canyot’s picture impressed her much more than she had anticipated. The artist had managed to communicate to those shadows in the water a strange passionate beauty full of wistful hints and intimations; the wind that stirred the rank-growing melancholy hemlocks seemed, as the girl gazed at them, to be the very wind of fate itself carrying the burden of old sorrows, of old baffled longings, out of some deep unknown into some still obscurer future.

She understood, as she looked, fascinated and silent, at what he had done, something of what he really did mean by his queer phrase about the ‘paint box’.

It was not till quite late in the afternoon that they prepared to leave Toat Farm. At the last minute Robert discovered to his dismay that Sally-Maria was missing. Her aunt called loudly for her and they all searched for her in the places where the child generally was accustomed to play. But in the end they had to leave without saying goodbye to her.

If her aunt’s final conjecture was correct, she had run off; as she usually did when she was unhappy, to the cottage over the hill where lived Old Miss Stone’. With this explanation Robert had to be contented.

The incident of Sally-Maria’s disappearance threw a gloom over them both as they walked back slowly across the Downs; and nothing that Nelly could find to say to her companion seemed able to lift it.

She herself was occupied with the very difficult question as to how the broken and ruffled stream of her love for her husband could be restored to its former level course.

She surprised herself by the bitterness she felt about it, by the anger she felt towards him.

Her present desire, which she herself did not dare to bring into the light of complete consciousness, was to excite his jealousy to the breaking point.

She wished to make him suffer exactly the same pain that she herself was suffering. She wished to have him not only begging for her forgiveness, but in a blind helpless manner – the clearness of all human issues tarnished and stained – doubtful as to her love.

Meanwhile as she walked by Canyot's side there slowly settled down upon her the consciousness that things could never be quite the same. If she had actually caught him in the act of making love to this Paris woman, she could hardly have felt more deceived, more betrayed, more disillusioned. And yet in one part of her brain she had known that it was almost certain that he had entanglements. Woman-like, she had suppressed that knowledge, thought it down, thought it away, thought it into faint unreality.

Everything about her present feeling towards Richard puzzled and bewildered her. She was surprised at herself for not being more hurt than she was. She recalled how as a young girl she had often imagined herself in just this very position – the position of a betrayed wife – and how she had always, in imagination, felt a kind of passionate passivity in suffering, a sweet tenacious clinging devotion to the erring one that nothing could shake. In place of this she found herself sickened with the whole business of life, dulled and stupefied, as if with a species of nausea. What especially surprised her was that the strong, clean, pure flow of her own love for her husband seemed to have received some disastrous alloy, some influx of poisonous bitterness.

Was she, after all, she asked herself, something different from the devoted, passionate, tenacious Nelly, in whom she had believed?

Was she, as Mrs Shotover had so bluntly told her, no better than an intriguing flirt whose infatuation for a man turned to gall and wormwood at the first catastrophe?

Or had Richard, by his miserable business, really poisoned with a fatal poison the well-spring of her love?

It is strange, she thought, these terrible little accidents of betrayal – what they can destroy! Like some evil acid thrown upon sensitive flesh, they seem able to bite to the very bone! Nelly sighed, as she walked, from a heart most 'sorely charged'. It seemed so ridiculously small, the whole matter of this clandestine correspondence, of this burnt letter, revealing a sequence – so she told herself – of letters that had not been burnt! A ridiculously small matter! and yet it seemed to have given to the very essence of her being a strange organic shock.

She felt as if since he had thrown the thing into the fire two or three long bitter years had passed over her head instead of a few hours.

When they reached the top of the hill above Hill Cottage they were surprised to see a small motorcar standing by the gate.

'Who's that?' said Canyot brusquely. 'If it's a visitor I shall clear off. In fact,' he added, 'I think I shall be off anyway. I don't feel in a mood for meeting people.'

He gave her his hand and looked into her eyes, hoping for some final glance of tenderness; but her gaze was fixed upon the unusual object at the gate. 'Goodnight, Robert,' she repeated, almost mechanically, as with a wave of his hand he strode away.

She was met at the door by her husband. Directly she saw him she knew that something was wrong. 'Is it Father?' she asked. Richard nodded without speaking and stood aside for her to go in.

Her father's bedroom was upon the ground floor. Its door stood wide open.

Directly the girl stepped across the threshold she knew that the old naturalist was dying. By his side stood the doctor, a quiet self-contained young man with an expressionless face; at the foot of the bed sobbed Grace, her big tears streaming down her rosy cheeks and falling upon her apron.

‘What is it?’ whispered Nelly to the doctor. ‘Is it his heart?’

It was Richard who answered her question. He stepped up close to her side and put his arm round her waist. ‘It was a sun stroke it seems,’ he said. ‘He was brought back from West Horthing in Mrs Shotover’s carriage. He must have become unconscious on the way. Grace was alone. Mrs Shotover’s man carried him in and then went for the doctor. I have been several times to the top of the hill to look out for you. I found him like this when I came in and he has not changed since.’

The old man was lying on his back with his eyes closed. His breath was loud and unnatural, resembling the sound of water in an iron pipe. His mouth was wide open and every now and then a convulsive spasm crossed his face.

Nelly went up to him and bent down above him – ‘Father!’ she whispered. And then in a louder tone, a tone full of a sudden desperate fear, ‘Father!’

Her voice seemed to reach the dying man’s ears; for he made a little feeble movement with his hands.

The young doctor drew a step back.

‘Can’t anything be done to make that breathing easier?’ whispered Richard with something like a tone of reproach. ‘It must hurt him to breathe like that.’

Suddenly John Moreton opened his eyes and gazed at his daughter. The girl fell upon her knees and kissed his hand as it stirred faintly on the counterpane. Wildly and strangely the old man looked at her. His breathing grew shriller, harsher, huskier. It became the most dominant thing in the room. It became a living separate entity, a palpable horror that pressed with a ghastly weight upon them all; that tyrannized over them all. It was as if, in that repulsive sound, Death itself – the old eternal antagonist – was mocking them, was menacing them with an unintelligible threat.

Nelly spread out her arms over the bed and hid her face. It was not easy for her to look into those bewildered wild eyes with their inexplicable appeal. An unnatural longing suddenly seized Richard that he might rush from the room and escape, escape into the largeness of the evening, from this pitiful struggle. He felt as if every breath the dying man drew rent and tore at his own throat. He felt stifled; as if it were he himself that were wrestling there with an invisible enemy.

The impassive young doctor contemplated the scene with serene detachment. He had seen hundreds of deaths in France and this particular death had less effect upon his emotional capacity than the shooting of an aged dog.

Nelly's head, buried in the white counterpane, was full of a turmoil of remorse. Why hadn't she been a better, a kinder, a more considerate girl? Her sobs shook the bed and mingled with the horrible rattling in the old man's throat.

Suddenly John Moreton jerked up his head from the pillow and held it erect. The young doctor was reminded of a similar movement in the neck of a frightened tortoise.

Inside the old man's mind, at that moment everything was absolutely clear. In a flash he saw the whole scene. He saw the impassive doctor. He saw the weeping servant. He saw his daughter lift her tear-stained face from the bed and gaze at him with desperate love. He caught in Richard's eye a look of fidgety irritation, a look that said 'let's get this melancholy business over and go for a walk on the Downs'.

And in a flash he knew that this was his last moment of what is called life. He gathered up in a bundle all his inveterate thoughts – the Eidolon

Vulgaris popped up on its pedestal before him as he had grown accustomed to envisage it. It nodded at him amiably from the top of his bookcase like a leering Punchinello. He did not think of it as the great illusion of humanity. He saw it as a whimsical but not unfriendly goblin whose feelings he had hurt by his contempt. He felt inclined to bid it goodbye and to apologize to it.

Yes, his brain was clearer than it had ever been in his life. The only thing that puzzled him was that the human arms of that crucifix which hovered just above poor Gracie's head were not fastened to anything but were waving in the air like the wings of a butterfly. What butterfly was it? That was the one thing that troubled him. He would like to know that, before darkness covered his eyes. He felt extremely happy, happier than he ever remembered feeling. Was that because Cecily and Betty were making it up? He knew they were making it up, though he could not see them. Those butterfly wings were doing it. They were hidden under the shelter of those wings; and as the wings waved they were growing smaller and smaller and smaller.

Everything was growing smaller now, smaller and further away. And yet they were not leaving him. They were leaving themselves. He himself was getting further away – a stupid old man breathing like a cracked steam engine. He was there, and they were there, far off, far away – four unhappy people bending over a grotesque old entomologist stretched out on a bed. Why couldn't he communicate to them what a delicious thing it was to be fanned by butterfly wings?

Never had his brain been more clear. But it was annoying that he couldn't remember the name of that butterfly! And it was annoying that he couldn't remember what his opinions were about the immortality of the soul. He ought to be thinking about that now; not enjoying this unphilosophical happiness!

He was just on the point of dying. That was certain. This happiness was nothing less than death. What a curious discovery! And he was quite unable to explain this to any of these dear agitated young people. This was the queerest experience he had ever had in his life; it was teasing not to be able to speak.

The immortality of the soul? What was his view upon that problem? He hadn’t the least idea. He had no idea of anything except of floating in a lovely blue space – a blue space that grew darker and darker. Then he recalled one single word out of a great many. It was the word annihilation.

That was the secret then; John Moreton was being annihilated. He wished this being annihilated would never stop. It was the happiest sensation he had ever known. He loved everyone; only he couldn’t speak to tell them so. Annihilation had something to do with love, then? It must have. And it was beautiful beyond expression. But what was the connection between annihilation and the immortality of the soul? He wished he could remember what the immortality of the soul meant. It was a musical sentence. It must have meant something once to him when his brain was clouded. But his brain was clear now and it meant nothing at all!

How heavy his eyelids were growing; and how nice it was to love everyone, every single person – even foreman Pringle! Yes, his eyelids were very heavy. It would be still nicer when this blue space in which he floated got quite dark! He was going to sleep now; going to sleep upon velvet-black butterfly wings.

Someone was weeping. It wasn’t Cecily or Betty or Nelly. Who was it? It was the darkness of space. No! it was his mother.

At that moment he uttered a strange croaking cry like the cry of a bullfrog in a swamp. It seemed to himself that he shouted ‘Mother!’ in an ecstasy of indescribable peace; but to the four figures watching his death it sounded as if he had uttered the meaningless syllables ‘Blub-blub’. His head sank back on the pillow after that; the young doctor in a quiet discreet voice informed them that he was dead.

Chapter 11

THE DAY FOLLOWING the old naturalist’s death was a day of supreme discomfort for Richard. His feelings were those of natural sympathy with Nelly; on his own account he felt a certain sense of loss and bewilderment. The little cottage seemed to have changed its character. The old man lying upstairs dominated every corner of it with his silent presence; and it was difficult to understand exactly how Nelly was reacting to that wordless motionless appeal.

She went about her domestic duties as usual. She comforted poor Grace and kept her from any further outburst of grief. But what, all the while, was going on in her own mind it was impossible for Richard to guess.

Canyot came round in the morning after breakfast, and Nelly took him up at once to the dead man’s room. A little later, when they were all three loitering miserably and awkwardly together in the little garden, ostensibly engaged in picking flowers to make ‘that room’ as cheerful as it could be made, they were disagreeably startled by the appearance outside the gate of Mrs Shotover’s dogcart.

Richard went to help her down.

‘I know all about it,’ she said. ‘I telephoned to the doctor last night. Thomas told me he had fetched him. How do you do, Mr Canyot— ‘this was in recognition of the young man’s opening the gate for her.’ And my dear, dear child!’ She embraced Nelly with tender effusiveness. ‘And there is Grace! Take these things, Grace, will you? It’s eau-de-cologne, my dear, and some of my best roses. I thought he would be glad to think I’d remembered to bring them. And now you’ll take me upstairs at once won’t you? Well, Mr Storm, I'm afraid all this is very sad and disturbing to you. It must be terribly upsetting to you writers, when something really human breaks in on your inventions. Dear, dear child!' She still continued to retain tight hold of Nelly's hand while she addressed her words to the two men. 'And you, Mr Canyot, you've had your own loss of course; and no doubt you know how to comfort our little Nell. It is very nice that she has both of you to fall back upon. It would have been doubly sad if she'd had nobody but an old friend like me …

'Yes, Grace. In water, Grace. It would be a pity for them to wither while we can fancy he enjoys them. Ah my dear, my dear' – this was addressed to Nelly again – 'we old people must seem very tiresome sometimes to you young ones. But when it's all over I daresay you miss us. Yes; at once if you please. Yes; do take me up at once.'

Preceded by Grace and escorted by Nelly, Mrs Shotover walked solemnly up the little creaking stairs. What did actually go on under that high forehead and behind that elegantly poised head no human being will ever know. She shed no tear at the sight of her old friend. Very gracefully, and like a great actress in a play, she stooped, and kissed him; once on the forehead, and then with a quick birdlike movement, a sort of fleeting afterthought, on the bloodless lips.

Nelly thought she detected a furtive glance into the mirror as they went out together after placing the roses on the table; but her rush of cynical thoughts was dissipated in a wave of sympathetic feeling when she noticed that the hand which rested on her arm as she helped the old lady downstairs shook like a leaf in the wind.

'Very beautiful and very peaceful,' she said, addressing the two men when she came out into the garden; for the one thing that Nelly wanted to avoid at that moment was to be left alone with her.

‘And now you two must come back to lunch with me,’ she said. ‘I’m sure Grace will be glad to have you off her hands. She doesn’t look as if she was fit to do a thing more. I daresay Mr Canyot will be available if he’s wanted. Oh yes you must both of you come. It would be quite the dear man’s wish, I’m certain of that. You must let me take you all in hand. He would wish it. You see I did understand him. Mr Canyot is just the right person to take care of dear faithful Grace. Aren’t you, Mr Canyot? An artist like you is always so nice to simple natures. Have you thought of taking a death mask? No, I suppose not. Oh, there’s just one more thing – if you don’t mind, Nelly dear. No! No! I’ll be down in a minute. Just one little thing. You must humour an old woman, my pet. One minute!’ And with more alacrity than she had yet displayed Mrs Shotover went up for the second time to the room above.

What passed on this occasion between those ancient friends only the invisible watchers of life and death will ever know. When she came down again the old lady was a little quieter.

While she was away, Richard had whispered to Nelly – ‘Do you really wish to go with her?’ Nelly had nodded. ‘And you’d like me to come too?’ Nelly had nodded again. ‘I don’t want to be alone with her today; and we can’t hurt her feelings. She was Father’s friend.’

So Nelly climbed up by Mrs Shotover’s side in the front of the dog-cart; and Richard held on at the back in company with Thomas.

Never had the author of The Life of Verlaine had so uncomfortable a drive.

He felt as though Mrs Shotover had ears in the back of her head and heard every word he said to Thomas; Thomas, in any case, was the most taciturn of feudal servants and had already acquired a prejudice against him as a foreigner and not quite the right sort of gentleman.

The lunch passed easily enough; for after the stress they had been through, and the long jolting drive over the Downs, they were both hungry. The uncomfortable time for Richard came afterwards, when they lingered over the coffee in Mrs Shotover's drawing room.

Nelly clung resolutely and tenaciously to her husband. She seemed to have made a vow not to be separated from him for a moment; their hostess, whether she liked it or not, had no alternative but to submit.

So Richard became aware of the enormous importance, in events of this kind, of the right fabrics to be selected for a young woman's mourning.

Of course you'll leave it all to me, 'said Mrs Shotover.' I'll drive you in to Selshurst tomorrow and have you fitted. They keep the medium sizes practically made up, you know. And you're a good medium, my dear. Just a few touches here and there, and that sweet little Mrs Fortescue will fit you to a nicety! I'd have had her over here this afternoon, if we'd only known in time. You needn't look so pompous and reproachful, Mr Storm. Need he, Nelly? Your dear father never minded my little jokes.

'Ah you modern men, you modern men! You're always grave when you ought to laugh; and you chuckle like wicked ogres when you ought to be grave.

'The question of Nelly's looking nice at her father's funeral, when quite a lot of the neighbourhood may be there, is not a thing to laugh at. No gentleman ever laughs at a woman for her seriousness about dress. That kind of humour is just pure vulgarity and shows simple ignorance of life. It's like the bucolic laughter of stupid rustics when they see well-dressed people coming out of church.'

'I haven't been in an English drawing room for quite ten years,' remarked Richard, in an effort to change the conversation.

‘So I imagined!’ was on the tip of Mrs Shotover’s tongue; but she substituted for it, ‘Dear me! How glad you must be to be civilized again!’

‘I don’t like drawing rooms,’ said Nelly. ‘I’ve never had one. I think men’s rooms are much nicer.’

‘That’s what all the young people say now,’ cried the old lady. ‘You’ll turn England into a dreadful place soon, where there’s no more society and no more good manners and no more good conversation. You should have seen the tea parties we used to have at Fixden Manor in my young days. There was a drawing room for you! And the men were witty too. I can remember old Lord Trace-bridge, how he used to flirt with my aunt, Lady Gower. That room had no less than seven mirrors. One of them got cracked one day; and the Bishop of Sodor and Man said to Grandmamma – but that’s too naughty a story to repeat before Mr Storm! I’ll tell it you tomorrow, Nelly, when we’re driving to Selshurst’

Richard looked round Mrs Shotover’s drawing room with an eye of unmingled contempt. There was not one single book to be seen in any direction except a great morocco-covered edition of the poems of Lord Byron, lying on its side on a tortoiseshell slab, and a tiny volume of 151 Dodd’s Beauties of Shakespeare, used as a letter-weight on the lady’s rosewood writing table.

To make up for the lack of books there were endless vases of flowers of every conceivable size and colour; there were plants in Japanese pots and plants in Chinese pots and plants upon little stands of old English pottery.

On the mantelpiece and on every available space in the room were an incredible assortment of objects that could hardly be called objets d’art.

The most harmless of this gallery of knickknacks were portraits of elegant human beings, nearly all of them in full dress, varying from the dark ancient daguerreotypes in silhouette down to the latest modern photographs of young soldiers and young society belles.

‘I see you’re looking at my things,’ said the owner of this pretty collection. ‘The work of a lifetime, young man! The work of a lifetime! My French novels I keep upstairs. But we won’t talk of them now! All the same I wish you’d make Mr Storm write something really amusing, Nelly. Something witty, for one to read at night when one goes to bed. I read a lot in bed. It’s the only place where I get a moment’s time.’

‘Oh, here’s a picture of your father when he was a young man. You’ve seen it before? Yes? It’s rather nice I think, don’t you?’

She replaced the object carefully in its former position and sighed deeply, looking at herself as she did so in one of her innumerable mirrors.

‘Poor dear John! He never minded my bad little ways. I’ve told him before now the most terrible stories. You’ve heard him laugh, haven’t you, love, when we’ve been together in his study? Well! he’s past laughing now, poor darling. Why don’t you ever laugh, Mr Storm? For I can see you never do, does he Nelly? He “grimly smiles”, as the novels say, and that’s all. I must confess I like a man who can laugh. You modern writers take life so horribly seriously. One would think you were always in pain. Are you in pain when you “smile grimly” like that, Mr Storm? I hope Nelly looks after your stomach. I always used to advise her father to take castor oil, didn’t I Nelly? It was quite a joke between us. And other things too. Heigh ho! And the dear, dear man is lying there all alone. Well! I see you’re anxious to be off and I won’t keep you. But what is your opinion of these modern authors, Mr Storm, and their spiritualistic nonsense? I say that when we are dead we’re in good society. In these days you have to die to be in good society. Oh my sweet little Nell, how I am rattling on! Well! you must excuse me. I am an old woman and hardly see anybody nowadays.’

‘It was very kind of you to bring us over,’ said Nelly, rising, ‘but really you mustn’t trouble about tomorrow. I’ve got several black dresses.’

‘Nonsense, child, nonsense. You talk in the way your mother used to. Black dresses indeed! I hope, Mr Storm, you won’t let her get silly and dowdy now she’s married. But I’m sure you won’t. I expect you’ll be getting her all sorts of things from Paris. That’s what she married you for, you know, not to hear sermons about art! And do let me hear you laugh sometimes. I suspect serious faces. I always have. I advise Nelly to watch you very carefully when you’re silent like that and looking out of the windows and into the bushes. You may try to make her believe you’re composing lives of the poets or something; but I know better! You bad sly man! You’re probably thinking of some naughty little girl in Paris! There! Don’t look so sad, Nelly. It does him good to be teased a bit. These modern clever men have no sense of humour. Well! goodbye my dear one. You will walk back, eh? I could easily get Thomas to drive you. Oh dear, dear! What a thing life is. Well! be a brave girl. That’s what’ll really please your father. I’m sure the dear man is safe in heaven by now. If he’s not there, the Lord may send Betty Shotover to the other place!

‘You will walk, then? Well, goodbye, and God bless you! I’ll be over tomorrow early.’

They shook hands with her at the door; and Richard threw up his arms and beat at the laurels with his stick as soon as they were out of her sight.

‘What an awful woman! What a perfectly horrible old woman!’ Then, as if to relieve his feelings, he proceeded to make a goblin-like grimace in the direction of Mrs Shotover’s drawing room,

‘Don’t, Richard,’ said Nelly. ‘You hurt my feelings; and it isn’t pretty of you. I don’t think it’s ever nice to despise people quite like that, when you’ve been enjoying their hospitality. Besides she was a friend of Father’s.’

‘Damn her hospitality!’ cried Storm, letting loose the stored-up venom of his outraged vanity. ‘She only asked me there to annoy me. She might just as well have had you by yourself. She has always hated me from the first time we met. Her Fixden Manor! Her aunt, Lady Gower! What a disgusting old snob. I expect she saw I saw through her from the very start. That’s why she loathes me. We know how to put people like that into their places in France.’

‘Perhaps she sees through you, Richard!’

‘What do you mean?’

‘I only mean that when it comes to seeing through people, we’re all at bottom much of a muchness.’

‘Don’t for God’s sake, Nelly, use those awful expressions. I know they’re supposed to be arch and debonair and genteel in England; but I detest them. We’re not living in Wonderland or Looking-Glass-land.’

‘I wish we were!’ cried Nelly looking at him with a little surprised tilt of her eyebrows. She was still in the dark as to what had really ruffled him; for it was inconceivable that a person of his intelligence could take poor dear Aunt Bet quite as seriously as that!

Had she possessed a little more insight into her husband’s character, she would have known that he was engaged in a secret and not very human struggle to exploit in the interests of his own scheme of life every one of the events which were now occurring, centred round that old dead man lying at rest. And into this vision of things, where the old man’s death and Nelly’s own grief fitted so beautifully, Mrs Shotover and her drawing room came as a bombshell of irrelevance.

He wanted to act the part of a wise and tender philosopher to his young wife just then. He wanted her to give him an opportunity to comfort her, to explain to her his views upon death, to soothe her mind by large and noble sentiments. He wanted her to remember to her dying day how beautifully he had said just the right thing with regard to her father, how tactfully, how spiritually, he had entered into her feelings!

And here she was, actually amused and diverted by the silly chatter of this old featherbrain, and even by her ridiculous rudeness to himself!

It was not a very cheerful walk that they had together, that afternoon, back to where the dead man awaited them.

The tension between them was relieved for Nelly – while it was increased for Richard – by their overtaking a young visitor who was on her way to leave her card at their place. This was an acquaintance of Nelly's for whom, though he had only seen her twice, Richard had acquired almost as strong a dislike as he had towards Aunt Bet.

Their meeting in just that way seemed to Richard extraordinarily awkward and unfortunate. One surely, in reserved and discreet England, managed to avoid acquaintances and condolences when one's father was still unburied?

What would the caller do now, since she had met them? Would she hand her card to her friend with a polite curtsey, and say, 'I'm sorry your father's dead,' as one might say, 'I'm sorry your potatoes are blighted'?

These little niceties of social intercourse always filled Richard with chilly embarrassment. His own feelings were so seldom simple or direct that it was a matter of terrible self-consciousness to him how he should behave where the conventions did not act as direct signposts.

As it happened on this occasion, whether conventionally or not, Olive Shelter walked with them as far as their gate and simply said goodbye. As far as Richard could make out, she didn't so much as refer to the dead man. Their conversation as they crossed the cornfields was lively and interesting. Nelly was evidently challenging the girl about some male cousin of hers in whom gossip reported she was interested.

'There's absolutely nothing in it, my dear,' Richard heard the girl saying, 'and you know that there isn't. How often must I tell you before you believe me that I've never been interested in anyone in my life? When my uncle dies I'm going to take a poultry farm and earn my own living. Perhaps when people see me in gaiters and knickers they'll let me alone.'

'But, Olive!' cried Nelly, 'lots of us wear things like that just to attract men!' 'They won't be attracted to what I shall wear,' said Olive smiling. 'I'm perfectly sick of this stupid idea that we've all got to have love affairs or husbands. I don't see things that way at all.'

'You're not going into a convent are you, Miss Shelter?' Richard threw in without taking very much heed to what he said. The girl's clear-cut sharp-featured brusqueness had little appeal for him.

'A convent? Oh dear, no!' she replied, giving Richard a quick satiric glance which seemed to say 'as usual!' 'That's just what everybody thinks,' she went on. 'It seems incredible to people nowadays that a girl should prefer to be unmarried just as a man prefers to be a bachelor. Whenever I talk of my poultry farm, everyone always smiles and sniggers – as much as to say "she'll be married in a week and then you'll see!" And if they don't do that, they look at each other and become grave and sympathetic, as much as to say "she must have been badly jilted, poor little thing!"'

Richard became faintly interested at this point. 'But you don't mean to say, Miss Shelter, that you really intend to live alone all your life?'

'Certainly I do!' she laughed back at him. 'Though I might of course take a partner, if I could find some girl of my own sort.'

‘Ah! a girl, a platonic friendship,’ laughed Richard superciliously. ‘Not a bit of it!’ replied Olive, giving him a quick, almost angry look and flushing a little. ‘A business partnership between good comrades,’ she threw out with a toss of her head.

Richard became puzzled and silent. It seemed incredible to his mind that there should be any alternative between a passionate devotion to religion and a passionate devotion to some shape of flesh and blood. To rule out the attraction between human bodies and souls and not to substitute for it some exclusive passion of religious faith seemed to him weird and strange.

He looked at Olive with an unexpected interest. She was certainly a new type to him of what England could produce. Was it really possible, he wondered, for life to go on being thrilling and exciting, without the stimulus of either religion or sex?

Olive was by no means a bad looking girl. Her features were a little hard; but her complexion was soft and childlike. Richard was quite glad to take her hand when they said goodbye. It was a cool and a firm hand, the hand of a woman who, like Natalia in Wilhelm Meister, loved ‘never or always’!

Chapter 12

JOHN MORETON WAS buried on the following Wednesday by the side of his wife Cecilia.

Mrs Shotover came to the funeral; she thoroughly scared the new vicar, patronized Richard before the whole neighbourhood and offended Nelly very seriously by being rude to Robert.

The news which Canyot received that week about his exhibitions made it possible for him once more to postpone his journey; for it appeared there was to be a second New York show of his things which promised to be of far greater importance than anything that had been done hitherto; there was no need for him to cross the water until July.

He stayed on therefore at the farm, painting as he had never painted before, painting at a furious speed and with a gathered weight of feeling and intensity.

He wanted if possible to have at least half a dozen more pictures to carry over with him and he dreaded to lose the peculiar value of the kind of power which was now coming to him, snatched out of the electric air of his relations with Nelly.

He felt obscurely that all was not perfectly right between the husband and wife; he felt that Nelly needed him and in some mysterious way clung to him at this juncture, almost as if he had understood what she felt about her father better than Richard did.

Richard himself was making at that time a concentrated effort to recover the interrupted sequence of his own work. He found this surprisingly difficult. The roots of the thing were there, firmly planted in his new feeling; but the temptation to enjoy that lovely countryside, to fall into a sort of vague half-sensual dreaming over the sounds and scents of those unequalled fields, was still fatally strong.

The sweetness of Nelly's initial surrender to him still remained, an intoxicating drug among these other enchantments, and his pleasure in her grew more and more material, more and more a thing of the thrilled and exacting senses, less and less of an emotional or spiritual passion.

Nelly was occupied in arranging the natural history treasures in her father's study; she went about this work with a greater weight of gloom upon her mind than she had ever known. She had not separated herself from her husband; nor had she referred again to the matter of the letter; but even while she submitted to his caresses, even while she passionately responded to his caresses, there was a weary disillusionment in her heart. She tried to forget this, just as she had tried to forget her father's loss, by abandoning herself almost fiercely to her love; but the whole thing was different. Her very love seemed to herself much more a thing of the senses than it was before; a thing from which some peculiarly subtle essence had been withdrawn. She knew only too well what she was trying to do. She was trying to forget her father and she was trying to forget the old 'dead' Richard, by plunging recklessly into the mere material thrill of the chemical attraction that existed between them.

She was playing the courtezan, so to speak, in the temple of her pure love, so as to drown, if she could, that bitter underlying consciousness that something was wrong between them.

It was very painful to her to think of her father at all, so guilty did she feel towards him. The actual pain of missing the old man was made so much worse by the miserable feeling that in a hundred ways recently she had neglected him for her own pleasure. And the only distraction that seemed able to make her forget this remorse was the distraction of Richard’s caresses.

The unfortunate thing was that in proportion as Richard made more sophisticated love to her and she responded to his lovemaking, Richard himself in his own brain and nerves began to lose something of the original delicacy of his attitude towards her. The more feverishly she tried to forget her troubles in his arms the less rare and exquisite did the link between them tend to become. This tarnishing and blunting process was not, of course, a thing of a few days, but it began to have its effect upon Richard’s character. This effect showed itself in two ways.

His wife became more of an obsession to him in a physical sense and very much less of an inspiration to him in a spiritual sense.

The situation was a singularly cruel one; for had the girl loved him less, had there been less magnetic attraction between them, the charm of her personality, apart from flesh and blood, would have grown more powerfully upon him. Nelly’s physical beauty was indeed Nelly’s own rival in this matter, and a rival who was absorbing and devouring the very thing in the man she loved that had originally drawn her towards him.

What was happening to Richard was indeed the very thing he had fled from Elise Angel to avoid. He had fled from it because he knew how dangerous to his peculiar temperament this sort of erotic obsession was – how it sapped the very life blood of his soul. He had married Nelly for a conscious and also an unconscious reason. Consciously he had wanted her as a living symbol of what he was aiming at in his work. Unconsciously he had been attracted to her with precisely the same sort of purely sensual attraction as he had felt towards Elise Angel. He had not known that at first. But now he did know it and it had a fatal effect upon the freedom of his brain. The sweetness of his English wife and the sweetness of the English scenery became between them a dangerous euthanasia, a drug-induced trance, the death of his better self.

And the thing did not stop even there. For the very lowering of the moral atmosphere of his life produced by his uxoriousness led to a subtle undermining of his resistance to the image of the dancer. The more absorbing did his present voluptuousness become, the less did he expel from his imagination the attraction of the other woman. Both he and Nelly were deliberately seeking to drug their differences by exploiting their attraction to one another.

That this kind of abandonment must eventually lead to satiety and reaction they did not seem to realize. That it was destroying the more exquisite moments of their life they did vaguely feel; but they felt it without understanding what they felt. And by slow degrees there entered into the fabric of their love some black threads of abominable hostility which came very near to hate. They loved and hated because they loved without restraint. They put poison into their love, because they separated love from life.

Had not Richard been twice as old as Nelly this ruining of the delicacy of their relations might never have occurred. What he was really guilty of was the exploitation of her emotions by his sophisticated senses. He was ‘seducing’, so to speak, his own lawful wife and turning her into a more delicate reproduction of his Old irresponsible amours. The worst of it was that while these former excesses had in no way interfered with his old work, his new, more spiritualized purpose was most seriously imperilled by what was occurring now.

The engaging, ingratiating charm of that insidious Sussex landscape lent itself with fatal ease to the process of spiritual deterioration. He bathed himself in the beauty of those rolling hills and those rich pastures. He drank in, through every pore of his skin, that magical air, those blue skies, those soft languorous mists, those warm, fragrant rains. And the girl he loved became for him the material medium through which he worshipped all this, through which he lost himself in all this. In loving Nelly he was loving the trees, the hedges, the lanes, the meadows, and the thyme-scented grass. In embracing Nelly he was embracing the very body of the sweet earth which, just then, was so luxuriously responsive.

It is true that there came to him certain moments when he was seized by a vague uneasiness. These moments were generally connected with Canyot; for, sure as he was of his wife's material fidelity, he was by no means so sure now of her mental interest, of her spiritual rapport. She seemed to escape him, even while he held her, and that obscure disillusionment at the bottom of her eyes fell away sometimes into a region of thoughts and feelings to which he had no entrance, the clue of it quite lacking and all its ways dark.

Physically she was his without reserve; mentally she had slipped aside into a land of her own; it was at the moments when he suspected that this land of her soul's escape from him was not barred to his rival, that he was seized with a vague uneasiness and discomfort.

One morning, early in July, Richard intercepted the postman in the outskirts of the village and received from him another letter from Elise Angel.

The fact that he had every intention of reading every word of this communication, and that he put it away in his pocket with a thrill of furtive delight, was an evidence of how far he had drifted from his original purpose, of how he had changed in these brief two months.

He actually took it with him, without any feeling of shame, to the secluded shelter of the overarching hazels of the lane that led to Nelly's

Happy Valley.

Here, sitting under the hedge, he read it with absorbed unrestrained fascination.

It was a characteristic scrawl, written in the dancer's bold imperious hand; its passionate words, conveying like a far-flung torch a trail of fire into his languid senses, thrilled him with forbidden longings.

She told him that she had accepted an engagement at a New York theatre that would begin sometime in October.

'I shall be there till Christmas,' she wrote, 'couldn't you possibly come over?'

He tore this letter into the tiniest fragments and poked it with his stick under the dead leaves, into the soft mould.

As he did so there came over him a sense of shame at this concealment, at the furtive cowardice of this action.

'It's their fault,' he said to himself, apostrophizing women in general. 'If they weren't so damned jealous, if things were really free – as they will be, perhaps, in two hundred years! – there would be no need for these tricks.'

Then it occurred to him to wonder what he would feel if he caught his wife in the act of kissing Rob Canyot. 'Hang it all!' he muttered in the retired honesty of this sudden soliloquy with his soul; 'I'm cursed if I should like that very much! I don't think that would be very nice!'

Then he turned his attention to Elise and tried to conjure up a situation in which he surprised her in some amorous colloquy with another person. 'The devil!' he confessed to himself. 'I shouldn't like that very much either!'

What did he want then? The answer was certainly naïve in its veracity. He wanted to move agreeably and openly, as if it were quite the accustomed thing, between Nelly his wife and Elise his friend! That, and nothing less than that, was precisely what he wanted. Was he no better, then, than an oriental Turk? No! he was no Turk; he was a civilized heathen. He wanted them both; but certainly not together in one house! There, at any rate, he had advanced in refinement upon the devotees of Allah.

But how would he like it if both Nelly and Elise moved ‘agreeably and openly’ between himself and two other men?

‘The devil!’ he muttered. ‘I couldn’t put up with that! I should run away from that.’ ‘But,’ whispered his cynical demon, ‘suppose that were the recognized custom in your two-hundred-years-hence community?’

I should find someone who really satisfied me, he thought, and persuade her to break this confounded custom. She and I would be the only faithful ones. This new line of thought led him to the conclusion that what he really wanted was not Nelly in England and Elise in America, but some wonderful ‘Elise-Nelly’ with whom he would be completely contented on both sides.

Having reached this conclusion he promptly rejected it with disgust. Such a double-natured female would be an odious monstrosity, like a peewit with the hooked beak of a sparrowhawk!

Then where was he, after his rambling meditation? Precisely where the bulk of humanity was, after its experiments of four thousand years!

It seemed, that particular July day, as though the hot sun on the ripening corn and the blazing red poppies had roused a feverish ferment in more than one human cranium. For no sooner had Richard reached the churchyard, where Canyot armed with a billhook was cutting the grass under the wall, while Nelly, perched on the top of the wall, with bare head and swinging legs, was watching him mischievously, than he became aware that their conversation was tense and startling.

At his approach Canyot rose to a perpendicular position, billhook in hand, and surveyed him frowningly and intensely. Nelly fixed upon him a glance of the most mocking and mysterious elfishness.

‘You’ve just arrived at the right moment,’ she remarked. ‘Robert has been proposing to me that we all go off to America together!’

‘Why to America?’ said Richard lightly, leaning back against the wall by her side and giving her skirt a little discreet pull so that it should conceal her ankles.

‘She understands my work,’ threw out the young man. ‘I want to work over there … new impressions – new world – sky-scrapers.’

‘But perhaps I don’t want sky-scrapers,’ said Richard with a smile. ‘Perhaps I prefer Sussex.’

‘Go ahead Robert!’ cried Nelly mockingly. ‘Explain yourself. I told you how absurd you were.’

‘It’s like this, Storm,’ went on the tow-headed youth, screwing up his eyes and prodding the wall with the tip of his billhook. ‘It’s like this, Storm —’

‘Well, my friend, what is it like?’ inquired Richard blandly, laying his hand familiarly on his wife’s knee. ‘Do you intend to carry us both off with you, or are you thinking of kidnapping Nelly?’

‘She understands my work, Storm. She knows nothing of painting, of course—’

‘Thank you, Rob dear!’ cried Nelly from her perch on the wall, giving him a kick with her foot. ‘You can leave out the “of course”.’

‘But she understands what I am aiming at. She helps me. You can’t work without one person who knows what you want to do.’

‘I don’t know in the least what he’s talking about,’ cried Nelly. ‘And please don’t think I put all this into his head.’

‘Of course he knows you didn’t!’ protested the painter. ‘He knows only too well you didn’t!’ he added with a profound sigh.

‘Well then,’ began Richard, feeling extremely well pleased with this queer turn of fate but prepared to get the full credit for magnanimity, ‘it appears that you want to drag me to America with you as a sort of necessary item, troublesome but inevitable, in the train of my wife?’

‘Don’t try and be sarcastic like that,’ interrupted Nelly. ‘It annoys me and it goes completely over Rob’s head.’

Richard at this removed his hand from her knee. Her words irritated him more than, at that moment, he could have guessed was possible. In his heart he roundly accused her of ill-breeding and he revenged himself on her by reverting with a sweep of his imagination to the large heroic gestures of Elise Angel.

It was one of Richard’s weaknesses to dislike beyond everything else the flick or sting or smart of a well-placed rebuke; especially if administered by a woman he cared for. His temperament had a certain equine sensitiveness to the lash of the human tongue. He himself was singularly slow of wit in these verbal encounters. Externally he kept his temper, to avoid looking a fool; internally he revenged himself out of all proportion to the affront. And he never really forgave.

‘It’s like this, Storm,’ repeated the young painter, dropping his billhook and coming nearer to the man he addressed. ‘If you and your wife don’t come with me on this American trip my work will stop dead. I shan’t do another stroke of the brush. I can’t work without her. I can’t deal with my thoughts without her. I can’t cope with existence without her. I can’t endure it without her.’

His words came out pellmell, one on the top of another. He seemed all in a moment to lose control of himself. His clenched hand quivered at his side. His voice became shrill and harsh. His lips trembled. ‘I can’t endure it without her,’ he repeated. ‘I know you don’t understand my work, but you said it was good. You know it is good. You know I shall go very far with it. If you take her away from me now it'll be the end. It'll finish me. I can't stand it. I shall chuck the whole thing and just go off.'

'But Robert dear—' began Nelly.

He raised his hand. 'I know all that,' he said. 'I used not to mind not seeing her; but she's too much for me. I can't bear it any more. I must see her. I must have her within reach, where I can get to her. I thought I could sail without a word. I can't. I can't go away. If she doesn't go with me, if you two don't go with me, I am done in. I'd better give up at once. Without seeing her I can't do my work; and without my work what's life or anything in it to me? I hate it all! So you see you must come with me, Storm.'

It gave Nelly a strange and curious feeling to hear herself spoken of as if she were not present. A chilly sense of ghostliness fell upon her and she looked at Canyot's agitated features with a queer mixture of compassion and remoteness.

'If you two don't come with me,' the young man continued, 'it'll just finish me off. I thought I could bear not having her – I gave her up.' He still kept talking of Nelly in the third person. 'I didn't know myself. I was proud of letting her go. But I can't do it. I've found that out. I can't do it. So you must come. I only want to be somewhere near her – on the same side of the sea. But I can't do without her. Life is short. Everything else is unimportant. I only want just to see her – I – I love her too much! It's like that, Storm. I love her too much!'

'Well?' murmured Nelly looking at Richard with inscrutable eyes. 'Well?'

Richard was simply and directly touched. Canyot's feeling was so genuine and so deep that it swept him off his feet. It was one of those moments when he showed the best that was in him. He was awed and he was impressed; a real impulse of generosity stirred within him. He would have made the same response had there been no Elise Angel in the world. At that moment, oddly enough, he actually wished that Elise Angel was not in America; so that his response could be disinterested. The power of that passion passing like a tornado across the artist's twisted and corrugated countenance shamed him, disarmed him, liberated him from himself.

'Well?' repeated Nelly.

Richard bowed over the girl's hands as they lay in her lap and taking one of them into his own kissed it with a grandiose gesture.

Then he turned from her to Canyot and laid his hand on his shoulder.

'Of course I'll bring her. Of course we'll come, Robert,' he said. 'I've always thought I ought not to settle down without seeing America, and Nelly's never been out of England. Of course we'll come. I like Nelly to be of use to a real artist.'

Canyot's expression when he heard this was one of such rapturous relief that Richard had a reciprocal thrill of emotion.

The young painter blurted out some inarticulate words of gratitude and then without a glance at either of them strode off over the graves, his heavy shoulders shaken with childish crying.

'That was nice of you, Richard,' the girl whispered. 'At least I think it was nice of you. But I never quite know. You are not an easy person to understand, my husband!'

'It was a little bit nice of me, sweetheart,' he responded. 'But I quite sympathize with your difficulty in understanding me. I'm damned if I understand myself.'

'I wouldn't have let another woman come with us,' Nelly continued, 'certainly not that woman who wrote that letter!'

This was indeed a sharp thrust. Richard's mind visualized that little hole under the leaves into which he had prodded Elise's last communication. In one brief moment he was hurled down from the heights of magnanimity.

'I don't know that I would have agreed,' he said, 'if he hadn't been what he is. But he's a real artist and one must do what one can when it's a question of that. You really do seem to have been an inspiration to him. Yes; his work is good. Canyot's a genius in his way; with his mother dead, one couldn't very well do anything else.'

'Well! It's nice of you. It is nice of you! I only hope I shan't be seasick. But it'll be fun anyhow. I shall enjoy it. Come, dear! Aren't you going to lift me off this old wall?'

He took the opportunity of kissing her before he set her on her feet again. They were still sufficiently in love for these snatched embraces in unpromising spots and queer moments to be very pleasant to both of them.

Hand in hand they drifted to where the old naturalist lay; as if anxious to receive his benediction upon their erratic impulse.

That afternoon Richard deliberately slipped off after tea so as to leave his wife a free field to discuss the details of their departure with the young man. She had told him she had to go down to the farm to get some eggs from Mrs Winsome and he took it for granted that the painter would be expecting her there. A faint glow of self-righteous magnanimity still hung about him and his knowledge of the dancer's being in America still remained a vague exultation far away in the back of his mind.

He thought to himself, as he followed his favouriievhazel path, that these difficult relations between men and women were really growing a little more adjustable nowadays. The war had left its impress, he thought. Old rigid conventions were breaking down. Human beings were learning to be more generous to one another, less tenacious of their legal rights, more flexible, more reasonable.

He was inclined to attribute the thrill of new happiness which he felt, as he swung along the lane under that leafy roof, to the spirit of his own generosity to Canyot. Something of it was perhaps due to that. But if he had analysed his feelings down to the bottom he would have found that it was not at all disagreeable to him to have Canyot there, somewhere about, so that when he was in a mood for solitude he could hand over Nelly to him and go his own way. He liked to go off for long walks alone. He was still obsessed with Nelly as a lover; but he was not perfectly satisfied with her as a companion. There were moments, especially after he had made love to her a great deal, when he was decidedly bored with her society. The companion he really loved best was, after all, none other than Richard himself. Richard alone with Richard was what really gave him the deepest satisfaction.

He branched off after a while down a lane to his left, which led ultimately by shadowy byways to a small country town to the west of Selshurst. He had never been precisely this road before and the absence of any old landmarks made the path full of fresh and new impressions. The fact, too, that he was destined to leave England so soon again gave an added attraction to every little omen of the way. The jerk to his mind of this impending adventure shook him out of the half-sensual half-mystic lassitude into which he had insensibly fallen and he found himself thinking and feeling with more clear-cut subtlety.

He paused at the entrance to a long avenue of ash trees that led away across a marsh into the very land of the sunset.

What was it in a road of that kind, bordered by those twisted weather-beaten trees, that caught his mind up and carried it so far?

There came over him, just then, a feeling that he had only known once or twice in his life before; a feeling far too evasive to be put into intelligible words.

It was as if the obscure emotions of many lonely travellers upon many lonely roads, the fragments and morsels of their intercourse with the low–bowed branches and the gleaming pools, with this particular patch of moss and that particular bed of reeds, had mingled strangely together and had waited for him, had been waiting for him, precisely at the turn of the road, so that he should respond to them and give them a sign of recognition.

It was as if they became for him, at that hour, a solitary signal, a beckoning intimation, something that emerged out of long lonely expectant nights, nights full of soft-falling rain and rustling wind and the sound of shaken leaves.

It was a feeling that was only possible in a very old country, a country where generations of men and women, one after another, had mixed their human sorrows with the wistful loneliness of marsh and mere, of moorland and wayside. It was a feeling that could not have endured for a moment either in the uproar of a city or in the inhuman desolation of jungle or desert or mountain. It was the evocation of a strange marginal purlieu, lying midway between the loneliness of solitary human beings and the loneliness of inanimate things, things that had been witness, in their long centuries, of the passing of many such wayfarers and had become the accomplices of many vaguely floating thoughts.

Richard turned back at that point – he was already some three miles from home – but the glimpse he had been permitted that day into the very secret of his native soil went with him as he retraced his steps.

He felt humbled and saddened. He realized that he had in these days of lovemaking lost some clue, some contact with the unknown, that it must to one of his motives to rediscover.

That half-sensual half-mystical communication with nature, such as he had blended with his love for Nelly, had not been subtle enough. Certain more delicate voices had grown inaudible, had passed over his head, had been drowned in the grosser monotony of his material sensations.

Towards Nelly herself, how dull, how insensitive he had been! Towards her and towards poor Canyot too!

It was likely enough, he thought, only too likely, that there were aspects of Canyot's work deeper, more clearly emphasized, nearer the great withheld secret of things, than anything he had himself ever written. And how little he had written, of any kind, during these recent months! He had betrayed his better self; and in doing so he had betrayed Nelly also.

He had not retraced his steps very far when he observed a dogcart driving rapidly towards him, with a couple of dogs running beside it.

It pulled up with a jerk when it reached him and he perceived that the driver was none other than Mrs Shotover.

'How do you do, Mr Storm,' said the lady. 'It's a pity we're going in opposite directions. I'd have offered you a lift. I'm going to Fern-ham Beeches to fetch a bitch pup I've just bought – such a little darling. Well! how's Nelly and everything else at the cottage?'

Richard put his hand on the side of the cart. Her horse chafed and stamped and fretted; and the two dogs barked at his legs. The wheels of her smart little vehicle smelt of new paint. Mrs Shotover was dressed in a tightly fitting tweed suit and her grey hair was well tucked in under a cloth hat. She looked the typical Englishwoman, out for a race meeting or an agricultural show or, as was actually the case, to visit her dog fancier.

With her champing and stamping horse, her barking dogs, and the taciturn Thomas sitting on the back seat, she broke in upon the writer's thoughts like an image of the 'verdict of society.'

'Oh, Nelly's very well,' he said. 'I have been for a long walk. I often go for long walks.'

'Too long,' Mrs Shotover hazarded. 'It's a mistake! Married men ought never to go for long walks. They ought to take their young wives out – to see people and all that kind of thing.'

'To buy terrier pups, eh?' said Richard.

'To buy the good opinion of people that count,' rapped out the lady. 'Oh no, my dear Mr Storm, you really must be seen a little more, you and your charming Nelly. There's that adorable Lady Wincroft; why, she's asked me over and over again why Nelly hasn't returned her call. Of course I say it's her father, and so forth – but her father, poor dear, is out of it now.'

'I don't see why I should break my usual habits, Mrs Shotover. I married Nelly Moreton, not the society of West Sussex.'

'That won't do! That won't do!' cried the lady, and she sat so bolt upright in her seat and looked so fierce that Richard began to feel as if he had encountered the chariot of the sternest of the Eumenides.

'You're a great deal older than she is,' was her next remark; Richard could not help wondering what comments upon all this the coachman's imperturbable profile concealed from the world.

Then his mood suddenly changed. A mischievous spirit of schoolboy levity took possession of him. Confound the woman! he thought. What right has she to talk to me like this? And in order to see what she would do, and out of pure maliciousness, he burst out with what was in his mind.

'You'll be pleased, then, I expect,' he said, 'when I tell you that I've decided to travel with Nelly for a bit.'

Mrs Shotover did indeed look startled. ‘Oh excellent! very excellent!’ she cried. On the Continent, I suppose? To Paris first, no doubt, and then to Switzerland? I am delighted you can afford to give my dear child this happiness!’

‘I think of taking Nelly to America,’ he said, with a malicious emphasis. ‘Robert Canyot has some exhibitions to look after over there; and he has persuaded us to go with him.’

Mrs Shotover did indeed show ‘the mettle of her pastures’ at that moment. She became extremely quiet, and flicked a horse-fly from the flank of her impatient steed.

‘Ah!’ she muttered, drawing in her breath with a little hissing sound. ‘Ah really!’

‘Yes; we think of going quite soon. Nelly will be sorry to leave Hill Cottage of course. But we may be able to let it for a few months. We are both so interested in Mr Canyot’s success.’

In her heart Mrs Shotover thought bitterly – Who is the one to be exploited in this abominable affair? What a couple of ill-bred cads these fellows are! Poor, poor, poor Nelly! But aloud she only said, ‘How nice it is for the dear child to have two men of genius to support her! I expect you and Mr Canyot will both find America very much to your taste. I hope Nelly will. It’s rather a terrible place isn’t it? But no doubt there are some nice people there. You won’t get anything to drink, of course, but I suppose none of you will mind that. What’s their word for those horrid mixtures they all swallow? Soft drinks! Well, I hope you’ll enjoy the soft drinks, Mr Storm. But don’t kill my dear child between you. Give her my love, please! Goodbye.’ And she flicked her horse viciously and was off at a gallop, almost throwing Mr Thomas into Richard’s arms.

She had successfully destroyed the filmy threads of his meditation. ‘It is to escape from women like that,’ he said to himself, ‘that people emigrate. Oh England, England, you certainly allow many troublesome persons many strange privileges!’

Chapter 13

THE NEWLY BROADENED Varick Street, now a continuation of Seventh Avenue, is one of the most characteristic thoroughfares in New York. It is characteristic of that city by reason of a queer blending of the dilapidated ‘old’ with the harshly and rawly ‘new’. The old is indeed rapidly disappearing, but it lingers on in a diffusion of chaotic litter; bits of ancient Dutch houses, roofs and sheds, old wooden walls, little ramshackle staircases, fragments of antiquated sidewalks and old tobacconist and barber shops, clinging pathetically enough to the great new erections, just as the small narrow streets in that vicinity seem themselves to cling with a tenacious persistence to the huge new thoroughfare that cuts its proud straight path through the middle of them.

It was at the corner of Charlton Street and Varick Street that Richard and Nelly at last installed themselves.

They had a bedroom, a sitting room, a bathroom and a kitchen, on the second floor of a small house that must have been at least a hundred years old.

The place was already furnished; and they possessed themselves of it on the understanding that they could leave it when they pleased.

Robert Canyot had taken a studio on a year’s lease in another part of the city; in a street adjoining Central Park, of whose trees he could catch a distant view as he worked.

Nelly had found the heat of New York with its accompanying humidity rather exhausting when she first arrived, but the amusement and interest of housekeeping under these new conditions prevented her from losing her good spirits.

Her first view of the great group of colossal buildings gathered round the Woolworth Tower, as they entered the harbour more than a month ago, had been forever associated in her mind with the discovery that she was to be a mother.

She could see that same Woolworth Tower as soon as she left her little apartment and turned into Varick Street; for Varick Street led straight into the city district and lost itself among those iron and marble monsters.

It always struck her when each day she saw the huge erection as she went on her housekeeping errands that the thing resembled some gigantic temple, built to some new god of this new world, a god who demanded the service of innumerable men and women but whose own especial angels and chosen ministers were things of iron and stone and steam and electricity.

It a little terrified her sometimes to think that she was destined to stay in New York until her child was born; but they had let Hill Cottage before they left England; Grace had married her young man; it would have meant an uncomfortable hunt for a new abode if she insisted on returning. She had no desire that her child be born in America, but she dreaded, in her nervous state of health, the effort of the voyage.

There were other more subtle reasons to account for her acquiescence when Richard proposed to take this apartment. She associated Hill Cottage with that fatal letter from Paris and it pleased her to think that New York was further away from Paris than was that little garden where she had inhaled, together with the scent of white phloxes, her first taste of the cruelty of sex jealousy.

And she had a longing, too, that she might put off her return to her father's grave till she had received – as she believed she would receive in time – some sort of absolution for what she regarded as her sin in neglecting him when she first married.

If I'd married Robert, she thought, it would have been to give Father a home. I did give him a home with Richard; but it wasn't the same. It was for my own pleasure, and I hardly saw anything of him during those weeks.

In the subtle workings of her brain she had come to associate her Littlegate haunts with a certain complicated sadness – the sadness of her first taste of the bitterness of life and the sadness of her father's wasted powers.

The upbraiding shadow of Mrs Shotover also menaced her from those Sussex fields. I suppose I ought not to have let her go, she thought. I suppose I was cruel. But she was impossible. She was mad.

In spite of her nervous condition and in spite of certain moods of timid apprehension as to all that was before her, Nelly was really extremely happy during those hot airless days. She suffered physically from the heat; but her husband had never been mentally so close to her; their mutual interest in their new surroundings seeming to have brought them together on a deeper plane.

She was very happy too in her frequent visits to Canyot's uptown studio; and the conversation about life and art which she had with the young painter, seated by his side in some gallery of the Metropolitan Museum or on a bench in the Central Park, lifted her out of herself into regions which she had never supposed she would be able to enter.

She admitted Canyot into the secret of her condition with a sure feminine instinct as to the effect the news would have upon him. And in this she was completely justified. The final loss of her, in a physical sense, thus emphasized by her prospect of motherhood, seemed to act as a sedative to the young man's passion, seemed to purge it of all possessive jealousy.

Canyot himself was steadily advancing in power and originality. He was surprised by the recognition his work received. Not only did he experience no difficulty in selling his pictures, but he found himself accepted as a desirable personage by the whole aesthetic fraternity of that enterprising cosmopolitan city. He turned out to be the only artist in New York whose methods of work were untouched by modern French fashions; this very fact appealed to the American craving for novelty; it was just the moment when a reaction was impending against the more extreme European schools.

It was not the prospect of Nelly's giving him a child that brought Richard nearer to her, it was the effect upon him of America. Like some great wedge of iron this tremendous new world, bored its way through the thick sensuousness of his nature and laid his deeper instincts bare. It was a process of spiritual surgery, painful but liberating. There were no lovely fields or leafy lanes here in Manhattan; as he trod its hot pavements and passed down its echoing canyons of iron and stone he was compelled to fall back upon his own soul for vision and illumination. Nelly's ways and Nelly's feelings and Nelly's little enjoyments became a sort of oasis to him in a stern stark wilderness where he wandered alone, stripped and defenceless.

Things were thus arranging themselves for all these three persons when an event occurred which changed everything.

Richard received word from Paris to the effect that his publisher there had gone bankrupt, leaving him without hope of any further income until arrangements could be made with some other house.

It became necessary that he should at once find work; for he had already spent what he had saved.

While he was looking for work he was compelled to borrow a couple of hundred dollars from Canyot. This loan was the beginning of evil, for by making him his rival’s financial debtor it introduced a new element into their relations full of dangerous possibilities. Insensibly he began to hate the successful painter as he had never hated him before. He threw out malicious and carping observations when Nelly went to see him. He got into the habit of grudging her her uptown visits. He vented his feeling of humiliation by all manner of sarcasms upon ‘successful people who cater to the American taste’.

The money that had passed into his hands became a slow poison, ruining the new understanding between himself and his wife. He brooded gloomily and morosely upon his situation as he went about looking for a job. He felt himself to be a failure. He was tempted to borrow more money and clear off to Paris; but he did not dare to suggest so drastic a move.

The late summer was a bad time in which to look for work. The pitiless sunshine made those vain interviews with journalistic underlings in stuffy offices peculiarly depressing.

Week after week passed; in spite of rigid economy the two hundred dollars ebbed away, and still Richard had found no job. Canyot kept pressing him to accept another loan. Once, to his unspeakable chagrin, he found that Nelly had accepted a cheque for fifty dollars from her friend. This incident led to the first quarrel between them that had occurred since they landed. The fierce manner in which the girl, when teased by his reproaches, cried out, ‘My child shall not be starved while Robert has a penny to give him!’ pierced the skin of his deepest pride. To revenge himself on her he deliberately reduced his own diet to an absurd minimum, refusing meat and milk and eggs and living almost entirely upon bread and tea. The result of this was that he began to suffer from acute dyspepsia which was aggravated by his miserable and hopeless hunt for work.

He found that he had overrated his reputation as a writer. In America he was practically unknown; the French estimation of his critical power amounted to almost nothing with the New York publishers and newspapers.

His great poetic purpose upon the substance of which, both in manner and in matter, that first month in America had produced a profound change, pruning it of accessories and giving it a sterner, more drastic tone, was now completely laid aside. He began to curse the day he had ever entered upon this too ambitious undertaking. He began to regret the light facility and the easily won local fame of his pre-war achievements. He felt himself a charlatan and a fraud; was almost tempted to destroy every word he had written under the stress of his new spiritual purpose. He felt as though he had completely deceived himself as to its quality.

At last he did succeed in finding something. It was not much of an opening, considering his former Paris reputation and his recent poetic schemes; but it was something – a ledge to cling to, a shelf of rock to hold by, in this tidal wave of adversity.

It was in the middle of September when he found it; an engagement with a newly organized magazine called The Mitre for which he had to furnish weekly articles upon the more definitely Catholic writers and poets of Europe. His salary amounted to forty dollars a week; but with the rent they had to pay for their apartment, this meant a very rigid economy. It meant, as a matter of fact, that he continued to underfeed himself so as to give his wife as little excuse as possible to accept any further help from the painter.

He went each day to the office and did his work there – though he might have worked at home – partly because he found it increasingly difficult to concentrate his thoughts in their small apartment, and partly to avoid the irritation of being harassed by his wife on account of his fantastic experiments in diet.

The result of this was that Nelly, being lonely and restless at home, resorted more and more to Canyot's studio. By gradual degrees the custom arose that she should prepare for the young man and for herself a substantial lunch in his 'kitchenette' while he worked at his pictures.

These picnic lunches in the painter's apartments were some of the happiest hours Nelly knew in those days and she solaced her conscience for accepting them by posing for him in various draperies during the afternoon.

Her evening meals with Richard grew more and more gloomy; for though she forced him to share certain little dishes which she took a pride in making, he never would really eat enough; and his persistency in this aggravating mania became a constant cause of friction between them, which was not lessened by his knowledge that in spite of such economy she still continued to accept Canyot's help.

Things went on in this unsatisfactory manner till the end of September, the girl drifting further and further away from him and concentrating all the attention that was not bestowed on Canyot upon the care and protection of the new life that was germinating within her.

It was a curious thing that this same new life, which had not drawn Richard as strongly towards her as it should have done, did not draw her either towards him.

It almost seemed, as time went on, as though it estranged her from him. It certainly absorbed her to such a degree that she could not make the effort to overcome his nervous irritability or to put an end to this ruining of his digestion by ill-chosen food.

She was touched and grateful to him for the way he stinted himself in his favourite luxury of cigarettes and she was distressed and worried to see him grow constantly thinner and older-looking. She seemed to live in these days in a self-concentrated dream, so that it was only the outside of her mind, as it were, that stirred at all. The more passionate elements in her were all taken up and exhausted in the slow process of maternity.

She could not have described to anyone what she felt in her inmost heart all this while. What was happening to her mentally was happening in some deep subconscious region out of reach altogether of any intelligible analysis. To her conscious self her attitude to Richard remained unchanged; and she was only dreamily and faintly aware that she regarded his coming and going with an abstracted eye, taking his presence for granted, like a background that varied slightly in colour but was always there.

It seemed as though the tenacious unscrupulous egoism of that new life was asserting its blind formidable unconscious will, careless as to whom it sacrificed, careless as to the spiritual havoc it caused, careless as to the human agencies to which it owed its being; asserting its will, as it rose out of the unfathomable reservoirs and groped forward towards the light, asserting its will, as it drew its nourishment from the body that protected it, isolating that body and treating the consciousness that animated that body as of no account at all save as it answered to its physical needs.

And Richard, while day after day he set off, with growing disinclination, to the office in East Twenty-seventh Street and settled down to his task of selecting, from piled-up Catholic books and brochures, the few things that interested him, felt as though his personal self were of no more weight than a floating straw borne on the tide of great irrepressible forces.

This feeling was precisely the one most naturally engendered in New York, where the crowds of men and women scourged by economic necessity seemed to dehumanize themselves and become just one more mechanically moving element, paralleled to the iron and steel and stone and marble, to the steam and electricity, whose forces, brutal and insistent, pounded upon it, hammered upon it, resisted it or drove it relentlessly forward.

Richard was puzzled in the profoundest depths of his nature by Nelly's attitude towards him. He expected her to be nervous and capricious. He expected her to cling to him, to depend upon him, to share every subtlety of her emotions with him. This strange shrinking away from him into herself, into that dim obscure unfathomable workshop of organic creation where her soul now brooded in its solitude, startled and bewildered him.

He wondered how she behaved with Canyot and whether he suffered from the same mysterious aloofness.

And Nelly's remoteness from him, her escape from him, was only one more additional element among the blind tremendous forces which seemed invading the last recess of his mind; and then passing on their way, indifferently.

Much of Richard's depression arose from sheer physical weakness, from his saving money by cutting down on meat and milk and eggs; but a good deal of it was due to a horrible doubt that began to invade his mind – a doubt as to whether he had not made the one irretrievable mistake of his life in marrying Nelly at all.

With the toning down of the more physical elements of their attraction to one another, the accompanying difficulties of the present situation seemed to fill the whole field. Richard became vaguely aware for the first time in his life of a serious deficiency in himself. He fought against this recognition and threw it aside but it kept returning; what it amounted to was that a certain human warmth, a certain tender fidelity, apart from either spiritual or physical excitement, was lamentably lacking in him. His great poetic purpose had been so thwarted and baffled that he found it difficult any more to take refuge in it; but he had to face the fact that all that was best in him was roused and stirred by that kind of thing alone. Apart from that kind of thing, he felt himself to be something hopelessly ignoble, untrustworthy, irresponsible, below the emotional level of ordinary humanity.

He did not attempt to conceal from himself that this ill-balanced economy of his was not really undertaken for his wife's sake. For her sake – if that was what he was about – he ought obviously to take every care of his health. The real motive that prompted him was a kind of voluptuous self-cruelty, mingled with an angry hatred of her dependence upon Canyot.

When he was quite alone, seated in the overhead railway or struggling with the crowd on Sixth Avenue, all sorts of inhuman egotistic feelings came upon him. Where had his intelligence been, that he had let himself be led into this trap? He had not the least desire that Nelly should have a child, He wanted Nelly, not Nelly's children. If he could not write wonderful new poetry, poetry that would be read hundreds of years hence – why, then, his old Paris life brought him quite enough fame and pleasure to satisfy any man! And what had he got now? Nelly's body was dominated by Nelly's child; Nelly's mind was dominated by Canyot. He had nothing for himself but odious duties and harassing responsibilities. He supposed that most men were thrilled with joy when the woman they loved had a child by them. Well! He was not thrilled. The idea of having the responsibility of a child gave him not the remotest pleasure. He wanted his name to be perpetuated not by children but by poetry. Children were nature's will and pleasure. Poetry was the attempt of the spirit of mankind to rise above nature and extricate itself.

Richard had just begun to make a few acquaintances among the literary and theatrical circles when this blow fell. But he let them go now; and they were not sufficiently interested in him to take any trouble in seeking him out. His wife was meeting Canyot’s friends but that did not mean that Richard met them.

As long as he did his work in the office he felt that he had fulfilled every duty that was demanded of him.

Each day he seemed to care less what happened; the promise for the future which his wife was bearing within her seemed to coincide in its growth with the steady loosening of his own hold upon all that he valued in existence.

There were no fields or lanes in Manhattan where he could recover his spirit by drawing upon the deep earth forces. All about him were iron girders and iron cog wheels and iron spikes. All about him were the iron foreheads of such as partook of the nature of the machinery whose slaves they were. And the iron that entered his soul found no force that could resist it; for all the days of his life he had been an epicurean: when the hour called for stoicism he could only answer with a dogged despair.

Chapter 14

ONE DAY, ABOUT the middle of October, Richard left the office between half-past one and two o’clock to get some lunch. He had been trying to extract the elusive quintessence from some especially recondite Catholic poet in order to make a popular article out of what was the last refinement of subtle and sceptical credulity.

He felt sick of his work, weary of himself, and beaten down by the noises of the street. Between the elaborate sophistications of this Parisian trifler with the faith and the raw harsh brutal aggression of the vortex of ferocious energies that swirled around him there seemed no refuge for his spirit, nothing that was calm and cool and simple and largely noble.

He made his way slowly up Sixth Avenue, searching for some little refreshment room or café where he could eat and read in quiet. He passed many of these places with a shudder. They were crowded and unappealing. The people inside them seemed as though they were eating for a wager, watched by the whole world through plate-glass windows.

He felt hunted by iron dogs whose jaws were worked by machinery and whose mouths breathed forth a savour of ‘poisonous brass and metal sick’.

He crossed street after street, threading his way through the automobiles and the great motor-lorries, jostled and hustled by the crowd. He held grimly to Sixth Avenue, knowing that there alone, in this quarter of the city, could he find any sort of inexpensive retreat. Above him rattled with clanging roar the trains of the elevated railway, supported on a huge iron framework, the very shadows of which, as they broke the burning sunshine, seemed to exude a smell of heated metal. The paraded objects in the store windows leered aggressively and jeeringly at him through their plate glass.

Every material fabric in the world, except such as suggested quietness and peace, seemed to flap and nod and make mouths at him. Every man he passed seemed to flaunt an insolent cigar, held tightly between compressed lips, and every woman seemed to jibe mockingly at his decrepitude from under her smart hat.

Suddenly, when he began to feel actually faint and dizzy and was on the point of entering a glaring cavern of marble tables, he caught a glimpse of the front of a theatre down one of the streets on his right hand. It was some distance away but certain well-known words emblazoned on a huge placard made the blood rush to his head.

ELISE ANGEL, proclaimed this placard to the tide of traffic, ELISE ANGEL IN HER FAMOUS ATTIC DANCE.

All his dizziness disappeared in a moment and the iron wedge that had worked itself into his brain during these miserable weeks seemed pulled out by invisible hands and flung under the wheels of the crowded street.

He rushed to the theatre entrance, paid for a ticket in the second row and was led to his place by a damsel in apron and cap, whom he smiled at with a smile of a drunken man entering paradise.

The house was not particularly full that afternoon and it was not long before the performance began.

It was a vaudeville entertainment and the great dancer’s ‘turn’ was the last on the list. It was indeed nearly an hour and a half before she made her appearance, the longest hour and a half, but in one sense the very happiest, that Richard Storm had ever known. He saw and heard all that preceded her entrance as if he was in a trance.

At last she appeared, with the familiar background of plain black curtains; and out of infinite depths of obscure suffering his spirit rose up, healed and refreshed, to greet her.

She danced to some great classical rhapsody, tragic, passionate, world-destroying, world-creating; and the harmonies of the dead musician lived a life greater, more formidable, more liberating, than humanity could have dared to dream they contained. Her arms, her limbs were bare; her nobly modelled breasts, under some light fabric, outlined themselves as the breasts of some Phidian divinity.

Once more, as if all between this moment and when he had last seen her were a dark and troubled dream, she lifted for him the veil of Isis. In the power of her austere and olympian art, all the superficial impressions that had dominated him through that long summer dissolved like a cloud of vapour.

This was what he had been aiming at in his own blundering way; this was what he was born to understand! The softness of ancient lawns under immemorial trees, the passion of great winds in lonely places, the washing of sea tides under melancholy harbour walls, the retreats of beaten armies, the uprising of the multitudinous oppressed, the thunder of the wings of destroying angels, the ‘still small voice’ of the creative spirit brooding upon the foundations of new worlds – all these things rose up upon him as he watched her, all these things were in the gestures of her outspread arms, in the leap and the fall and the monumental balance of her divine white limbs.

Her physical beauty was the mere mask of the terrible power within her. Her spirit seemed to tear and rend at her beauty and mould it with a recreating fire into a sorrow, into a pity, into a passion, that flew quivering and exultant over all the years of man’s tragic wayfaring.

But her dancing was not the wild lyrical outburst of an emotion that spurned restraint. Beneath every movement, every gesture, binding the whole thing together and realizing the cry of the beginning in the finality of the silence of the close, there was the stern intellectual purpose of a mind that was consciously, deliberately, building a bridge from infinite to infinite, from mystery to mystery.

The scattered audience that watched her was largely composed of poor people, many of them unknown unrecognized artists of both sexes, mingled with a sprinkling of wealthy virtuosos, mostly young men and women.

It was to youth – that was plain enough – to the youth of these after-war days, that she came with this great new art, an art that changed former values, an art that created the taste that was destined to understand it.

And how, for one man at least who watched, white-cheeked and still as a statue in his place, the important things became the unimportant and the things that had been half forgotten became everything that mattered!

All the complicated weight of sensual sensations, of refined sensuous sensations even, which had hitherto meant so much, seemed to be torn away from him. New York had loosened them from his heart already – those insidious pleasures! New York had cut at them and prodded them, had hammered them and crushed them, with its iron engines and the howling arena of its energies. But New York had left his soul naked, helpless, flayed and bleeding.

With these divine gestures that seemed to arise out of some tremendous unseen victory over all that was in the path of the spirit, Elise Angel clothed that wounded soul of his with the garments of new flesh and blood.

She had never danced quite like this in the days when he had known her in Paris. He felt she must have endured strange tribulations while he was taking his pleasure in green pastures and beside still waters. And this new phase of her unconquerable art was the result of what she had gone through!

When it was over and the curtain fell, Richard felt like a man to whom has been manifested at last the hidden god of a lifetime of hopeless prayers.

He rose to his feet when they began applauding her and stared at her without a movement. In his eyes were tears, but they did not fall. On his lips was a cry ‘Elise! Elise!’ but he did not utter it. He only stood motionless and white as a ghost, staring at her, his whole soul one inarticulate ecstasy of gratitude. He knew, all of a sudden, that she had seen him; for the frank infantile smile of delight at the shouts that rose from every part of the house changed in the flicker of a moment to a quick agitated look of troubled concern. She must have found him sorely changed! She made an imperceptible movement towards him and gave him a direct sign of recognition. He smiled faintly in answer to this and moved at once from his place towards the theatre door.

Out in the street his dizziness came upon him again; so that it was all he could do to stagger up the little dark passage that led to the stage entrance. Here he sank down upon a flight of wooden steps and closed his eyes. He only prayed that he might not lose consciousness before she came out.

She came at last, hurriedly, anxiously and unattended.

‘Richard, Richard!’ she cried, bending over him.

He struggled to his feet and she gave him both her hands. ‘What’s happened, my dear? You are old, you are ill, you are horribly changed! What have they done to you? Didn’t you get my letters?’

He could only smile at her with perfect happiness and contentment. Then he staggered and sank down again on the wooden steps.

‘Mon Dieu! You are ill,’ she cried. ‘Oh I must get you away from here. I must get you to my rooms. Stay where you are. Don’t try to move. I’ll be back in a moment. Ah! there’s Tommy!’

A tall thin man in fashionable attire approached them from the street. ‘Tommy dear,’ she began at once in a pleading, cajoling voice, full of a vibrant plaintiveness. ‘This is the great critic Richard Storm, the friend of Richepin and Barrès. Have you got your car there? I must beg you to help me get him into it. He's going to dine with me. The theatre was too much for him.'

The gentleman addressed as Tommy obeyed her with courtly alacrity.

Between them they supported Richard to the street and got him into the automobile. Then 'Tommy', after giving his chauffeur the dancer's address, bowed to Elise and bade her goodbye. 'I shall be here tonight,' he said. 'You can tell me then how your friend is.' With a farewell wave of his hand the man was gone and Richard was alone with Elise.

She made Tommy's servant help her to get him up the single flight of stairs that led to her luxurious apartments.

Once safely ensconced here and laid out upon the cushions of her divan she hurriedly brought him a glass of cognac.

When he had drunk this she told him to rest for a bit; leaving the door between the two rooms ajar she retired into her bedroom and changed her dress for a long loosely fitting tea-gown.

Appearing again in this more intimate array, and with purple-coloured oriental slippers on her feet, she called softly into the lighted corridor. To the elderly duenna who obeyed her call she gave some quickly whispered order; the woman presently returned with a heavy silver tray upon which were a pile of sandwiches and a bottle of champagne.

Having filled their glasses, this invaluable attendant, mute and competent, observing everything as though she observed nothing, went out as silently as she had entered; Elise, seated on the divan by Richard's side, made him eat and drink.

It was not long before the wine brought back the colour to his cheeks and loosened his tongue. He made a feeble effort to rise.

‘It’s you who ought to be resting now,’ he said, ‘after what you’ve done; not a great hulking fraud like me!’

She forced him back upon the cushions and kissed him tenderly on the forehead.

Then she refilled her own glass with champagne and rallied him because his was still only half-empty.

‘You never could drink as I do, mon vieux,’ she murmured. ‘Come then. Let’s smoke for a bit!’ And she lit a cigarette and gave one to him.

‘Well! speak to me, old friend; tell me what they’ve been doing to you? I can see you’re in the hands of some female person! Only a woman could reduce a man to the state you’re in. Getting grey and withered, upon my life! Come on, coeur de mon coeur, and let’s hear the whole miserable story! But do please tell me, first of all, why you ran away from me like that? That wasn’t very nice of you, was it? Why did you do it, Richard? No! you shan’t get out of it by kissing my hand. Why did you do it, Richard?’

She spoke with a caressing infantile naïveté, which many another had found irresistible, and she sidled up to him on the couch, letting her fingers stray through his hair and across his thin cheeks. The softness and warmth of her flexible form enveloped him like a hovering cloud that follows every contour and every rigid outline of the hillside against which it nestles.

‘Why did you do it, Richard?’ she repeated, putting all the plaintiveness of a child’s appeal to be loved into the intonation of her voice. ‘Why did you do it?’

There seemed to be no answer to this except the one inevitable answer to all such questions and he let his hand slide round her waist and drew her closely against him.

Vaguely in his half-conscious mind – such is the eternal hypocrisy of the male conscience when confronted with the unscrupulousness of women –

he justified himself for this yielding by putting all the burden of it upon her. He let her lips be the first to seek his lips, and the fact that it did happen in that way seemed, to his half-extinguished loyalty, justification enough. The only alternative would have been that he should have struggled up to his feet and shaken off, with a brusque unthinkable violence, her warm arms and caressing fingers.

Having been so long without food it was no wonder that the wine she had given him disarmed his scruples quite as much as her insidious beauty. It threw him back upon a sort of delicious helplessness and weakness out of which he clung to her blindly, while her love lifted him up, like something strong and immortal into a paradise of peace, pressing against its breast something hurt, wounded, frail and pitifully human.

It was indeed with a certain innocence of real tenderness that they clung together then; and with their kisses was mingled for both of them a kind of infinite relief, as if they had been for aeons of time torn apart and separated, and as if some living portion of their being had gone through the world suppressed, dumb, fettered, stifled, until that liberating hour.

It seemed as if only a few minutes had passed, so rapt and absorbed had they been, when Elise leapt up to her feet and announced that it was time for her to dress.

She called to Thérèse and scolded her for not having brought in dinner; and she insisted, when the servant did bring it, that Richard should begin his meal while she changed her clothes.

While he ate she kept running in, in her dressing gown and with loosened hair, to make sure he was doing justice to Thérèse’s cooking. She snatched her own meal by hurried mouthfuls in this way; Richard never forgot the mingling of childish excitement and royal graciousness with which she filled his plate and his glass and bent over him with fleeting kisses as she did so, her bronze-coloured hair hanging in heavy braids upon her white shoulders.

They had just time for a last cigarette together before she had to leave. Richard, laughing at her protests about being too heavy, drew her down upon his knees and teased her about the shameless way she had reddened her lips. ‘It’s your fault,’ she whispered. ‘You’ve kissed away every bit of natural colour out of me!’

She would not let him enter the theatre again that night, but before they parted at the stage door she made him promise to come to tea on the following day.

‘It doesn’t matter how early or how late you come,’ she assured him. ‘There’s no performance tomorrow and I’ll keep myself free for you from four o’clock on. So don’t get worried. Come just as soon as you can get away.’

It was not till he found himself in the Seventh Avenue subway that Richard remembered that he had been expected home at half-past six.

It occurred to him then, as he sat staring at advertisements of soap and toothpaste, cold-cream and hair-wash, that Nelly was to have made some especial vegetarian dish in his honour, the recipe for which she had obtained from one of her uptown friends.

He got out at Sheridan Square and walked down Varick Street.

Far off, in front of him, he could see the colossal bulk of the Woolworth Building, in and out of the very body of which the huge procession of wagons, drays and motor-lorries, which poured up and down from north to south, seemed to be moving. Normally this stream of rattling trucks and wagons, driven by reckless brawny youth, some of them still clothed in heterogeneous patches of khaki, was a cause of nervous misery to him.

He gazed in astonishment at the unmoved equanimity with which the tiny school children, going to the high school in Hudson Square, crossed that roaring street. American children, he thought, must be born with some self-protective membrane, impervious, like the shell of the oyster, to all rending shocks of noise!

But today he seemed to possess within himself a resistant power more effective than any oyster shell, inasmuch as it was able to carry, so to speak, the war into the enemy’s camp and find grist for its mill in the most rending and tearing sights and sounds.

As he swung down Varick Street brandishing his stick – a stick bought under the shadow of Selshurst Cathedral – he actually exulted in all the sights around him. He exulted in the rawness of the iron frameworks, in the great torn-out gaps, like bleeding flesh, that were being laid bare in the sides of the old Dutch houses, in the subterranean thunder and the whirling puffs of air and dust that came up through the subway’s gratings. He exulted in the huge grotesqueness of the gigantic advertisements, in the yells of the truck drivers, in the flapping clothes lines, in the piled-up garbage, in the hideous tenements and vociferous children. He suddenly became aware that in all this chaotic litter and in all this reckless, gay, aggressive crowd, there was an immense outpouring of youthful energy, an unconquerable vitality, a ferocious joyousness and daring.

The individual separate person, with his ways and his caprices, was certainly hammered and battered here into a horrible uniformity. But the stream of humanity, considered in its ensemble, had a tornado-like force and swing and amplitude. If the exquisite was pounded out of existence, the fidgety, the affected, the meticulous, the conceited, was certainly allowed no mercy.

He stumbled along the rough uneven sidewalk and finally threaded his way through a long line of arrested vehicles to the corner of Charlton Street.

He opened the door with his latch key and ran upstairs.

He found Nelly extended on the sofa white as a sheet and with her eyes tight shut.

He rushed to her side and falling on his knees took her hand and called her by name.

She opened her eyes and looked at him with a bitter smile. She snatched her hand away and drew back from his touch.

He was so relieved to find that her immobility was a deliberate and not an unconscious thing that he got up from his knees and began talking loudly and freely, walking up and down the room.

‘I was very lucky tonight,’ he said, using the crude diplomacy of his earlier days and trying to undermine her suspicions by a mask of nonchalant candour. ‘I met an actress I know and got treated to a wonderful dinner; champagne and all that sort of thing. Upon my soul I believe it made me a bit tipsy. I’m not used to this wining and dining.’

Nelly’s face had changed from its ghastly pallor to an unnatural flush. She moved her head and made a little gesture with her hands that might have meant anything or nothing.

‘But I thought,’ went on Richard, still walking up and down the room as if to gather confidence by the sound of his own footsteps, ‘that in our present state of finances it would be absurd to leave a good dinner unenjoyed.’

‘You left my dinner unenjoyed,’ murmured his wife. ‘I had it ready for you by half-past six: I waited and waited for you. And then, when I did eat, I was faint and sick. I waited so long. I got nervous and scared. I was afraid something had happened. Kiss me Richard please, and don't tell me any more.'

He stopped by her side and bent over her and kissed her tenderly. The particular scent used by Elise Angel still hung about his clothes and she drew away from him with a quick start.

'You've been making love to someone!' she cried. 'Oh Richard, how could you do it?'

That refrain 'how could you do it?' – hadn't he heard it, just an hour or so ago, on the lips of the other?

'My actress reeked with every kind of scent,' protested Richard. 'They all do, you know. Why, you yourself were buying something of the sort the other day. I expect we shall have you using rouge soon!'

His air of bullying levity did not conceal from Nelly the fact that something quite serious had occurred to him. He was a different person from the Richard who had left her that morning.

'You've been making love to someone,' she repeated. 'But it doesn't matter. I'm too tired to talk about it now. So don't tell me any more. I think I shall go to bed if you don't mind. It upset me a bit waiting so long. It isn't nice to have to wait so long.'

She raised herself up with a weary effort as she spoke. 'No, no, my dear,' she repeated, 'you can't fool me like that. You've been making love to someone while I was waiting and waiting for you. You had quite forgotten my existence.'

'I don't see,' said Richard, beginning to assume an irritated and scolding tone, 'why I shouldn't have my friends just as you have yours. How do I know what people you see up there in Canyot's studio? I don't ask you inquisitorial questions when you come back to me.'

‘You have no need,’ she answered with a sad little smile, sitting on the edge of the sofa and propping her chin upon the palms of her hands. ‘But it’s no matter. I don’t care what you do. I don’t want you to tell me anything. All that came to an end long ago when I found you were writing to someone. I ought to have known something of this kind would happen. I suppose I couldn’t expect anything else. I did think, though, just a little, that since I am as I am you wouldn’t have done anything like this – yet.’

He was just about to pour forth a torrent of false asseverations when there came a ring at the street door. ‘What’s that?’ he whispered looking at her in a frightened nervous way. He vaguely expected some drastic agitating message from Elise Angel.

She got up quickly and walked with steady steps to the mirror. ‘Open the door, Richard, will you please, and bring him in.’

‘Who is he? Is it Canyot?’

She smiled at him out of the mirror, as she arranged her hair – her old mocking elf-smile. ‘Bring him up and you’ll see, my dear. No – it’s not Robert.’

Greatly puzzled but at the same time a little relieved Richard ran down and opened the door. He came up escorting a tall slender girl, quite unknown to him, who was at once greeted by Nelly as ‘Catharine dear’. ‘Where is Ivan then?’ she asked. ‘I thought it was his ring.’ Catharine Gordon looked round the room with an expression of amused suspicion. ‘You’re not hiding him up somewhere are you?’ she said. ‘This is Mr Storm, I suppose?’ And she gave Richard a firm boyish grip and fixed on him a pair of laughing grey eyes.

‘Oh, I suppose Ivan’s gone off somewhere else,’ she said; and without further invitation proceeded to take off her hat and fling herself down in the only available armchair. She seemed to exercise a kind of fascination upon

Nelly, who promptly seated herself on the arm of her chair and began toying with her silver bracelets, the weight and number of which gave to her long brown wrists an almost oriental appearance.

‘What will you do if you don’t see him tonight?’ inquired Nelly.

‘What shall I do?’ repeated Catharine Gordon. ‘What would you advise me to do?’ And she turned round suddenly upon Richard whom Nelly had just now a tendency to treat as if he were thin air, rather than a tired, excited, agitated, uneasy man of forty-five.

Richard who was standing at the window drew near to her and surveyed her curiously. She had the longest legs of any girl he had ever seen and she stretched them out now in front of her as if they had been the legs of some young athlete.

‘You must tell me more details,’ he said, indicating by the way he looked at her and by the interest in his voice that she had made an impression upon him.

‘Don’t tell him anything,’ threw in Nelly. ‘Why should you? It’ll do him good to get a little bewilderment. Just go on talking to me.’

‘But I should like to tell him,’ said Catharine, crossing one leg over the other and clasping her long brown fingers behind her head. ‘I should like to hear what he’d say.’

Nelly at this got up from the arm of the chair. ‘Oh well,’ she said, ‘if you’re going to start confessing your sins to Richard I’d better make the coffee.’ She retreated into their little kitchen.

Catharine did not seem the least perturbed by this outburst. On the contrary, she turned to Richard with quite an intimate gesture. ‘Come and sit down,’ she said; ‘there’s plenty of room for two thin people like us.’ Then she added in a low quick whisper, ‘You must be very kind to Nelly these days; the poor darling looks worried.’

Richard had a taste that evening of what real Bohemian life in New York is like, and it amused him that it should have come to him through Nelly. If these are the sort of people she meets in Canyot's studio, he thought, I certainly needn't agitate myself about Elise.

'… And so I said I'd be down here tonight and he said he'd look in too, though he had to be some place else for dinner; the French Pastry Shop I think it was, or the Five Steps Up, and I knew he might change his mind if Lucretia dragged him round to her rooms, but the chances are she'd hardly dare to do that, as it would be breaking up the party and leaving Tassie Edstein, and even Lucretia would scarcely go quite so far, so I fancy he'll turn up all right; it's absurd if he doesn't, because he knows he'll have to make it up sooner or later and the sooner he does it the less I'll punish him; have you a cigarette? Oh, imported English ones! That's lovely.'

Richard's mental confusion was not greatly cleared up by this breathless discourse. A certain Lucretia was evidently no prude and a certain Tassie was evidently a maiden who couldn't be left unprotected in the streets of New York.

He hazarded a leading question to this long-legged damsel whose athletic person was giving him at that moment what children call pins and needles, as she leaned against him as if he were a convenient piece of furniture, completely devoid of normal sensibility.

'Who is this you are speaking of, this man you are expecting here?'

'Who is it?' She jumped up from his side and ran, or rather bounded, into the kitchen. 'You've never told him about Ivan!' she cried indignantly. 'Here have I been chattering on for the last half hour and I find he doesn't know who Ivan is! Do you and he go round with different crowds?'

Nelly's answer was interrupted by such a burst of laughter that Richard could not catch its purport. The two women then launched into a whispered colloquy punctuated by little smothered shrieks of amusement.

What children they are, he thought, stretching himself out in his big chair and lighting another cigarette. If it were Canyot and I making that coffee, we should be either propitiating one another's vanity with the most pompous earnestness, or we should be quarrelling like the devil!

They came back into the room at last, with the coffee not quite spoilt by so elaborate a preparation. At that very moment the doorbell rang again. Richard ran down to open it, full of curiosity to see this much talked-of Ivan. As he descended the stairs he could not help thinking with what completely different an eye he regarded everything in the world, now that he had seen Elise.

He opened the door to the stranger; who walked in with hardly a gesture of thanks. When the door was shut he turned upon Richard and showed himself under the electric light of the little hallway to be a man of about thirty with a pointed black beard and a head of small stiff black curls. His eyes were at once dreamy and alert; dreamy on the surface of them and profoundly alive beneath the surface. 'Is she up there?' he inquired.

Richard lifted his eyebrows. The man's manner irritated him. 'Is it our place you're looking for? Please come up, will you? We're on the next floor' – and he proceeded to lead the way.

Halfway up the stairs the man caught Richard by the arm. 'Is she angry with me?' he whispered. 'Has she told you about me?'

The long rambling discourse he had just submitted to, squeezed so very close to the young person in question, rose confusedly in his memory.

'I really don't know,' he answered drily. 'But please come in. I'm sure my wife will be delighted to see you.'

They entered together and Nelly greeted the newcomer enthusiastically. He was introduced to Richard as Ivan Karmakoff. Catharine, who had once more taken possession of the armchair, extended to him a long languid brown arm without making any attempt to rise.

They all sat down and began drinking coffee.

Catharine concentrated herself upon Richard, and in order to face him more directly she swung her legs over the arm of the chair, displaying a greater length of openwork silk stocking than he had ever associated in his life before with any respectable conversation.

‘You’ve seen Fancy Goring in The Way of all Souls, I suppose?’ she asked. ‘She’s a good actress, but her personality is terrible. Oh, and have you seen Keenie Trench? She does that innocent-little-girl business adorably – a regular young Greuze, don’t you think so? But what you must see, if you haven’t yet, is Jack Candid in The Blue Mirror. He’s a bit wobbly in the serious parts but he does that harlequin stunt to absolute perfection. What a pity Charlie Guelph didn’t do the set for that thing! Don’t you think so? He’s the only one of that Broadway bunch who’s got any gumption. It was real creative stuff that he did for Ralph’s Banbury Cross – those conventional trees, you remember? and that market place? They say he’s never got another job since his affair with Lena Hastings. Kind of pulled him to pieces, so they say at Aunt Flouncy’s. Disintegrated him. Broke his spirit. Lena’s mad about Jack Candid now, who’ll hardly speak to her. Serve her right, I say. But she’s very unhappy. Jack Candid’s the last person a girl ought to get involved with. I like him myself. We have splendid times together. But he knows he can’t be at all personal with me. And so he treats me quite decently. She’s a little fool I think. And I’d tell her so, for a cent! Oh, and have you seen Elise Angel yet?’

This unexpected question coming bolt out, at the end of a rigmarole that Richard had quite lost the thread of, made him give a palpable start.

Like one greater than himself and on a very different occasion, he lied bluntly and deeply.

'Elise Angel? No I've never seen her work. What is she? an imitator of Clarice Darling?'

Catharine Gordon clasped the arm of the chair and bounded to her feet. She forgot all about her difficulty with Ivan and turned to him with something like a shriek of excitement.

'He's never seen Elise Angel! Is it possible? He says he's never heard of her!'

There was a general movement of aesthetic consternation. Richard felt that he had damned himself for ever with the initiated of Manhattan.

Even Nelly attacked him – 'But surely, Richard, surely—'

'Why,' cried Catharine. 'Nelly told me you'd spent years in Paris. It's only Paris that really understands Elise. She gets outrageously wretched houses over here. She hates this place and I don't blame her. But her time will come. They'll be sorry for it. Why, my good man, she's the greatest artist in the world. She and the Duse. Tell him about her, Ivan. It's incredible he shouldn't know!'

'I can only tell him,' said Ivan, speaking very slowly and deliberately, 'that her genius has revolutionized the whole modern theatre. Her influence is behind everything – not only dancing, but everything. The Russian Ballet of course – they've admitted that themselves. And everything that's been done since! It's her ideas, they say, that started Charlie Guelph with his best sets.'

Richard began to curse himself for his treachery to his goddess. Never had his diplomacy blundered so abominably. He felt instinctively that Nelly was watching him very closely in his discomfiture. He felt that his power of self-control was on the point of abandoning him. He felt that just because it was all so impossible he might at any moment blurt out the truth.

In desperation he got up from his seat. ‘Well, some of you people must take me to see her,’ he muttered. ‘Yes, I think I do remember hearing of her in Paris. But this office work today has put everything charming out of my head. And I had too good a dinner tonight – that’s another thing – a dinner uptown, you know? I scared Nelly when I came in. I really wasn’t quite myself. They gave me champagne.’

‘Who’s they?’ cried Catharine Gordon, flinging out her long arms and seizing Richard by the shoulders. ‘Shall I make him confess, Nelly?’

Richard looked helplessly at the arms that held him. They were bare except for the loose short sleeves of the smock she was wearing, and their skin looked brown and soft above the elbows like the skin of a young gipsy.

He threw them off almost roughly. ‘I think I must go out for a bit of air,’ he said. ‘I seem to have been indoors all day. You people will look after Nelly till I come back, won’t you?’

Ivan Karmakoff walked to the side of the room where he had left his hat. ‘I think I’ll come with you, if you don’t mind,’ he said.

‘That’s lovely!’ cried Catharine putting her arm round Nelly’s waist. ‘Then I shall have this sweet thing to myself. But don’t forget, Ivan, that you’ve got to take me home. Be sure you bring him back, Mr Storm. Don’t let him run off.’

The men went down the stairs together and out of the house. ‘Do you mind if we go to the river?’ asked Karmakoff.

Richard assented passively; crossing Varick Street and Hudson Street they made their way to the waterside.

There was a heavy wooden jetty, used for transferring garbage from the rubbish carts to the barges, that stretched out into the river just at the point where they struck the wharf.

Karmakoff led Richard out along the edge of this, in placid disregard of the evil odours that emerged from the cavernous recesses.

When they reached the end they sat down on some wooden crates and contemplated the lights of the river and the lights of Jersey City on its opposite bank.

At their feet the tide was rolling in from the Atlantic, dark and swift and stormy; an evil-looking volume of formidable water, out of whose blackness arose gurglings and whisperings, capricious splashings and strange indrawn sucking gasps, like the swallowings of an indescribable monster.

Karmakoff lit a pipe, and Richard got a truer glimpse into the secret of his personality, here by the water's edge, than he had obtained in his wife's apartment.

A lamp suspended from the mast of a small coal steamer adjoining the jetty where they sat threw a flickering light upon them both. Ivan's black beard, sulkily sensual lips, and heavily lidded beautiful eyes fixed themselves upon Richard's mind as objects with which he was destined, whether he liked it or not, to become more closely acquainted.

Karmakoff began talking quietly and bitterly about America. He described its ways, its weaknesses, its inmost pathology, like a surgeon dissecting a corpse.

As Richard listened to him he began to wonder what his relations could possibly be with that brown-armed Indian-looking girl who called herself Catharine. Was all that fuss, as to what temper she was in and so forth a mere social convenance, proper to that particular circle, but meaning nothing at all to the man's real identity?

The fellow attracted him and repelled him simultaneously. He deliberately lit a cigarette for no other reason than that, by the light of the match, he might get a clearer glimpse of those extraordinarily beautiful eyes.

There was something a little equivocal and menacing about the kind of sensuality betrayed in the man’s mouth. But his eyes were, without any doubt, the most beautiful eyes that Richard had ever seen in the head of any human being, whether man or woman. They actually seemed to be a woman’s eyes, as he looked at them under that steamer lamp. Had not the black beard on his chin decided the matter Richard could have sworn that he was a girl in disguise. Even as it was, he caught himself hazarding a fantastic speculation as to whether it was possible that the beard was a false one and that he was on the track of a wild romance. But no! Ivan’s voice was not a woman’s voice. It was deep and low and purring. It was a seductive voice but the voice of an eminently masculine mind. It had a caress in it but it also held out danger signals. It was curious to Richard how he felt about this man. It was as if he had seen him before. But he certainly had never seen him before. What was the attraction he exercised? By degrees it occurred to him that the explanation was that Karmakoff was his direct psychological antipodes – his fatal opposite – with vices, virtues, nobilities, ignobilities, made up of some chemical compound that was the extreme antithesis of all that he was himself.

Karmakoff soon drifted into political and economic problems; and Richard, before he quite realized what was occurring, found himself listening to a most subtle and convincing argument in support of the dictatorship of the proletariat.

As the writer listened to one clear-cut argument after another, lucidly and modestly suggested, hinted at, made way for, rather than flung dogmatically down, he became conscious that he himself had hitherto barely touched the fringe of these drastic issues.

Karmakoff's purring, caressing voice, between long puffs at his pipe, the stem of which acted as a sort of pointer to his argument, flowed rhythmically on, above the flow of the dark water at their feet.

There was certainly nothing personal in his argument. It was almost inhuman in its impersonality. It might have been addressed by an inhabitant of Mars to an inhabitant of Uranus; for all the appeal it made to ordinary human prejudices. It seemed to use all human passions, all human pieties, as if they were pawns upon a gigantic chessboard.

Richard, whose Parisian experiences of the revolutionary spirit were of a very different nature, was astonished at the absence of personal animosity in what the man advanced. He effaced his own tastes. He effaced the tastes, passions, prejudices, hostilities, of the proletariat he represented.

Everything was reduced to a logical inevitable sequence of cause and effect, which could neither be hastened nor retarded, but which in its own predestined hour, to the discomfiture of some, to the relief of others, would reveal a new order of society.

Richard felt, as he listened to him, as though he were present at some demonic unclothing of the hidden skeleton of the universe – a skeleton of cubes and circles and angles and squares, of inflexible geometric determination!

The steady flow of the tide beneath them, with its gurgling and sucking noises, seemed to gather the man's reasoning into its own flood and become a living portion of the fatality he represented.

Storm could detect no flaw in Karmakoff's logic, wherein all that was personal and arbitrary seemed slowly to be obliterated, as if under the power of a remorseless engine. Nature was reduced to a chemistry. Human nature became mathematical necessity. A sublime but cheerless order, irresistible and undeviating, swallowed up in its predetermined march everything that was the accomplice of chance, the evocation of free will.

Deep within his own heart, Richard hid away from the beautiful eyes of this terrible logician, the secret exultation of his own free will, wrought upon by Elise's great dance. Art, he thought to himself, is anyway safe from this man's logic. There, at least, will always be a refuge for the free creative spirit that lies behind all this cause and effect. The image of Elise, dancing her dance of the Eternal Vision, became at that moment his only counterpoise to what the Russian was saying. He hid this image away deep in his heart, very much as some crusader in medieval times might have hidden away his piece of the True Cross from the eyes of some conquering Saracen.

In his imagination he seemed to see this great city of marble and iron as some huge Colosseum, in the arena of which the art of Elise wrestled with the science of Karmakoff.

He felt vaguely and obscurely that the mind which could bring these two tremendous forces into some vital relation with one another would be the mind that would dominate the world.

Karmakoff meanwhile was comparing the huge cosmopolitanism of New York harbour with what he had seen at Southampton.

'Could anything be more English?' he said. 'You sail straight in between parks and fields and country villages, and are landed right at the bottom of a quiet provincial street, where nurserymaids and butchers' boys congregate to watch your exit! You English are a queer race. You seem to have acquired your precious empire without leaving your sheepfolds and rose gardens. You seem to have marched from Cairo to Baghdad in your sleep, without so much as having a single theory that'll hold water, except with regard to the breeding of terrier dogs. Come now, Mr Storm, I've been talking all this evening to you and you've hardly spoken a word. What is your theory of the economic problem?'

'I'm afraid I haven't gone into the matter,' replied Richard, rising from his seat. 'My economics are terribly personal.'

Karmakoff laughed softly. 'How English! Everything you do and think and feel is personal. Do you know, my good friend, you English are so individualistic that I wonder sometimes that any of you manage to get born at all!'

'Isn't that rather a personal matter?' murmured Richard.

Karmakoff positively stared at him. 'Personal?' he said. 'You don't mean to say you still think – wait a little. Wait a little. You evidently have never been in love.'

'What are you talking about?' asked Richard, almost petulantly.

The man laughed aloud. 'I'm talking about the utter impersonality of the most devastating force in the universe! I should like you to overhear Catharine Gordon when she's got her knife into me. Don't you know what it is to worship the flesh of a girl and to hate her for it? Do you know nothing of that malice? But I beg your pardon. You're an Englishman. The great forces of the world are your child's toys. Well! It must have something in it, your little method. Everything must be genteel and well-behaved and respectable and personal. But good Lord!'

Chapter 15

ABOUT A WEEK after Richard's reversion to his old love, Nelly according to her custom was preparing lunch for herself and Canyot in his studio in Seventy-fifth Street.

His model, a handsome girl from Siena, beautiful as that purest Italian race is beautiful, with a certain glowing and yet chaste voluptuousness, was resting from an exhausting pose, and eating cream chocolates.

The two were conversing together without embarrassment, though the richly coloured garment that half-swathed her was more in harmony with a picture by Veronese than with a New York apartment.

Nelly, through the open door leading into the little passage containing the kitchenette, joined amicably, when she could, in their conversation.

'Amelia swears she's never had a lover and never means to,' remarked the young painter, raising his voice a little. 'Did you hear that, Nelly?'

'She's a sensible girl, then,' came the, answer from the passage.

'You see? The lady agrees with me!' cried the model, selecting another chocolate with exquisite care. 'It's all nonsense this, about love being so important. I do my work. I help artists. I put myself into pictures. I make pictures. And then I go home and look after the little mother. I cook us a good dinner – a very good dinner. I smoke cigarettes. The little mother smokes cigarettes. We go to the theatre together. We go to hear the singers. And then we go home and sleep till morning and – that's all!'

'But haven't you ever fallen in love, Amelia, dear?' inquired Canyot, putting a dab of crimson lake upon his canvas and retreating a little to observe its effect.

'Why should I fall in love? I know what men are. I know what women are. Chocolates are much better. And when the great Caruso sings – basta! I don't want to think of such things. I go to Mass too, and I love Our Lady. Our Lady didn't need to have a lover. Her Son was enough for her; and the little mother's enough for me.'

'But Amelia darling, don't you find it rather difficult to be so good? I should have thought with your profession—'

'That's just where you're wrong, Mr Canyot. You're a good man. You don't have any lover or any woman about, except Madam, and anyone can see how good she is! And I can tell you that lots of the people I work for are like that. Artists are good men. They love their work. And I'm part of their work.'

'But haven't you ever, not ever, seen anyone you'd like to marry?'

'Don't tease her so, Robert,' came the voice from the passage.

'It's all right, lady,' cried the girl from Siena; and then, in a lower voice: 'If there ever was anyone, it was that Russian gentleman who talked to me about the strike in Milano in this very room. Now don't you go and tell him what I've been telling you, Mr Canyot! Of course I'd never really have him, because of mother. Mother doesn't like Russians. But I think he was beautiful – as beautiful as St Anthony.'

'Well run away and dress now, Amelia; I shan't want you any more this afternoon.'

When the girl reappeared in her street costume she still looked adorably handsome; but no one would have guessed how flawlessly classical her limbs were.

Nelly begged her to stay and share their meal; but she flatly refused to do this. 'I always go to Castignac's to get my dinner. They cook me little yellow omelettes, full of red jam. I love Madame. She has a great heart. I am her protector.'

When Amelia had gone, Canyot said to Nelly, 'I wonder what it is about that fellow Ivan that attracts women so? You're a woman, Nelly, you ought to know what it is.'

'You'll have an opportunity of watching his effect upon me very soon,' Nelly replied, as she carried in her dishes and arranged them on the table. 'He's going to come round at two o'clock; so we'd better hurry up and get our meal over.'

'What's he coming here for? I can't stand the fellow. He must know I detest him.'

'Oh my dear,' cried Nelly, regarding him with an affectionate smile across the plate she held in her hand, 'no one minds the way you detest them! Of course he's coming because Catharine is coming.'

'I don't like Catharine,' remarked Canyot pulling a chair up to the table and making his guest sit down while he went to fetch the knives and forks.

'Why don't you like her?' asked Nelly giving a sigh of weariness.

'I don't like her because she pulls you about so and makes such a fuss over you. I don't like her arms or her legs.'

'Poor old Cathy! She can't help that, you know. I like both of them. I think she has a very interesting figure.'

'I don't like the way she treats that fellow Ivan,' Canyot went on, eating his food in great hungry mouthfuls but keeping a still hungrier look, full of infinite tenderness, fixed on his friend's face. 'Why doesn't she take him altogether or let him go altogether? I can't stand all this messing about and playing around.'

'It is a bit hectic, her life, I admit,' said Nelly. 'But I'm not at all sure Ivan loves her.'

‘Loves her? He’s mad about her. He follows her everywhere with those confounded woman’s eyes of his.’

‘He may be mad about her. But that’s not the same thing as loving her. Do you know, Robert dear, I think that there are very few men who really love their woman – love her for herself, I mean, and not for the sensations they get out of her.’

Canyot glanced meaningly at the grey eyes that met his own across the table.

Impulsively Nelly stretched out her hand and, seeking his, gave it a tight squeeze.

‘I’m not thinking of you, Robert,’ she said. ‘You’re one in a thousand. I’m thinking of all the rest.’

Canyot frowned savagely as was his wont when his love for her troubled him.

‘Men and women want different things of each other,’ he muttered, ‘and always will.’

‘But would we want different things – if things had been different with us?’

As soon as she had uttered the words she would have given anything to recall them, for she saw the pain upon his face.

‘Oh yes, I suppose so!’ he replied wearily. And then after a little pause: ‘I could never have satisfied you, Nelly – my darling!’

She thought in her heart, How can I tell him that I love him with everything that is best in me? How can I tell him that I love him because he is strong and good; and that I love my poor Richard because he is weak, and anything but good?

And she also thought in her heart, Am I different from other women and much less moral? Am I doing something callous and selfish in sitting here eating Robert's food while I am still Richard's wife? And then, sweeping aside both Richard and Robert, there rose up within her that fierce blind instinct to protect the unborn at any cost; to take from one, to take from another, to exploit them all – if only this flesh of her flesh, this bone of her bone, might live and grow in peace! And she thought to herself, How little, really, is anything in the world important except the creation of life! This idea had come to her several times during these last weeks as she listened to Canyot's conservatism and Karmakoff's radicalism. 'These men understand nothing!' she had heard her heart whisper. 'All their theories are superficial! All their words leave the truth untouched!'

'It is destiny, Robert dear,' she said at last. 'I certainly little thought in those old days that we should be sitting together like this this autumn united by your faithfulness, separated by my … nature!'

They finished their lunch in silence after this; then he made her lie down on his studio couch, while he washed up the things.

At two o'clock punctually Karmakoff turned up. He was excited beyond his usual wont. There had been a police raid upon some peculiarly inoffensive Russian utopians, and one Herculean Irish official had used his baton savagely. 'The absurdity of the whole thing is,' he said, 'that these people were not political revolutionaries at all. They were a sect of mystical Tolstoyans – quiet nervous saintly men, like medieval hermits – the sort of people that in any other community would be protected by the populace, as innocents sacred to God.'

'What annoys me,' remarked Canyot in his most surly manner, 'is the way all you fellows appeal to what you call bourgeois justice and bourgeois morality as long as you are persecuted. And then, directly it's your turn to be the upper dog, to the devil with such scruples! It's then a case of saving the revolution at the cost of any bloodshed. If you are allowed by the moral law to save your revolution by breaking heads, why isn't the capitalist allowed to save his system by breaking heads? With both of you it becomes a sheer matter of who can use the greatest force. I never can see what right either of you have to appeal to these moral principles, principles that are just simply human, and quite outside your class struggles.'

'Nothing,' replied Karmakoff, smiling patiently, recovering his normal poise; 'nothing is outside the class struggle. The class struggle is the very thing that has given birth to all these abstract human principles you're referring to. The principle of the sacredness of property, for instance, is simply the enforced will of the people who have possessed themselves of property. And all these doctrines of justice and order and legality and so forth are really nothing at all but just the will and pleasure of those in possession of power.'

'Order is the one essential thing!' cried Canyot. 'How can anyone work or think without order? What becomes of art without order?'

Karmakoff bowed his head politely. 'I entirely agree with you,' he said. 'It's you who're the anarchist, not I. Certainly we must have order. The question is who are to enforce this order – a privileged few or the whole community?'

'The whole community can enforce nothing,' cried Canyot controlling his anger with difficulty, his face growing flushed and wrinkled. 'The whole community is a set of silly sheep!'

'Precisely,' replied the other in his most purring voice. 'And the whole question resolves itself, then, into what set of people are to give this desirable order to these silly sheep. Are they to be people with sheep's blood in their veins – old horned rams for instance, like myself? Or are they to be wolves in sheep's clothing? I believe it will be found in the long run that the silly sheep prefer the former!'

‘I wish,’ broke in Nelly, ‘that the day would hurry up and come, when the sheep stop being silly and throw you both overboard!’

Karmakoff laughed heartily at this. ‘The woman speaks!’ he said. ‘But seriously, you know, Mrs Storm, you and I are in much closer agreement than you and Mr Canyot. I am perfectly ready to admit that the dictatorship of certain representatives of the proletariat is only a temporary and transitional thing – an interregnum of horned rams, shall we call it? – until the sheep grow accustomed to power. Mr Canyot would have the poor wretches left for ever at the mercy of the wolves.’

At this point there was a rapid tap at the door and without waiting for a reply Catharine Gordon swung into the room. She had just bought herself a new smock of the very latest futurist design, and though it was so early in the afternoon, she wore a black silk skirt.

‘Ha! you’re here first, then!’ she threw out at Karmakoff while she gravely shook hands with Canyot, who at once, turned away and busied himself with his palette of colours.

Then she rushed across to Nelly who still reclined on the couch. ‘I’ve got a job! I’ve got a job! I’ve got a job!’ she shouted, throwing herself down on the floor by the end of the couch and possessing herself of Nelly’s hand. ‘It’s what I’ve always wanted. The very nicest thing in the world. Try and guess what it is, Ivan!’

‘Not anything on the stage?’ Karmakoff inquired.

‘Oh dear no! I’m sick of that. I’m not vulgar enough for Broadway; and I know too much about the theatre for the art people.’

‘Is it dancing, my dear?’ asked Nelly. “I’ve always thought if you only got a chance—’

‘No! it’s not dancing. That may come later, of course, and probably will; but it’s not dancing yet. Shall I tell you what it is – oh, and I’ve got something else by the way to tell you, Nelly, in private, presently, something very comical, something about your husband – well, I'll tell you. It's that I'm to be secretary to Elise Angel!'

There was a general exclamation of surprise. Even Canyot turned round from his work. 'I didn't know you could typewrite,' he said.

'I can't! That's just the fun of it. But Elise said it didn't matter a bit. She liked her letters written in ordinary script. She made me show her my hand and liked it awfully!'

'Do you mean that she liked your hand or your handwriting?' inquired Canyot.

'Both! She made me write on a piece of paper. And when I had written my name, she took my hand in hers and played with my fingers, and said she liked their longness. And – just think – when I said goodbye she kissed me. Yes! kissed me. Oh, isn't it lovely? I've been kissed by Elise Angel! And I'm to go to her this very night to begin!'

'Surely she doesn't write her letters by night?' growled Canyot.

'Are you going to live with her?' inquired Karmakoff gravely.

'Oh no. I'm not going to live with her. She doesn't want me to do that. I'm going in the daytime, in the morning, in the evening – any old time; just as she wants me, you know.'

As the girl spoke she fixed her eyes steadily upon Karmakoff. The Russian walked up and down the room, frowning, his hands behind his back. Presently he stopped in front of her. 'You'll have to introduce me to Elise,' he said. There is a chance they might invite her to Moscow to take charge of the whole art movement there.'

'What?' cried Canyot in a loud voice. 'It's impossible! She wouldn't contemplate such a thing.'

It’s hard to predict what a person like Elise will do, ‘said Ivan quietly.’ But you may be quite right. It would be a sacrifice in some ways.’

Catharine, who had fallen into a sort of meditative trance with her chin propped upon her knees, now struggled to her feet. She bent down and taking Nelly by the wrists tried to pull her up from the couch. ‘I’ve got something very amusing to tell you my dear and I’m sure you wouldn’t want me to say it out before these two.’

Nelly, rather reluctantly, submitted to her violence and allowed herself to be led into the passage. ‘Don’t let Ivan run away,’ shouted Catharine to the painter before she closed the door.

‘I always say,’ remarked Karmakoff, sinking down on the couch vacated by Nelly and lighting a cigarette, ‘that it’s you honest conservatives who do more to retard the progress of the world than any other people.’

‘I don’t believe in the progress of the world,’ replied Canyot drily. ‘Life swings backwards and forwards. Everything has a beginning and an end. It’s all the same old mad game.’

‘Then why,’ murmured the Russian, puffing out a cloud of smoke and arranging himself on the couch with a certain feline grace, ‘why do we fuss ourselves about anything?’

‘I don’t fuss, myself,’ growled the painter stepping back to regard his canvas, upon which was emerging a revel of satyrs and nymphs; ‘it’s just a matter of taste. My taste objects to cruelty and disorder and lechery. I am old-fashioned, that is all. It doesn’t really matter. But I’m not comfortable when I’ve behaved like a cad.’

Karmakoff smiled pleasantly. ‘I suppose you’re thinking at this moment that I’ve behaved like a cad to Catharine?’

Canyot moved up to his canvas and gave it a resolute splash with his brush. His gesture was so drastic that it looked as if he would have greatly enjoyed dabbing that brush across Ivan's smiling countenance.

'Heaven forbid,' he said, 'that I should interfere between you two. I expect you are perfectly agreed as to what the limits of life are.'

'What do you mean by the limits of life?'

'Oh, I don't know,' murmured the painter indifferently, 'something about life extending a little further than the five senses, I suppose. You mustn't press me. I'm at work.'

At that moment the passage door opened with a violent outward fling and Catharine burst in upon them. 'She's upset. I've upset her dreadfully. It wasn't my fault. I didn't know she cared.'

Canyot dropped his brush upon the floor and came forward, his face convulsed with anger. He flung Catharine aside as if she were some intrusive stranger, and rushed to the back of the passage where there was a small box-room filled with spoiled canvases. Here he found Nelly seated in a dark corner shaken with smothered sobs.

'Darling! my darling!' he whispered, kneeling beside her and putting his arm around her. 'Tell me what's the matter. No! no! never mind! I don't want to hear anything. Nelly, my darling – I can't bear to see you like this.'

The girl gently but obstinately pushed him away. 'Leave me alone, please, Robert,' she gasped. 'I'll be better soon. I'm silly to make such a fuss. It's nothing really. Please go back to them, Robert, if you don't mind? I'll be all right in a minute.'

He obeyed her so far as to move to the further end of the passage. But he would not open the studio door. She made a desperate effort to control herself and rising to her feet passed her hands over her hair and pressed her knuckles into her eyes and against her cheeks.

'Robert,' she murmured in a whisper. He came quickly up to her side. 'Get my things for me, please, my dear, will you? I don't want to see them like this. I'll go straight home I think. And don't let Catharine talk to Karmakoff about me. But she's sure to do it. She's sure to do it!' And her sobs began to break out afresh. Canyot ached to press her to his heart and soothe her tears with kisses from his very soul, but he kept a rigid hold over himself.

'She shan't say a word, my dearest one – not a word. But won't you let me take you home, Nelly? I'll just say you're unwell and we'll go straight off.'

She looked at him quickly, a rapid tender look, full of affectionate gratitude. 'No – no, Robert, I don't wish that. It's sweet of you, old friend, but I don't wish it. Get my things, please, dear. I shall be quite all right.'

He saw that her mind was made up and he went straight into the studio and possessed himself of her hat and cloak. Catharine was huddled on the couch, clinging like a great frightened child to Karmakoff. 'How is she?' she whispered. 'I'm so sorry I told her! I'd no idea she'd take it like that.'

'She is going home alone,' said Canyot, turning away with her things on his arm. 'We must let her do exactly what she wishes. I'll come back when I've seen her into the subway.'

'She knows how to change at Grand Central?' asked Karmakoff quietly.

'The shuttle to Times Square, you mean?' said Canyot. 'Yes, I'll tell her. If by any chance I don't come back you'll make yourselves comfortable here won't you? You know where my tea is Catharine?' And once more the door was shut between the studio and the passage.

Nelly did not let Canyot go a step further with her than the entrance to the Lexington Avenue subway. She made him leave her at the top of the steps.

'Sorry for having made such an idiot of myself, Robert,' she said as she gave him her hand. 'I knew Richard was having an affair with someone. It was only a shock to me to hear Catharine talk about him – you know? – in the way she does. I'll be all right now, my dear. Goodbye – God bless you, Robert.'

He turned sadly up the street, and feeling himself singularly disinclined to go back to his studio he made his way into the park and walked blindly, engrossed in miserable thoughts, across its least frequented spaces.

Nelly got out at the Grand Central and made her way through the conflicting streams of people to the little shuttle train for Times Square. She had to stand, during this short journey, clinging to a leather strap, and the mass of indifferent humanity that were jammed against her weighed down her spirit with an infinite discouragement.

It was even worse when she emerged at Times Square. Well, she thought, has this place been named! In those underground corridors extending indefinitely in every direction, with their little green and black arrows pointing backwards and forwards, and their confluent streams of people, it certainly did seem as though she had arrived at the spot in the universe where time and motion became identical.

As she struggled against the crowd, she experienced the queer feeling that her real conscious mind was somewhere out of all this, and that the Nelly thus pushed and jostled was a mere helpless automaton among other automatons. A horrible feeling of mechanical indifference seized her. Her real mind seemed to have escaped out of her flesh, leaving nothing but a mass of quivering exposed nerves that could suffer passively without end but could take no initiative. She found herself thinking with relief of the quietness of her father's body lying in Littlegate churchyard, 'free among the dead'.

Confused by the bewildering corridors and stairways she got finally swept by the crowd into an uptown train on the Seventh Avenue subway instead of a downtown one.

Her first intimation of this mistake came to her when the train was just leaving the next station marked Fiftieth Street. She got up from her seat and looked around her in dismay. Her eyes had such panic in them that one man whispered to another; a little old coloured woman who had been sitting next her hazarded the remark, ‘Wrong station, honey?’

Other, less sympathetic observations reached her, such as, ‘She’s up against it!’ ‘Some girl, too!’ with various humorous asides which were quite unintelligible to Nelly’s English ears.

She got out hurriedly at the next stop which proved to be Columbus Circle – another symbolic name! Here a hopeless weariness descended upon her and when she had climbed the steps and emerged into the great open space near the entrance to the park she leaned against the edge of a newspaper stand and began to cry without caring who noticed it.

A man who was buying the New Republic raised his hat. His head was large and powerfully moulded, his figure of corresponding weight and dignity. ‘Can I do anything for you, lady?’ he said kindly. Nelly pulled herself together with a gallant effort and dried her eyes. ‘I’m so ashamed of myself,’ she murmured. ‘I’m not often like this. I’m not feeling very well.’

‘Won’t you let me get you a taxi?’ said the tall man whose face seemed vaguely familiar to Nelly, though where she had seen him, or anyone like him, she could not remember. While addressing her he continued to hold his hat, which was a soft broad-brimmed felt one, in his right hand, while with his left he stroked her jacket reassuringly with the New Republic.

A sort of blackness began now to descend on the girl’s eyes, blackness crossed by little vibrations of white light. She nodded eagerly however and the tall man stopped a passing taxi and assisted her into it. He handed the driver a couple of dollar bills; only after he had done that did he put his head into the window and ask her for an address.

By that time the blackness was very dense around Nelly Moreton's brain and without realizing what she said she uttered the words 'Elise Angel'.

The man's friendly physiognomy became illuminated with a new interest. 'Ah! you're one of her girls are you? That's where you belong, is it? Well! tell her that Pat Ryan says she must give you some of his especial cognac.' And he shouted an address in clear terms to the driver who started his car without further question.

Nelly sank back on the cushioned seat, too faint to realize in the least what was happening and too dizzy to breathe another word.

The air beating on her face through the open window saved her from becoming actually unconscious, but she felt too wretched to think anything or even to feel anything. A blank numbness, inert and obscure, took possession of her and sealed up her mind and senses.

They stopped in front of the well-appointed apartment house where Elise Angel had her rooms.

The driver got down from his seat and approached the door of the taxi. He mechanically held the door open, gazing down the street and meditating upon matters in no way connected with cabs or houses or fares.

While he stood thus, waiting in professional indifference for her to emerge, the door of the house opened and Elise and Richard came down the steps.

Richard looked straight into the taxi window. He was laughing at some remark Elise had just made and his eyes were bright, his cheeks flushed. Elise, sweeping majestically down the steps just behind him, laid her hand at that moment upon his arm. She bent towards him as she did so and whispered something which made him laugh yet louder. Then he turned his head and they both moved down the street.

Richard, had he been challenged, could not have told what vehicle it was that was waiting there. His heart was full of excitement and happiness. He was in a trance of obvious delight.

But he had smiled straight into Nelly's wide-open bewildered eyes; and when the other whispered to him and putting her hand on his arm led him away, an ice-cold stab of an emotion the girl had never known before pierced her heart.

The sight of Richard had brought her consciousness back; but it was only brought back to be startled into sharp incredible pain at what she saw. To her bewildered mind it seemed as if her husband had recognized her, had laughed in her face, and in callous disregard of her distress had gone off, jesting about her with his new love.

But her brain was working only too normally now and her fit of faintness was gone.

'Number sixty-six! Where I was told to go to, Marm,' repeated the driver. To the end of her days Nelly would associate that particular number with the stark desolation of that moment.

'I've changed my mind,' she said quietly. 'Will you please go to number one Charlton Street.'

The man looked slightly surprised at this order, but closed the door again and mounted his seat. He was considerate in his demands upon her purse, however, when they reached her own house, exacting only sixty cents in addition to what Mr Pat Ryan had given him.

Nelly mounted the stairs to her room with chaos in her heart. One wild notion succeeded another in her brain. She would leave Richard, she thought. She would go off somewhere into the country and stay there till her child was born. She would borrow money from Robert, risk the voyage, and go back to Sussex. She would seek refuge with Mrs Shotover who, no doubt for old acquaintance sake, would take her in.

All these ideas surged through her mind as she climbed the stairs. When she reached her own floor she was a little surprised to find the door of her apartment standing ajar. She must have forgotten to close it when she went out that morning.

She pushed it open and entered quickly to discover, to her immense surprise, a completely unknown young man smoking a cigarette in Richard’s armchair.

The stranger rose at her entrance and began stammering and apologizing. ‘I am Roger Lamb,’ he said. ‘You don’t know me, but I’m a cousin of your friend Olive Shelter. My grandmother was a Shelter and we’ve kept up the connection. I’ve never seen Cousin Olive – I’ve never been to Europe – but she wrote to tell me you were here.’

There was something so grave and quaint about this youth’s manner that Nelly felt drawn towards him at once. She begged him to sit down while she took off her things and tidied herself up. Incidentally she slipped into the kitchen and lit the gas under the kettle. ‘I must have some tea,’ she said to herself; then she gazed at her face in the looking glass as she used her brush and comb.

Presently she laid down these objects and began smoothing out the little wrinkles round her mouth and eyes with the tips of her fingers.

She was shocked by the drawn look of her face; as if in these last hours the skin had grown tighter and less soft.

A faint shadow of her old elfish smile flickered back at her from her staring disillusioned eyes.

Then her face hardened into a mask of bitterness and a strange expression of recklessness passed across it. The queer thought came into her head – Richard's got tired of me. He has this other woman. What does it matter what I do now? It was with this reckless expression still upon her face that she returned to her guest.

In the first few minutes before she got the kettle to boil and the tea poured out the conversation between herself and her visitor was broken and perfunctory. When they had drunk a few cups, however, they began to grow quite intimate.

Roger Lamb persuaded Nelly to try one of his own cigarettes which were a different sort from those Richard smoked. Settled comfortably in the deep armchair listening to his whimsical talk, the girl felt as if she were recovering from an anaesthetic.

It appeared that her young visitor was a journalist – a dramatic critic – attached to one of the largest of the New York evening papers. He seemed to know all the people Nelly knew and a great many she had only heard of by name, and she was struck by the way he spoke of them, without any of that tang of spiteful disparagement which she had come to associate with artistic people.

Of Catharine Gordon, for instance, he spoke with peculiar respect. 'She has the heart of a child,' he said. 'She would be the happiest thing alive if she were less generous-minded. People take advantage of her.'

'Don't you think she's a little affected?' said Nelly.

'Not a bit of it! She has her own manner; why not? but that's natural to her. It's a cruel thing she should be so involved with Karmakoff.'

'Don't you like him?' said Nelly, a little startled. 'I thought everybody liked Ivan.'

Roger Lamb laughed. ‘Of course I like him,’ he responded. ‘But I can’t honestly say I think he’s very good for Catharine. She’s an elemental; and he’s a fire spirit. He withers her up.’

With an irresistible impulse Nelly led the conversation round to the problem by which she herself was confronted. ‘It’s all so wretchedly mixed up, this business of men and women. Don’t you think so? Whether for instance a man who knows a girl is false to him should go on just the same, or should have it out with her and make her confess? Doesn’t it seem to you that it’s disgusting when a man knows he’s being deceived and made a fool of and he just does nothing?’

Roger Lamb became very grave. He got up from where he was sitting and walked about the room. Nelly began to fear that in her indirect hovering round her own situation she had prodded an open wound.

‘We’re all too touchy,’ he burst out at last, ‘over this business of deception. Our idea is that when a person we love loves someone else they triumph over us unless they confess everything. But, you know, if they did confess everything we should regard them as heartless and callous beasts. We should accuse them of abominable bad manners. It’s all frightfully difficult. But I don’t believe myself that a woman who deceives a man enjoys doing it or derides or despises the man she deceives. I think if we were a little more generous lots of these people who “deceive” us would come back to us all right. It’s often a mere passing attraction. It’s our bitterness and jealousy that drives them on.’

Nelly made a little grimace at this point. ‘But it’s so disgusting– the idea of sharing a person! I’m sure I should despise anyone who tamely submitted to that sort of thing. I should feel they’d no self-respect.’

Roger Lamb bit his underlip and threw back his head like a restive horse. He had fine eyes and a sensitive mouth but his nose and chin were shapeless and badly moulded.

'Oh, this self-respect!' he burst out. 'It's the cause of half the misery in the world. Have you ever met Pat Ryan, by the way? No relation to the great financier.'

The introduction of this name gave Nelly a bitter stab.

'Yes,' she said quietly. 'He reminds me of someone and I can't think who it is.'

'It's William Jennings Bryan, of course! Everyone notices that. But what I was going to say was this. I know Pat well; and he's got a very difficult wife, and he himself is a very – what shall I say? – amorous kind of person. But they get along quite happily. They go their own way, but always come back; and they've got no children either. I think that Pat and Mary are models of what married people should be – unless they're naturally good and faithful.'

Nelly sighed deeply and bitterly. 'Are there any faithful ones in the world? Oh, I think life's a terrible thing. They ought to warn women before they're born what they've got to expect!'

The girl's visitor looked distractedly at the shaded electric light. 'I don't think many of us have got at the secret of life yet,' he remarked. 'The worst of it is we've nothing to go upon and no proof that there's a secret at all. But I think there is; and I think it has nothing to do with self-respect.'

For a moment Nelly was stirred by his words and by his manner into an obscure response. Then she relapsed into her habitual feminine contempt for all these vague generalizations that seem to do little to ease the hurt of the iron teeth of the great trap.

Chapter 16

'NELLY – LISTEN to me,' said Richard, standing behind his wife that night as she was combing out her silky fair hair and tying it together with a black ribbon. 'I swear to you on my dying oath that I didn't see you in that taxi! Whatever wrong I may have done you I couldn't do a thing like that.'

Their eyes met in the mirror and he was the first to turn away.

'I believe you,' she said.

'Well, do do more than just believe me! Do smile at me and say something like your old self. Don't let's hurt each other any further.'

Nelly did swing round at this. With a flash of clear-eyed indignation and with a tilt to her chair so that she could face him, she flung out her challenge.

'Are you going to give up that woman and never, never, never see her again?'

She gave a sharp little tap. to the floor with her slippered foot as she uttered these words. Deep in a somewhat ambiguous portion of her heart she was almost sorry that he had not jeered at her in that taxi. That would have been a definite gross brutality and she could have held him in contempt for it. Now, after he had confessed to her about Elise, there was nothing she had against him except the fact that he loved someone else; and Nelly, in spite of her bitterness, recognized that she could not hate him with the intensity he deserved, as long as this was his only fault.

Richard certainly was staggered by the violence of her words and the directness of her demand. It did not seem to him that his attitude to her had changed at all because of the appearance of Elise upon the scene. He loved her still. He loved both of them! It was the old recurrent dilemma, into the real psychology of which women seemed debarred from entering. With them the state of being in love was a clearly outlined condition with sharply defined edges. One either was in love or one was not; that seemed to be their code; and one couldn't by any possible means be in love with two people at the same time! And yet, he thought, it is unfair; because Nelly herself in a sense loved both himself and Canyot. Why then, couldn't he be allowed to love Nelly and Elise? Because the element of passion entered into it. Yes – he had to confess to himself that there was a difference! He knew perfectly well that Nelly's affection for the young painter was entirely free from the last sensual element. But suppose he had loved Elise in an absolutely platonic manner, would that have reconciled Nelly to their association? It might; but he doubted if it would. She would never believe that it was possible to love a passionate provocative woman, with a body predestined for heathen dalliance, in a manner that was entirely chaste. Yet Richard knew that it only needed that Elise's own wayward heart should be ensnared by someone else for him to have just that pure devotion to her. For even now the deeper portion of what he felt was a thrilled and grateful response to her genius as an artist.

In his own mind he was able to separate into two distinct worlds his emotion towards the dancer. On the one hand she appealed so overwhelmingly – and that was what had made him leave her at the beginning – to his sophisticated senses. On the other hand she inspired in him a pure flame of hero worship, such as any critic might feel for any creative spirit.

The spell she exercised over his senses could hardly be called 'love'. It was the old immemorial heathen craving for the beauty that troubled the blood, that aroused insatiable desire. And though he craved for her in that way, he knew very well that he hated her also in that way. He was not blind to the secret law that makes love and hate so evilly interchangeable when the senses are once enslaved. All these thoughts whirled through his mind as he leant back against the little chest of drawers in their bedroom and looked into Nelly's reproachful eyes.

By throwing out at him that violent ultimatum she had recklessly forced the issue. She had dragged them both to the edge of the precipice. He felt angry with her for it and yet he felt guilty too. Beneath both these emotions was a vivid sense of revolt against the accursed law of things that made such drastic dilemmas possible.

How lovely she looked at this moment with her fair hair bound up so chastely under that black ribbon, and her slight girlish frame, as yet but faintly indicative of the promise within her, so delicately fragile!

The silence between them prolonged itself remorselessly. Her sharp cry, 'Never, never, see her again' hovered in the air and became a menacing and disturbing entity. He could hear his own Waterbury watch ticking, ticking, ticking, where he had placed it on the dressing table. Damn the ticking of watches and the issuing of ultimatums by resolute young mouths!

For one moment Richard seemed to catch a glimpse of what women meant by love. For one moment he seemed to see that mysterious bond, the unbroken attachment of a man and woman, like a visible thread of light over a dark gulf. Then his masculine logic broke into this sudden vision; and he reasoned with himself that this fierce claim of hers for absolute loyalty was a wild demand of insane possessiveness that no human soul had a right to make upon another.

Yes – she had dragged them both to the edge of the precipice, to the very brink of the parting of the ways, by this fierce claim upon him.

He could see that thin film of white light, the link that bound them together, quivering and vibrating in the darkness.

Then a sort of crash came somewhere in his brain; and he had a cold terrible sensation of irrevocable choice, the kind of sensation out of which, it may well be, the human race has evoked the idea of perdition.

‘You have no right to ask that of me, Nelly,’ he said in a low husky voice. ‘It’s too much. It’s more than a man is allowed to promise. A certain freedom of movement must be left us. We cannot bind ourselves like that, whatever we’ve done, whatever we deserve.’

He was conscious that the colour left her cheeks and that the angry light faded from her eyes.

‘Ah!’ she murmured, drawing in her breath. ‘That’ll be the last time I shall ask it of you.’

She gave her chair a little jerk with her hands and turned away from him towards the mirror. Mechanically she picked up her hair brush and mechanically raised it to her hair. The gesture struck Richard to the heart as piteously pathetic; for he knew well that she had done all that was required to that silky head.

He made a half-movement towards her and then checked himself. What was the use in insulting the better spirit in both of them by an unworthy lapse into sentiment that anyhow must miss the mark? It would be like trying to make love to the dead.

He went back into the sitting room and changed into his night-things there, as he usually did. He sat for more than half an hour after that, silent and motionless in the armchair, wrapped in his dressing gown, too deep in thought even to smoke a cigarette.

Life seemed flowing past him in great irrevocable waves and he felt as though he were stranded upon a remote shore watching a ship gradually disappearing over the horizon. The ship of Nelly’s and Richard’s love!

When, after giving a slight knock, he entered their bedroom again and looked hurriedly towards the place where their two beds lay side by side, he saw at once that she had separated these by the introduction between them of a little table containing her favourite books and a photograph of her father, a thing that until that night had always remained on the further side of Nelly's bed.

The electric light was not turned out but the girl lay far round on her side, only the outline of one white cheek and ear visible, for her hair was thrown round the top of her head now, and the bare nape of her neck looked touchingly childish as she hid her face from him in the pillow.

Richard went over to her side and bending down kissed the top of her head. But so softly did he do this, that whether or not she was aware of his doing it he did not know.

Then he went round to his own side of the divided beds and put out the light.

Chapter 17

‘You are cold, mon ami. What’s the matter with you? Are you tired of me already?’

Elise drew herself out of his perfunctory embrace and moved across to one of her deep wicker chairs, leaving him alone on the sofa.

He had thought in his simplicity that he could transform his relations with her at his arbitrary will and pleasure, ‘and nothing said’. He was destined to discover his mistake.

‘You are the same as you always were, my dear,’ she flung at him, settling herself among the cushions with a sort of crouching movement, like a beautiful lithe animal among jungle branches and leaves. ‘You were always afraid of committing yourself. And that’s what’s the matter with you now. You’re afraid of love. You hate love. You’re scared of losing something of your precious personality. As though one lost one’s personality that way!’

‘It isn’t that at all,’ protested Richard feebly. How could he tell her about his conversation with Nelly? Elise laughed, a bitter cruel little laugh.

‘Oh, of course you’ll lie. You always have lied to me. You lied to me when you left me like that in Paris. I know now why you did leave me. For precisely the same reason that you’re in your present mood – fear of committing yourself!’

Teased by her words and foolishly anxious to justify himself at any cost, he burst out then with the one thing he had particularly made up his mind not to say.

‘It isn’t that at all. It’s nothing to do with that! It’s only that I have sometimes a touch of remorse when I think of my wife.’

Elise laughed more maliciously than ever and her eyes gleamed. ‘No not a bit of it! All excuses! That’s just what you always do. You use masks and screens and blinds for everything. You are not in the remotest degree concerned about your wife. You’re just simply afraid of committing yourself to me! You’re afraid of love. You have a mean soul, the avaricious ingrowing soul of a peasant – and you’re afraid of losing something if you let yourself go. I don’t know what you’re afraid of losing. Your precious soul perhaps – if you believe in the soul; but I sometimes doubt if you really believe in anything.’

Richard jumped up from the sofa and rushed towards her.

For one flicker of a second she must have thought he was going to strike her; for she put up her hand as if to protect herself. The movement was accompanied by a quick change of colour in her eyes as if they had been the eyes of a wild animal seized with sudden alarm. Perhaps if Richard’s purpose had been to reduce her to submission, to softness, to amorous response, it would have been to his advantage to strike her. But he was very far from anything of the kind; all he did was to kneel at her feet and press her hand to his lips. She tore it away in a moment and her eyes flamed at him.

‘Never think you can play that game with me!’ she cried. And the look of dark fury which she gave him made him get up from his knees and walk back to his former place.

‘Did you actually suppose,’ she said, leaning forward, with her long white hands clutching the arms of her chair, ‘that I would let you pick me up and put me down at your pleasure like a paid courtesan? Did you think you could have me when you were annoyed with your wife and wanted to be revenged on her; and then drop me when you made it up again and were good little children? Did you think I'd submit to that kind of thing, Richard Storm?'

'Elise! Elise! Stop! How can you say things like that? I can't understand you.' And he stared at her with contracted brows as if she were some kind of extraordinary animal.

'I suppose,' he began, in a meditative voice, 'this weird mood of yours comes from that accursed possessive instinct which all you women have. I suppose you are really just simply jealous of my wife.'

The crouching position she had assumed became still more pronounced. She drew in her hands slowly, along the edge of the chair, and her greenish-hazel eyes, staring at him out of her pale face, seemed to darken almost to blackness.

'How little you know me! How little you know anyone! It's your gross, heavy, blind complacent vanity!'

Richard mechanically drew out of his pocket a packet of cigarettes. Then, seeing what he had done, he deliberately and consciously selected one and lit it.

Do women, he thought, never give the real reason of their sudden angers? Is it an inveterate tendency with them, like a dog who turns round before he lies down, to give their fury some moral basis completely removed from the point at issue?

Why didn't she scold me for my 'gross, blind heavy vanity' yesterday, when we were happy together? I was much vainer and more complacent then – the Lord knows – than I am today!

But how magnificently beautiful Elise looked! He couldn't help admiring her in spite of his sense of injustice. Her hands pressed against the sides of the chair straightened her Attic torso, under its filmy drapery, into lines and curves that were worthy of Praxiteles.

He couldn't resist a faint smile, through his clouds of cigarette smoke, as he looked at her sitting there in her dark smouldering feline sulkiness. If she was less dangerous and less irrational, he thought, she wouldn't be so lovely.

'Come, my dear, my dear,' he said, 'it's absurd for us to quarrel like this. It's not fair to make me tell you my thoughts and then to pounce on me for them. Of course I'm bound to have moments with you when I feel a little guilty. You know what I'm like. You know my troublesome ridiculous conscience. It's just because I'm so happy with you that I get these moods. I can't help my nature. I was made like that.'

Her eyes darkened yet more and her face paled yet more. Before she could find her voice, her lips quivered, opening and closing like the petals of a sensitive plant. "Made like that!' she hissed at last, her beautiful head swaying on her long white neck like the head of some angry Lamia that might at any moment revert to its primitive shape. 'Oh, how English you are, Richard! That's what we other races have to accept is it, and just conform to? Made like that. And we have to unmake ourselves, and change our very skins, so as to adapt ourselves to this thing that cannot alter!'

'Elise – Elise – you must be mad to talk like that! You know that with us from the very beginning it's been the attraction of opposites. You don't change, you can't change, any more than I. If I weren't so English, as you call it, so heavy and gross and all the rest of it, do you think you'd have ever cared for me? Not a bit of it!'

'Well, I don't care for you now, anyway,' she flung out. 'I hate you!'

There was just a faintly perceptible softening in that 'I hate you!' which was not concealed from Richard. By laying the stress upon the faults of his character and keeping his wife out of it he had evidently succeeded in turning the course of her thoughts. He got up and threw his cigarette into the grate.

Her incredibly sensitive mouth with its twitching lips looked irresistible to him and he suddenly loved her with a fierce deep strange love such as he had not felt for any living person in his life before.

He went straight up to her, seized her by her wrists and pulled her up upon her feet. Then he kissed her as he had never before kissed any woman. He kissed her with an emotion that was neither sensual nor spiritual. It seemed to him as if his soul required her soul, and the only way to obtain it was by draining it through those quivering lips.

When at last, after what seemed a blind eternity of feelings beyond any analysis, he let her go, he noticed that her eyes had changed from that dark look. They were strangely beautiful still but it was with a different kind of beauty. As he took her on his knees and caressed her Grecian head, pushing back the heavy bronze-coloured braids from her broad low forehead, it seemed to him that her eyes resembled the leafy shadows of cool rock caves overhung with ferns and moss. He had never realized their depth or what soft greenish lights were hidden in them.

‘You know how to treat us!’ she said with a low tender laugh that had something in it of the sigh of a wild animal that submits to being petted. ‘But I don’t love you any better for this.’

‘I don’t care whether you love me better or not,’ he said, ‘as long as I’ve got you still. I should be much more agitated about your moods if I wasn’t with you, if it were a case of writing letters to each other.’

She looked at him almost as intensely and questioningly as he had looked at her a little while ago.

‘I’ve been reading those poems of yours,’ she said, with just a faint flicker of malice, ‘and I cannot say that I think they’re worthy of you. They are so overloaded with sensations that one doesn’t get any emotion at all from them.’

‘I must have a cigarette if I’m to talk about poetry,’ said Richard, lifting her off his knee and walking over to the chimneypiece to get a match. ‘And you must free yourself from the burden of your critic’s weight too, it seems!’ she retorted, as she settled herself alone in the wicker chair.

‘What do you mean by sensations?’ said Richard walking up and down the room with impatient strides. ‘The whole purpose of what I’ve been writing is to get into it the very essence of the English country – and that’s a “sensation”, isn’t it?’

‘It may be to an Englishman, my dear,’ she replied. ‘It isn’t to me. All this indiscriminate piling up of flowers and trees and grasses, all this business about lanes and fields, seems to me just heavy and dull. It seems to get into the way of something.’

‘That’s because you’re an American,’ he threw at her indignantly. ‘Any English person reading what I’ve written would be reminded of the happiest moments of his life.’

‘And what are they, if I may ask?’

Richard looked at her with a scowl. A red flush came into his cheeks. ‘It’s no use trying to explain to an American things of that kind,’ he said. ‘The happiest moments of a person’s life in England are associated with old country memories, with just those lanes and gardens and fields that you find so dull. If you don’t care for things like that, of course my poems are nothing to you!’

‘But my dear Richard,’ cried Elise, ‘surely the whole purpose of art is to make such impressions universal, so that everybody feels them? If you’re content to write about ponds and ditches for the benefit of English people – well! you may please yourself of course; but I cannot allow you to call such a thing art. It's the merest personal sensation of one individual!'

Richard looked as if it would have given him immense satisfaction to box her ears.

'Isn't art always a personal sensation?' he protested.

'Not a bit of it!' cried the dancer. 'Art's an emotion not a sensation. It's an emotion that expresses the only really impersonal thing in the world.'

'And what may that be?' asked Richard sarcastically.

'Ah! my dear,' murmured the dancer with a sigh, 'if you don't know what that is, if you don't care to know what that is, you'll never be a great poet.'

'Well, at any rate,' said Richard, 'I've only done in my poetry what English poets have always done; that's to say, tried to get the magic of the earth soul into words that are not too vague or mystical.'

'My dear, my dear!' cried the dancer, laughing at him quite frankly now. 'You don't mean to say you think you have rivalled Shelley and Keats in these verses? They are very beautiful and right, those old poets, but you can't do that sort of thing twice. You've got to go further. You've got to start where they left off. You've got to say something new.'

Richard came and stood in front of her, glaring and lowering. She had stirred the very depths of his self-love. She had entered a chamber of his mind deeper than all his indolent acquiescences. She had given him the sensations of someone poking with a hayfork into the most sacred recesses of his soul.

'New!' he threw out at her with infinite disgust. 'You're the victim of your confounded country, whatever you like to say! Everything has to be new, always new! My poetry deals with those elemental feelings that the race has always had. My earth soul is not a bit different from Wordsworth's earth soul or Virgil's either, or Plato's for the matter of that!'

She looked at him with a queer deep enigmatical look that puzzled and irritated him.

What was she after? Did she want to rake into his very inmost being? Had she raked into it, and found rank weeds where she hoped to find delicate and rare plants?

He felt angry and humiliated. A vague feeling of misgiving mingled with a raging sense of injustice. Was he destined never to love a woman who responded to every movement of his mind? Of course it was her cosmopolitan life, without roots in any soil, that made her so difficult! Naturally she could not understand the subtle and exquisite pleasure that he derived from every stick and stone in England. Where could he get in touch with anything deep if he didn't go back to those old delicious sensations connected with lanes and fields, with gardens and hedges?

He solaced himself hurriedly with these thoughts, but was not reassured. He was bitterly hurt and startled. After all, in her own work she was a great artist. She had done what he certainly had never done: she had put her whole life into her work. Why couldn't he, too, do that? Was she right in her attacks upon his mystical sensationalism? Did that kind of thing really act as a sort of drug, numbing the finer and rarer energies?

Troubled through and through by what she had said, his self-love obscurely conscious of a deep wound, letting in air and light from very alien spaces, he hovered in front of her, with his hands behind his back, like an erring soul before some tutelary spirit.

'It's like this, my dear,' she went on. 'Though I don't want to annoy you. I think you have great powers. But I cannot say I think this poetry of yours has done justice to them. I believe you inject into it, as you read it to yourself, a great many vague feelings that are not conveyed to anyone else. Your poetry is a kind of self-indulgence. It is the expression of a good deal in you that is merely personal. It is too self-satisfied, too unruffled. It's as if you had never really wrestled with life!'

He looked so completely miserable under her words that she took him by both his hands and pulled him towards her.

He responded to her caress almost savagely, seeking to recover his ascendency over her and to regain his self-respect in the oldest of primitive ways.

As he made love to her he withdrew his soul from her, letting it escape down some long corridor of reservation. His pride found a way to recover itself in this manner. Without actually formulating the malicious thought, what he felt in his mind was a derisive sense that she did not know at that moment how far his soul was wandering from her.

When the hour arrived for her to return to the theatre she was called for by Pat Ryan in his green Studebaker. They separated therefore at the door, Richard's vanity completely reinstated upon its secret throne. 'She is only a woman,' he said to himself as he walked towards the elevated station. 'Her art is instinctive, not intellectual. She does not understand the quieter, cooler, more magical kinds of poetry. She wants everything to be emotional and dramatic. In some ways Nelly has a truer feeling for beauty than she has. But Nelly's childish impishness spoils her insight. Nelly laughs at her own soul.'

As he ascended the crowded steps to the little platform, Richard felt in better spirits than he had felt for many a long week. It was a relief that Nelly knew of his affair with Elise and apparently had no intention of doing anything about it. It was sad that it made her unhappy. It was sad that she insisted that all lover-like play between them should cease. But she clearly had made up her mind not to sulk; and they had had – even since her discovery of his unfaithfulness – some not uncheerful hours.

There was thus a base unction, a shallow satisfaction, a sleek slurring over of all deeper issues, in Richard's mind as the elevated railway carried him down Sixth Avenue, the car in which he sat moving parallel to the third-storey windows of the larger shops.

It seemed as though the malicious revenge he had taken upon Elise had punished him by removing from his nature, in that hour, all nobler, all subtler feelings.

He had never caught himself in a mood quite so cynical, quite so brutal and crude, as he caught himself in then. It was a mood that seemed to fall into odious reciprocity with the external aspect of the New York thoroughfares at that evening rush hour.

Those pale-jowled rigid-faced men, those handsome self-assertive metallic-voiced women, pushing, jostling, scrambling, hurrying, driven by that elemental necessity of which Karmakoff had discoursed to him, seemed to fall in with this mood of his, to blend with it, to hearten it, to justify it. It was with a kind of prolonged snarl of predatory exultation that he – one of their number, one of the male animals of this wrestling tribe – chuckled to himself as he thought of the desperate struggle of life and how he was playing, in his dunghill isolation, his own little game against all these! Two women were 'interested' in him, two exceptional women, a great artist and a sweet-souled girl. How easily it might have happened, in this evil vortex, that no feminine creature worth a moment's thought might have cared one jot what became of him! But two of the most exquisite did care, and in this alone he had surely attained something! One after another the little stations passed, each numbered by the number of a street, crossing Sixth Avenue. When the train stopped at Twenty-third Street two young businessmen got in, in company with an older person, an elderly woman. The three were quarrelling about something, and continued quarrelling as the train moved out. The woman’s face was gentle and very sad. The two young men were causing her some peculiar shame by the vulgarity and crudity of their discussion. Richard caught her eye, the eye of a hunted thing, looking desperately out of the train window, and then he caught her reverting her gaze into the interior of the car as though driven back by the menacing heartlessness of those glaring lights, gaudy advertisements and obtrusive store windows.

There swept over him a drowning wave of sudden remorse. Had he, in this eternal division between the sensitive and insensitive, slipped over to the wrong side? Had he ranged himself with the glaring advertisements and brutal sounds, with the lights and the iron and the paint and the roar, against the deeper voices that alone gave life any beauty or meaning?

Was he actually – he, Richard Storm – exulting in his possession of these two women as if he were a gross fool of a numbskull roué, devoid of all finer instincts?

Eighth Street! It was necessary for Richard to get out here, if he wished to walk through Cornelia Street and Le Roy Street to Seventh Avenue.

As he made his way through Greenwich Village with its laxer, easier, more careless atmosphere, he became conscious that there did exist in New York, hidden away among its iron buildings and its chaotic litter, many charming backwaters of friendly humanity.

In this particular quarter were artists of all the nations of the earth, writers, painters, journalists, bric-à-brac dealers, revolutionists, virtuosos, charlatans, dilettantes, actors, bachelor women, women workers, wealthy connoisseurs of the theatre, aesthetic dabblers, art-book dealers, literary recluses, imagist poets, futurist sculptors, popular mystics, cranks, faddists, philosophers, humbugs, devoted humanitarians, art-movement leaders, and many quiet solitary thinkers living between uptown fashion and downtown greed, intersected by wedges of every sort of foreign element. There was certainly a large, free, easygoing casualness in the air that seemed powerful enough to maintain itself unspoiled, in defiance of both economic necessity and social convention.

It was naïve and simple, this Quartier Latin of the New Atlantis; it was crude and self-conscious, but something of the great ocean spaces that surrounded it, something of those free winds and that high unclouded sky, had got into its manners and habits and usages. It was certainly primitive and unsophisticated in its ardours and devotions to what it proudly called ‘creative work’ but its very primitiveness preserved its love of beauty intact and pure, unspoiled by the cynical disillusionment of the traditional Bohemians of the Old World.

Here, if anywhere, wedged in between foreign tenements and big business, breathed the lungs of whatever mental and spiritual freedom that iron Manhattan could offer to her children!

When he reached the Charlton Street apartment he found that Nelly had already got their supper ready. She permitted him to kiss her, only turning her head a little to one side so as to avoid giving him her lips.

How blint and clumsy, how brutally callous and dull he had been, he thought. This avoidance of his lips made him suddenly aware of the infinite subtleties, the world of shy emotional reactions, so deep and so clear-edged, that women associate with this simple symbol. He was made obscurely conscious that he had hurt something in his wife’s soul of a different character, of a more sensitive texture, than anything which he possessed in his own.

Does any man, he thought, really understand what this touching of the lips implies in the heart of a woman?

He felt at that moment as though there was a region of delicate, evasive, exquisitely attuned vibrations in Nelly's spirit, of which he might suddenly awake to discover he had lost the clue for ever; to discover that he had lost it, when it was too late to get it back.

As he chattered superficially with her, of this piece of gossip and that piece of scandal, over their meal, there slowly grew upon him the bitter cruel sense that he had, in his clumsy sensuality, thrown away something much more exquisite and precious than any merely physical thrill. After all, he could have given himself up to the divine genius of Elise, to her inspiration, her great instinctive art, without dragging her down to the level of an odalisque, a courtesan, an amorous plaything.

There was no reason to suppose that if he had made it clear to Elise that he loved his wife and intended to remain faithful to her she would have rejected his platonic friendship. The passionate paganism of Elise was a thing quite uninvolved with her deeper nature and a few clear indications of loyalty to Nelly would have placed his relations with the dance on a basis much more honourable to both of them.

Every mouthful he took at that meal, as he sat facing the delicate being whose love he had deliberately set himself, so it seemed to him now, to trample on and to kill, tasted of miserable remorse.

Had she sulked, had she thrown out sarcastic speeches, had she been vituperative and vindictive, he could have hardened his heart in his unfaithfulness. But as it was, thinking his self-accusing thoughts beneath their friendly chatter, it seemed to him as though he had dragged down and exploited in sheer stupidity of sensuality both these finer spirits. His remorse about Nelly diffused itself over Elise too, and he felt he had betrayed them both. The great creative spirit of life – the only god he worshipped – had given him Nelly's love and the child she carried within her; had also given him the friendship of Elise and the child she carried within her, that incomparable art of hers. And what had he done to both these mirrors of the eternal vision? Tossed them down, flung one against the other, tried to see his own egotistic countenance in each of them, and clouded and blurred them in the effort.

He sought, absurdly enough, on this particular evening, to soothe the smart of his conscience by an exaggerated consideration. He helped Nelly clear the table, he helped her to wash up; it was only afterwards, when seated near her in their small living room looking out on the quiet houses opposite, that he was made starkly aware how futile such catchpenny offerings were.

He found himself leaning forward and touching her hand as she worked at the piece of sewing spread over her knees. 'Nelly – my dear – my dear, can't you bring yourself to forget and forgive? It's more than I can stand, this way we're living now. It makes me homesick for the old days. It makes me long for Sussex.'

She let his hand stay where it was, but her fingers lay passive and cold within his own.

'What can I do, Richard?' she murmured, looking at him gravely and quietly. 'What can I do that I haven't done? I haven't interfered with your pleasure. I haven't made a fuss or tried to leave you. Many women would have … well! you know! But when you ask me to be just the same, as if nothing were going on, when you're still seeing that person, I can't understand quite what you mean. Sometimes, my dear,' and she looked at him with a puzzled look that almost flickered into a faint smile, 'sometimes I doubt whether you've ever grown up. You seem to be so blind to certain things; as if you actually didn't understand, as if you were not quite an ordinary human being; as if you were hurting me without knowing that you were hurting me. You can't expect me to laugh and smile and encourage you to go off to someone else.'

He moved a little nearer to her. 'But you do love me still, my darling, my darling?' he whispered.

Her forehead puckered up into a concentrated frown and her lips quivered.

'You don't think I like the way we're living?' she broke out. 'But how can I bear it differently? What can I do? When I asked you that first day whether you'd give this person up, you wouldn't answer. And of course I know you haven't given her up. I know you see her every day. I know you came straight from her this very night. And how can I feel as if it were just the same – when it's like that? I can hold myself in, from saying any more. I must hold myself in, for our child's sake. But I can't help feeling bitter. You can't expect me to go on just the same. It takes a little time to make a person's heart numb and dead. I don't think you know – that's what I keep saying to myself – I don't think you know what a woman feels. I don't think you can know. You couldn't have done it, you couldn't have done it, if you did.'

Her voice broke at this point but she controlled herself with a pathetic struggle, and got up from her chair. 'You mustn't expect too much from me, Richard,' she added. 'I'm not made of wood and stone.'

The direct cause of her rising was the sound of the doorbell accompanied by a sound of quite a number of voices in the street.

'Here they are!' she cried, moving to the window and drawing aside the curtain. 'They've come all together. Let them in, will you Richard? You've got cigarettes for them? We’ll have the coffee at once. I’ve got two of those cakes.’

He ran downstairs. A few minutes later the little apartment was full of tobacco smoke and lively conversation.

Roger Lamb sat by Nelly’s side on the sofa. Robert Canyot established himself on the windowsill, his long legs dangling awkwardly, and his dusty boots looking large and prominent.

Karmakoff and Catharine shared the armchair; while Richard seated at the table before his coffee cup munched one piece of cake after another, as if by the mere process of devouring this sticky substance he fortified himself against unhappy thoughts.

‘It’s all very well for you to speak of Russia as if nothing but sweetness and goodness emerged from it,’ said Karmakoff suddenly, throwing the remark like a hand grenade straight at the head of Roger Lamb. ‘Russia’s no better and no worse than the rest of the world. All this sentimentality is as false as all this savage abuse.

‘Where we Russians differ from you people is simply that we’ve no false shame. We express everything – all that there is to be expressed – and a good deal more sometimes!’ He laughed a rather bitter laugh.

Nelly made an unconscious little movement of her hand towards the young man as if to protect him from this frontal attack; but Roger Lamb seemed quite unruffled.

‘I apologize,’ he said. ‘I ought not to have dragged Russia into it at all. It was a lapse. It was only that Mrs Storm seemed so awfully pessimistic. I just reminded her of the nicer side of things – of human nature, you know? I was trying to explain my own feeling about it. Russia was a by-issue and a silly one. I apologize to Russia, Ivan.’

‘Oh Roger,’ cried Catharine Gordon, ‘while I think of it Elise wants you to write her up in The Manhattan. She’s getting sick of the rotten notices they give her.’

The colour rose in Nelly’s cheeks at this name. Karmakoff deliberately pinched Catharine in the arm. Richard put an enormous piece of cake into his mouth. Canyot, kicking the wall with his heels, remarked surlily, ‘She gets better ones than she deserves as it is. I’d leave her alone, Roger.’

Nelly, who had bent her head over her lap, raised it at this. ‘The Manhattan ought to have something about her,’ she said calmly, looking straight at her husband.

Roger Lamb smiled. ‘I don’t think any of you know much about the difficulties of journalism. I’ve been trying for three months to get her a satisfactory write-up. The old man won’t have it. He says we’re too modern as it is.’

Karmakoff, who had been regarding Roger Lamb with a fixed scrutiny for some minutes, moved a little away from his companion in the armchair and, leaning forward, startled them all by suddenly saying – ‘Something’s wrong with you, Roger. You’re not well. What is it?’

Richard rose from his seat at the table. ‘Shall I get you a glass of water or anything, Lamb? Ivan’s right. You look pale and worried.’

Nelly turned towards the young man at her side with a look full of solicitude. Catharine Gordon leapt to her feet and rushing up to him took his head in both her hands and gazed into his face. ‘You’re not ill are you? No you can’t be ill. I won’t have you getting ill!’ She slipped down beside him at the very end of the sofa and hugged him with her strong young arms.

The general disturbance produced by all this concern on his behalf did not seem to ruffle Roger Lamb. He drew himself gently out of the young girl’s embrace and rising from his place moved over to the chair vacated by Richard. With an amused and friendly smile he rejected the glass of water which this latter offered him. 'You can give me a match if you like,' he said and proceeded to light a cigarette.

Catharine Gordon possessed herself of Nelly's hand. Canyot returned to his place on the windowsill. Richard sat down by his wife's side.

'You haven't answered my question yet,' resumed Karmakoff who had not ceased to regard the journalist with a searching scrutiny.

'Don't tease him, Ivan!' cried Catharine. 'You're looking at him as if you were a magician or one of these horrid psychoanalysts. Don't – don't look at him like that!' And she waved her arm backwards and forwards in the air as if to break the spell.

'He doesn't tease me,' remarked Roger Lamb. 'I love Karmakoff's way of looking at people. And he is quite right too. He's found me out. He's called my bluff, as they say. I hadn't meant to tell any of you anything about it. But it was silly of me to hide it up – a sort of pride I suppose. I don't know! One does these things sometimes. Perhaps it didn't seem so real to me as long as I kept it to myself. But Ivan has found me out with his confounded Slavic intuition; so I'll confess …'

There was a perceptible hush in the small apartment as he said these words; his youthful figure, in its trim dark-coloured suit, seemed to isolate itself from the rest. His queer-shaped skull under its closely cropped hair assumed the appearance of an archaic statue as it emerged from the clouds of his cigarette smoke. His grey unhappy eyes looked quizzically round him as he paused in his speech; and his sensuous mouth with its impassioned red lips seemed more than ever as if it had been carved out of his white face by the hands of some insane god, forgetful of all proportion.

'Don't tell us! Don't tell us!' cried Catharine Gordon suddenly, putting her fingers in her ears. 'I hate you for this, Ivan. It's a cruel thing. And you're a devil to do it.'

Karmakoff smiled at her with a smile of infinite indulgence. A strange contest of looks passed between them full of complicated vibrations;

'If it's anything to do with your nerves, Roger,' said Canyot earnestly, 'I'd much rather you didn't tell us—' and he looked anxiously at Nelly.

Roger Lamb interpreted his glance. 'You needn't be afraid, Robert. It's nothing that could scare anyone. It's simple enough. It's only that I am—'

'Don't tell him! Don't tell him!' cried Catharine again, pressing her fingers wildly into her ears.

But the young man proceeded without regarding her. 'It's only that I learnt from the doctor this morning that if I don't have an operation at once I've no chance of living; and that the operation I've got to have is a ticklish matter, a matter of even chances.'

There was a moment of embarrassed silence in the room. Catharine, who seemed to have understood his words, took her hands from her ears and covered her face.

'How long does he give you without the operation?' asked Karmakoff.

'About a week,' replied the other smiling. 'Just about a week.'

'And you've arranged to have it?'

'I go into the hospital tomorrow.'

'Which one?'

'The Postgraduate.'

'I am very glad you told us this,' said Nelly quietly. 'I should have hated not to know.'

'How does this affect your old pessimistic apathy?' inquired Canyot from the windowsill, speaking roughly and almost harshly.

'I shouldn't have thought that he was either pessimistic or apathetic,' protested Richard.

‘He isn’t! How can you say such things, Robert?’ reiterated Nelly.

‘Speak up, Roger, and tell them I’m right,’ cried Canyot. ‘You know you’ve always said that down at the bottom, except for the theatre, you cared nothing for anything in life; that you’d just as soon be dead as be alive.’

The brusqueness of this question flung so crudely at the young man produced a curious jar and jolt among them all. Nelly looked reproachfully at the painter. Richard scowled and sank into gloomy silence. Karmakoff lay back in his chair and shrugged his shoulders, smiling a little.

‘I can’t understand what you mean,’ remarked Catharine. ‘Roger’s always so amusing. He’s naughty of course and funny; but I can’t think how you can call him pessimistic. He always puts me into a lovely mood when I come across him.’

‘Thank you, Catharine,’ said the journalist, looking affectionately at her.

‘You’re wrong all the same,’ persisted Canyot; ‘and Roger knows it, only he won’t admit it. You haven’t answered my question yet,’ he went on, almost brutally, his eyes flashing from beneath their heavy brows.

‘Robert dear!’ protested Nelly softly.

But the atmosphere of tension in the room after the journalist’s revelation seemed to have gone to the painter’s head.

‘Why don’t you answer?’ he growled. ‘You know perfectly well I’m right.’

Roger Lamb buttoned his jacket with quiet fingers and crossed his legs.

‘Are you really going to the hospital tomorrow?’ cried Catharine. ‘It’s dreadful. It’s like a dream.’

‘Yes, you’re quite right, Robert,’ replied the condemned young man, frowning a little and opening his eyes very wide with a sort of humorous grimace. ‘I have never cared very much what happened to me. A sort of inertness – a silly kind of disillusionment about everything – I don't know! but it's always been here, somewhere or another, like a marble slab.' He tapped his forehead with his long second finger.

'But, Roger, you have helped me so much at different times,' protested Nelly softly.

'And me too – you poor darling – you've been an angel to me always,' murmured Catharine Gordon.

'But how has this operation news affected your indifference?' Canyot persisted.

'How can you go on teasing him like that?' cried Catharine, stepping up to Canyot's side and seizing his arm with her hands. 'Stop it, I say! Stop it!' And the young girl positively shook the painter in her indignation.

'It has had absolutely no effect at all,' answered Roger Lamb. 'It's all right, Catharine. Robert and I understand each other perfectly.'

'He ought to be beaten!' cried the young girl retreating to Nelly's side and clutching her hand.

'Absolutely no effect,' the journalist repeated, bending down to straighten out one of his purple-coloured socks. 'But I confess I'm a bit scared of that hospital. I always have been terrified of institutions. The most agitating moment of my life was when I first went into camp.'

'But Roger dear,' cried Catharine, 'the army isn't an institution.'

'Is marriage an institution, Catharine?' asked Karmakoff.

'Not for you or me,' the girl replied, giving him a strange quick look.

At that point Roger Lamb arose to his feet. 'Well! I think I'll be making my way home,' he said.

They all made an involuntary movement towards him; and while Richard was searching for his hat and stick they surrounded him awkwardly, in a silence full of unsaid things.

His slim figure and closely cropped skull seemed to grow almost terrifyingly alien from them; seemed to repel them, for all his gentleness, as if with a stern and menacing gesture.

He shook their hands quietly enough when that moment's embarrassed pause was over; the passionate sympathy of the embrace which Catharine Gordon gave him broke the spell of the general discomfort.

'You'll take him home, Richard, won't you?' said Nelly, and added a hurried 'of course he will! No, Roger, he must go with you. You must let him. He'll see you to bed and then come back to us.'

As Richard walked by the side of the doomed boy, up Varick Street and across Sheridan Square, in front of the Greenwich Village Theater, he became conscious of the extraordinary power of Lamb's self-possession.

This might well be the last time the youth was destined to walk through those well-known haunts, the last time through an inconceivable eternity; and yet he seemed to look round him with his usual whimsical gravity, noting the passers-by and the various familiar scenes without a sign of dramatic self-consciousness.

They went into one of the innumerable Village cafés for a cup of coffee, and Richard was amazed at the urbanity and aplomb with which his companion greeted some casual acquaintances of his, Dulcie Foster and her strange friend Siegfried Stein, the mad musician. When finally, an hour afterwards, he left the room in Waverley Place where he had seen the young man safely to bed, he felt himself impelled to walk round Washington Square in order to collect his thoughts before returning home.

The night was a little damp and chilly, although the day had been hot. The trees in the square had already changed their tints and many of their leaves had fallen. As he strode beside the familiar arch, whose classic facade is so curiously adorned with two statues of the same Father of the Country, and let his eyes wander up the long perspective of Fifth Avenue, he realized how tremendous was the mere weight of sheer material substantiality in this astounding city. The death of a fragile man-of-letters, the death of many men-of-letters, what were they amid the palpable projections of this tremendous scene?

As he moved up close to the masonry of the arch, to shelter himself from the tornado of whirling automobiles that rolled past him, he visualized this harsh raw emphatic city as a sort of deliberately flung-out challenge to the march of the feet of the destinies. It was like a great flaring advertisement sign, this city, hung up here between the deep sky and the deep ocean, with a sort of defiance to all the old submissions and resignations. These immense marble-and-iron structures, blazing with a million lights, seemed to flaunt in the face of the gods a certain bravura of splendid levity.

The Old World with its time-bleached pieties had accepted those gods' austere decisions and had bowed low before them in patient fatalistic ritual. But this reckless New World seemed to claim, in daring impious flippancy, the right to deny the whole traditional order, its solemn sorrows as well as its solemn assuagements, and to fling forth a sort of profane adventurous challenge to the whole system of things.

The death of a man, contemplated in the light of the illuminated perspective of Fifth Avenue, dwindled into a kind of negligible accident. So many men must have died in order that this huge shout of defiance should reach the planetary spaces.

Love and friendship and religion and loyalty, these things were proper subjects for the old forms of art; but here in New York these things seemed to fall into the background and other manifestations of the life force seemed to assume prominence.

In a different mood Richard might have been tempted to condemn these other manifestations, as part of the primordial brutality in things, but in some queer way the influence of Roger Lamb had altered his feeling about them. The journalist had thrown out to him so many capricious fancies as he prepared for his last night in his own bed, that Richard began to wonder whether it was possible that this huge chaotic welter of a world might after all be destined to evoke some completely new attitude to life; some attitude in which camaraderie took the place of love, honesty to one's self the place of loyalty to others, cynical courage replaced submissive piety, as a reckless indifference to death did the old sad resignation.

As he walked slowly back to Charlton Street through the familiar quarter with its voluble crowds and its lighted fruit shops great splashes of crude warm colour against the darkness, there came upon him a dim feeling that there was something here, some mood, some attitude of the spirit, some breaking up of ancient barriers that it would be perhaps unwise wholly to harden one's heart against.

At any rate he was able in that hour, as he had never been able before, to gather up into some sort of perspective his former life in Paris, his marriage to Nelly, and his love affair with the dancer. I will make this night, he thought, as he passed the illuminated front of the Greenwich Village Theater, a new start for my poem. I will get some of that young fellow's fancies into it. And I will tell Elise that she was right and I was wrong.

Chapter 18

TWO DAYS LATER, after Richard had left for the office, Nelly was called up on the telephone by Catharine Gordon who told her that she and Ivan were at the hospital and that Roger Lamb was dead.

Catharine informed her that Karmakoff was taking her down to Atlantic City to get a breath of sea air, and that she had already spoken to Richard ‘over the phone’.

Nelly got a queer startled sensation from Catharine’s words which had ended with incoherent emotion. She stood for a few minutes by her kitchen tap, fumbling with the breakfast things and mechanically putting into the water some plates which she had already washed. An infinite sadness invaded her heart. It seemed incredible that this self-possessed boy, who had talked to them so quietly in that very room only forty-eight hours ago, was now as far divided from her as her own father.

The news about Atlantic City was a shock to her too. She wondered if Karmakoff and Catharine had secretly got married. If not – was this naïve passionate creature self-possessed enough to risk the sort of transient affair which such an excursion suggested?

Nelly had come to feel a maternal tenderness for the erratic young girl; and though Ivan was no pleasure hunter, she could hardly imagine him committing himself to any lifelong attachment.

She did not go so far as to accuse Karmakoff of exploiting the girl’s emotional agitation over Lamb’s death to his own amorous advantage; but she wished Catharine had come straight to her from the hospital instead of going off like this.

But perhaps it was only for the day. There were plenty of late trains back from the famous resort and, after all, it was likely enough, in the easy moral atmosphere in which they lived, that all the harm that could happen had happened already.

She turned with a heart full of vague forebodings to her housework in the little apartment. She could not quite explain to herself the sort of melancholy which descended upon her. It seemed something more than the boy's death, more than Richard's unfaithfulness, more than Catharine's danger, more than her natural apprehensions about her own future. She reverted to each one of these matters, trying to get at the secret of what she felt, but it escaped her each time. It seemed to be something impersonal, a sort of universal misery in things, a kind of freemasonry of tragedy into which, by the medium of her own distress, she had been formally admitted. Whatever it was, it seemed to grow upon her as the morning went on, gathering in intensity and volume, as if actual vibrations of misery were rolling, wave after wave, over her brain. She had felt something like this once before, during the war; but she had got rid of that by digging frantically in her father's garden. Here, in a New York apartment, there was no garden to dig in. It was about half-past eleven. She was already vaguely beginning to wonder whether she had the spirit to cook herself any lunch when the telephone rang. Lifting the receiver she was surprised to hear her husband's voice.

Richard hated telephoning. This was the first time, as it happened, that these two had ever talked together in this way.

She was still more surprised when she heard him say that he thought of following Ivan and Catharine down to Atlantic City and spending the night there. She was indeed so startled by the tone of his voice, which sounded abrupt and strange out of the receiver, that she could do nothing but say 'yes – yes – yes—’ without any comment. He must have been anxious enough to avoid any comment, for he rang off suddenly in the end, having told her that the train he intended to take left at three o’clock.

Nelly sat down on the nearest chair, nonplussed, puzzled, bewildered, indignant. Had the death of Roger Lamb affected Richard as much as Catharine? But why Atlantic City? There were surely other places, country places in New Jersey, he could have rushed off to? Had Lamb’s death driven them all crazy? Surely Karmakoff and Catharine didn’t want him down there with them? And then, all in a moment, it dawned upon her that he was using the two lovers merely as a clumsy excuse, as an awkward blind, for his own devices. What he was really up to, no doubt, was going down there with Elise Angel! Lamb’s death had made him restless and defiant, as it had made these others restless and defiant, and he had resolved to follow their example and take some wilful plunge. It was curious that that boy’s death, instead of lifting them all into a calmer, clearer state of mind, seemed to have driven them into fiercer acts of self-assertion than they had ever dared to risk before!

The girl felt almost tempted, as she sat on the high chair by the table resting her chin in her hands, to attribute all these feverish movements to some influence of Roger Lamb emanating from the invisible world.

Was this capricious and chaste spirit trying to communicate to them all some utterly subversive doctrine of human relations, some secret of the abyss that contradicted all the normal traditions? Was the real law of the system of things nothing less simple than that every living person should fight unscrupulously for his own hand?

She rose to her feet and moved to the window. The little street below her was quiet enough; but from the great neighbouring thoroughfare came the roar of the motor-lorries carrying their merchandise from the warehouses and wharfs of the downtown quarter to the uptown department stores.

Along with that harsh persistent rumble, the very beating of the bold heart of the adventurous city, came a sort of challenge to her courage. Dared she too, as these others had done, shake off the fatalism of the Old World and strike resolutely and swiftly for what she wanted?

She turned from the window and looked at the clock on the mantelpiece. It was only a quarter to twelve. Richard's train did not leave for three hours yet.

She stood in the middle of the room biting her lip and pondering deeply. Then with a sudden start she rushed into her bedroom and began putting on her outdoor shoes and her best hat.

A great and desperate resolution had formed itself in her mind. She would go and see Elise Angel.

The effort with which she prepared for this daring move was the most extreme she had ever made. It was like the effort required by an unarmed hunter who walks straight up to a crouching tiger, seeking to dominate it with his eyes.

She was out of the house by the time the chimes in the Metropolitan Tower sounded twelve o'clock. She took the subway at Houston Street and sat bolt upright in the crowded car, her lips tightly compressed and her heart violently beating. What she felt in her inmost soul was that she was fighting for her unborn child, and this thought gave her a defiant courage.

She got out at Columbus Circle and proceeded to walk resolutely eastwards, skirting the southern edge of Central Park.

She was not oblivious to the aggressive newness of everything round her and the crushing challenge of the huge hotels and the portentous apartment houses.

Through the iron railings she could see great blocks of huge grey stone emerging from the midst of enbrowned grass and melancholy shrubs.

It was as if the skeleton bones of the primitive rock basis of all this grandiose architecture were insisting upon its own share in this orgy of triumphant matter. Nelly felt as though all this iron and marble and stone were consciously piling itself up against her frail human weakness. She touched the park railings with one of her hands and a stain of dusty rust came off upon her glove. Never had she felt so entirely alone in the world. She experienced a sickening sensation of nostalgia, of longing for her Sussex hills. Tears came into her eyes as she thought of her father, unable to help her, however desperately she called for help. The longing for home grew so intense as she moved on, between the rocks of the park and the mountainous buildings that she was conscious of a definite pain in the pit of her stomach, something quite distinct from the sense she had of bearing the burden of her child.

But in spite of her weakness she moved steadily on; and when she came to the great hotels that surrounded the flamboyant gilded statue, the most unsympathetic spot on the face of the globe, she found herself able to cross the pretentious avenue and turn northwards along it without losing her self-control.

Compared with this terrible centre of uptown fashion, how warm and friendly and human and mellow was that unassuming Greenwich Village which she had left!

She had never till this moment realized what the prodding thrust of unmitigated newness, armed with the arrogance of wealth, is able to do to the frail human heart into which it drives its wedge.

She turned eastwards at length, out of the great avenue with its palatial enormities, into a comparatively quiet street that seemed to her to possess something of the massive reticence of London.

It was a quarter to one when Nelly finally arrived at the door of the apartment house where her rival lived.

She was by this time so physically exhausted that a sort of obstinate recklessness took the place of her former agitation.

She rang the bell and asked to see Miss Angel.

‘What name?’ demanded the braided official.

Nelly had one second of hesitation and then she said quietly, ‘Mrs Richard Storm.’

She had a moment of faintness while the man clicked at his telephone board and talked to the apartment overhead; but a few moments’ rest on a polished bench and a drastic effort of her will saved her from collapse.

‘Miss Angel says will you please go straight up,’ announced the man presently. ‘Second floor and first door on the left.’

She entered the elevator, worked by a Negro boy, and emerging at the designated level knocked at the dancer’s door. She was admitted by Thérèse and ushered straight into the luxurious sitting room with its oriental rugs and settees.

The servant closed the door behind her and she found herself alone with the owner of the apartment.

Elise rose from one of the cushioned lounges and advanced towards her with an air of regal indulgence.

‘I’m so glad to make your acquaintance, Mrs Storm,’ she murmured, with the sort of inclination of the head that some barbarian queen might have given to a casual prisoner doomed to die. ‘Please sit down. No! No! This one’s much nicer. There! we’ll sit together here. What a child you are; and oh! how pretty you are! I don’t wonder Richard’s so in love with you.’

She made a half-movement as if she would have touched Nelly's hand, but something in the face that was turned towards her cut her gesture short.

'I came to see you,' Nelly began in a voice that sounded hard and strange, 'because I wanted you to know exactly what you're doing, what you've done.'

'My dear child, I've done nothing. You've come to me on a wild-goose chase. Your husband and I must have been old friends when you were in short frocks. How pretty you must have looked in those days!'

'I came to see you,' Nelly repeated, completely disregarding her words, 'because I wanted you to understand things; and not be able to plead ignorance of the ruin you are causing.'

Elise Angel lifted her eyebrows. 'What a dramatic little person you are! I don't myself see this ruin you talk of. You don't look in the least "ruined". And as for Richard – why he, even you must admit, looks a great deal better since I first picked him up. It wasn't your fault I daresay. It was simply want of money. But when I think of how wretchedly thin and miserable he was that day, and how happy he looks now, I can't say I feel as if "ruin" were the right word for what I have done.'

A look of such strange intensity flickered over Nelly's face as she opened her lips to reply to this, that the great artist by her side drew in her breath and stared at her in a sort of puzzled wonder. The girl seemed hardly to have heard what the other actually said. It was as if her look answered some unspoken word, some word that passed between them quite independently of any uttered sound. Nelly spoke again:

'You don't really love him. I am glad of that. That clears up a great deal. If you really loved him I should feel differently to you. I don't know whether I should hate you or not, but I should feel differently.'

Elise looked at her with a deeper bewilderment than ever. There was something about Nelly's self-possession that took the situation out of her hands. As long as it had been a matter of dramatic gesture and physical dominance she had held the lead; but the lead was taken away from her now, the girl of twenty-two seeming to represent an older, deeper experience of life.

'So you came to me to find out that,' said Elise Angel.

'I came to you so that you should know what you've done to me. You've killed something in me that can never revive. You are a successful woman, Miss Angel; you're what the world calls a genius. But you are a cruel woman and a heartless one. You are just as much a murderess as if you'd killed me. You have killed me, in a sense. I don't suppose you care. I know you don't care. But I wanted you to know once and for all how one person feels about you. I feel towards you as I should feel towards any other perfectly heartless criminal, towards any other person who is capable of killing things. You've killed my life, Miss Angel; though no doubt I shall go on living. One does, you know.' Nelly's voice had shown no sign of nervous tension as she uttered these words. There were no tears in her eyes. When she had finished she clasped her fingers tightly together and sat very straight, looking in front of her. Her attitude seemed to say, 'I have spoken for my own satisfaction rather than for any desire to make you understand me. And now I may just as well sit here and think, as sit anywhere else.'

'I suppose it's never occurred to you,' said Elise Angel, 'that I was a friend of Richard years and years before you came on the scene. One has to judge things by their general effects. And I can't say his life with you seems to have made him so very happy. He left me full of radiant spirits to go to England; and I find him here thin, miserable, half-starved, working in a wretched office! Of course I know he has to support you; but it seems to me when a man gives his name to a woman he deserves at least to be looked after a bit.'

Very slowly Nelly unclasped her tightly locked fingers, and turned her head towards her rival. The thought flashed through her mind, He has been telling her about Robert, and for the first time during this interview there was aroused in her a ferment of real vindictiveness. Out of the depths of her being this evil poison rose to the surface, corroding her more honourable indignation and turning it into bitter gall. It rose to the surface from that deep cistern of malice which is one of the unfathomable secrets of mortality.

As usually happens in these cases the cause of this particular anger was a misunderstanding. It was unfair. It was unjust. For Richard had far too much pride to breathe a word to Elise on such a matter as Canyot's relations with his wife – those picnic lunches in the painter's studio were quite unknown to the dancer.

'He lost his money,' said Nelly. 'The Paris people failed him. I've had to go short of things as well as he. But it's no use trying to explain. It doesn't matter. Nothing matters very much now. It's a mere incident to you of course; but incidentally it has destroyed a thing that was really beautiful – quite as beautiful I daresay as your wonderful dancing.'

Elise rose slowly to her feet at this. 'That's the worst of you good domestic women,' she said. 'There's always a point where you begin to scold like fish-wives.' She walked to the mantelpiece and back again, the texture of her gown hanging about her figure in clinging folds, folds that were as statuesque and classical as those that fall about the figures known as the Three Fates among the Elgin Marbles. 'It's all sex,' she went on, standing erect in front of her visitor and looking down upon her. 'Your anger against your husband; your anger against me. You talk of my heartlessness and cruelty. Do you suppose I asked your Richard to make love to me? Do you suppose I'd care a jot if he stopped making love to me tomorrow? I don't care a fig about that, one way or another. That means nothing at all with men. You ought to know it means nothing; and you would know it, only you are blinded by sex. Suppose I were married to him and he was playing with you, I might be furious; I probably should be, but I shouldn't deceive myself about it. I shouldn't use grand language about it. I should know it was all this wretched sex illusion, his unfaithfulness and my wretchedness about his unfaithfulness – both of them illusion.'

Having uttered this tirade Elise looked at Nelly as if challenging her to respond. Nelly did not even lift her eyes. She seemed to look through the goddess-like figure before her as if it had been a thing of transparent mist.

'You have killed my happiness,' the young girl repeated. 'You have killed it without scruple or thought. You have no human kindness in you. You are thoroughly heartless. You will always be a bad selfish woman, a woman without pity. And sooner or later your dancing will end. You will get stiff and heavy and dull. And then perhaps you will remember the girl whose heart you killed and who came to tell you what you had done!'

She rose from her seat as she spoke and the two women stood looking at each other with that deep look of infinite understanding and infinite contempt which is one of the most characteristic achievements of nature's laws.

Elise, the artist, felt herself in this struggle weaker and less implacable than her more normal rival. And it was her sense of this advantage in the other that made her toss her proud head and burst into a bitter laugh.

'You silly pretty child!' she cried, moving towards the door.

Nelly followed her; but when the door had been opened and she stood on the threshold, the accumulated indignation within her burst forth. 'I'm glad

I came to you,' she said bitterly. 'I know you now for the kind of thing you are.'

'What you really came for,' retorted the dancer, 'was to try and persuade me to give Richard up.'

'You can't give him up – because he's never belonged to you. You've never loved him, not one little bit! And he – he's only infatuated with you, as he might be with any other woman of your sort. There's no real link between you and there never can be.'

'There's a much closer link between us than you can understand. But goodbye – I wish you joy of your precioul s possession.'

The dancer's eyes were blazing with anger now. But Nelly looked straight into her face. 'It may interest you to know that Richard and I are expecting to have a child. I ought not really to have risked the shock of this interview. You can better understand now, perhaps, how impertinent and ill-bred you seem to me in coming between us just now. You talked of illusion. But it seems to me that the illusion is yours and a crude and vulgar one. It is the illusion of thinking that you could do anything worse to me than destroy my happiness. That you have done by your interference. But your power for evil stops there.'

Having flung this parting shot the young girl turned her back on her enemy and without waiting for the elevator ran down the two flights of stairs and walked out of the building.

She moved now with a very different step from the one with which she had approached the place. Some curious power of battle seemed to possess her, quite different from anything she had felt before. She emerged into the great gaudy avenue with her nerves strung-up and her heart bitter and hard.

There was a child leaning over the stone fountain in front of the Plaza Hotel whose appearance made her, for a moment, recall what she herself had once been; a flicker of faint amusement crossed her face as she thought of those early days and how far she had travelled since then. Had all this happened in Sussex, she thought, would she have had the courage to fight so fiercely for her own hand as she was prepared to do now? Was she too, like the rest, acquiring a new spirit in this New World?

She paused and looked at the watch on her wrist. It was nearly two o'clock. She remembered that her husband's train left at three. From where did these Atlantic City trains start? The Pennsylvania Station! Yes, that was it. She had seen someone off from that very place only a few weeks ago.

She mounted to the top of one of the green buses, and then left it at Thirty-third Street for a cross-town car.

Walking down the stately arcade of the grandest of all railway stations, she paused at the top of the great flight of granite steps leading into the enormous concourse.

She was impressed, even in the midst of her agitated thoughts, by the superb magnificence of that imperial architecture. The feelings that passed through her must have resembled those of some unhappy Celtic captive, conveyed with her unborn child into the forum of the classical city. In spite of herself she was conscious of a sort of exultation as she looked at these huge columns and embossed roof. Something in the tremendousness of that weight of primitive stone, measured and carved in such grand outlines, lifted her above herself and beyond herself. Here at any rate was a beauty and nobility that had something in common with her Sussex Downs.

What amazing cooperation between brain and hand had been needed to produce a thing like this! She found herself thinking suddenly of an argument in support of Karmakoff's theories; an argument based on the difference between this building and the vulgar individualistic palaces on the avenue she had just left!

She lifted her head and tried to read the time by the huge clock which hung above her; but she was too close beneath it for the great hands to be intelligible. She felt as if she had indeed reached some fulcral or pivotal point in space where time issued its mandates but was itself obliterated by some formidable super-time.

She looked at her own watch. It was twenty-five minutes past two. The thought struck her, how living and human a thing a timepiece was, whether large or small, and how terribly like little goblins – so nice or so hateful – these ‘ones’ and ‘twos’ and ‘threes’ and all the rest of them were!

Suddenly she remembered she had had no lunch. After hesitating for a moment between the spacious restaurant on one side and the lunch counter on the other, she hurriedly entered the latter place. Seating herself on one of the revolving stools she ordered a cup of coffee and a roll. She was not sufficiently accustomed to this kind of public feeding to be quite at her ease. The long counters were not crowded; but to her English fancy every eye there was regarding her with a questioning stare, and the Negro who waited upon her embarrassed her by his Southern affability.

She kept her eye on the clock while she ate, anxious to make sure she caught her husband before he went past the barrier to his train; and at twenty minutes to three she paid her bill and ran down the granite steps.

It was only when she reached the iron gates marked atlantic city express that she realized how vague her notions were as to what she would do when her husband did appear.

She had come here blindly to see him, just as blindly and instinctively as she had gone to see Elise. In neither case had she formulated any project. In both cases a vague fighting spirit had driven her on.

Would Elise be with him when he came to the train? She had not precisely thought of that, though she had suspected that they were going down there together. But how could the dancer escape from her engagement at the theatre? That, again, was an aspect of the affair that she had not considered.

Without losing sight of the iron barrier, whose gate was already opened now, Nelly ran quickly to a newspaper stand and possessed herself of an Evening Post.

Returning to her place of observation she rapidly turned over the pages of this paper until she came to the theatre announcements.

She had no difficulty in finding the theatre notice she wanted and the first thing that met her eyes was the phrase, ’Change of Programme’. The name of Elise Angel was not mentioned at all! Hurriedly she scanned the opera and concert notices. Yes! there it was. Beginning next Saturday at the Morgan Hall,’ a series of Classical Dances by the famous Elise Angel from Paris’. So the woman was just now entirely free, and that was the reason why Richard was hurrying down to Atlantic City!

As the full force of this discovery dawned upon her she realized how far she had been from actually grasping the situation in its true meaning. She had, after all, only half believed it. She had, after all, really expected to find her husband alone here – and either to persuade him not to go, or to go down with him herself.

It was now suddenly borne in upon her that he was actually coming, with Elise, here to this barrier, to go off together to the great pleasure place.

By one of those sudden telepathic flashes of insight which remain at present inexplicable, but to which women are more subject than men, and women in Nelly’s condition most subject of all, she knew in a single moment that her husband and Elise were, at that very second, coming down the arcade.

With an instinct of desperate panic she fled across the aisle of this cathedral of commerce and slipped into the waiting room. Here, pressing her face to the glass, she watched the iron gate she had just quitted, her body cold as ice and her hands trembling.

Yes! There they were. There they came!

She drew back from the window as if she had been shot and, covering her face with her hands, sank into one of the waiting-room seats.

Here she remained absolutely motionless; her body heavy as lead, a curious dull pain in her forehead, and all her pulses numbed.

The last traveller of the three o’clock train hurried through the closing gates. The trainmen on the platform, below the iron stairs, blew their whistles … Richard and Elise, seated opposite one another in a Pullman car, sighed a mutual sigh of miserable tension, half-relief and half-remorse; while the great clock above the steps moved forward its hand, oblivious, indifferent, worked by punctual machinery.

Chapter 19

THREE DAYS AFTER their departure from the Pennsylvania Station Richard and Elise were walking together on the sands by the edge of the sea. He had sent a telegram to his office begging them to give him a brief holiday and promising to send them all necessary copy by mail. He had written briefly to Nelly – a letter full of half lies in which he announced that he would return with Ivan and Catharine in a few days.

His time with Elise had been a turbulent one, full of violent quarrels and passionate reconciliations. As they drifted together now, side by side along the water's edge, they were engaged in bitter recrimination.

Above them, supported on wooden trestles, stretched the famous board-walk, frequented even then, at the end of the autumn, by a gay and noisy crowd.

On the further side of the board-walk a long line of small wooden shops offered the visitors to that newfangled promenade every sort of fantastic novelty.

Richard and Elise, absorbed in their quarrel, moved along the brink of the ocean until these shops began to thin out and disappear. But even beyond where the shops ended, that immense boardwalk continued to extend its length. It was borne in upon Richard's mind that by use of its ironwork and its woodwork the American public loved to separate itself from nature and to dominate nature with a certain brutal contempt.

Not a living soul except themselves was to be seen walking upon the sand or close to the water. Directly the actual bathing season was over, during which, in their super-moral costumes, they had lain about in the hot sunshine, all the visitors to Atlantic City congregated upon those high-erected boardings and peered triumphantly at the elements in the intervals between moving-picture shows and flirtation.

Where Richard and Elise were now walking, the noises of traffic and entertainment had ceased; the high bare boards had a look quite peculiar to themselves and different from any other inanimate objects in the world.

They were curiously melancholy, these projections of woodwork, but not melancholy in the manner in which most new human erections are depressing and sad when contrasted with so old a thing as the sea: they were full of peculiar loneliness and desolation of their own – and one not devoid of an appeal to the imagination – but it was a desolation quite different from that produced by deserts or moors or marshes. It was a negative desolation, wherein the mere absence of humanity in a place obviously built for humanity evoked something peculiarly forlorn.

Still exchanging words of cruel and wounding bitterness, such as only those who are physically attracted without being temperamentally congenial are capable of flinging at one another, the two lovers were soon out of reach of the town altogether; the famous board-walk had dwindled to a narrow plank path.

Here they found themselves in a world of more attractive melancholy. Beyond the sea bank there stretched a vast expanse of reeds and rushes, and by the edge of the sand dunes where they were now wandering grew all manner of glaucous sea growths mingled with wild purple asters.

Every now and then they might have seen a long line of wild geese, travelling at an enormous height in the air, and sending down that peculiar sound, by the creaking of their wings, which can be only expressed by the syllables hank-hank or honk-honk.

But they did not look up at the sky at all just then; and the lines of flying wild fowl meant nothing to them; and the vast grey plateau of the ocean meant nothing to them; and the shells upon the white sand meant nothing to them.

They were two human beings, engaged in the immemorial occupation of sticking poisoned arrows into one another’s hearts. Absorbed in this delicate pastime, they were oblivious to all else in the round world.

The real cause of their disagreement was the shock to their nerves of this reckless adventure and the simple fact that being neither of them young they lacked the resilience to recover themselves.

Remorse in Richard made a bitter and poisonous background for new romance. Not for one single moment could he really obliterate his wife’s figure – silent and upbraiding, ironical and mocking, beautiful with the beauty of youth, and bearing his child at her heart.

The very air of gallantry which the pleasure city exhaled, like the sea breath of Aphrodite, was bitter and vulgar in his nostrils. All this transitory woodwork, all these painted wooden shops and flaunted showhouses seemed thin, sad and insubstantial to his spirit. The immense waste of November waters, shot with pale white sunshine or desolately grey, seemed to reduce all these theatrical attempts at pleasure and passion to a sort of fantastic Maya or unreal illusion, a gaudy ripple upon a vast emptiness.

Too sick at heart, too cruelly torn between the two women, to enjoy the escape which now offered itself as they left the houses behind and began to breathe the unsullied breath of the Jersey coast, Richard had a strange sense, as he wrangled with his companion in one of those interminable lovers’ quarrels which seem like elemental forces, that he and she were will-less automata, doomed to hurt each other for the amusement of unseen spectators.

Struggling to break loose from the exhausting logic of anger which poisoned the air about them, he stopped at last and began tracing patterns with his stick in the white sand.

He drew an ornamental E and a deeply indented A on that smooth surface. But no sooner had he done so than an angry contempt for his own sentiment made him erase both of them with a violent gesture. The dancer's face was pale and sardonic as she watched him; her red lips curved in a hard significant smile.

'You don't know what the word love means,' she said suddenly.

'I wasn't writing love,' he retorted childishly.' Can't you read English? I was making your initials.'

'In sand,' she said.

'Well! they're gone now, anyhow.'

'It's the fact of your being English, I suppose,' she remarked, looking at him with a misery of indignation. 'I hate all you English. Your feelings are clotted up with clods of earth – gross, thick, heavy clods of earth! Not one of you can be clear and free and honest. You worship what is, just because it is. It's worse than materialism, it is absolute deadness! And what's more you're not content until everyone's as dead as you are. Dead words, dead sentiment, dead hearts! You've no real courage in you … without courage everything becomes initials written on sand!'

Richard's face assumed the bewildered expression of a child that is beaten for an unknown fault. His superficial cynicism was swallowed up in real trouble. He looked at her like a dumb flogged animal.

His bewilderment increased her anger.

'These three days with you have killed my love,' she said. 'You've done the unpardonable thing … and you've made it worse by your stupidity. It would have been far better if you'd known what you were doing. It has been like being tied to a corpse!'

'I thought we'd been so happy,' he murmured.

‘That’s just it,’ she cried, ‘it’s always happiness, happiness, happiness with you! Have you no idea of great, beautiful, terrible things that have to be paid for by the loss of all that? Happiness? My God! It means comfort to you – a nice, easy, complacent English comfort.’

‘It’s you who are not honest,’ he muttered. ‘Why can’t you confess the truth? You’re angry with me for quite a different reason from the one you’re talking about.’

She flashed at him a look of splendid fury, a look that made her so beautiful that he was completely disarmed.

‘What reason?’ she flung out.

‘Oh you know …’ He hesitated. ‘What’s the use of my saying it? It’s you who drive me on till you force me to say these things.’

‘Tell me what you were thinking. Tell me! Quick!’

‘It was nothing,’ he stammered. ‘We both think all sorts of unfair malicious things.’

‘You must tell me. I must know. What was it?’

‘It was natural enough … I daresay it’s not true. I meant that you’re angry with me because I felt remorseful about Nelly.’

‘Ah!’ She drew in her breath and her eyes grew dark against the pallor of her skin. Of course you’d say that. Being the most ill-bred thing you could possibly say, it’s characteristic of course. As it happens, it’s untrue. But if it were true, would that let you out? Can’t you see that such remorse with you is only fear for your own skin? Or are you really such a baby as to think that you can make your wife happy by holding her hand?’

‘You are very unfair,’ said Richard. ‘I can’t help hating to make a person suffer.’

‘We all suffer,’ retorted the dancer. ‘And the worst cause of our suffering is a man like you who thinks he can carry an ointment pot about with him to heal the wounds he makes. Haven't you even got the courage of your callousness? Haven't you even got the courage to face the fact that you are utterly and profoundly selfish? Must you go on slipping out of it and evading it and covering it up, to the very end?'

'I don't slip out of anything,' protested Richard. 'I wish I did!'

'It's because of this that your poetry is so bad,' she went on. 'It's only your ingrained conceit that makes you think it anything but thoroughly bad. You deceive yourself far more deeply than you deceive anyone else.'

Richard's face assumed the dogged obstinate look of a much persecuted mule, and this seemed to hound her on to further malicious stabs.

'You talk of bringing your philosophy into your poetry. My good man, you must realize once for all that your poetry is a fraud, a fake, a piece of rank charlatanism. You're the very last person to be a poet. The whole business is an elaborate edifice of humbug!'

'If my poetry isn't real,' said Richard, 'nothing in my existence is real.'

'Nonsense! Stuff and nonsense! You've got a sound critical faculty. You're receptive enough. You're capable of doing very good honest literary work. But you're so ridiculously proud that you pretend that all this is nothing. You must be the great poet of the age – or you will sulk in your tent and do nothing at all.'

'You are most frightfully unfair,' he began. 'No one can tell for certain where their power is until they—'

'Until they stop lying,' she interrupted. 'Don't you understand that art is a thing connected with character?'

'I thought it was a thing connected with imagination,' said Richard sulkily.

The great dancer fixed her eyes on a sailing ship far out to sea.

‘God knows what it is, my dear,’ and she sighed deeply. ‘I only know it is a thing we seem unable to get into our life with each other. But it may be my fault quite as much as yours. I’m sorry, Richard. I’m sorry I’ve been bad. Shall we go back?’

He took her hand and kissed it and they began slowly retracing their steps. They were silent. With the splash of the long waves breaking beside them an infinite sadness gathered about their hearts, the kind of sadness which no argument can destroy and no hope can lift; the sadness which is of the very nature of life itself, when the distractions of desire and curiosity are for the moment in abeyance.

They had not moved far in the direction of the town when they heard themselves called by name from one of the high ridges of sand overgrown with grass that separated them from the marshes on the left. They stopped and turned. Two figures rose from a hollow place in the sand dunes and came running down the slope towards them.

Catharine’s extravagant greeting of Elise was a reminder to Richard of how small a place in the great world he himself held in comparison with his companion. Elise had never met Karmakoff; and before she condescended to notice Richard at all, the enthusiastic girl eagerly introduced him to the dancer.

The encounter between Elise and Ivan was like the encounter between two feline animals of the same jungle. They watched each other furtively, measuring one another’s strength and weighing in the balance one another’s magnetism. Her accumulated anger against Richard made the imperious dancer ready for any kind of an emotional plunge; the womanish eyes of the cynical Russian, with their strange green lights, dilated in amorous reciprocity to the furtive challenge which she gave him.

Poor impassioned Catharine had already wearied him with her unsophisticated emotion. She had irritated him, too, by queer fits of deep depression in which she had returned to her childish scruples, and incidentally she had made the situation more strained by constant references to Roger Lamb.

When the four of them moved on together towards the town, it appeared inevitable that Karmakoff and the dancer should outstrip the others – vehemently and passionately absorbed, as it seemed, in what they had to say to one another.

‘One day you’ll be coming to Moscow,’ Ivan remarked, among other things. ‘Our people ought to have you. You’re precisely what they must have. They’ll give you authority over our whole art movement, which owes so much to your genius already.’

‘And the only way to get anything beautiful,’ added Karmakoff, ’is to put an end to the economic struggle.’

‘Can that really be done?’

‘It can be tried.’

‘By force?’

‘Why not?’

‘But force only breeds force.’

‘Words! my dear lady. It’s force when you prune a tree, but what that produces is fruit.’

‘It does me good to talk to you. I don’t know why.’

‘I have waited long to make your acquaintance. We were destined to meet, sooner or later.’

‘You’ve seen my work?’

‘I’ve seen you nine times this season.’

‘Do you like me better when I’m Greek or when I’m Christian?’

‘You are never wholly either. You are a woman Dionysus.’

‘When a woman Dionysus really does appear it will bring all our misery to an end.’

‘By bewitching us into thinking it isn’t misery?’

‘By undermining misery with tragedy.’

‘Ah! you separate those two; so do I. That’s where Cathy and I quarrel. She enjoys the sentiment of misery and loathes its boredom. I am never miserable.’

‘What are you, Ivan Karmakoff?’

‘I am never happy. I know that. And I am never unhappy. I am a person who works and plays.’

‘Is our dear Catharine part of the play?’

‘You know the answer to that, or you wouldn’t ask it! Catharine and I belong to two different worlds.’

‘And we belong to the same world?’

‘You will always be a symbol to me; of what I live for.’

‘And that is?’

‘To bring a little order into chaos.’

‘I am the most chaotic person in creation.’

‘You are the greatest artist in America.’

‘What’s the use of being that if no one understands me?’

‘Doesn’t Storm understand you?’

‘I’m afraid my Richard lives in the same world as your Catharine. Poor darlings! They are both children.’

‘Where and when have you and I talked like this before?’

‘In Nineveh probably, or in Carthage.’

‘Do you believe that kind of thing?’

‘I didn’t – an hour ago.’

‘Don’t bring me into your play, my friend. I belong to your work.’

‘You belong to the object of my work.’

‘Where did you get those woman’s eyes from? I shall think of them when I dance next week.’

‘Neither of us is pure woman or pure man. That’s why we understand each other.’

‘What are we?’

‘We’re messengers of the forgotten gods.’

‘We ought to give the password, then – the secret sign.’

‘We’ve given that already.’

‘Have we? Without knowing it?’

‘We are messengers. We know nothing.’

‘I thought when I first saw you just now, that you were the most brutal materialist I’d ever met.’

‘I thought you were the most unhappy woman I’d ever met.’

‘Now we have been flung together we must say everything.’

‘And prove our kinship?’

‘And make the sign of the meeting of messengers.’

‘And leave our play for a day and a night?’

‘How can we do that, Ivan Karmakoff?’

‘Dare you, if I dare? An interlude, a resting place.’

‘I thought you were the most cynical realist I’d ever seen.’

‘I thought your mouth had the look of a thing hunted by dogs; a torn mouth, a bleeding mouth, a mouth of suffering.’

‘Did you try to imagine what it would be like to heal that hurt?’

‘I imagined nothing. I knew that I had been sent for that.’

‘Because of our both being messengers?’

‘Because of our purpose. Because of the clearing up of chaos.’

‘What nonsense we’ve been talking, Ivan Karmakoff! These seagulls must think us the biggest prigs they’ve ever listened to.’

‘We have to get used to being thought prigs – by seagulls. The wild geese up there would understand us.’

‘No doubt they would! But I’m afraid our dear pair of tame geese back there wouldn’t! To come to a practical question. How are we to manage? How are we to see a little more of each other?’

‘Your new programme doesn’t begin until next week, does it?’

‘No, my friend. It doesn’t.’

‘When has Richard to go back?’

‘Tomorrow. But oh, dear me! let’s have none of this manoeuvring, you green-eyed savage! I’m not married to Richard and you’re not married to Catharine. Let’s go straight to our hotels, get my things and your things and take the train back to New York.’

‘And leave letters explaining everything?’

‘And leave letters explaining nothing! What’s the use of living in a modern city if you cannot live in a modern way? We’ll treat it simply as a joke. We’ll write humorously. It is a joke, you know. Why shouldn’t we go back to New York together? Richard has been telegraphing his wife that he was with you and Catharine. Well! He will be with Catharine!’

‘And he’ll go back with her to Nelly?’

‘Oh you know the lady too? I’ve just met her. She’s as pretty as a picture. But oh dear me! how English the poor dear is!’

‘I don’t think our gods have given us any message to the English.’

‘They’ve warned us to run away from them. And that’s what we’ll do.’

They both turned round at that, and surveyed the long line of sand and spindrift that lay behind them white and chilly, lit up by the November sun.

A darkly outlined breakwater, about a mile away, broke the line of their vision. Their companions had evidently not yet arrived at that point. The two reckless ones had walked so quickly during their strange dialogue that they were already out of reach of pursuit.

‘You’re sure you won’t worry about Catharine?’ remarked Elise as they made their way up from the sands to the board-walk above.

‘Not if you don’t worry about Storm,’ retorted Karmakoff.

They exchanged a glance of intimate understanding and allowed their eyes, which certainly had a queer resemblance in colour and expression, to meet and hold each other’s gaze.

‘The world would say we were following a funny road to our purpose,’ murmured the woman, as they threaded their way through the crowd.

‘You’re thinking of what I said about reducing chaos,’ responded the man. ‘But it’s only when you’ve got that ingredient in your own veins and are using it with your brain that you can do anything. To bottle up chaos doesn’t help. It has to be ridden on and bitted and bridled. Most people’s minds are burial grounds of that kind of thing, sprinkled with dead flowers. We’re not leaving our friends for the sake of pleasure. We’re leaving them for the sake of our work. We need one another at this juncture, Elise. Perhaps, later, it will be different!’

Again their eyes met and clung together in a long mysterious questioning look. And after that they both were silent.

‘Perhaps later it will be different!’ the dancer repeated under her breath; and there awoke within her a sickening envy of that rare company of faithful souls who have the power of loving once and not again.

Then as the great fantastic hotel loomed above them, like the dream palace of some mad king of Thule, the old Dionysian mood surged up once more. ‘I’ve found him at last!’ she whispered to herself. ‘The free spirit worthy of me. It will be easy enough if he loves me. But if I love him – let him beware!'

And in her heart she caught a strain of that southern music to which she was wont to dance when the northern harmonies grew too heavy for the fire within her.

A couple of hours later Richard stood in the hallway of the Hotel Ransom watching Catharine read Karmakoff's letter.

As he saw that tall willowy figure shiver from head to foot and bend and sway under the blow, he thought within himself quite suddenly – We are all wrong, we irresponsible ones! Suffering goes deeper than joy and to save from suffering is better than to give pleasure.

When the girl turned to him at last, mechanically crumpling up the wicked note in her hand, the look upon her face went to his heart as nothing in his whole life had ever done before. For Catharine had nothing of Nelly's pride, and to see her inarticulate suffering, nakedly exposed before him, made him hate the whole business of love and the whole system of the world in which such things were possible.

It was even worse when the girl tried to smile at him, tried to take the thing lightly. She was so smitten that not a tear came to her eyes. She just swayed backwards and forwards and smiled, her hands fumbling weakly, foolishly, meaninglessly, at the piece of paper which she held. She kept thrusting it into the envelope and taking it out again; and her words tripped over one another blunderingly, confusedly, like the words of a person in a fever.

Richard experienced such a pang of pity for her that he felt as though his whole philosophy of life would be different from that moment. 'Damn these cruelties!' he said to himself. 'This can't be endured!'

They had gone first to his own hotel, thinking to find them there. His feelings when he read Elise’s letter had, even then, been swallowed up in his concern for Catharine.

The link between himself and the dancer had been already stretched to the breaking point. I must get her back to New York at once, he thought. I must take her to Nelly. His naïve dependence upon his wife’s powers of comfort did not arouse any sense of humour in him, did not appear to him as singular under the circumstances.

He could be cynical and sardonic enough sometimes, but at other times he behaved with the innocent egoism of a spoilt child. Elise being disposed of, his natural instinct was to go straight back to Nelly. She need never know, except in vague suspicion, he thought, how things worked out down here.

Catharine was like wax in his hands during the rest of that day. She let him help her pack her things; she let him convey her to the station and place her by his side in the compartment, without a word.

He wondered, as he saw her lean sideways against the edge of the window, whether she wasn’t half-asleep, whether indeed she hadn’t swallowed some sort of drug. Once, however, when by a sudden movement forward he obtained a glimpse of her face he knew that she was only too completely in possession of her faculties. It was clear to him then that it was the blow to her heart which had deprived her body of all muscular resistance.

Chapter 20

IT WAS ABOUT nine o’clock in the evening when Richard and Catharine mounted the steps of the Charlton Street house.

Richard left the girl leaning helplessly against the wall of the passage, as if she were an umbrella or a stick that he had been carrying and, quickly turning the handle of the door, he entered the room.

The place was dark except for the light of a lamp in the street opposite. Nelly’s gone to bed, he thought. But I must wake her, as Catharine’s here. He could not help experiencing a certain cowardly relief at the girl’s presence, as it was an obvious raft of escape from immediate explanations. He struck a match and lit the gas. Then he went back into the passage. Leading in Catharine by the hand he placed her in that same big armchair where he had first made her acquaintance.

The girl looked at him out of hollow miserable eyes and murmured Nelly’s name.

‘Hush! my dear!’ he whispered. ‘It’s all right. I’ll wake her now and she’ll look after you.’

He opened the door of the bedroom and went in. The bed was unoccupied, and the empty room, left in perfect order, mocked him with its neatness as if with a leer of derisive contempt.

He went up to the dressing-table, entirely bare now of Nelly’s brush and comb and bottle of eau-de-cologne.

In the place of these things was a letter addressed to himself in Nelly’s girlish hand.

He returned to the living-room where Catharine was sitting exactly where he had left her, her eyes fixed in vacancy.

Standing under the gas burner he opened the note and read it. It ran as follows: ‘If you only hadn’t lied to me it would have been different. Why did you do it, Richard? How could you do it? I should have thought – but what’s the use of saying any more? If neither for my sake nor the child’s you can’t give up your pleasures, it’s no use pretending that you care for us. By the time you read this I shall be on the sea. Robert is sailing on the same ship. He will take me to Mrs Shotover’s. He wants me to divorce you, but I shall never do that. He is very angry with you and unhappy. I think I am myself too sad about everything to be angry ever again. Goodbye Richard. When you get tired of this person, as I know you will very soon, you will be sorry you forced me to leave you. I have to think of my child and I couldn’t endure it any more. You will never be able to understand what a woman feels. Perhaps it isn’t your fault altogether. I am afraid I must ask you to send me a little money, at regular intervals? I shall be happier when I see the Downs. Don’t be afraid I shall do anything rash. I feel only too clear-headed. It is the Village Laundry, not Ebstein’s, who come for our washing now. Goodbye. I am all right. The voyage won’t hurt me.’

The letter was signed ‘Nelly’ and there was a postscript to it containing one sentence: ‘Please keep in touch with Catharine, for the girl has no friends.’

Richard carefully folded up this letter and put it in his pocket. Then he took it out of his pocket and read it again very slowly. Then he carried it to the chimneypiece and placed it under a book.

He noticed casually as he did this that the elemental sprites, who accompany every human disaster with their satiric commentary, had arranged that the book under which he placed it should be the Vita Nuova. Well did he recall the romantic nonsense he had written for Nelly on the flyleaf of that book. But it served very well as a letter weight just then to keep that particular letter from blowing away!

He walked up and down the room several times trying to visualize Nelly on the ship. He felt no jealousy of Canyot at that moment. He felt only relief that his wife was not alone. But how he longed for her; for her voice, her look, her silent reproaches even! He had never longed so much for the presence of any human being.

At last he stopped in front of Catharine. What was to be done with the stricken girl?

‘Nelly has gone away,’ he said. ‘I’ve treated her badly and she’s gone away. She’s sailed for England.’

Catharine stared at him with a puzzled uncomprehending look. ‘Nelly’s left you?’ she murmured.

‘Yes – devil that I am! She’s treated me as I deserve and has gone off.’

‘Not alone?’

‘No, Robert Canyot’s with her.’

The absence of anything in his tone except self-abasement seemed to rouse Catharine’s pity.

‘Poor Richard!’ she murmured and stretched out one of her long arms towards him. That naïve gesture of sympathy from one so cruelly hit herself was too much for Richard’s self-control. He found himself on his knees by the side of the girl’s chair struggling with violent sobs that shook his whole frame. Still tearless herself Catharine smoothed his hair caressingly with her fingers. An onlooker would have been made aware at that moment of what an immense fund of passionate human feeling lay beneath that queer Greenwich Village smock-frock, coloured like a Matisse painting.

He rose to his feet in a little while, relieved by his outburst. One of the cynical demons that were always ready to whisper unpardonable things in his ear commented with sardonic interest on the fact that somewhere within his consciousness there was an actual throb of self-congratulation that he was still able to shed tears.

The question now presented itself vividly to his mind: what was to be done with Catharine?

The girl had crossed her knees and clasped her hands round them, and now sat staring blankly in front of her.

It struck his inner consciousness how queer a thing it was, this pathology of wounded love! How it seemed to be something impersonal, like a madness that fell upon a person out of the air, quite independently of the value or worth or nature of the object for which it vexed itself.

He looked at his watch. It was already past ten. ‘Shall I see you back to your flat?’ he said, touching the girl’s hand.

The idea of her room in Thirty-fifth Street, full of little objects associated with her friendship for Ivan, brought such a woebegone expression into Catharine’s face that he wished he had not suggested such a thing. But what else was to be done? He hesitated for a moment, looking helplessly round the apartment. Then he said, ‘All right. The best thing you can do is to stay right here, where you are. You shall sleep in Nelly’s room and I’ll pull my own bed into this room. Nobody will be any the wiser. And after all what does it matter? We’re both past fussing about things of that sort!’

She seemed relieved at his suggestion; and he got a grim satisfaction from the thought of that postscript in Nelly’s letter – Look after Catharine. She has no friends.

Having settled this matter he proceeded to drag the second of the two beds into the sitting room. Then he lit the gas under the stove so as to make them both some tea. He was touched by finding that Nelly had stocked their small cupboard with more provisions than he had ever seen there before.

He managed with difficulty to persuade the unhappy girl to swallow some oatmeal biscuits and a raw egg made palatable by the last drops of his brandy flask. These things and a cup of milkless tea formed their melancholy supper.

It was a curious situation, not likely to recur in either of their lives – sitting thus alone together beneath the same roof, while the man and the woman who had thrown them aside were no doubt drinking Olympian drinks in the sumptuous apartment so well known to Richard.

'I shall have to get another job,' said Catharine wearily. But Richard was relieved to hear her say even that; still more relieved when she didn't refuse the cigarette he proffered.

'How lucky Roger is to be safe out of the whole thing!' she remarked after a long silence.

'Well! we shall all be out of it before so very long!' responded Richard.

'I've got some morphia tablets in my room,' she added.

He laid his hand upon hers. 'You mustn't talk like that, Catharine,' he said sadly. 'You'll have to see it through, just as I shall. Sometimes I feel as if the whole mad business were a sort of dream and that when we wake up we shall be quite free from all this misery.'

'Do you mean death?'

'Yes. Death – but something else too. Anyway we should quite spoil what I mean by killing ourselves.'

The girl sighed. 'I wish I could understand better what is underneath it all. If there were any point in it, any purpose in it, it would be easier.' She added desperately, 'I would give my life for Ivan.'

'I have a sort of idea,' Richard went on, 'that after death all the people who care for each other come together without any of this wretched jealousy.'

‘I shall never bear to see him again, or her either!’ cried Catharine Gordon.

‘Some day,’ said Richard, ‘it may be completely different with these complications. The human race may learn to disentangle itself from its flesh and blood. It may learn to love without wanting to possess.’

‘Do you feel like that now?’ she asked him suddenly.

‘No, no, my dear; I’m far below such feelings. Don’t talk about me. I sometimes wonder whether I’ve got a heart at all.’

She looked at him with a puzzled frown and he fancied that she had been hurt by his words as if by something clumsy and banal.

‘You must never say a thing like that to anyone who loves you,’ she said earnestly.

Richard smiled. ‘Why not, my dear?’

Her answer was a surprise to him. ‘Because it’s unfair; because it’s mean and cunning!’

There was a considerable flicker of annoyance at that moment flung across ‘the lake of his mind’. Had the girl managed to pierce the core of a very subtle form of self-complacency and vanity? Her words certainly broke up Richard’s mood of superior protective strength. In some profoundly recondite way they gave him the sensation of being exposed. The feeling he derived from this sensation was not a pleasant one; he experienced that kind of unharmonious shock from it which, as he had noted on other occasions, gave a severer prod to his life illusion than anything else.

‘I expect you are right, Catharine,’ he muttered, resuming his walk up and down the room. He made that time a genuine effort to break the crust of egoism which imprisoned his soul. Yes, the girl was undoubtedly right. That vague self-accusation ‘I have no heart’ was only too obvious an example of a mental trick he was always playing himself – an unctuous salve of moral evasion with which he covered up drastic issues!

His analysis of his real inmost reaction to all these events revealed to him that he had been all the while, secretly and without any self-forgetful suffering, dramatizing his situation. He had been making it all a part of one long stream of not wholly intolerable occurrences, in the flowing tide of which the figure of Nelly herself, the figures of Elise and Catharine and all the rest, were there to be exploited, were there to be contemplated subjectively, as scenes in the human play which after all remained his play – whereof he was not only an actor on the stage but an appreciative critic in the gallery!

His thoughts whirled confusedly through his brain now as he paced that little room, his guest's purple stockings and white sand-shoes mingling with first one mental image and then another.

It cannot, he thought, be altogether selfish and contemptible to dramatize one's life and to detach one's self from it. Nelly never does that. Catharine never does. But surely Elise must do it, or she couldn't put so much art into her dancing. How is it then that I annoy Elise so much with the way my mind works? Why does she despise my poetry so? Poetry must, surely, be detached from a person's life and yet be the residuum of a person's life. Am I hopelessly inhuman and unnatural in all this?

Suddenly it occurred to him, as quite a new discovery, that it was queer that instead of being reduced to hopeless misery by his wife's departure he could occupy himself like this in cold-blooded abstract analysis!

Was it that, at the back of his mind, he felt confident that he had only to return to England, to receive Nelly's forgiveness and settle down happily with her as before? Or was it really that nothing, beyond extreme immediate physical pain, could break up the crust of his indurated egoism? Was he actually wanting in some normal human attribute; and did everything that occurred to him approach his consciousness through some vaporous veil like a thick sea mist? He began naïvely to wonder what the great artists of the world were like in these complicated human relations. It occurred to him that they must have the power of transfiguring the results of analysis and forcing the issue by the use of some sort of creative energy which the gods had completely denied to him.

Where was his place in the world then, he who was neither a normal human being nor a creative genius? Was he doomed for ever to live this wretched half-life, neither deeply happy nor deeply unhappy, cheated in some mysterious way of the prerogative of being born a man? He looked at the long tenuous figure of the young girl in the chair; and he felt, for one swift moment, as some fabulous merman or neckan might feel, as it craved for the human soul that had been denied it by destiny.

When Catharine was at last safely in bed in Nelly's room and he had kissed her goodnight and turned out her light, he felt amused to note how the mere fact of sleeping in the sitting room gave him a curious pleasure.

He lay for a long time before he went to sleep, smoking one cigarette after another, enjoying in spite of his conscience a certain primitive and heathen satisfaction at being alive at all in this mad complicated world; at being able to say still, with the royal villain in the famous drama – 'Richard is Richard – that is I am I.'

His mind called up the image of Roger Lamb as he had last seen him. And with the thought of the dead boy he found himself recalling an interview which he himself had had with a great Paris specialist, when his heart troubled him in earlier days. 'Any extreme physical strain may finish you off,' the great man had warned him. He had thought of that verdict during his fit of exhaustion at the stage-door of Elise's theatre; he thought of it again now as he began to grow drowsy. ‘That would be a better way than morphia,’ he said to himself.

Chapter 21

RICHARD SLEPT LONG and heavily that night. Once he woke with a start, in complete bewilderment as to where he was and with a feeling that someone had called him by name. He sat up and listened; but if it had been a cry from Catharine she did not repeat it. He heard no sound from her room.

After that he fell into complete unconsciousness till Catharine herself aroused him with the news that breakfast would be ready in ten minutes.

The girl looked lamentably hollow-eyed as they sat down opposite each other. He surmised from her appearance that she had hardly slept at all; and this, in his morning mood of malicious irritation, made him almost angry with her. What right had she to punish him with a miserable face like that, when he had turned out of his room to make her comfortable?

Just as he was leaving for the office she suddenly said, ‘Would you like me to get your supper for you or shall I go away when I’ve washed up?’

The idea of coming back to a lonely room struck his mind at that moment as the one thing he couldn’t endure. ‘Will you do that?’ he rejoined eagerly. ‘Here’s a couple of dollars.’ And he placed the two notes on the table. ‘Then we can manage again as we did last night,’ he added. ‘I don’t suppose either of us cares for Greenwich Village gossip.’

So it was brought about that these two took up their queerly assorted and entirely chaste domicile together.

Catharine reverted to her former method of earning a little money by embroidering Russian smocks which she sold at one of the numerous little art shops which abounded in that vicinity. Richard sent off many passionate and penitent letters addressed to Furze Lodge and by every weekly mail received a brief acknowledgement from Nelly of the small sums he punctually dispatched to her.

He worked more assiduously at the office of The Mitre than he had ever done before, receiving sometimes a bonus from the editor for work done beyond his original contract.

But he was all the while anxiously looking out for some means of rehabilitating his literary fortunes. He had constantly in his mind the idea of sailing for England; but it was obviously impossible to do so until he had obtained some permanent income. He could not see himself arriving in Sussex without a cent. To present himself before his wife, not to speak of Mrs Shotover, penniless as well as disgraced, was more than he could contemplate.

The weeks and months dragged on and the innumerable circles of people in that cosmopolitan city began in their various ways to prepare to celebrate the far-off event which for a minority meant the birthday of a God, while for the majority it signified parties and presents and desperate attempts to defy Prohibition.

The afternoon of Christmas Eve found Catharine occupied in a pathetic effort to adorn their bachelor apartment with some sprigs of holly and mistletoe, purchased in Jefferson Market.

The girl had seen nothing of Karmakoff since that day at Atlantic City, and as far as she knew Richard had seen nothing of Elise. Her receptive nature, passively docile to the will of fate, had slipped insensibly into a sort of trance-like domesticity, the seclusion and regularity of which had a healing effect upon her wounded spirit. It was the first time in her life that she had felt herself to be necessary to another human being. The naïve way in which the incompetent Richard clung to her ministrations was a profound solace to her self-respect. Nothing but the feverish activity of that whirlpool of human effort which seethed and eddied around them could have enabled their association to pass uncriticized.

They invited no one to the flat and they went to see no one together. The few separate encounters they did have with former acquaintances led to no sort of inconvenience to either of them; and if one Greenwich Village habitué remarked to another that Cathy Gordon had 'moved downtown', the worst commentary that resulted was some such remark as, 'They say she's having an affair with that fellow in Charlton Street whose wife ran away.'

Richard did not mention to Nelly in any of his passionate love letters that he and her friend were living under the same roof. The instinct that prevented him doing this at first was an entirely unconscious one. It was Catharine herself who converted it into a deliberate and conscious repression.

'I'd rather you didn't say anything to Nelly about my being with you. She wouldn't understand it. And why should we agitate her unnecessarily when we know that if she did understand it she would be quite satisfied?'

Richard, amused at this innocent piece of sophistry, had not worried further about the matter. Since his conscience was clear, let the affair go! He had grown accustomed to Catharine's companionship. He had got fond of the girl; and his renewed loyalty to Nelly did not seem in any way impinged upon by this relationship. If any sort of scruple did flicker for a moment across his mind it was constantly being quelled by Nelly's reiterated requests that he should look after Catharine. Well! Catharine was looking after him. So all was as it should be!

On this Christmas Eve, while the young girl was standing upon a chair, holding in her hand two large bunches of holly with the intention of fixing them behind a print after Watteau, she heard a sharp knock at the door.

She hurriedly jumped down and cried, ‘Come in!’

To her amazement and indignation the door opened and admitted Elise Angel.

The dancer was wrapped in a black Spanish cloak which she promptly flung down upon a chair. She then quite calmly closed the door behind her and, folding her arms with a dramatic gesture, ejaculated the words, ‘So it’s as they told me! I didn’t believe it. It seemed too funny to be true.’

‘What seemed too funny to be true, Miss Angel?’

‘That you and Richard should be living together.’

‘We’re not living together!’

‘Well, that you should be here, then. It isn’t for outsiders of course to inquire any further.’

‘I’m expecting him back any moment; so unless you want to meet him I advise you to leave your message quickly.’

‘Mon dieu! We have changed from our little devoted Cathy! Richard must have been telling you fine stories about me.’

‘We’ve never spoken of you once. Not once. Will you sit down?’

The last words were uttered in a reluctantly softened voice. It was difficult in the presence of Elise Angel, even for a jilted rival, to keep up the role of moral indignation.

The dancer settled herself in the armchair and fixed upon Catharine a look so disarming that the young girl asked hurriedly, ‘Can I get you anything, a glass of water?’

‘No – no! child. I’m only a bit tired. Your friend has left me and sailed for Russia.’

Catharine Gordon turned pale and leant against the table. ‘Sailed for Russia?’ she gasped. ‘When?’

‘Oh several weeks ago. I ought to have come and told you before. We quarrelled before he went – of course.’

‘He left you, too?’

Elise Angel smiled. ‘Yes, my dear, he left me too! It seems that neither you nor I are very clever at keeping people. But you seem to have got Richard safely anyhow!’

‘Have you come to take him away?’

‘Mon dieu! little one, heaven forbid! But my impression is that our good Richard is pining for his wife. You know that pretty young person is going to have a child?’

‘A child? He never told me!’

‘I don’t know why he should have told you, you funny thing, unless you’re in love with him now.’

Catharine Gordon frowned at this and shook her head.

‘Not yet?’ repeated the dancer. ‘You’re just living – what shall I say – like brother and sister?’

The young girl coloured and nodded furiously.

There was a moment’s pause during which the two women exchanged one of those indescribable glances which reveal without words so many things. Then the dancer stretched out her arms.

‘Come and be friends again, you darling! We’re both deserted now!’

The look which accompanied this gesture was too much for the generous-hearted Catharine. She slid down upon the arm of her rival’s chair and hugged her impetuously.

‘What you and I have to think about now,’ said Elise Angel, ’is what we’re going to do with our dear Richard. I caught a glimpse of him in the street the other day and he looked to me wretchedly thin.'

Catharine pouted like a child at this.

'I give him very good meals,' she said.

'I'm sure you do. But he's an Englishman, my dear, and English– men, whatever they may do in New York, pine for their rainy fields. We don't want to have to bury our Richard out here do we?'

'But he's got no money. He sends home nearly all he makes, as it is.'

'Well! We must get him the money. A thousand dollars would keep him going till he could get over to Paris. And once in Paris he'd soon pick up again. They know his value over there.'

'But – a thousand dollars!'

'It isn't so much as it sounds, you dear baby. Why, Pat Ryan lent me as much as that only two months ago! I mustn't go to him for this; but I could sell my pearl necklace.'

Catharine looked at her with tears in her eyes. A wave of vibrant sympathy flowed between the two.

'You dear!' cried the younger girl.

Elise smiled. 'You'd do the same for him. I'm not blind. You're one of those people, little Cathy, who put their genius into their heart, just as I put mine into my legs!'

Catharine looked at her thoughtfully. 'Yes, I have got fond of him. But that's because he's got so used to me, I expect. It's a new thing to me to be really wanted.'

The dancer put her arm around her waist. 'Well! now we're friends again, I may tell you that I want you most abominably. So you see my cunning design! I pack off our good Richard to his wife and have you all to myself again! For you will come back to me now, child, won't you? No! don't shake your head. You must –I can't be deserted by everyone.'

Catharine looked wonderingly into those mysterious eyes which were neither grey nor blue nor violet nor green, and yet were all those colours together.

‘If you’re very good and very nice, I may teach you to dance,’ said Elise Angel.

Catharine leapt to her feet at those words and clapped her hands. ‘Not really? Do you think I could? That would be simply heaven! I used to dream of that when I was a little girl. And to be taught by you!’ She snatched at one of the dancer’s hands and kissed it fervently.

‘Meanwhile,’ said Elise, ‘I’ve got to go round and pick up a thousand dollars.’ She rose slowly from the armchair and laid her hand on her Spanish cloak. ‘Richard won’t, I suppose, be too proud to take it when I’ve got it?’ she said, as Catharine arranged the cloak round her shoulders.

Once more they exchanged that curious enigmatic glance with which women converse without the necessity for words.

‘I don’t think so,’ responded the girl smiling. ‘I don’t think he is very proud – in those things.’

‘Well! goodbye, you dear child. I’ll bring the money round to you in a day or two. By the way, why don’t you bring him to see me dance tonight? I’ll tell them at the box office to keep you good seats. But just as you like of course. It won’t matter if you don’t come. Goodbye!’ And she ran lightly down the narrow stairs and let herself into the street.

That last word of Elise’s had a little clouded Catharine’s pleasure.

Somehow she felt reluctant to sit with Richard in a prominent seat at that theatre.

She left her pieces of holly lying on the table and, sitting down with her hands around her knees, fell into deep meditation.

Just very faintly, across the most remote portion of her consciousness, there flickered a vague shadow of suspicion. It was scarcely articulate. It had no definite shape or form. But like a small cloud on the horizon it spoilt the complete harmony of her thoughts. Before Richard's return, however, she had recovered the balance of her normal generosity and had driven this little cloud altogether out of her mind. The pieces of holly with their red berries were now adorning the 'Watteau' print and the table was decorated with copper-coloured chrysanthemums, candied ginger, New England grapes and a bottle of California wine.

He arrived at half past six. He was already in better spirits than he had been in for some long while, and the sight of his 'young monk', as he called her, with this festive background gave him a thrill of pleasurable excitement.

They were halfway through their meal, drinking wine and tea in shameless propinquity, and laughing with most keen amusement over what Richard called 'crackers' and she called 'bon-bons', when Catharine broached the subject of Elise's visit and her offer of tickets for that night.

It was only her sense of honour that made her refer to this latter point, as she herself would have greatly preferred to continue, in the quiet of their own ménage, an evening so auspiciously commenced. But her hope was that Richard would, as she said to herself, 'turn the thing down'. Whether it was the California wine, however, or a sudden craving to see his ivory goddess dance her Dionysian dance on this 'night of all nights in the year', he leaped eagerly to meet the suggestion, and at once began to hurry through the rest of the meal.

Catharine was surprised at herself over the vexation which this interruption of their little feast caused her; but she fell in gallantly with his mood and while they were washing up the things together the effort she had been making, ever since Elise first appeared, to be ‘good’ in the whole affair was rewarded by one of those rare inspirations of disinterested happiness which selfish people never know and which are by no means as frequent in the experience of the unselfish as ideal justice would demand.

Thus it happened that when, an hour later, they found themselves seated side by side in the new Stuyvesant Theater there was hardly a more excited or more carefree pair among all that holiday-thrilled Bohemian audience.

The new Stuyvesant was in every respect worthy of the great artist. It had been designed by a young acquaintance of Roger Lamb; Richard and Catharine whispered to each other a mutual recognition, as they looked round them, of the passionate theories of their dead friend now realized for the first time. The decoration was not only simple; it was austere. It was rigid and reserved in a manner suggestive of Byzantine work. There was about it something of that kind of ritualistic imagination which, perhaps erroneously, the modern world has come to name ‘archaic’.

Richard could not help becoming conscious that here, in the middle of this orgy of raw newness, there had been evoked something more suggestive of the passion of the human spirit ransacking the remote past and steering into the unborn future than anything in London or Paris. He recalled Karmakoff’s casual remark about certain affinities between Russia and America; and he whispered to Catharine that Roger Lamb’s idea of a revival of real mythology, of something that was both adventurous and religious, was actually present in what they looked at now.

The dancer’s inevitable black curtains were there; but they were there for the first time as an organic portion of a setting that might have been designed for some ancient classic ritual, some real worship of the Platonic idea of beauty, envisaged as a palpable presence. What the new Stuyvesant represented was preeminently an achievement of youth, of youth coming sternly and resolutely into its own, after the deadly disillusionments of the recent war. The actual fabric of the building itself – its contours, its curves, its nobly designed blank spaces – was all part of a musical rhythm which only reached its consummation when Elise began to dance.

It seemed to both Richard and Catharine that Elise had acquired yet more subtle art since they had last seen her. Her first dance was one to a certain musical fantasy written by a little-known Russian composer who was at that moment coming into fame in Revolutionary Moscow. Richard recognized Karmakoff's influence over the dancer in this choice; and he recognized it without the least touch of jealousy.

There was indeed something about this whole Christmas Eve performance that lifted him as it evidently lifted the girl by his side into a region where personal and possessive instincts had no place. Richard felt ashamed of himself, of his own inadequate and chaotic work, in presence of this achievement. He felt ashamed of himself that he had allowed this thing, this great new creation, to be born without his knowledge. The quiet cynical Roger, the inscrutable Ivan, his own ivory goddess, had together produced something, through the medium of an American boy of whose very name he was ignorant, which put his whole life's intention to shame!

While he had been trying to detach himself from life's flood and to see the mystery in large and flowing outlines, these alien spirits had plunged into the stream and had moulded those evasive waters themselves into vast stern human shapes of exultation and grandeur.

What he recognized as he glanced over that audience of cosmopolitan enthusiasts was that here in this new world, in this turbulent city of youth, was an opportunity for the old human passion for beauty such as the earth had never before known. The crudity and rawness of the crushing materialism around that bold experiment gave it an angry and free power which the very mellowness of more civilized places tended to undermine. But what struck him most of all in that thrilling hour was the amazing anonymity of the whole thing achieved by some unknown boy out of the far west whose youthful receptiveness was that of a reed played upon by the undying spirit of dead generations.

As he watched Elise dancing to a rising crescendo of hidden music, it seemed to him as though the whole architecture of that place, with every curve and space and line and mass and colour which it contained, melted into the rhythm of her movements and became part of the Dionysian passion which she evoked. By a wonderful touch of genius, beyond all his expectations, it seemed as though the youthful architect had allowed for the very audience there, and had given it also a part to play in the resultant harmony.

He experienced the sensation, and he was certain that everyone in the theatre experienced the sensation, of taking an actual part in some passionate ritual, some ritual that was itself a very dithyramb of exultant protest against all that was base, gross, possessive and reactionary amid the forces of the world.

Thus he became more vividly conscious than ever of what he had always vaguely held; namely, that art is not something separate from life, but the premonition, reflected inhuman intelligence, of what nature is perpetually aiming at and never altogether reaching.

Elise danced a much larger variety of motifs than he had ever seen her bring together in one evening. She seemed bent on extracting something congruous to her spirit from the music of every race. Richard noted that there was one insistent mood running through the whole series on that night, a mood that was at once heathen and Christian, rebellious and sensual, yet full of a passionate faith.

In her grand finale the amazing woman certainly surpassed herself. Catharine was so wrought up that she clutched at Richard's hand and held it tightly in her own. An electric thrill of excitement passed like a spiritual vibration through the whole of the excited house.

Richard thought in his heart, This is more than the work of Bernhardt or Eleanora Duse or Yvette Guilbert. This is on a level with Milton or Nietzsche!

When it was all over and the great audience rose to its feet with one wild cry of applause Richard and Catharine raised their hands into the air and shouted, 'Elise!' in the same way no doubt as, at some similar festival, two platonic friends in ancient Hellas might have shouted 'Evoé!' Their cry seemed perfectly natural to the ardent young persons about them, and it was caught up, and echoed from every quarter of the theatre.

At length the ovation was over and the two friends, in a state of tremendous excitement, were carried out with the rest of the crowd into the street. They both felt that they could not see Elise again that night. Even to touch her hand after what she had done for them would have seemed a profanation and banality.

They hardly spoke to each other as they made their way across the centre of New York to their own Seventh Avenue subway.

Before their train arrived at Houston Street, Richard, as was his wont when excited to such a pitch, mentally gathered up into one swift vision all the persons and events of his life's drama. He saw them, these events and these persons, all beautiful, all mysterious, all full of the magic of that Nameless One who, whether he were born child of Semele or child of Mary, had the power to turn the sordid tricks of chance into the music of an exultant rhythm that 'redeemed all sorrows'.

Richard followed the tall languorous figure of his companion up the narrow stairs to their room; and as soon as they stood alone facing one another there they seemed driven by the power of the impersonal emotion within them to gain relief for their feelings in each other's arms. Neither of them could be said to have been more responsible than the other for this disloyalty to Nelly. If anyone was to be held guilty it was the impassioned dancer who had put them both under so irresistible a spell that it seemed to bring with it its own plenary absolution.

The embrace they exchanged at that exalted moment was neither chaste nor unchaste. It was the genius of Elise as it had stirred the soul of the man – rushing to meet the same genius as it had stirred the soul of the woman!

Without any shame or remorse they drew back from one another and resumed their normal mood. And long before the clock in the Metropolitan Tower struck the dawn of Christmas Day the door was shut between them and they were monks again!

Chapter 22

IT WAS EARLY February. In the ditches on both sides of the narrow lane that led up from Selshurst to Furze Lodge the yellow celandines among their great cool leaves shone like stars seen through watery darkness.

In the smaller oak and hazel woods there were already a few early primroses out, throwing upon the moss-scented air of those shadowy places that faint, half-bitter sweetness which seems like the very spiritual body of the spring.

Richard had not wired from Southampton to tell his wife of his arrival, though he had written from New York to let her know the name of the ship. He only prayed that he might be lucky enough to find her alone; and it was this hope that led him to time his appearance to just that particular moment of after-lunch siesta, when it was the custom at Furze Lodge to retire to rest.

He had not been able to resist the temptation to snatch a moment en route in the nave of the familiar cathedral.

The sleeping crusader with the ‘eternally praying hands’ lay there unmoved and unchanged, his mailed feet upon the back of his marble hound.

Arriving straight from the piled-up snow of a great New York blizzard, the warm misty sunshine of the early English spring was like the breath of an amorous and beautiful god; as Richard came out from the cathedral and looked at the yellow and purple crocuses in the ancient gardens, that same indescribable sense of peace descended upon him which he had felt when, nearly a year ago, he had first set his eyes on Selshurst.

As soon as he left the secluded portion of that long West Horthing lane and emerged upon the open Downs he found the air as full of the singing of birds as it had been on the day when he discovered Littlegate. The songs of individual skylarks were lost in one ubiquitous chorus which seemed to descend upon the earth as if it were the voice of universal space, corresponding in the sphere of sound to infinite blueness in the sphere of colour.

His pulses were beating with a good deal more excitement than he had anticipated as he approached the lodge gates of Mrs Shotover's drive. But he felt confident of the result of his interview with his wife.

The flawless beauty of the day seemed an invincible omen of success; and he had in his notebook eight hundred and fifty dollars!

He rang the bell of the front door at precisely half past two o'clock – the hour of all hours when he deemed it most impossible for Mrs Shotover to be in a state of visibility.

He asked, in a purposely low voice, whether he might see Mrs Storm at once and he repeated his name in a whisper. The servant was apparently a stranger for she gave no particular sign of surprise and, ushering him straight into the well-known drawing room, closed the door discreetly behind her. Richard walked up and down in excited perturbation. His mind called up the image of Nelly. He thought of her child, and how it would be born before April was over, or at any rate in the beginning of May – exactly a year since he had first arrived in Sussex.

It would be wonderful to have a child of his own! If it were a girl he could call it after his mother; and if it were a boy, after his father. He was sure Nelly would be willing to leave the name in his hands! He supposed Canyot would have to be its godfather and Mrs Shotover its godmother. About those little matters he could afford to be generous!

How slow she was in coming! Had that confounded maid forgotten to announce him? Perhaps she too was resting, and they were reluctant to disturb her. Well! he could wait. She would probably be up and about before the lady of the house showed herself. He surveyed the teasing knickknacks and the incredible frippery of that early-Victorian shrine. Why was it that young English women in evening dress photographed so badly? He supposed they ought to be 'snapshotted' on the hunting field or in walking costume. They seemed to be all chin and forehead and shoulders and elbows when adorned for civilized intercourse!

Suddenly the door opened. He sprang forward with a cry of recognition on his lips, only to step back in cold dismay at the entrance of Mrs Shotover. The lady closed the door behind her and bowed stiffly.

'I can't think what your purpose can be,' she began, uttering the words very much as some pompous statesman of her youth might have addressed a recalcitrant delegacy, 'in forcing yourself into my house. You don't suppose for a moment, do you, that I can permit you to agitate my dear Eleanor by silly dramatic scenes? She has done with you, sir! Let me make that quite plain: she has done with you and your ill-bred vulgar behaviour.'

'But Mrs Shotover—'

'I won't argue with you. It is bad for me to get angry directly after lunch. Fortunately I had lunch late today because of that idiot of a vet, making such mistakes with Bobby, else I shouldn't have been able to tell you what I think of you.'

'I don't want to argue with you, Mrs Shotover. I want to see Nelly. I want to explain to Nelly that—'

'It's no use, my good man. I can see what you're after. You're after money. You're trying to blackmail us. But let me tell you at once that though I have made your wife my heir and left her everything, it's all tied up so that you cannot touch a penny of it! So there! The best thing you can do is to clear right off, before I am compelled to ring for Thomas.' And the lady with a grand toss of her head opened the door for him, making a vague movement with her hands as if she were about to drive off an intrusive fowl from a precious flowerbed.

Richard stepped out into the hall; but instead of meekly picking up his hat from the hall table he made a sudden bolt up the polished stairs and, arriving at the top where all the bedrooms were, called in loud violent tones the name of his wife.

One of the doors promptly opened and Nelly appeared. She had evidently just removed her dress, for she wore a long soft bedroom gown and her hair was loose about her shoulders.

She turned very white when she saw her husband and leaned against the side of the doorway uttering his name in a tremulous voice as if she had seen a ghost.

He rushed up to her and was about to embrace her when Mrs Shotover who had closely pursued him pushed her way in between them.

The old lady dragged the girl back into her room and held her tightly there with her thin arms, muttering all the while, 'The rascal! the bandit! the highwayman! the scoundrel! I'll have the law on him! Why doesn't Emma come? Where is Thomas?'

Richard, following them into the room, made a desperate appeal to Nelly. 'Send the woman away, sweetheart! Send her away! I must and will talk to you!'

Making a brave effort to gather up all her mental and physical energy, Nelly extricated herself from Mrs Shotover's clutches; turning sternly upon her, she said in a tone that the old lady seemed to recognize as not to be controverted, 'I must see him alone. You must leave us alone, please. You needn’t be afraid. He is my husband. It will not be for long. Go now, dear, and leave us by ourselves.’

Like some eighteenth-century caricature of a defeated Juno, obedient to the commands of an irresistible daughter of Jove, the indignant old woman retreated, muttering vague threats. Nelly closed the door and turned the key in the lock. But she astonished Richard by waving him back when he tried to take her in his arms.

‘My darling! my sweetheart!’ he cried, making a second attempt to embrace her. Again she drew away from him and, wrapping herself closely in her dressing gown, clutched at it as if it had been protecting armour, her hands against her breast.

‘Nelly!’ he whispered with an intensity in his voice that betrayed an emotion which she had never noted in him before.

She looked straight into his eyes. ‘Have you given up that woman?’ she said, repeating the words as if in the presence of some formidable tribunal. ‘Do you promise me that never, under any circumstances, you’ll see her again?’

Richard murmured the word ‘yes’ and added hoarsely, ‘I will never see her again without your consent.’

As soon as those words had been uttered Nelly’s face changed and her whole body seemed to relax and unbend, as if relieved from an unbearable load.

She turned whiter still and, taking her hand away from his, clasped her fingers tightly together while her mouth also compressed itself into an almost hard expression.

‘What do you mean?’ she said.

‘You needn’t look so scared, my dearest one, it’s all over now and thank God there are no complications!’

She bit her underlip; her eyebrows twitched; her fingers clasped one another so violently that they became white as her face.

If one of his demons had whispered into his ear some huge palpable lie at that juncture and had compelled him to utter it, the situation might still have been saved for both of them. But by a cruel irony in things the good in him – if such an instinct for confession was good – drove him so fast that no demon's help arrived.

'You know you told me to look after Catharine?' he said.

A tiny little red spot appeared on both her cheeks, but she only answered by a barely perceptible nod.

'Well, I did take care of her.' He gave a little uneasy laugh. 'And she took care of me. In fact we lived together in Charlton Street right up to the end. She slept in your room and I slept in the sitting room. We were always good – like two monks – and I left her much happier when I came away.

'Elise Angel is teaching her to dance; and I've no wish to see her again, any more than I want to see—'

The figure upon the bed sat up absolutely erect, like a lovely image of judgement. Her eyes were blazing with anger. She tried twice to speak, the indignation within her strangling the words. Then at last in a low cold frozen tone, 'I can't stand it. This is the end. I must ask you to go away at once please. You can write to me and I will answer your letters. But this is the end of everything between us. I can't live with you any more, Richard. Will you go quickly, please? No! No! Don't touch me! I can't bear it. I suppose you don't want to drive me insane, do you? No! No! I must ask you to go at once. Now – quickly! Before they come to answer this!'

And in a sort of panic terror lest he should touch her, she flung up her hand and pulled violently at the bell rope which hung above her bed.

But he did not attempt to touch her after that: he did not utter one single word. A kind of dizziness came over him and a dull knocking in his brain like the knocking of the hammer of fate. He heard the bell she had rung resound loudly in some room below. Like a man who has been shot through the heart but still retains his consciousness, he mechanically unlocked the door, opened it quickly, ran down the stairs and was out of the house and halfway down the drive before the shapes and figures of the external world renewed themselves in his brain.

Once clear of the Furze Lodge premises, his first mad flight, like the flight of Christian from the City of Destruction or like Adam from the gates of Paradise, subsided into a shambling and weary shuffle.

He became irritatingly aware of two little subordinate annoyances, which vexed him out of all proportion; vexed him as an exhausted patient after an operation might be vexed by a buzzing fly: he had left both his hat and his stick in Mrs Shotover's hall.

He missed his stick the worst of the two losses, as he never went out without it, and the absence of it gave him a most unpleasant feeling, as if he were disarmed, humiliated, not properly himself, and exposed to universal ridicule.

He missed his hat, because the sun was hot with that peculiar heavy relaxing heat of a warm day in February.

With slow, bewildered and drifting steps he made his way down the lane till it led across the open Downs. Other emotions began to succeed that first sense of blackness and the knocking of a great hammer inside his skull. He found himself making a kind of articulate appeal to his unborn child, crying upon it to intervene and soften its mother's harshness. He had the sensation of the child being actually conscious, and of its stretching out its arms to him, while Nelly sternly repressed it and forced it to be still.

Then out of the depths of his wretchedness his pride rose to the surface; and as he walked he pulled himself together and ceased shuffling and dragging his feet. He no longer held his mouth open like a panting dog. His eyes lost something of their hunted animal look.

Very gravely, knowing perfectly well what he did, he cursed the possessive instinct in women, their savage jealousy, their insatiable vindictiveness.

She can never have really loved me, he thought; not as I have loved her. It must have been a kind of infatuation. Otherwise she couldn't treat me like this – after I told her everything; after I promised to give up everyone!

It did not at that moment occur to him that compared with his own 'love', which was simple physical desire compounded with pure affection, her love was one of the vast terrible tragic forces quite beyond the balances of good and evil, which spring up out of the deepest levels of nature. It did not occur to him that if she had loved him less, she would have shown more generosity. He was in fact unconsciously comparing her primitive indignation not with his own masculine tenderness but with that 'love of the saints' which neither men nor women are often permitted to reach: the love that forgives – not out of a lower intensity of feeling but out of a deeper intensity. An emotion of that sort was as far beyond his own reach as it was beyond hers; thus when his pride began to rise to the surface, mingled with a bitter sensual memory of how beautiful she had looked in her anger, he found it possible to curse her as he strode forward.

I am alone again, he thought within his heart, alone, alone, alone! I'll go straight back to Paris – Paris that is wise and indulgent, Paris that has always understood me ... To be quite alone in the world, to fight for one's own hand, that is the only thing! I'll have a flat in the rue des Arts; and I'll know no living soul except gamins and grisettes. Damn these good women!

They have hearts of marble. To be absolutely alone in the world, that is the thing! To love nothing but beauty! All these women, every one of them, are ready to destroy everything, to murder everything, in order to possess, to possess!

But this first mood of his did not last long. His wife’s fragile loveliness haunted him and the memory of how she had yielded to his kisses remained as a thing that troubled his blood. The image of her standing in that doorway, the familiar outlines of her figure changed by the presence of their child, came between him now and every curve and contour of the chalk hills around him.

As he grew weary with walking in that relaxing heat, his pride ebbed completely away. He had cursed her once; but he never cursed her after that. ‘Nelly, my love, my darling, my true love!’ he cried aloud.

More and more exhausted did he grow; there came a real humming and hammering in his brain and a sickening sense of dizziness. He had been too excited to do more than swallow a cup of tea that morning and he had eaten nothing. It was now well on in the afternoon.

By the time he reached the point where the open Downs lost themselves in the alluvial plain at their foot, he was so faint that it was with a deliberate and conscious effort that he took each individual step.

At length he stood still and looked hopelessly round. ‘I can’t do it,’ he muttered. ‘I can’t do it.’

He sank down on the ground and rested for a few minutes. Then he got up again and tried once more; but the brief rest seemed to have made his legs weaker than ever and his head dizzier. ‘Damn!’ he muttered in a fit of childish irritation and tears of sheer physical exhaustion came into his eyes.

He looked back along the path by which he had come and forward towards the valley, hoping that some kind of cart or wagon might be in sight, which would help him to reach a farmhouse or a village.

The long white perspective of the empty chalk track offered no trace of any living or moving object.

He left the path then, and staggered across a ploughed field to where a high hedge of hawthorn and holly completely blocked his eastern view.

Reaching this hedge he sank down on the bank beneath it and gave himself up to a comatose acquiescence in whatever might befall.

Several hours passed over his head and the sun sank below a mass of clouds. It began to grow cold and damp; the inherent chilliness of the rain-soaked February earth making itself felt as soon as the heat of the sun was withdrawn.

Feeling very cold at last, for he had no overcoat, Richard managed to crawl through a hole in the thickset hedge into the field beyond.

The moment he tottered to his feet on the further side he knew where he was; the knowledge came to him with a sharp and bitter stab.

He was looking down into Nelly's Happy Valley, the very place where he had first made love to her!

He sat down again and with his arms round his knees gazed dreamily at the gorse bushes and the last year's bracken.

Another hour passed away while he sat there; staring patiently down upon the scene of that lovemaking of nearly a year ago.

Suddenly he saw a figure coming along the bottom of the valley, carrying some object in his hand.

Richard was roused at once to something like a flicker of hope. Well did he know that figure and what he carried! It was Robert Canyot with his easel frame and paint box returning after a day on the Downs. With a warm breath of reviving hope the thought crossed his mind – Canyot will explain to her. She will listen to him. It never occurred to his dizzy and exhausted brain that there was anything fantastic in thus begging his rival to act as his intermediary with his wife. There was something about Canyot that inspired this insane sort of confidence and Richard had always been careless and childish, if not blunt and insensitive, in matters of this kind.

He struggled to his feet and shouted wildly, waving his arms.

The young man's astonishment at the sound of his voice was obvious even at that distance but he saw him carefully put down the things he carried under a gorse bush and come striding up the hill towards him.

'How damnably faint I feel!' Richard said to himself. 'I pray I shan't collapse before I've sent him off to her!'

He sat down again to await the painter's arrival, drawing each breath with conscious deliberation, lest the dizziness which hovered over him should intervene before he made his appeal.

He remained seated when at last Canyot stood over him leaning on his stick.

'So you've come,' was the young man's laconic remark.

'Yes, I've come,' responded Richard. 'But I'm feeling damned ill at this moment. You haven't got any brandy on you, have you?'

Canyot shook his head.

'You look rather queer,' he muttered. 'You'd better come and stay the night with me. Do you think you can walk? You look awfully shaky.'

'Never mind how I look,' said Richard hurriedly. 'It's only want of food. I've been up there, Canyot. I've been up there and I've seen her. But I told her everything, you know, and she got very angry and sent me off. She sent me off, Robert, after I'd sworn that I wouldn't speak to Elise again.'

'What do you want me to do?' said Canyot suddenly.

Richard looked confused and miserable. A sort of hangdog expression of dilapidated helplessness came into his face.

‘How did you know I wanted you to do anything?’ he said with the ghost of a smile.

Canyot chuckled grimly. ‘Pretty obvious!’ he remarked. ‘You don’t shout to a fellow like that just for fun.’

‘Yes, Robert,’ Richard pleaded, fixing his eyes desperately upon him. ‘I do want you to do something. I want you to go straight to Nelly – now, at once – and make her understand that I will be faithful to her, after this, for the rest of my life.’

‘How can she trust you?’ retorted the young man.

‘I love no one else,’ said Richard in a low voice.

Robert Canyot looked at him closely. ‘It is an agreement between us?’ he said. ‘Between you and me?’

Richard nodded and held out his hand.

‘Very well,’ muttered the other after their hands had met. ‘I’ll go. I tried to get her to divorce you, but she wouldn’t. She loves you, I suppose, God help her!’ He gave a harsh little laugh. ‘I’ll go,’ he added, ‘but for heaven’s sake, stay exactly where you are, so that I know where to find you! I’ll be back in a couple of hours anyway. And look here, eat some of this.’ Fumbling in his pocket he handed Richard a piece of cheese wrapped up in tissue paper. ‘You look most confoundedly ill,’ he said suddenly, as he prepared to force his way through the hedge; ‘I hope you’re not going to kick the bucket or anything, while I’m gone? Maybe after all I’d better get a cart for you from Littlegate before anything else. ‘Richard’s look of blank despair at this suggestion decided him, however, to do what he had promised.’ After all,’ he called back to him, as he forced a path through the hedge, ‘West Horthing is as near as Littlegate and I can get a trap or something for you there! But you shall sleep with me tonight, whatever happens, and we’ll have a talk. Don’t move from where you are!’

Left to himself again Richard tried his best to eat the piece of cheese. The taste of it nauseated him. ‘Oh, for just one drink of water,’ he moaned aloud. As if in mocking answer to his prayer, the heavy clouds which had been working up with the growing darkness from where the sun had sunk, now burst over his head in torrents of rain.

He crept closer to the hedge for shelter; but the rain fell in such heavy floods that the hedge itself was soon penetrated through and through, and the continuous dripping from it became almost worse than facing the storm in the open. The man remained crouching there, his head whirling with strange wild thoughts, alternately full of hope and hopelessness.

At length, with a tremendous effort, he gulped down the cheese in three rapid mouthfuls. It nearly made him vomit, but his thirst was now partly quenched by the rain which drifted across his face and trickled down his cheeks. Although he found himself shivering with cold he began to feel stronger and less faint. His dizziness was as a matter of fact rapidly giving way to feverishness; and the more the fever grew upon him the more exalted and less wretched his mood became.

He must have remained under that hedge about half an hour when he became conscious of a melancholy bleating carried on the wind towards him from across the Downs.

Over and over again he heard it; and at last its reiteration got upon his nerves.

He rose up, stiff and shivering, from his huddled position, and listened intently. Yes – it came from the direction of West Horthing and it was quite different from the ordinary sound of a sheepfold. It was the cry of a solitary animal in great distress.

He crept through the hedge by the same hole he had come by, and when he rose to his feet on the other side he recognized that Canyot’s bit of cheese had considerably restored to him his powers of movement. ‘It was simply want of food,’ he said to himself. ‘What an idiot I was!’

It was almost completely dark. The driving rain, lashing against his face, was like the palpable force of some huge hostile elemental being.

He heard that pitiful bleating very clearly now, and he made his way across the ploughland, a little northward of where he had come, until he reached the turf of the Downs.

He could see no more than a few yards in front of him, but the bleating sound was so clear a guide that he had only, as it seemed to him, stumbled up the slope of the hill about a hundred yards when he came upon the cause of it.

He found himself in collision with some low wooden railings. Leaning over these he made out a shimmering whiteness below and then a grey level circle into which the rain hissed, water falling upon water. He had been long enough in Sussex to know exactly what he had found. It was one of those mysteriously constructed dew-ponds upon the secret of which whole books had been written, none of which really solved the problem of how the thing was made.

The books agreed upon one point, that whatever the secret of these places was, it had been totally lost.

There were no new dew-ponds. The circular basin upon which Richard now gazed through the darkness was about twenty feet in diameter. The whiteness which struck his eye was the slippery sloping surface of the pond’s steep banks, made up of chalky mud.

In the summer such a place was the resort for all manner of Down birds, such as the wheatear and the whinchat, and at all seasons those banks were trodden into slippery mud by the great sheep flocks that came there to drink.

Richard remembered how Nelly’s father had once brought him to one of these places, perhaps to the very one he was now scanning, and how the old naturalist had pointed out to him the great orange-bellied water lizards or newts, as they basked in the June heat at the top of the water.

Richard remembered lying once on his back below the circle of those banks, just a few days before they sailed for America, and how he had loved the effect of the white chalk against the blue sky.

He knew very well now, as he waited to make out exactly where that pitiful cry came from, what was the matter down there. It was some luckless sheep that had slipped down in the rain and darkness and was now imprisoned by those slippery banks.

It was some while before he could locate its exact position. When he did so he lost no time in sliding down the slope and in wading through the water until he got hold of the woolly derelict.

To get hold of it was one thing, however; to get it out of the pond was another matter.

Desperate were Richard’s struggles to get the animal up those slippery banks. With the rain hissing into the pond below him and lashing his face in driving gusts as the wind whirled it round within that enclosed circle, he pulled and tugged and wrestled with that bleating mass of drenched wool until at last, with a superhuman effort, he got it safely over the brink.

He placed the thing on its feet, pushed it under the railings and clambered over them himself.

To his annoyance and surprise, instead of trotting off as he had expected, the animal fell over on its side, uttering once more a long-drawn pitiful bleat.

Now it became clear that either in its own struggles to escape, or in his struggles to help it, the unfortunate beast had broken or seriously injured one of its legs.

Richard sat down beside the bleating sheep and uttered a wild laugh. He lifted up his face to the sky and was met by the whirling downpour of merciless rain. He began to be alarmed lest Canyot's two hours should have passed and the young man, returning with some conveyance, should find him gone.

With this thought in his mind he took a few steps down the slope of the hill in the direction he fancied the ploughland to commence. But the miserable bleating of the wretched sheep, apparently realizing its desertion, brought him to a standstill. No! He could not leave it there – even to meet the messenger who brought the deciding of his fate.

Hurrying back to where the creature lay, he stood regarding it, uttering once more a wild chuckling laugh.

The fever in his veins was running high by this time, giving him an unnatural strength. His one instinct was to convey this animal to some sort of shelter, if it were only the inadequate shelter of that hawthorn hedge! Once there, if Canyot came with some kind of conveyance, both himself and the sheep could be rescued together.

If Canyot came!

On Canyot's appearance, with the message he brought, everything in the world at that moment seemed to depend.

'Nelly, my darling!' These words seemed to the man who uttered them aloud into the wind and rain, to issue from some other being than himself – some stronger, braver, nobler being at whose imperious bidding the shivering exhausted wretch who called himself Richard was now compelled to act.

He bent down, and after two or three hopeless struggles he succeeded in getting the sheep upon his back, its belly round his neck and its feet held tightly in both his hands.

Burdened thus, and swaying under the creature's weight, he staggered down the slope in the direction in which he supposed the hawthorn hedge to lie.

As he went, with the rain whirling round him as if the darkness itself were one great river of water, all manner of strange ideas passed through his mind. It seemed to him as though he were carrying on his back the burden of his great unfinished poem, the poem which he had so often changed in character – and which had now taken the form of a sheep!

Then it seemed to him as if he were arguing with Nelly's father about the existence of God. It seemed as though God too, like his poetry, had turned into a heavy woolly sheep that bleated pitifully into his ear.

Then he suddenly, thought of Karmakoff the Russian; and he imagined himself putting the question to him as to whether they would have slaughter houses in an ideal state!

And he thought of Elise dancing, dancing on the edge of a great grey sea swept by hurricanes of rain …

He knew he must be getting near the hedge, because of the feel of ploughed-up land under his feet. It was just then that he stumbled and bent low under the weight he carried and something seemed to snap in his heart.

After that he saw nothing at all – nothing but darkness, dense black rainy darkness, that seemed full of bleating cries, cries, that called upon him for help.

'All right! It's all right!' Was it he who uttered those words?

Something pricked his face. The hedge! The hedge!

He stumbled to the ground beneath its shelter, and fell heavily down with the animal above him.

The next thing he was conscious of was the sensation of something burning being poured down his throat and of a swinging lantern. With one last desperate effort he forced his eyelids to open against a weight like lead.

‘I – can’t – get – my breath,’ he gasped. ‘Does she forgive me?’

‘She loves you,’ said Robert Canyot.

The look of unutterable happiness that spread over Richard’s face, as the lantern flickered upon it, remained to the end of the painter’s life the best return he ever obtained for a love that had learned to be unpossessive.

The head of the dead man fell back upon the living body of the sheep. And so it was that the moment most unalloyed by critical self-consciousness in all the experience of the author of the Life of Verlaine was that moment which, in human speech, it is the custom to refer to as his last.

Canyot, using his one arm with well-calculated effect, lifted the man and the sheep upon the cart he had brought from Furze Lodge. The weight of both the living and the dead was heavy upon him as he drove towards Littlegate through the darkness. She killed him because she loved him, he thought. Well! She will have his child; and I shall have – my work!

The Owl, The Duck and — Miss Rowe! Miss Rowe!

HOWLS OF PRISONERS from behind the bars of the Old Market Prison, with its tall sham-Gothic Clock Tower, used sometimes to enter the narrow opening of Patchin Place. Another disturbing sound, less terrifying than this, but sufficiently formidable, was the rumble of the Elevated Railway, under whose mitigated thunder all the old three-storey houses on both sides of the little blind-alley used to shiver and shake. Growing upwards, from their roots in dusty ground outside these houses, rose several tall ailanthus trees, whose branches, in cold, clear, April weather, were now just beginning to put forth their large greenish-yellow buds.

It was in three little rooms, constituting what was always described as ‘Top Floor Front, Number Four’, that a group of Persons lived, two of whom were human, two Divine, one an apparition, several inanimate, and two again only half-created.

The largest of these rooms was called by its human inhabitants ‘The Living Room’ and by its other inhabitants ‘The Known World’. The one next in size, with a window upon the alley, was humanly known as ‘The Alcove’ and otherwise known as ‘Paradise’; while a small dark chamber, full of empty boxes and a mass of un-wanted litter, which the human tenants innocently named ‘The Ante-room’, was designated by the Other People of the place who understood reality better, by the brief and tragic syllable ‘Hell’.

With these Other People of that Top Floor Front, a day was like a week of light; and a night was like a week of darkness; so that the dramatic events which I now proceed to unfold must be regarded as occurring in parallel dimensions of existence.

The human inhabitants of this Top Floor, the ones who persisted in their habit of calling Paradise ‘The Alcove’ and Hell ‘The Ante-room’, were an old man and an old woman.

They were both aged circus people and it was only by the influence of a very rich benefactor that they were pensioned by the authorities instead of being turned out of the Top Flat long ago and put into a ‘Home’.

The one fate they both dreaded worse than death was this ‘Home’. This ‘Home’ presented itself to them in exactly the same light — or absence of light — as the chamber which they called ‘The Ante-room’ presented itself to the Other People; and they never heard the cries of the prisoners from the end of the alley without a deep shudder; for these cries made them think of the ‘Home’.

It was the custom of the old man, who thought the old woman was far deafer than he was, to turn his contorted face away and fumble with something on the mantelpiece when the wind brought this particular sound. It was also the custom of the old woman, who was sure the old man was far deafer than she was, to retreat behind the screen, which protected her kitchen stove, and rattle her pots and pans when she heard this sound, hoping in this manner to prevent the old man from hearing it. Thus both of them imagined that they kept the thought of the ‘Home’ from troubling the mind of the other one.

The oldest of all the People in the Known World was the Stuffed Owl.

This dignitary had been shot in the wilds of Virginia by a hump-back, who, in this way, both asserted his mutilated humanity and obtained for his lonely life a soft, silent, and watchful companion.

But the hump-back had proved at last, in a way even more irrefutable than by shooting an owl, his similarity to normal persons. He had died as lonely as he had lived and at his death the great, wise, silent, hook-beaked creature had been brought to the Top Floor Front. Here it stood in motionless state, glancing grimly sometimes at the old man and sometimes indulgently at the old woman, but keeping its dark, wild, pessimistic gaze fixed without more interruption at the corner of the screen, round which he always seemed to expect the reappearance of his assassin and friend.

On the left hand side of the mantelpiece there stood erect, with its round enquiring eyes, its out-stretched neck, its flat yellow beak, all a-gog for what was going on, a beautiful white china Duck.

Under ordinary conditions nothing could have exceeded the quietness and patience — although full enough of natural curiosity — of the Duck's speculative gaze. But the life of the Duck had not been allowed to be ordinary. And alas! it was not fate that had prevented this. Nor was it any exterior accident. Nor was it the malignity of Chance. The power that disturbed the serene speculation of the Duck's placid curiosity arose from beneath its own smooth white feathers! The Duck had a passion, a craving, a vice, an obsession, a mania. This madness in the Duck was nothing less than a poignant longing to touch with his yellow beak the polished and provocative flesh of young-lady dolls. Ordinary dolls were nothing to the Duck. Comic dolls, vulgar dolls, baby dolls, grotesque dolls, paper dolls, theatrical dolls were positively repugnant to the Duck. But a young-lady doll, and the more quiet, the more refined, the more aristocratic the young lady was, the more unbounded was the creature's desire, ravished the Duck, and turned his poor maudlin wits into curds and whey.

Thus was a happy and peaceful existence turned into a worried, anxious, fretted, teased and restless existence. The Duck would certainly have broken up the smooth current of his normal curiosity by Desire alone, so intense it was, even had there been no particular object for its thirsty craving. But an object was brought to the Duke. Fate or Chance brought it and they must share a little in the guilt of the poor bird's plight. One or other of these celestial-infernal Powers caused it to come to pass that the most beautiful young-lady doll that has ever existed in the world, and by far the most aristocratic, came to live with the old man and the old woman in the Known World. How she came, or what brought her; whether she came by natural means or by supernatural means; mattered nothing to the Duck. One day, as he was casually, after his fashion, satisfying his serene curiosity by observing the general stream of the universe, there was Olwen, and from that time forward all his life became one long Longing.

Olwen was indeed more than a young lady. She was a Princess. Her slender legs — to begin with what agitated the Duck most pitifully — were the legs of a Princess; her long graceful arms were the arms of a Princess. Round her wrists she wore lace cuffs. Lace also — and one glimpse of this lace brought the Duck nigh to swooning — adorned her Princess' drawers. But if these remoter graces were ravishing to the enamoured bird, never, under the smoky ceiling of the Known World had he beheld anything as lovely as her face. Those blue eyes, that dainty nose, that exquisite chin, the tilt of that proud little head, those tresses of dusky brown — all these were more than could be borne. The Duck could only stare and stare, until the particular round eye, which was at the moment the favoured one — for the nature of birds forbids a double-sighted vision — came near to melting quite away under the rapture of such a sight.

It was the old man who used sometimes to peer into Olwen's face — for Olwen was the Princess' name — as she lay on their bed, turned for the day into a decent couch, with her brown head on a little special white pillow, and mutter to himself, 'Olwen looks sad,' or 'Olwen wants a change.' At these times he would take her up very carefully, between his finger and thumb, his old hand shaking sadly, and deposit her by the side of the Duck upon the mantelpiece. ‘Olwen likes to sit by the Duck,’ the old man would then say to the old woman and never was there such a wispy, straw-like ‘Pshaw! pshaw!’ as the old woman then breathed, from over the top of her sewing-basket; as much as to say, ‘Girls will be girls and old men will be old men. Don’t disturb my embroidery!’

There was no bathroom at that epoch in the Known World; so that when the old woman decided to give the old man a bath it became necessary to open the ante-room door and take therefrom a small tin bath and very large bath-rug. On these occasions — for the windows of the Known World faced East — a thin stream of April sunshine entered and illuminated, for the space of a few seconds, the thick darkness of Hell!

In Hell, propped up against an old, black, disused kitchen stove — a very Devil’s Cauldron — and supported on two weak legs, for the other two were missing, stood, or rather leaned, a noble, melancholy, wooden white horse. This was Falada. It was the old man who had found Falada. He had found him in Limbo — otherwise in one of the great Garbage Receptacles at the entrance of the alley — and he had brought him, with tottering steps and tapping stick, up the two flights of narrow stairs into the Known World.

He had stood him up at first on the chest of drawers leaning against the large mirror; but the old woman had the peculiarity — common to many scrupulous housewives — of disliking what she was wont to describe as ‘everything mixed up’. This peculiarity was often bewildering to the old man, who in his early days had been a clown and had been accustomed to confusion; but since the old woman still presented herself to his eyes as the lovely young dancer whose least whim was his law, he uttered no audible complaint when Falada, who had for half a day just managed to survive the intolerable litter of Limbo, was now placed in Hell.

It was in Paradise — though she persisted in calling it 'The Alcove' — that the old woman made her toilet. There was her dressing table. There was her jewel case. There were her precious bottles of lavender-water. There were her fragrant pots of cold-cream. The old man was not encouraged — indeed more than once he was vehemently discouraged — in the venture of entering Paradise. But he knew, and the Other People of the Known World also knew, that side by side with her jewel-case the Ex-Dancer of 'The Cimmerian Troupe' kept upon her dressing-table a little Ten-Cent statue of the Mother of God. The aged Clown had long ago ceased to believe in God and why this stiff little image of His Mother should have affected him as it did was one of the mysteries of Paradise; but whether by reason of the bottles of lavender-water and the pots of cold-cream whose perfumes impregnated that sacred Recess, or by reason of old association — for in her youth the lovely dancer had sometimes received him in her tiring-room — any glimpse he could steal of this glassy-glazed, sky-blue statuette, softened the asperities and privations of his life. Stern and stony was the expression on the face of this statuette in Paradise; but sometimes the old clown fancied to himself that it was aware that a very aged atheist was fascinated by it and more than once he got a wicked satisfaction by imagining 'the Authorities' confronted by that Divine severity!

It was into Paradise that on certain occasions Princess Olwen herself was conveyed by the old woman and carefully deposited, without the loss of one of her little shoes, upon the top of a great wooden chest that stood there. This chest had belonged to no less a personage than an Admiral of the Navy, a great-uncle of Long Ago, who had been kind to the Dancer in her girlhood. It was when 'the Authorities' visited the Known World that this removal took place; the old woman feeling reluctant to permit the unsympathetic eye of such mundane persons to be cast for a single second upon this beautiful creature.

And it was a wonder to the old man — who was so often put to the blush by the old woman's 'Pshaw! pshaw!' when he placed Olwen on the mantelpiece — to note how tenderly the old woman handled the doll when she did this; tenderly and yet with a kind of petulant crossness; very much, in fact, in the way she handled him, when she washed his back or trimmed his beard or cut the finger-nails of his right hand.

It might have been supposed that the presence of that sky-blue statuette in Paradise was enough of the god-like to satisfy everybody in the Known World; but such was not the case.

Both the old couple and the Other People were conscious of two additional supernatural Powers. One of these was a minute image, only two inches high, of the great Chinese sage, Kwang-tze. This image of Kwang, who in his lifetime taught men and animals and birds and trees and fishes to worship nothing but the mysterious Tao, had become, by reason of the mythological aura of the Known World, a god in its own right. Nor was the great little god Kwang companionless at his end of the chimney-piece. By his side — but without a head — stood an image of Lao-tze. The headlessness of Laotze was due to the wrath of the old woman; for once, in putting Olwen with his shaky hand upon the Duck's side of the chimney-piece, the old man dropped one of the Princess' shoes into the fender. It was then that the old woman, trembling with indignation, had avenged herself upon all men and upon all philosophers in one fatal swing of her arm. Thus did Lao-tze lose his head. But in a miracle of masculine philosophy, beyond the powers of angry female understanding, Lao-tze, although deprived of the organ of rationality still continued to philosophize, as was evident from every fold of his dignified robe.

It was the image of Kwang, however, which, in a faded yellow garment, represented the attribute of Divinity in the Known World. All the Other People glanced reverently at that little figure in dirty yellow; and it was only a vein of ferocious cynicism in his feathered heart that prevented the Owl himself from murmuring a reluctant ‘Help me, O Kwang!’ when the old woman, approaching him with a duster, outraged beyond endurance his dark, philosophic, Saturnian soul.

Such were the Human, the Inanimate, the godlike inhabitants of the Top Floor Front. But Divinity and Humanity, even with the Inanimate superadded do not exhaust the Possible Categories of Being. There were moments when the Duck upon the chimney-piece, Olwen upon the couch, the Owl upon the book-case, and even two-legged Falada in Hell, were wont to cry aloud in a thin, wild, wistful voice, ‘Miss Rowe! Miss Rowe! Miss Rowe!’ These outbursts of pitiful invocation usually accompanied one of those terrible visits of ‘the Authorities’, which always left the old woman in hysterics and the old man white as Olwen’s cuffs and trembling as the ailanthus buds in the wind. For what ‘the Authorities’ invariably did, before they went thump, thump, curse, spit and clatter, down the narrow stairs, was to remark in harsh, derisive tones. ‘The “Home” is the place for people like you! They’ll fix you up all right in the “Home”.’

It must not be supposed that ‘the Authorities’ were so lacking in all artistic instinct as to repeat this sentiment, on every visit, in exactly the same words. The burden of their message was the same, but its expression differed on diverse occasions. Sometimes they would say, ‘You two will learn to Sign on the Dotted Line in the “Home”,’ and at other times they would say, with no less Caesarean brevity, ‘You two, once in the “Home”, will have to toe the Line; and don’t you forget it!’

The Voices of ‘the Authorities’ were as terrible to the Other People in the Known World as they were to the old man and the old woman. They could not understand the meaning of the words; but the repetition of the syllable ‘Home’ struck them as something mysteriously dreadful; and as for the word ‘Line’, they associated it with the remote thunder that shook the whole house when any Elevated train passed by.

There was a large mirror at the end of the room facing the window; and on the chest of drawers below this mirror the old couple had placed a big glass Fish with its mouth wide open. This Fish had been a present to the old woman from the old man on the occasion of their Golden Wedding Day; and next to Olwen herself it was regarded by them both with the greatest reverence. If the word ‘Home’ terrified the old man, to the open-mouthed Fish these words meant something too awful for contemplation, something ichthyophagous, such as an iron kettle of fish or a diabolical fish-hook.

The general cry that went up from the Known World over the hysterical form of the old woman on the bed and the white face of the old man on his stiff knees beside her — that pitiful cry of ‘Miss Rowe! Miss Rowe!’ — had its origin in the fact that there used to live in the Top Floor Front, before the present occupants drifted in, an illusive, enigmatic lady, tall, thin and under-nourished, called ‘Miss Rowe’. Miss Rowe was not her real name. Her real name was a deep historical secret, like the name of the ‘Man in the Iron Mask’; but it was as ‘Miss Rowe’ that she came to the rescue of all the dogs, cats, birds, and other harmless creatures, whether animate or inanimate, who had no one else to take pity upon them!

The placid sky-blue statuette in the Alcove and the dirty-yellow image of the great little god Kwang by the side of the headless Lao-tze, were the only Persons, in that Upper Room of Number Four, who did not join in this pitiful cry of ‘Miss Rowe! Miss Rowe!’

Days passed by over the old couple — they were weeks to the Other People — without the uplifting of this solemn invocation. Fortunately ‘the Authorities’ restricted their visits — they doubtless had other candidates for their ‘Home’ — to certain particular days. Had these days, which were marked, not in the Catholic but in the Commercial Calendar, been more frequent than they were, the old couple, in spite of the presence of the Statuette in the Alcove and of Kwang on the mantelpiece, would doubtless, like many other odd couples in our energetic Civilization, have turned on the gas and laid themselves down to die.

As it was, they just dragged on, from day to day of their own dimension in Time, and from week to week of the Other People’s; stopping up their old ears against the periodic howls from the Prison, moving Olwen carefully into Paradise during the dreaded visitations, and bringing her back — when ‘the Authorities’ had thumped, cursed, spat and clattered themselves off — still more carefully, into the Known World.

Miss Rowe had been very thin in her life, as thin as she had been kind, and her wraith must have been thin in proportion, thin beyond all wraiths ever recorded in history, for it was never permitted to the old couple, with their feeble human eyesight, ever to catch sight of her; whereas the Duck had seen her once, the Owl had seen her three times, and the Fish saw her quite clearly every time she answered their desperate cry.

But although the wraith of Miss Rowe was thin and faint, there were moments in the life of the Known World when yet fainter Existences manifested themselves. Two Beings if they could be called Beings whose hold upon life was much more tenuous than the frailest human ghost — flitted every now and then from couch to chair, from screen to window, from door to fireplace.

No one perceived them except Olwen, and she only perceived them when her attention was freed for a while from the Duck's yellow beak and from the Fish's open mouth.

They were not elves, or ghosts, or elementals, these Two Beings. They were not sylphs or salamanders or undines. That they should have existed in the Known World at all only proved that the philosophy of the Owl was correct when he made it clear to the Duck by irrefutable logic that at every known point in space thousands of unknown dimensions meet and overlap.

These Two Beings, although so tenuous and although only visible to the dreamy stare of a romantic doll, had names of their own. They had also feelings of their own; feelings that were always bewildered and not infrequently seriously hurt.

These Beings were Lord Tormentil and Lady Potentilla.

Like other existences in the Known World — as the Owl had been explaining to the Duck for years — Lord Tormentil and Lady Potentilla were not causes of themselves. They had an undeniable First Cause.

Their First Cause was Miss Fells.

Miss Fells had inhabited the Top Floor Front before Miss Rowe. She was a voluminous writer of Romances and there still remained at the bottom of the Admiral's chest a fragment, two or three obscure pages only, of fast fading pencil-scrawls, that had been overlooked when Miss Fells, who was as small as she was aristocratic, had been carried out in her tiny coffin.

Lord Tormentil was a cripple and Lady Potentilla was a High Church woman of strict piety; but their First Cause — the creative genius of Miss Fells — had made them to be passionate lovers. She had, however, placed between their love and their happiness a deep grievance. This grievance lay in the fact that Lord Tormentil was a dogmatic Materialist. To the searching intelligence of Lord Tormentil everything outside the Known World was ‘Tommy Rot’. It was not clear from the few last pencil-scrawls on Miss Fells’ manuscript whether this trouble between these noble lovers was destined to culminate in tragedy or find a happy solution. She may have intended that Lord Tormentil should hear a Voice; or that Lady Potentilla should see a Light; but Miss Fells had departed leaving this solution to posterity, or to the same Limbo from which Falada had been saved!

One thing is certain — a credulous bewilderment used to come at moments over the bold, shrewd mind of Lord Tormentil and a sceptical weakness, amounting to a feeling of forlorn futility, would sometimes cloud the expressive lineaments of Lady Potentilla. When these moods came on, neither of these Two Beings, fumbling about on the twilight edge between Existence and Non-Existence, knew what they were or where they were. Their First Cause had left both their character and their destiny frayed, ragged, blurred and indistinct.

The confusion would have been more pitiable, however, if Olwen had not been watching them! Olwen knew nothing and cared less about philosophical questions. She would always fall into a young girl’s dream of White Horses and Disguised Princes, the moment the Owl began to speak. To the mind of Olwen, therefore, it was enough that a sad nobleman and a stately gentlewoman were deeply in love. And thus the attention of Olwen kept these two half-created ones in some sort of ambiguous ‘Status Quo’. Created by the most gentle and the most aristocratic of authors, they were preserved from dissolving into Nonentity by the interest of the most romantic of dolls!

‘Owl of Roanoke’, said a plaintive voice one day when the old man, in placing Olwen by the Duck’s side, had placed her so that the Duck could only see a fragment of her lovely face; ‘Owl of Roanoke’, said the Duck, ‘can Love be satisfied by the sight of ladies’ profiles?’

‘Duck of Dirty Ditch,’ replied the Owl morosely, ‘Love can never be satisfied; and since that is the case, and every pleasure is relative, between the two extremes of catching a glimpse of a vanishing tail-feather and of swallowing the Loved One whole, it is wise to enjoy whatever contact it may be, however limited, that chance bestows on us.’

‘Chance?’ cried the inquisitive and amorous Duck, ‘What is chance?’

It was at this point in the conversation that the Fish intervened.

‘Allow me, your Worship,’ said the Fish hurriedly, ‘allow me to answer this infatuated fool’s ridiculous question. Chance, you lily-white idiot, is a mere human word, unworthy of gills or beaks. All that happens is due to the in-breathing and out-breathing of the Great White Whale. That the old man put you where you can only see that pretty wench’s profile was the will of Him that Spouteth forever. There is no other cause of anything that happens; there never was; there never will be. The White Whale wills the Good. The White Whale wills the Evil. Blesséd and cursed be the name of the White Whale!’

It was the Princess Olwen herself who spoke now. Her beautiful eyes were fixed upon the capacious mouth of the fatalistic Fish; and blushing slightly she lowered her long eyelashes.

‘I would much rather,’ she said, in a high-pitched but extremely melodious voice, ‘not be referred to as a “pretty wench”.’

‘Don’t notice him, Princess,’ said the Owl, in a gentle, paternal voice, subduing his natural moroseness. ‘Fish were the first experiments of Chance. They were created out of Chaos and they have Chaos in their bones, in their fins, and in their tails. Let us return to Philosophy which recognizes no such Causes as White Whales, and in which the matter of females’ — here he made a little bow towards Olwen— ‘combines civility with — with — combines civility with — civility with—’

‘With dotage!’ whistled the Fish rudely, continuing to open his mouth at Olwen in a manner at once obscene and fatal.

‘Will you,’ groaned the Duck, ‘could you,’ implored the Duck, ‘give the old man a sign, a token, a hint with your heavenly eyes to move you around, ever so little a way round, so that I can see a trifle more of your heart-breaking shape?’ With these well-chosen words did the tantalized Duck seek to cajole the profile of his Desired.

But the Owl hastened to lift the occasion up to the lost level of philosophical speculation.

‘I have been wondering,’ he remarked gravely, glaring at the bent back of the old woman who was spreading newspapers on the floor preparatory to arranging a bath for the old man, ‘what Law it is in the Known World that prevents us from communicating our wishes to these Human Automatons in the gross noises which they call speech, rather than in the pure thought language which we so eloquently employ among ourselves. Can you, Princess, can you, Duck of Dirty Ditch, can you, open-mouthed Son of Chaos, offer me any light on this serious problem?’

The grave and scholarly nature of the Owl’s topic was in a certain sense mitigated by the demonic darkness of his glaring eyes. But nevertheless from the girlish breast of Olwen there up-rose a weary little sigh. No subject interested her in the least, unless it had to do with Love, or with Presents, or with White Horses, or with Castles in the Air! A cloud of sadness descended on her beautiful face. It was only when the Duck was actually fainting with amorous excitement that he, her most devoted adherent, had the least interest for her. At other times the alert curiosity of his extended neck, the guilelessness of his eye, the extreme flatness of his yellow beak filled her with a wild longing to escape from the Known World altogether. ‘La!’ she would murmur to herself— ‘O La! I wish I were dead! And I will die soon, too, if I don’t find a more romantic lover than this duck!’

In truth the philosophical problem propounded by the Owl to the People of the Known World met with no response from any direction at all. The Fish whistled a bawdy ditty learnt from a drunken sailor in which the word ‘wench’ was most unsympathetically introduced. The Duck kept repeating lamentably, ‘Can Love be satisfied in Profile only? In Profile only can Love be satisfied?’ and Lady Potentilla, vexed beyond endurance by the ‘haverings’ and self-contradictions of Lord Tormentil, turned her back upon him and walked to the window.

The old woman, meanwhile, continued making her preparations for the old man’s bath; the ailanthus twigs continued to sway in the wind; the sky-blue statuette in the Alcove continued to stare at the Admiral’s chest.

Only the old man, uneasily anticipating his bath, seemed nervously conscious of the unusual import of this day to all the occupants of the Top Floor Front. He walked up and down; he fidgeted with the headless body of Lao-tze; he gazed nervously at the door of the Known World and at the door of Hell. Every now and then he listened intently, and when he listened he looked at Olwen, and once he lifted his hand towards Olwen, and then he glanced hurriedly and furtively at the back of the old woman. Though she went on so methodically laying newspapers on the floor, which now securely covered the larger portion of bother her precious ‘Hook’ rugs, and in no way showed the least sign that this occasion differed from those of a similar nature that had taken place a thousand times before — well did they both know what the other was thinking! The last time! The last!

The tea-kettle on the stove began rattling its lid and letting fall small jets of boiling water which hissed down its heated metal sides and struck the hot stove with a gasp of disaster that made it seem as if a miniature cosmic cataclysm was in progress behind the screen. It was an old feud between these two feminine arbiters of the household. The very shape of the tea-kettle whose straightness expressed the rigorous conception of feminine rectitude it held was in part responsible for its incapacity to contain the water one second after the successful consummation of its boiling had been achieved. The old woman's former profession alone was sufficient to implant a strong suspicion and dislike in the kettle's hearth-bound, domestically despotic heart, and it used these eruptions caused by the impersonal Laws of Nature as every member of the feminine sex uses them — for her own psychological and emotional ends — which in the kettle's case were, namely, to upbraid and scold the old woman for the careless, shiftless hussy she was in not paying attention to the primal, unequivocal duties and concerns of one in possession of an old man, a kettle and a hearth. This bickering avalanche always roused furious annoyance in the old woman, and as she turned to quench her shrewdish detractor as she had done so many times in the past, with a vicious push of the knob to shut off the gas, 'The last time! The last!' so diffused itself through her mind that she stayed stockstill behind the screen without making a motion, staring at the kettle's imperceptibly rising and falling lid which though reduced to silence still managed to convey inaudible taunts.

She stayed behind the screen so long that the old man began at last to be aware of the inertia that had taken possession of the Known World. His eyes were fixed on his piece of soap on the blue saucer where he was accustomed to find it and in his mind too came and went 'The last time!'

It was then that the great little god Kwang spoke an audible sentence. He spoke quietly, humbly, playfully; and his tone was like the tone of nothingness talking to nothingness or of silence talking to silence. 'It is very sad,' said Kwang, 'but we must be more than Superior Men,' and he looked whimsically at the Duck, 'if Love is to satisfy us. We must—'

All the people of the Known World listened intently to this gracious oracle. Even the headless neck of Kwang's companion bowed a little towards him, as if accepting his word as in the true tradition of immemorial antiquity.

'We must,' pronounced Kwang; and his faint voice became almost as high-pitched as Olwen's, 'we must seek Love as water seeks its own level!'

A dead silence followed this pronouncement. The metaphysics of the Owl, the amorousness of the Duck, the fatalistic obscenity of the Fish were all rebuked by this Logos from the land of Honoured Age.

And it seemed to the People of the Known World that more than half a week passed over their heads while the old man and the old woman never moved and the rumbling of the Elevated Railway sounded in their hearts like the tumbril wheels of the Revolution.

So tense was the knot of contrariety on that flowing stream of change which as Heraclitus says carries all things (even the very gods) away, that a tragic vibration passed from it into the heart of every dweller in the Known World.

The Owl lost for a moment the clue to his accustomed Philosophy and gave way to a dark, interior anguish, in which he loathed his life in Patchin Place and longed with a savage nostalgia for the smell of moss-damp, rain-scented woods.

And 'Love, Love, Love!' sighed Lady Potentilla. And 'Water seeks its own level!' quivered, like the echo of an echo, the thin voice of Lord Tormentil.

And 'Never satisfied — never satisfied,' gulped the Fish.

And 'Profiles be damned!' groaned the Duck.

‘Was there no Fairy watching o’er my birth?’ cried Olwen in Shakespearean rhythm. ‘Will no one bring me a disguised prince? What will I do if I have always to see the yellow beak of a Duck and the open mouth of a Fish? Who will give me a ride on a lovely white horse?’ And, at that, the beautiful girl began silently weeping; every little invisible tear being like the ghost of a dewdrop in the Petit Trianon.

And then once more, out of the silence of the Known World, there arose from all the People of the Place the familiar, piteous cry— ‘Miss Rowe! Miss Rowe! Miss Rowe!’

And this time Miss Rowe came.

Dark and yet bright, like a red and white geranium behind a cracked window, was Miss Rowe this time. So thin she was that although the Owl and the Duck saw her and the Fish saw her, the tears in Olwen’s eyes blurred the beautiful young girl’s vision too darkly for her to see anything but that tedious yellow beak at her side and that great, gaping, open mouth under the mirror. Olwen did just see the wavering ailanthus buds reflected in the Mirror; and she fancied that it was the sight of these that comforted her. But in reality it was the coming of Miss Rowe.

And Miss Rowe, now that she had come, stood just inside the door of the Top Floor Front and instead of talking to anyone in particular she began telling, to all the People of the Known World, a long rambling story.

Lord Tormentile found the courage, when he heard Miss Rowe’s voice, to cross the whole length of the room and join Lady Potentilla at the window. Olwen observed this occurrence through her tears and it seemed to her a dramatic and very beautiful event. Lady Potentilla at the window seemed to her like the White Lady of Avenel in ‘The Monastery’. Olwen did not always listen when the old man was reading to the old woman, but the White Lady of Avenel had seemed to her the right sort of character for a book to contain; and as she now listened to Miss Rowe's rambling tale, she began to weep again, for she began to feel that she herself was the sad Catholic fugitive in 'The Monastery' surrounded by rough admirers of the Lower Orders, and understood by none save The White Lady.

Miss Rowe's story was about cats. It was also about magic charms and about doves and tents and ruined sheep-folds and gipsy caravans. Her voice, as she told it, was like the sound of a tiny, silvery hand-organ; and her figure, to all the People of the Known World, was like the wavering moon-shadow of a motionless birch-tree falling upon troubled water.

The old man and the old woman neither heard nor saw Miss Rowe. There had begun a pitiful disagreement between the two old people. The old man insisted that he should postpone taking his bath for fear 'the Authorities' should come when he was in the middle of it; but the old woman said this was nonsense, that in evenings everyone went to theatres or dined on balconies and never came to take people to 'Homes' at such an hour.

It was with the intention of opening the door of 'The Anteroom', as she persisted in calling it, that the old woman now walked towards the thin wraith of Miss Rowe. The Other People in the Known World were astonished at the tender solicitude with which Miss Rowe moved aside; treating the old woman — although she kept repeating in her high cracked voice, 'Pshaw! pshaw! pshaw!' — just as respectfully as if she were still the Lovely Dancer of the 'Cimmerian Troupe'.

The old man, who was now standing at the window, quite unconscious of Lord Tormentil and Lady Potentilla, seemed to be paralyzed by a commotion he heard in the alley below.

'They are coming,' he whispered hoarsely. 'They are coming to carry us to the "Home"!'

But without taking any notice of what he said the old woman opened the door of Hell and let into it a flood of light. It was only after she had done this and was fumbling for the tin bath that the old man's cry— 'They are coming to take us! They are coming to take us!' reached her deaf ears. She turned towards him and he stumbled across the floor towards her.

Together they stood, facing each other, each trembling, each with a stricken face. They imagined they heard 'the Authorities' thumping, cursing, spitting, clattering, up the first flight of the steep stairs.

Miss Rowe! Miss Rowe! Miss Rowe!

And hours seemed to pass over the Known World then, and over Paradise, and over Hell; and all these hours that passed, behold! they were as weeks to the Other People of the Known World and as weeks to Falada in Hell.

But as the old couple clung to each other and waited for the onslaught on their door an incredible relief slowly relaxed every nerve in their bodies when in place of what they feared, a cavalcade of joyous revellers paused to disturb in his fantastic reveries their strayed Mercutio of the Top Floor Back.

But they would come in the morning to take the old man and the old woman away. Everybody seemed to know that. The Owl knew it. The Duck knew it. The Fish knew it. Even Miss Fells' half-created ones obscurely knew it.

Miss Rowe! Miss Rowe! Miss Rowe!

And the day drew to its close; and the old man in silence was given his bath; and the old woman cleaned her teeth more elaborately, more fussily, and with more contemptuous 'Pshaws!' directed at the obtuseness of All Men, than she had ever done before; and they laid them down together side by side under the covers of their bed and drew up the counterpane under their chins and darkness fell upon the Top Floor Front.

But in the great clanging, marbly, brassy City, littered with sordid lives, strewn with wind-tossed débris and bitter dust, exhaling mephitic stenches and corpse-chills, one resource, one issue, one last escape is left. A rusty iron stove supplies it and a patient row of little oblong knobs.

O holy gas, O comfortable gas, O thrice sacro-sanct gas, O gas, deliverer and redeemer of the old and unhappy in this too active world, O gas that art more healing and more divine than that Nepenthe which Helen brought from Egypt, O death-giving, terror-removing, euthanasian Gas, Thou must have been, under the deft fingers of this thinnest of all ghosts, these old people's escape from the 'Home!'

Let the ultimate opinions of 'the Authorities' be divided as they might be about the cause of this event between the austere tea-kettle placed on the top of the stove which could conceivably have extinguished the burners and the two pairs of dead and stiffened hands under the counterpane, either of which might have done it too, the Other People of the Known World were wiser. They had seen what they had seen. With those eyes of Inanimates that can see in darkness they had watched the wraith of Miss Rowe struggle for immeasurable Time before she managed to achieve — for the weakness of ghosts only permits the feeblest of physical efforts! — the least, little, faintest, filmiest pressure, like the pressure of the wings of a Lunar Moth, upon those fatal china knobs!

When morning came at last and the long hours that were like weeks to the Other People — and the Other People were all the People now — had passed away, it was not concealed from Olwen who had been put back by the old man — it was his last action on earth — upon the mantelpiece that the insubstantial Materialist and his devoted Religieuse were still gazing into the branches of the ailanthus and disputing about the Grievance that divided them. It was clearly the moment for them to finish Miss Fells' Romance. But how had Miss Fells meant them to finish it?

And then Olwen from the mantelpiece was aware of a strange thing. She heard the phantasmal Gentlewoman laugh with a little, roguish, wanton laugh and she saw her drop a mocking, irresponsible, inviting curtsey!

And Olwen's blue eyes opened wider than they had ever opened before when she beheld Lord Tormentil, that ungullible adherent of the visible world, hurriedly cross himself before lifting his lady's feverish hand to his lips and taking her in his arms!

It became evident to Olwen's young-lady-like intelligence, that there was something in the Known World that morning that was turning everything upside down. Olwen had never heard of Death. That those two old heads above the counterpane should look so like waxen dolls did not strike her mind as sad but as very proper and right.

As for Lord Tormentil and Lady Potentilla it was clear that they were engaged in writing their own 'Finis'; for as they forgot their Grievance they embraced; and as they embraced they faded quite away...

'The Authorities' were now banging loudly at the door. Would they find the Other People there when they came in? The old circus performers had escaped them; but would the Other People escape them? Would the end of the Fish and the Duck and the Owl be that horrible Limbo from which the old man had saved Falada? Death had saved the old man and the old woman; but Death has no power over Inanimates.

But it did come to pass that the Other People of the Known World left all the troubles of Patchin Place behind them.

And the manner of their escaping was as follows:

‘The Authorities’ had broken the lock of the door now, and in a second they would be inside the room.

But the door into Hell had been left wide open and Hell was flooded with light. And out of Hell, into the Known World, stumbled on his two remaining legs, the White Horse, Falada.

And all of the People of the Known World moved from their places — such was the power of the presence of Death — and came forward to meet the White Horse. And Olwen leapt lightly from the mantelpiece — as lightly as if she had been the dead dancer herself in her loveliest youth — upon the back of the White Horse, whose mane she seized with her little hand.

And the Owl said, ‘What is the final cause of the secondary cause of the immediate cause of the stillness of the old man and the old woman?’ And ‘I smell the mosses of the woods of Over-Hill-and-Dale,’ cried the Owl.

And the Fish said, ‘The White Whale has spouted to Heaven. All is Fate’. And ‘I smell the waters of the grottos of Over-Hill-and-Dale’, cried the Fish.

And the Duck said: ‘Now that she is mounted on horseback I can see much more of her than her profile.’ And, ‘I smell the mud of the ditches of Over-Hill-and-Dale!’ cried the Duck.

And the great, little god Kwang, said, while the headless Lao-tze bowed towards him, ‘Water seeks and water finds its level’. And ‘It is very sad and it is not very sad!’ cried the great, little god Kwang.

But Falada, lifting his proud head, uttered only one word; and it was a word never heard before in the Known World. It was indeed a word, the meaning of which no man, in any world will known until Merlin comes forth from his Island of Glass.

Falada uttered the word ‘ESPLUMEOIR’.

And when ‘the Authorities’ forced open the door of the Top Floor Front all they found was two dead bodies that flatly refused to sign any ‘dotted line’; and even when, in their gross manner, they rushed into the Alcove, they found no one to hurt or to insult. What they found was the Mother of God who confronted them with a terrible fixed stare.

UP AND OUT

A mystery-tale

GOR GOGINOG IS my name and I am writing this in the English language for a special and peculiar reason.

I was an orphan in an orphanage and I was never told who my parents were. I was born in a Welsh quarrytown called Blaenau-Ffestiniog under conditions that made me not only speak in two languages when I first learnt to speak but also made me think in two languages when I first learnt to think. I became indeed at a very early age, in fact either at five or at six, seized with a desperate mania for words: yes! for words as in their essential nature they really are, that is to say the expression of every kind of thought, emotion, feeling, sensation and idea that can possibly enter from outside, or can possibly spring up from inside, any imaginable or conceivable living creature. In a childish way, but whether in accordance with my appearance as a small boy I cannot say, I was endowed with an intelligence a great deal beyond my years, and with a shrewdness in coaxing, cajoling, and seducing to my purpose, whatever purpose at that particular moment it might be, not only older boys and older girls but grownup people of both sexes.

In response to my fervent solicitations a middle-aged American couple who visited Blaenau took me with them as their adopted son, for they themselves were childless, to New York City, and here I remained until Rhitha, a girl I had courted when a boy and who lived at Llandderfel, came to New York. And do you know what, apart from courting Rhitha, I spent my boyhood and young manhood upon? Upon one sole thing; upon inventing a universal Western Language! It sounds crazy, and of course some of you will accuse me of playing the copycat to that invented language called Esperanto and even to the inspired author of “Finnegan’s Wake.” But any way my purpose was to mingle and mix up in one verbal paint-pot, or let us say upon one syllabic palette, all the most characteristically national and all the most local and idiomatic expressions in English, French, Italian, Spanish, Dutch, Portuguese, Swedish, and Laplandish, and out of these multi-national composite sounds to create a lexiconic instrument through which the whole body, soul, and spirit of the men, women, and children of Europe could be expressed.

I was well advanced in my teens when I first courted Rhitha. In fact we were both seventeen — only as my birthday was the last day of November in the old year, and hers was the last day of April in the new year she was a few months the younger. Rhitha, like myself, was Welsh. She came from a small village not very far from Blaenau called Llandderfel, and she had for the patron-saint, patron-god or patron-devil of her village a deep, blind, unshakable awe and reverence which included the saint-devil’s war-horse.

I was a tall lad and Rhitha was tall and slender. She had long white arms and beautiful legs and I had long strong arms and very athletic legs. Like Rhitha I had a small waist and deft, rapid, nimble movements. Indeed I would say that it was the peculiarly quick reciprocity between my body and my mind that was at the heart of all I felt and of all I did. Everything I saw, heard, touched, tasted and smelt, was embraced, like the body of my loved one, by an exquisite concordance of my whole nature. And the curious thing is that Rhitha and I, allowing for her being a girl and my being a boy, were almost identical in these respects. She, too, was astonishingly rapid in all her movements. She, too, quite obviously to all who watched her, was wont to throw her entire being, “body, soul and spirit,” as the conventional phrase puts it, into every single thing she took in, whether it were a curve in a statue, a colour in a picture, a scent in a leaf, or a series of notes in a tune. Over the most evasive things in nature, a dragon-fly's eye, a lizard's foot, a minnow's tail, the slimy gloss on the spine of a black slug, the far-away wide-curving horizon of the ocean, Rhitha would hover with the same devouring enchantment as I felt for such things.

And we were the same too in our moral emotions. The one evil which neither of us could endure was cold-blooded cruelty; and when in our prowlings about New York City — which, in some respects, without being conceited, for you can easily be a very cowardly crusader, I might call crusades against cruelty and which were much more exciting to both of us than any film or television or opera or play could be — we chanced at last to come upon what the vivisectors were doing to dogs, cats, monkeys, and all sorts of other animals, we soon realized that we had found the worst example of unspeakable wickedness to be discovered in the whole of our modern world. We are both equally clever at getting round people and influencing people and moulding people to our immediate purpose; so working together, Rhitha with all a woman's wiles, and I with the guile of a Borgia or the statecraft of a Lord Burleigh, we soon got an entrance into all the cruellest and wickedest vivisection laboratories in New York City.

To say we were horrified and shocked at what we saw is as people say now "to put it mildly." Nor were our feelings mollified by learning that the tolerant and indulgent neutral government of India was sending this very year over two thousand monkeys in order that there should not be a month's or even a week's relaxation of the excruciating pain inflicted by the descendants of Cro-Magnon cave-men, many of them with more than a dash of Neanderthal-blood in their veins upon their innocent ancestors who had not yet had the cunning to come down from the trees.

We were far from blaming the medical profession for what we saw of these infernal cruelties. We soon discovered that ordinary doctors know absolutely nothing of these horrors. What struck us as most appalling were certain attempts we found going on to graft living animals upon one another. We found for instance a certain group of vivisectors intensely pleased with themselves for having produced by vivisection a dog with two heads. We got a glimpse of this phenomenon; and we found it hard to forget the pathetic way in which these two heads, who evidently felt themselves to be, and had every reason for such a feeling, two separate identities, with separate minds and bodies, watched each other and licked each other and evidently said to each other: "We have heard about the tortures inflicted by the Holy Office of the Inquisition but even the Holy Office didn't graft a Wesleyan baby on the neck of a Baptist baby."

Never had vivisectors brought forward all their favourite humbug about the life of one precious human child being well worth the excruciating sufferings of a million dogs, and a million cats, not to mention two or three million monkeys, with so little effect as in the case of Rhitha and me. We made our way hurriedly to Patchin Place, just off Sixth Avenue, in which there grew a gigantic ailanthus tree that we had come, ever since we first met, to regard as our "Sacred Grove" of refuge, though it was a lonely and a rather forlorn tree and also an extremely proud and very unbending tree.

Here then we got into the habit of standing, perhaps recalling the days when our monkey-ancestors came down from such a tree, but at any rate in a mood of savage anger at the cruelty of these vivisectors, each of us with a hand against the trunk of the tree. It was on a certain Wednesday we were standing here, the day of the week dedicated by the Anglo-Saxons to Woden and by the Romans and the Welsh to Mercury. The lights of the city were lit, and every now and then a tram or a taxi could be heard. But there were only small floating clouds of very thin mist and vapour between our ailanthus tree and the “enormous and delicate” sky.

The evening was well advanced by this time and the sky was growing black. But its blackness was the reverse of a thick, dense, opaque, heavy darkness. For once it happened, as I told myself afterwards, and when we recalled what we experienced Rhitha entirely agreed with me, that the sky looked what it actually was — a portion of the vast unending limitless gulf in which the galaxies and the nebulae and the stars of our system and the stars of all the other systems live and die even as we do ourselves.

“Listen my heart,” I said. “Let us pray to the King of the Gods by his three-fold name. Let us pray to him by his name Jehovah, as the simpler among the Jews called him, though every Rabbi would explain to them that in reality he was nameless. Let us pray to him by his name Jupiter or Jove, as the Romans worshipped him. And let us pray to him by his name Zeus the Son of Kronos as the Greeks worshipped him.”

Never afterwards did I, Gor Goginog of Blaenau, forget Rhitha’s profile as I saw it outlined at that moment between the lighted window of a small ground-floor apartment and the sacred tree of our Grove of Worship.

“What shall we pray to the King of the Gods to do?” Rhitha asked.

I pressed the knuckles of the hand that held hers against the bark of the ailanthus tree, pressed them so hard that it hurt. And I thought to myself, “I’m glad it hurt. When people make vows to the immortals it’s a good thing to arrange, as the old Athenians used to do, for some kind of offering. My offering now is this pain in my knuckles.”

“I’ll tell you exactly, my heart, what we’ll pray for tonight. We’ll pray to Jehovah-Jove-Zeus that every single creature being vivisected tomorrow shall feel no pain. It’s the day the Saxons have dedicated to their war-god Thor, and the day we Welsh call Dydd Iau, the day of Jove. But never mind what we call it. As Goethe says, ‘The Name is sound and smoke obscuring Heaven’s clear glow!’ Yes, let us pray to Jove, O my treasure, ‘in good set terms.’ Let us pray that every single animal, dog, cat, monkey or any other, they will be torturing tomorrow in this city shall become, until it dies, wholly and totally devoid of the capacity to feel anything at all! That will worry these devils! We couldn’t possibly worry them more than by immunising and petrifying and atrophying and de-sensitizing every victim in their laboratories! Have you prayed as I told you, Rhitha?”

Rhitha, who had been pressing her forehead against the trunk of the ailanthus, moved her neck a little so that she could give a slight nod in reply to this question.

“But you look dazed, my sweet,” I went on. “Are you hearing any of those messages from other dimensions which you told me about last night?”

Rhitha moved away from the tree and looked me full in the face. “Do you want me to be absolutely honest and frank?” she enquired.

“Of course,” was the only thing I could say.

“Well, Gor darling, to tell you the truth, ever since we have been in this alley and near this tree I have been listening to a long rigmarole going on and on and on and on, defending this vivisection atrocity. O yes! and much more frightening than that, Gor darling, I have seen the face of the Being, far above us, up in the air, who has been talking to me.”

“What sort of thing did he say?” I asked her.

“He said that there was only one important thing in life. He said that eating and drinking and building and painting and writing and carving and making music and racing and boxing and competing in athletics and having children and looking after them, were all only ways of amusing ourselves while we kept our race alive upon the earth. But he said that the one important thing, the one thing for which we were here, the one thing about which as human beings we had a right to be proud of, was our struggle to understand! Yes, he said the only important thing in life is to understand life; to understand what the earth and the ocean and the stars and every sort and condition of fire really and actually consisted of! And above everything else, he kept repeating, the important thing is to understand the nature of the creatures, lower in the scale than ourselves, who inhabit earth, air and water, and perhaps even fire; and in order to understand these creatures, their ways, their feelings, their bodily and mental reactions, it was absolutely essential to subject them to every kind of examination and experiment. We vivisectors, he said, do not do what we do in order to obtain for ourselves the curious satisfaction that is usually described as 'sadistic pleasure.' If such pleasure comes to us in pursuit of our duty, well! that is, if our temperament happens to be a sadistic one, what might be called, as the proverb says, 'virtue bringing its own reward.' But since the whole purpose of life is to understand life, it is absolutely essential that we should experiment with animals and with birds and with fishes; and although at present we have no idea where there are creatures who live in fire, we certainly must keep our attention fixed on fire so as not to miss them if they are there, and not to lose the opportunity of experimenting upon them also, if they exist."

Here, Rhitha stopped speaking; and I noticed the most extraordinary expression cross her features.

"Can you see this face up there now?" I enquired, not a little disconcerted by the strange look she had.

Rhitha nodded. And it was then that I cried out to her: "O please, please, my dear, tell me what you see — tell me, tell me quick! Your face is so white!"

"Don't look at me, Gor. Look down at the ground. But hold my hand tight."

I obeyed her to the letter. On the ground I saw a small black ant carrying some object, smaller than itself, of a pale yellow colour, and followed by another ant, a little larger, that did not seem to be carrying anything.

"His face is like a vulture's. But it's his eyes that frighten me most. They seem to be saying to every worm and toad and lizard: 'You must let me take off your skin a little higher up please! I want to see exactly what's underneath it there and there. You say it hurts. O I never stop for that!' Then his eyes seem to scoop at the body of a dying rabbit. 'O no! no! I can't possibly let you give up the ghost yet. Do you still feel that? No? Or only a very little? I can't explain to you now why it is so important to me to know if you have any feeling left there — yes! Just there! Hurting's part of it. If it didn't hurt, you wouldn't wriggle. And if you didn't wriggle, how should I get on with all my knowing and understanding?' Then those terrible eyes seem to go further. Having dissected living birds and living fishes, the mind behind those eyes begins to hunt for some helpless planet! O Gor! Gor! It's drawing me up along with it now! It has things that pull you like the horny suckers of a devil-fish! And they can gouge and scrape and claw and delve! O Gor! Gor! He's after the moon now! He's got the rim of the moon in his fingers! He's struggling to nibble or gobble from out that perfect rondure a moonlightbleeding, moonlight-oozing piece of moon-flesh! Listen, Gor darling, listen, I beg you! Do you hear that extraordinary noise? Like the sound we hear late at night sometimes, and call it the wind! But it's no more the wind than it is the moaning of the sea! It's the moon! But the moon now has stopped lamenting its loneliness in space as the only satellite of the earth. It's shrieking now! Yes, the moon is shrieking! It's a sound much worse than a wail of inconsolable sorrow! It's a clear, harsh, raw shriek, a shriek of jagged hurting! It's that little corner of the moon quivering with the pain of being grabbed at with the idea of tearing it and wrenching it from its mother, even if her silver flesh shrieks! O Gor! I just can't stand it! He hasn't managed to get that piece of the moon out yet! But he will. He will! I'm sure he will."

Watching Rhitha's face and listening to her words and looking at the moon, though I could hear nothing and see nothing, I began to be frightened. I told myself I mustn't, I mustn't, I mustn't let myself get scared! With all the grave authority I could assume, speaking in fact as if I were Math the son of Mathonwy, "Stop that! Stop that!" I cried.

"Stop what, Gor darling? What is it I must stop?"

"You must stop imagining yourself yielding an inch to that wretch. You must stop thinking we can't intervene. I can and I will intervene; and you shall help me in doing so."

My voice had taken on a tone that really was rather impressive. The girl was dominated by it and looked up at me as if she were awaiting something from me that would change the entire situation. And something did come. It came in the form of a word, or rather of three words, three short words, each an expressive monosyllable. "Up and out!" I cried. "Up and out!"

Rhitha could not have been more startled. Indeed I was startled myself at the effect of this cry of mine. The cry was wholly involuntary. It just rushed out of me. I hadn't the faintest prescience of it before it was in the air, and its challenge and the echoes of its challenge resounding among the gulfs and chasms of the mountains of that moon I was seeking to rescue. But neither of us had time now to listen to echoes. Where, in the name of Jehovah, where, in the name of Jove, where in the name of Zeus, were we? And then I knew. The hydrogen bombs of both East and West had been dropped in one wild mad, reckless orgy of universal destruction. Atomic science, as it had long threatened to do, had murdered the whole human race. We were both rendered unconscious at first in the shock of being carried so high into the air. But we were unhurt and we were side by side when the shock was over.

We found ourselves standing on a grassy plain the horizon of which stretched away into the sky in every direction. There were no flowers there, no trees, no bushes, no plants, no growths of any kind, no reeds, no rushes. There were only millions upon millions of grass-blades, all of them green as the greenest emeralds, only not in the least transparent. The sky surrounding this green plain was the greyest sky I have ever seen. Grey is a funny colour. Grey is a tricky colour. Grey is a mysterious colour. Grey is a ghostly colour. It is very rarely that in our ordinary life upon earth, whether we are in the New World or in the Old World, in the north or the south, in the east or the west that we see any perfect example of the colour grey. The sea is never grey. Lakes, rivers, estuaries are never grey. I mean they are not as grey as was this amazing sky surrounding this emerald-green undulating plain.

Rhitha and I looked at each other in dazed silence.

"Is this the piece of the moon, do you suppose, Gor?" she murmured, "that I watched that demon trying to scoop and gouge out?"

"No! I can't believe that, my darling. I would say it's some completely unknown satellite of this earth that revolves either much slower or much faster because it is so small; but whether faster or slower I'm not mathematical or astronomical enough to know. In fact, my sweet, it's a shame that a clever girl like you should be tied up with an old heavy-weather book-worm like me! I feel a mad desire to run in to the Blaenau public library, and get a few of the latest books on astronomy!"

"You mean," murmured Rhitha with just the faintest tinge of mischief in her smile, "those books about galaxies and nebulae; things of which I never hear mention without wondering why one of them ends with a Latin plural and the other with an English plural! Is that because a Latin plural means they can't ever stop going on, while an English plural means that we just don't know whether they stop or don't stop?"

"What do you exactly mean by 'stop'?"

"O, I don't exactly mean anything! But you tell me, my dear, whether the stars in the sky go on forever or come to an end?"

I struggled in my mind to remember what a certain book I had got out of the Blaenau public library had declared on this point: but all I could think of were the two expressions, firstly "an expanding universe," and secondly "background material."

"I suppose, my dear child," I began, anxious to prove to this lively girl that to the massive masculine intellect an "expanding universe" was as obvious a truth as that two and two make four and that the existence of "background material" was as certain as the fact that if you could get paper at the stationer's you could also get ink, "I suppose that scattered throughout all space there are invisible little atoms of matter that any fiery star or rushing meteorite enjoys snatching up as it plunges around and of course, as it does so, gets bigger and bigger and bigger, till it swells at last into a proper grown-up star from being at the beginning nothing but a poor little infantile asteroid, if that is the library word for a star that so far is only a toddler."

Rhitha positively clapped her hands for joy. Everything that was maternal in her sensitive little body pulsed and palpitated and pullulated with excitement to think of these little babies among stars growing up to take their place in an "expanding universe."

We were both silent for a while, gazing, neither gaily nor sadly, but in one of those fits of abstracted quiescence into which for its own wise purpose the body leads the mind, at our green island and its mysterious grey horizon.

But it was not long before the girl murmured: “Don’t you find it hard to believe that there are no living people left in Asia, Africa, America, Australia and New Zealand? Surely, Gor dear, there must be a few left? A few infants in Africa and a few old men in Scotland?”

She was watching my face so intently that she must have known that my thoughts, whatever they were, were troubling me quite a good deal.

“What is it, Gor darling?” she asked.

“How quick you are, little one, to read my mind! Well, I’ll tell you, honestly and exactly, what I was thinking just then. I was thinking what a thing it is that the whole of Nature, that is to say all that we know of the earth and the sea and the air, is full of hideous cruelty; and save for a few grass-eating and nut-eating and fruit-eating creatures, most of the denizens of earth, water, air, and possibly even fire, feed upon each other. What I had in my mind was simply this natural and obvious question. If to have what we call N*ature* at all — that is to say to have such an elaborately complicated, such a teeming and seething cosmos of living things, all struggling with one another and most of them devouring one another — we are compelled to accept, practically unchanged, the spectacle that life has given us, wouldn’t it be wise if we men — the final product of this blind and mad confusion, in which we might say that only the vegetable world and the mineral world with whatever weird sorts of ‘souls’ their subanimal substances contain, live a peaceful life — wouldn’t it be wise, I say, if we men, making use of the philosophy and the science which in our bold challenge to all the gods that ever were or will be, we have invented for ourselves, if we men, I say, were to put a final end to the whole business? Wouldn't the best retort to the selfelevating worshippers of Man as God, as well as to the self-prostrating worshippers of God as Man, be simply and solely to obliterate at one stroke the whole of Creation? Then and then only and in that way alone would the brutal and blustering and blatant eulogists of this murderous life of ours be reduced to their proper place.

"Why are we — answer me that, angel of my heart! — why are we debarred from deciding that this confounded creation of life, by this Grand Inquisitor and Master Vivisector we call God, this life which the greatest of all philosophers maintains appears by the eternal processes of matter — why, I say, are we debarred from deciding that it is the opposite of a praiseworthy thing, that it is in fact a wicked and abominable thing, to allow this life to go on?"

Rhitha, who had been listening to my diatribe with what struck me as excited amusement, now enquired eagerly: "But Gor, darling, what will it be like when we have destroyed creation? Will we be destroyed with it? Will you and I, I mean, no longer be here? Or what will the world look like if we're still here, on this grass-green plain, with this grey horizon all round us? Will everything be black darkness? Will there be no green grass, no grey sky, no earth, no sun, no moon, no stars? What shall we—"

She was interrupted by the sudden appearance, bolt out of the sky in front of us, of an extraordinary-looking creature.

"Do you two know who I am?" it said, uttering the words in English, but with an accent totally different from that of any English person I have ever met. For some odd reason, though I would be totally unable to explain to myself when or where I had heard that funny word, the word "Geezish" came into my head; and a moment later the word "Coptic." I gazed at the monster who had asked us, speaking with this extraordinary accent, if we knew who it was; and then without a moment's hesitation, I leapt upon it as if it had been a wild beast who had defied me to mortal combat. For one flashing second before leaping upon it, I had the feeling that I gathered together all I was and every power I possessed. I felt as if I gathered my whole body, soul, spirit, intellect, reason, feeling, imagination, tightly together. I felt as if I used every member I possessed and every nerve I possessed fused together in one consolidated organism, and then leapt upon this creature. I suppose, in what they call a "spiritual" sense, I am habitually such a ferocious swallower of situations and environments and of all that I see round me, that when I leapt upon this creature, as if it embodied everything I saw at that moment, I was in that second an incarnation of so much vitality, that the Being I leapt upon had no alternative but to yield.

The queer-looking creature was indeed completely staggered and not a little scared.

In the shock of his consternation and discomforture he fell backwards into a crouching and humiliating position. And then as I knelt above him on our brief battlefield of green grass, I felt that in my blind rush of force I had sufficiently subjugated him to know how it would feel to have him absolutely and permanently at my mercy and at my disposal. Something at that moment said to me, "Don't obliterate this creature, for you never know how desperately one day you may need such a creature as a servant! But get him well under control, now that you've got him down, so that, having learnt his lesson, he won't resist you again!"

Thinking thus, I arranged the feverish and convulsive shakings I was giving this extraordinary-looking creature in a sufficiently uneven manner to enable it to think, if it wanted to think, in as detached a way as I was thinking myself at this moment.

"Every creature in Nature," I cried, "is being treated as I am treating you. O how much better it would be — wouldn't it? wouldn't it? wouldn't it? — if the whole of Nature could be destroyed at one stroke?"

"But surely, master of mine," the creature cried in his Coptic or rather in his Geezish accent, "you will get my considered opinion better if you let me go."

At those words, I did rise up from above his grotesque body, and I did leave him — I will say "him" and not "it" from now on — to follow his own devices.

And it was then that Rhitha wisely intervened. But her voice was so low that for a moment all I could hear was this creature saying again, over and over again, that the war between the East and the West of the world had destroyed the whole human race. But at last I heard Rhitha's words.

"Ask it," she whispered, "Gor darling, what its name is and whether it's got a wife, and, if it has, what her name is and where she is!"

It was obvious that my subdued antagonist had understood her words, for he lifted his head out of the grass and replied promptly and distinctly, using English, although a many-membered monster, just as I had used it, although a many-weapon'd Welshman.

"My name is Org and we were blown up from Easter Island and my wife's name is Asm and she comes from Ultima Thule. And if you'd like to see her—"

"O please tell him," cried Rhitha, "that we'd love—"

But there, before we could say a word, easily, lightly, airily helping her monster of a mate to whatever substitute for claws, or paws, or fins, or hooves, or pads, or leathery heels, this surprising creature used instead of feet, was Mistress Asm of Ultima Thule herself!

"Are these people," enquired Asm, "enemies or friends?"

"Isn't that a feminine question!" chuckled Org. But it was obvious that Asm had made some sign to him to do what was clearly one of the most difficult of all things for Org to accomplish, namely, "to pull himself," as our authorities love to say, "together." But he managed it somehow and it was certainly the queerest assortment of fish-scales and bird-feathers and slabs of rhino-hide and blobs of elephant-muscle and soft patches of deer-skin and slippery expanses of seal-skins and whale-like curvatures of walrus-skin that composed the bodily presence of our visitor from Easter Island.

"As if I could tell, my dear!" the creature answered. "How can anyone know friends from enemies at a glance? They are friends of the moon, that much I can tell you, for they are strongly against that World-Demon who nibbles at the edges of the moon when he's hungry; though why a famished devil shouldn't satisfy his hunger, like the rest of us, I fail to see."

It was then that I made one of the grandest speeches of my whole life. I began with an emphatic and purposeful gesture, indicating magisterially that not only was the Monster Org and his lady Asm to lie down on the grass, but that my own faithful Rhitha was to assume the same quiescent posture.

"Here are we," I commenced with a magnificently, comprehensive movement of both my arms. "Here are we, two pairs of living beings, with all those freakish, incalculable caprices of imagination, emotion, pity, indignation, and amusement, which our various ancestors have possessed for thousands of years. How much more you two, of whom we know nothing but your names, are acquainted with the nature of life than I and my Rhitha are it is impossible for me to say; but if you are more enlightened in these matters than we are, the fact remains that there are limits to your knowledge, however extensive it is, and there must be a point in your accumulation of wisdom, as there is a point in our smaller amount, where all wisdom abruptly ends. Here we are, therefore, four beings alone in space, standing upon some sort of small satellite from which no doubt, when this grey sky turns black and when we grow aware of the glittering stars, we shall find ourselves surrounded by other consciousnesses similar to, or at least parallel with, our own. 'Long live Rhitha!' will then be my war-cry into space and 'Long live Asm!' will be yours. But O my dearer than strange pair of dedicated companions" — I became more and more of an orator as I went on— "don't you see that the important thing for us, who are the last living remnants of all the creatures that these old galaxies have spawned in their motley-whirling phantom-twirling nightmareswirling neutron-hurling dance through space, is to make one supreme initial effort to ensure with absolute certainty that there shall be no more of this devilish creation of living things! I tell you this is our one grand last chance to achieve this desirable purpose! That much is proved by my precious Rhitha's shudder just now, when she saw that that desperately hungry cosmic demon had reached such a point of insatiable craving for food that he was actually nibbling at the margin of the moon! She shuddered at such a sight, as well she might; but she did not realize that it was a clear sign that the whole order of our old universe had run down like a worn-out and rusty clock; and that the time had come for us to take this blasted clock entirely out of the blundering hands of Zeus and Jupiter and Jehovah — and take it to pieces in fact!— 'and remould it,' as some gipsy-minstrel expressed it the other day, 'nearer to the heart's desire.'"

Here I made a dramatic pause. But very soon — for, by the help of my infancy among the wandering sheep and restless orphans of Blaenau, I knew better than anyone between the sun and the moon how to handle both herds and herdsmen — very soon I saw the Ciceronian necessity, in the act of concluding my oration, of striking a completely different note. And thus, very slowly, and with an absolutely inspired manipulation of my shadow, I proceeded to strike this note, which was simply and solely one of deep, indrawn — and by this I mean that I, the speaker, drew magnetically into me the souls of all my three listeners — of deep indrawn silence; and with this I closed my oration.

This dramatic silence of mine, was, as I am always trying to make clear to the Simple Simons who know nothing of the noblest art in the world, far the most impressive way by which I could possibly have ended.

I had already noticed, though there was no sign of any sun up there, that shadows showed an unmistakable tendency to fall, though where the devil they came from, heaven itself, I am sure, couldn't have said.

Org was now sitting up in a rather curious position, considering the multiplicity of the members with which providence — or the process of evolution or the cruelty of vivisectionists — had endowed him; whereas both the ladies were lying gracefully and even seductively on that beautiful green grass.

It now became quite clear to me, from obvious signs, that as Org contemplated our two ladies on the grass he was unable to restrain, grotesque monster though he was, both a lecherous desire for those lovely limbs, and also, I could see this for myself in his expression, a real, deep, exquisite delight in the bewitching and sometimes almost miraculous grace that the bodies of women can assume when a real opportunity occurs. Are they, I asked myself, ever as completely unconscious of their physical beauty as I am sometimes completely unconscious of my power of oratory? Well! At any rate these two particular expressions of our life upon earth, my oratory and their beauty, had been brought to a climax by my dramatic silence, aided by this more than dramatic, this almost supernatural shadow, which had suddenly descended out of space to aid me, completely unimpelled by any thrower of shadows of which I was aware. This dramatic silence of mine, aided by this space-fallen shadow, was perhaps more Roman than Greek. What I hope I resembled was the culminating subsidence of one of Cicero’s most resounding sentences; and I would like to think of it too as not very different from one of those thunder-claps of conclusive finality in a poem of Catullus. But whatever it resembled it had an effect totally unlike my anticipated effect. The whole landscape in which Rhitha and I and Org and Asm had been resting now commenced a palpable movement of its own. It began to swerve, it began to tilt sideways, it began to circulate through the air as though propelled by its own volition. It began to make the most beautifully undulating gyrations. And, as the ground beneath us rose, the colour of the grass completely changed. As I watched it I imagined it was changing to blue but I may very easily have been misled by the peculiar effect that rapid motion can have upon grass-blades. What I took for blue might have much more properly been described as steel-grey. At any rate it was changing, even now as I looked round. But whatever was happening to the colour of the grass, it was not long before we two pairs of bewildered earthlings found ourselves in an unusually dark night, but exposed to the peering eyes of more stars than any of us had ever seen directed towards the earth! I don’t know what the others thought, but what I wondered in my heart was how it was possible for so many orbicular rondures to exist, as they apparently were existing, quite harmoniously side by side, moving in predetermined curves round and about one another and not attacking each other with supernatural ferocity, or trying to cut each other in pieces or to swallow up each other dead or alive! The females of our little party did indeed find themselves very quickly absorbed in a lively argument as to exactly where among all the magnificent hieroglyphics drawn so perfectly across the blackness of the sky was the star familiarly known as “the North Star.” Rising on one of his feet or paws or fins, Org begged me so say something.

“Yes, yes, brother,” I responded, “the moment has indeed come for you and me to show the mettle of our sex! As for the whereabouts of the North Star we can let that go: but the moment has come for us to announce and declare a world-shaking revolution, worthy of real thinkers and of such intellects as inaugurate the great changes that convulse and remould the history of the world. Will you allow me, Brother Org, to speak for us both as I address our attentive if somewhat simple-minded ladies?”

Org nodded with his biggest-land-snout and at the same time winked with his smallest sea-eye.

But never had any empire-builder in history to decide more rapidly what his world-policy was than I had to do at that moment. I expect all such cosmogonic decisions, if we knew the truth, have been dictated by just the same sort of small personal irritation as mine was at that moment. I expect Moses and Joshua and Pericles and Caesar and Alexander and Gustavus Adolphus and Napoleon and General Gordon all made the most momentous decisions of their lives when it came to the point by reason of some grotesquely little prick or sting or hurt or pique or minute stab of human vexation, caused in many cases by the simplest and absurdest misunderstanding. I will not go quite so far as to say that my sublimely tragic decision was taken purely for such a reason; but I will say that the emotional force I threw into it was accentuated by the fact that the fondness my Rhitha had been lately displaying for Org’s seductive Asm had been causing me several throbs of obscure resentment.

“Our political revolution,” I now declared in a majestically judicial tone worthy of Rhadamanthus himself, “and it must be remembered that we represent all the creatures in earth, water, air, and fire, and in their name we — that is to say Org and his lady Asm and I and my lady Rhitha — do hereby renounce and revoke, in one desperate and final reversion, all the claims of our jungle, of our sea, of our forest, of all the levels of life in the teeming margins between land and water! Yes, we renounce, I say, and revoke and reject forever all the claims of the living multitudes of swarming creatures that the power we call Nature engenders, the claims of worms and slugs, the claims of toads and frogs, the claims of newts and tadpoles, the claims of moles and badgers and foxes, the claims of rats and mice, the claims of stags and deer, the claims of every insect that crawls and of every insect that flies, and of all the insects that neither crawl nor fly! Yes, we have come, Org and I, as representatives of all these weak and helpless creatures; but we have also come as representatives of all the powerful and ravening creatures, of Hons and tigers, of leopards and panthers, of elephants and hippos, of crocodiles and rhinos, of rattlesnakes and vipers, of gorillas and chimpanzees; and we have also come as representatives of every bird in the air and every fish in the sea! Yes, and not only these! We include in our grand refusal all the halflives of the mosses and lichens and the most hidden and secretive funguses of the woods and the most recondite sea-weeds of the depths of the ocean! Yes, we four, we two males and we two females, are now speaking for all the four-thousand billions of living creatures in the entire universe. And we are announcing to the said universe that, from this moment we and the whole mass of lives we represent do proclaim and declare that we are withdrawing from the whole horrible and appalling play; yes, we have decided to refuse henceforth to bring to life one single offspring more to breathe this cruel and anguishing air and to live this iniquitous and abominable life! I tell you, we four, who represent all these mysterious multitudes, have decided on their behalf that from now on, all life, in all places and under all conditions is going to end!”

It was then that Rhitha and Asm ceased disputing about the North Star. It was clear to my exalted pride that they had been stirred in the very depths of their hearts by my powerful words; and the thought rushed through my mind that it was a real touch of the true genius of a master orator that, at that perilous moment when I had to decide just what my world-policy was, I decided upon annihilation rather than upon creation and upon suicide rather than upon any form of reconstruction. O how much easier it is, I now clearly saw, to attack than to defend, and to advocate destruction than to indicate the faintest possibility of restoration! Yes, both our wives now rose up on the tips of their toes and stretched their long slender white arms upward, and with their lovely bodies quivering with excitement turned their heads towards the stars, just as I had done myself with the gesture of an invincible orator while I shrieked my challenge to whatever appalling power it was, a power far worse than the old Homeric “anangké” or “necessity,” that was driving us willy-nilly to increase with our wretched little quota the horrible enormity of life’s tangled chaos.

But still upon us four living beings those millions upon millions of blazing stars gazed down with contemptuous casual, careless and sardonic amusement. The resonant cry that I had just now flung among those mocking points of glittering contempt was now reinforced by the silent cries of Rhitha and Org and Asm; and what I found of curious interest in my incurable introspection was the fact that neither I nor they — no! not one of us pitifully stirred-up four persons — had had the faintest idea to whom or to what we were addressing our “Declaration of Independence” and our right to end life instead of helping it to go on, and announcing our resolution to bring the whole damned business to an end. But now — and it all came in a moment — I knew to whom and to what we were making these universal proclamations. For there, straight before us, and straight above us, as our swirling and swivelling and swinging and slithering and slanting and shimmering little satellite revolved in its resolutely directed curves, was nothing less than Time Itself! Yes it was to Time Itself that I had been proclaiming my desire that all we creatures of the elements and sons and daughters of nature should perish once and for all at one stroke and never, no! not any of us, appear again! Yes, it was to Time Itself that I had been praying that all the children of Time might perish forever! Vacuum vacuo! Nihil super nihil! And what a monster Time was, thus envisaged, as we encountered it now! And all the while around it, as well as around us, were those millions of glittering little peering eyes! But what had become of the huge genial bonfire-furnace of a life-giving star that we have always been accustomed to call the sun? Clean gone forever, had he? And what had happened to our sweet sorceress the moon, upon whose enchanted flesh Rhitha had caught that unspeakable demon nibbling? Gone also forever had she too?

But what did I hear then? Did I hear one of those tiny twinklers in the distance, shining atoms, baby sparks, crowding out of space to attend the death-bed of Great-Aunt Time? Did I hear one of them — from the Pleiades, was it? — starting to cry? To confess the truth, little faraway fire-flies, I began to feel a trifle funny myself: but funny or not, I was going to play now the part of the bell that tolls the twelve-o’clock death-notes of Time!

I could see that Org was affected, just as I was, by the appearance of this incredible Monster directly before us, which he knew, as well as I knew, was nothing less than Time Itself.

The terrifying enormity in the sky to which we were getting so close, although in any scientific calculation it must have been about half way to the nearest star, was certainly a horrible object.

In the frantic circular cleavings of the dark air, made by our platter-shaped field of green grass, the nearer we approached to the thing called Time, the more clearly did we see that it resembled an enormous black slug. It was not exactly in every detail like a slug. It had very large eyes for instance, and out of its mouth wavered, explored, fumbled, groped, a very flexible forked tongue. No doubt my powers of observation are very limited, but somehow I find it hard to associate either big eyes or forked tongues with black slugs. This is not from ignorance of these creatures, for I used invariably to encounter them in my morning walks into the valley called Cwm Bowydd in my early days at Blaenau. No, I shall never forget to the end of my life this extraordinary ascent of ours; for here were Org and I mounting up with the rough, genial, good temper of a pair of sporting pals, while our girls as they ascended with us had the very look, awed, grave, abstracted, exalted, absorbed, of two Virgin Marys undergoing the mystical experience of Assumption.

You must understand that our two ladies were really so beautiful that they would have made a perfect subject for one of the great, old, religious painters, such as Titian, or Tintoretto, or Giorgione, or El Greco; though it would have needed a touch from Goya perhaps, or even from the more modern imagination of Gustave Doré, to do justice to this mystery-monster that was the true image of Time.

As we approached this monstrous thing, with the gliding, tilting, slanting, curving, sliding, switching motion of our unusual vessel, I could see those bottomless eyes of his advancing, receding, extending, distending, revealing indeed, so it seemed to me, such an interior cavern of nerve-passages and such a labyrinth of glandular ducts, and such a convoluted gallery of shudder-causing orifices, that you felt that, if once the news actually reached here of such a stupendous mouthful, as a raging, roaring, ramping, roving biped from Blaenau of the male sex, the whole interior anatomy of this man-eating minotaur would explode from greedy joy and blow up, strewing that little corner of the void with the scoriae soot of a whole crater of masculine life-illusion!

But what I had to do now was to keep repeating to myself the rending, cleaving, splitting, and splintering cry of my original challenge: “No more of this blasted procreation! No more of the swarming legs and arms and hairs and bristles of these jostling by-blows of Time!”

We must, I think, have been dangerously near the bursting-point of some sort of explosion, when, all in a moment I heard the voice of Org uttering a warning cry. O, what a jealous pang shot through me when I heard him, for why had not I been the one to cry “halt!” at this juncture?

Yes, I heard Org cry out in a shrill high-pitched reverberating voice: “All eyes to the left!”

We all instantaneously obeyed him of course; and there, lo! right before us, piercing the very heart of the Time-Monster, ran a gaping tunnel, quite big enough for our vessel with all four of us on board, to pass through, and revealing the fact, that not only were we heading clear through the repulsive and revolting body of Time, but that our vessel had already done something of much more importance.

What it had done was to cut into two halves a delicate, sensitive vital gland in the centre of the Time-slug’s midriff, which now was floating, draggled and loose, and dripping with enormous drops of blood, completely clear of the diaphragm to which it had belonged.

As our vessel emerged huge shadows of the murdered body of the Slug of Time moved round us, each one a little different from the others but all anxious to escape from our presence in any possible direction. And then we noticed that the whole blazing mass of the stars above our heads, of the stars above the head of the dead body of Time, of the stars above all the heads, human, subhuman, or superhuman, in the advancing, or retreating, enlarging, or diminishing, expanding, or receding universe had vanished. Yes! There, before us, clear through the body of Time was the ultimate Void. But the Void was not empty. In the Void there was still Eternity. We had passed through that tremendous tunnel into nothingness only to be faced by something worse.

But do you know what just then was my greatest comfort and relief? Dare I confess it? Nothing less than to have done forever and a day with the stars! No more of these confounded galaxies and nebulae of an expanding universe! No universe at all! No multiverse either! Just simply Nothing.

It was wonderful enough being carried through the belly of Time, but it was more wonderful still, in fact it was something beyond words to all four of us, when we saw — for none of us thought of eternity — into what heavenly expanse our ship was conveying us!

It was carrying us, not only through Time's despoiled diaphragm, but actually through the whole vast atmosphere that surrounds the idea of Time; and we all told ourselves that we should be free from every landscape, seascape, airscape, firescape, that submitted to Time's domination.

Into such freedom, into such liberty, into such inexpressible escape our circular boat, our coracle from Wales, finally carried us! No more the greyness of ocean around us! No more the dazzlingness of immeasurable star-points above us, no more the blind, dumb, dense, opaque mass of earth-matter beneath us! Yes, we were free of the whole thing! We were floating in an immensity without any up or down, or right or left, or high or low! But O! how difficult I now find it to convey to the future decipherer of this log-book of mine what we all four felt when our vessel suddenly ceased to make any definite movement at all, either forward or backward, but began slowly and casually and yet quite carelessly and indifferently, turning round and round on her own axis! But why did she do this? For no other reason than the simple and absurdly obvious one that we were free of Time, we passengers on Gor Goginog's ship, G.G. Time Destroyer. We had all the time assumed — note how I bring in Time over its very corpse — that we were now free to take our ease in complete disregard of any rules, laws, systems, methods or directions from any power or from any quarter, whether in the heavens above or in the earth beneath that didn't suit the whims, wishes and inclinations of our irresponsibility. But apparently we had been making, all four of us, incredible fools of ourselves! For we were now confronted by something far more mysterious than Time and far more dominant than Time. In plain words we were now confronted by Eternity.

I don't know what my nature-created, vivisection-distorted rival, Org, felt, or what either of our girls felt, but I can assure you I said to myself at once: "Now my Gor, this is a real test for you: probably the greatest you will ever have in your time. And what I want you to do is to watch and observe and examine everything you see; and avoid if you possibly can, any form or kind of action that is not implicit in your being just what you are and observing everything you can!"

What struck me first, and this did indeed impress and amaze me, was the fact that the sight of Eternity was the sight of a repulsive, disgusting, sickly, unpleasant, disagreeable thing. What I expected to see; but with my strong predilection for painting above all the other arts and my instinctive association of all I valued in life with my sense of sight, I found it amazing that when confronted at last with this terrific ultimate thing, I found nothing in its appearance that impressed me at all; in fact I found nothing in its appearance that I could possibly describe; not because it was beyond description, but because it was beneath description. As a thing to look at, as a thing to see, Eternity was pitifully unimpressive and woefully unappealing.

It was not exactly, at least not to my sight, colourless; for I had my own fixed idea as to what colourlessness was, namely a pale grey like the greyness that surrounded the edge of the fiat, round, quoit-shaped meadow upon which we were still travelling. Eternity, as I saw it now, was like a dirty-yellowish-ivory-white vapour interpenetrating the pallid murkiness of any ordinary dreary day and suffusing the tedious duskiness of any ordinary cloudy night. The Thing's presence in the darkness was immediately made known to me by a sense quite different from the sense of sight; namely by the sense of sound. And the sound I now heard emerging from this monstrous-shaped, corpse-coloured vapour, floating about in the black darkness of night, was the most horrible sound that can possibly be imagined. It was a low distinct sucking sound, followed by a gulping and a gurgling. In fact it was the sound of swallowing on a scale too huge and horrible even to be called superhuman; and after a second's pause there came a gastric rumble, mingled with a chuckle of revolting selfglorification, as if the swallower couldn't commend itself enough for having got its victim where, in sublime satisfaction, it could begin the process of digesting what it had successfully swallowed.

What I now began to realize for the first time was the unfathomable depth of the self-satisfaction of Eternity. How often, I told myself — and O! how I longed to tell it to the filthy vapour of the colour of dirty toilet-paper that now surrounded us! — have we been fooled by the seductively awful and deceptively appalling aura which so many pious tricksters have thrown round the word “Eternity,” in order to scare us about the fate of our souls! They have long tried to drive the more sensitive among us insane by this holy trick; and indeed in certain cases, as in that of the poet Cowper, they have, to their intense delight, succeeded.

“And the worst of it is,” so my thoughts ran on, “many eloquent and inspired writers, such as Carlyle and Ruskin and even the self-possessed and sensible Mr. Emerson, have added their quota of nonsensical adoration before the foul-smelling throne of this arch-illusion. Ordinary people have been perpetually fooled by this stinking humbug; for let it be, from now on,” so I decided in my heart, “thoroughly recognized and understood that this solemn and holy thing, Eternity, is just so much rubbish and balderdash. As for the death of Time, that is only like a faithful old staircase-clock having run down. It may give us a momentary sadness, as if we yielded to a sigh of sympathy when a tired old horse that had been pulling our cart up hill for a mile stopped to rest, but this poppycock claim of Eternity, this bloated, blown-up soap-bubble of sham awfulness, cleverly concocted by our priests and rhetoricians to make us ordinary folk — babies as we are when it comes to such things! — stand hushed and trembling in silent reverence, this is a completely different story.”

As you’ve detected by this time, you who are reading the log-book of G.G.Time-Destroyer, I’m neither a very brave man nor a very wise man; but I am one to blurt out the truth both about myself and about what I see. So at this moment, when I realized the loathsome nature of this cloud of vapour from all the scavengers’ carts and all the mortuary trestles and all the hospital cess-pools in the world, I became seized with such blind fury at the humbug we human simpletons had listened to for so long, that I could no longer contain myself, but from the deck, so to speak, of our whirling, swirling green-grass vessel I deliberately spat — yes! I spat three times — into the face of Eternity: and after doing so I cried out to this reverent swallower of honest men's corpses: "I can clearly see now, you dirty, sickly-yellow, bloodsucking devourer of heroic lives, that you are nothing but the master-sham of the universe! I tell you now that the smallest living insect swallowed by you is far more godlike than you are! Who created you, I would like to know? Not great Jehovah, the formless, shapeless, nameless God of Israel! Not great Zeus, the son of Kronos, the cloud-ruling, thunder-wielding God of the ancient Greeks! Not great Jupiter, the all-powerful God of the Romans, celebrated in Blaenau by the utterance 'Iau' every Thursday, the day we Saxons associate with our thundering Thor! I'll tell you, you dirty, filthy, sickly-yellow humbug, you who pretend that you've got a position greater than the Garden of Eden, greater than Mount Olympus, and greater than the Pantheon of Rome, I'll tell you who created you! A set of cunning, cruel, mean, avaricious, greedy, crafty priests who called themselves priests of Jesus! But in reality they were anything but that. Jesus was a wise man, a good man, a godlike man, and a miraculous healer of the sick. And they also call themselves, these cunning teachers, disciples of Paul of Tarsus. But in reality they were and are anything but that. Paul was one of the greatest and most inspired men who have ever lived. His ideas were not their ideas nor was his talk their talk. Yes these priests who used the names of Jesus and Paul to support their lies invented Eternity so as to bribe us with Heaven and frighten us with Hell. Yes! you unnecessary horror! It is your priests and prelates and rulers and spiritual false prophets — in fact those very Scribes and Pharisees that Jesus was always denouncing! — who are the ones who invented you! Help me, Org! Help me, help me! I begin to feel I shall soon be overcome by this nauseating vapour! O we must all help each other! We must! We must!

“If we don’t, we’ll all be swallowed up by this curst Eternity’s loathsome, gurgling, stinking, leprous, filthy gullet, this voracious maw that these priests and pastors and elders and inquisitors and prelates and literary rhetoricians have piled up in the clear, clean, beautiful Void! So you must, you must help me, Org! And tell your lovely little Asm that she must help us as Rhitha is helping now! Then there’ll be at least two males and two females, fresh from the old Earth, who refuse to be awed by this everlasting lie! Don’t you see, Rhitha dearest, don’t you see, Asm, this monster is infinitely worse than that Old Slug through whose bloody heart we’ve got here! Think, Org, my boy, what has happened to all the other inhabitants of the Earth! Where are the millions of East India? Where are the billions of China? What has become of all the black Africans? Where are the French? the Germans? the Italians? the Spaniards? Have these atomic explosions really destroyed the whole human race? Are we four really the only specimens who are left alive? Well, there it is! I’ve always hoped the whole lot of us would soon be done for; and now it’s come! Or hasn’t it come? Answer me, Org! Answer me!”

Org answered me in the manner that was best suited to his multiform and composite structure. He rose up on one of his hairy legs and heaved towards me two walruslike shoulders, as well as what might well have been the hump of an unknown sub-oceanic camel. As for the lovely little Asm, she leapt up on the very top of Org’s grotesque back, a leap that made her bewitching hips quiver and shake in delicious concord with the undulations of her sylph-like thighs. My own precious Rhitha kissed one hand after the other as she waved her white arms towards me, while her siren-like hair floated on the sickly vapour about us so gracefully that its heavenly curves completely redeemed all the loathsome mist they invaded.

"Do you think, Org," I asked him; "Do you think, Asm?" I asked her; "Do you think, Rhitha, that if we all four danced a dance of gay erotic defiance clear into the heart of this horrible mist, crying out as we do so any ribald nonsense that comes into our heads, some randy catch such as, 'Let Eternity stew in its own bloody juice,' while we hug one another sans shame or excuse, till the hulking great horror be driven to croon, 'I'll be dancing myself if this doesn't stop soon!'"

"Yes, Gor! Yes, Gor! Yes, Gor!" they all three replied with one voice; and, led by me — for I'm a perfect leader of any crazy crew — in a few seconds, there we all four were turning head over heels, and ballet-bouncing backwards and forwards, and leaping on each other's shoulders, and making little acrobatic towers of ourselves right in the middle of Holy Eternity!

But it suddenly came over me that there must be a yet more scandalous way of conveying to this preposterous monster our discovery that all this hushed and awful solemnity, all this cringing and reverential gravity, all this watchful and altar-facing expectancy, all this thaumaturgical silence, all this heavily-charged aura of factitious worship, is nothing more than an aerial fossil, a sort of huge liquidated ammonite or porous signature of Ammon, printed, not upon clay or stone, but upon the air itself, and printed on the air thousands upon thousands of years ago, before mankind had come to realize to what this life of theirs really amounted, this pinched and prodded, this poked and pampered, this festered and pestered life, concerning the creation of which there has been far too much fuss. Yes, what came into my head now was that we four entities, remnants of a race who had decided that in any case it was time for them to disappear, ought to have the simple wit, since we were already mocking and fooling this factitious Eternity instead of bowing and scraping before it, the simple wit to invent some more palpable way of showing this monster what our opinion of him was.

“Let’s scrabble,” I growled to my three companions in a furious undertone, as we jogged up and down through the vaporous aura of this obnoxious minotaur, “in the grass of our landscape-ship for some horse-dung and cattle-dung and sheep’s turds and birds’ droppings, and when we’ve filled our pockets with these wholesome missiles, let us give Eternity a good pelting with them! And if you protest ‘To what end and purpose are we to do this?’ I reply ‘Just purely and simply to make the Monster created by these Holy Cringers and Holy Suckers realize our contempt for him!’

“Yes. O yes, my dears,” I went on as I began grubbing in the grass of our green field that was now behaving very queerly and revolving on its edge like a circling and spinning quoit, “pick up all this hard gravel and all the soft mud and all the bits of sheep’s dung and birds’ dung you can get hold of, and we’ll rush into the heart of this sanctified Erebos and hear the sod gulp and gurgle! We’ll teach this great Bugaboo to reduce its pretensions! We’ll teach it that the humblest insect measuring out its miserable days by the pug-wuggery and skull duggery of the old Slug of Time is worth far more than this defecating bubble! Ee careful as you tread on its oily fog-navel, my friends, for we don’t want to fall thumping back on our green field! But it just shows what a humbug the thing is that we’re able to tread on it at all! O, you’re so silent and hushed and holy and hoary, aren’t you, you herpeton of hypocrisy! And we must all count one-two-three correctly, mustn’t we, if we’re not to fizzle forever and ever? Yes! We’ve got to confess, have we, that the number four leads nowhere because it stays where we’ve put it, but the number three rolls and rolls and rolls till, by being all and nothing at the same time, it proves the existence of Eternity! And then we learn that where Eternity exists all natural things and all natural feelings perish! No living creature can look upon that sickly, sticky, ivory-yellow vapour without loathing it and no living creature can approach it without knowing perfectly well how it longs to make us part of it. All that is Something it turns into Nothing! Eternity is the big hole that connects being with not-being. Its chief love is to suck down all that shivers at the sight of it! See how it gloats now over your fear and my fear of being swallowed up! It knows how we'd sooner cling to any straw rather than let it devour us. But you wait! you monster! You wait, you hideous disgusting horror! We'll teach you to be yourself! We'll show you what Eternity really is!

"Yes, we'll show you the very last thing you ever thought to see, namely your contemptible self! Eternity-Scum! Eternity-Scurf! Eternity-Stink! Eternity, the filthiest lie ever to pass out of the anus of the Nonsense-doll! I tell you, you sticky, yellow, swollen monster, we four living things will turn you back into what you once were, which is a secret you think known only to those who invented you! But it is a secret we know. And you shall know we know it! You think you are an indispensable background to all living things. But that's where you go wrong. We four living creatures have reached you by passing through the heart of Time. Time is dead. And now you are going to die. You think Eternity cannot die. That is the conceit that makes you swell and swell and swell. But Eternity can die, and you are even now, though you don't know it, a dying monster!"

Thus I cried in a transport of triumph; but I never for one moment dreamed how the end would really come about; the actual end of this terrifying Eternity, that has been used by Religion for so long to frighten mankind into lick-spittling servitude. But its end came now; and came about purely and simply from its own disgusting greediness. For no sooner were we all four clear of the unspeakable horror, than do you know, O lucky posterity, what the monster did? It actually bent down, and after opening a hole in itself as wide as the Milky Way, it deliberately swallowed the dead body of Time! Yes, it swallowed it whole, just as the preachers had threatened us with being swallowed! And it was this swallowing of the corpse of Time that finished Eternity. The thing's whole vaporous covering turned in a second inside out. And beneath that covering another covering turned inside out. And after this process, which was desperately shocking to witness had gone on for several minutes — lo and behold! the thing had, so to speak, turned its very self inside out; in other words, had swallowed itself. And there before us, where Eternity had been, was simply a hollow void. The big black hole between being and not-being was gone.

We were still standing, all four of us, upon our familiar grassy landscape — though perhaps I ought not to describe Org's straddling upheaval as "standing" — when suddenly our two lovely ladies, for Asm was nearly as beautiful as Rhitha, seized each other by the hands, and, with their long white arms outstretched, pointed excitedly upward at the vast, endless, dark, unencumbered space that now surrounded us on all sides.

"Do you see who's coming, Org?" cried Asm. "Do you see who's coming, Gor?" cried Rhitha.

"O who? O who? my dears!" Org and I murmured with one voice, bewildered and puzzled and awestruck.

"Mathonwy," answered our ladies. "Mathonwy! Lord of all the sea-coasts of the World!"

Org and I stared at each other in amazement.

"There! There! There! There!" And our ladies, still clutching each other's hand, pointed to a majestic little statue of a formidably bearded monarch made of delicate porcelain, standing upright upon a china pedestal and moving rapidly through the air, pedestal and all, with as much assurance as our grassy landscape itself was displaying as it carried us up and out. And then I suddenly knew what they meant and who it was who had come. It was an image, if not himself, of the oldest of all our native Welsh gods, the father of Math of Caer Dathyl.

“Mathonwy!” cried our two ladies, “Mathonwy! Mathonwy!” they repeated in an ecstasy of delight, clasping each other’s hands as if they’d been sisters all their days and had clung to each other for support from infancy!

“But is he a real person?” I asked. “Perhaps lie’s only an ornament thrown away by some child in heaven!” Org suggested.

“No! No! No!” cried Rhitha and Asm with one voice: “It’s Mathonwy! It’s Mathonwy!”

I couldn’t help adding: “And he can’t walk with his legs as we all can! He just has to be carried through the air on a marble pedestal, as if he’d come from the British Museum.”

But neither Org’s commonsense nor my mockery could quell the obsession in ‘the breasts of our ladies. They continued to swing their clasped hands backwards and forwards, as if rocking an invisible baby in an angelic cradle; and as the porcelain monarch on his pedestal drew near, our girls seemed to lose their heads completely and began bowing and scraping before him in the most approved manner, and repeating over and over, as if they were using at one and the same time consecrated Latin and sacramental Greek, “Mathonwy have mercy upon us! Mathonwy save us! O Lord God of the Ancient Britons! Save us and help us we humbly implore thee!” And as the pedestal’d figure came quite close to us and as I gazed intently at this mysterious monarch’s face, and as I remembered how his son, Math of Caer Dathyl, had created a girl for Llew Llaw Gyffes out of the flowers of the oak and the flowers of the broom and the flowers-of the meadow-sweet, it suddenly rushed into my head that, when the poet of poets hints in his casual fashion that there are more things in heaven and earth than our, or anybody else’s philosophy dreams of, he may have met — for it is clear enough that Welshmen tickled his fancy and that when he did meet them he humoured them to the limit — one of their race, who, like myself, indulged a mania for idolatry to such an extreme that what you might call his “household gods” were collected from every country on this planet.

I would dearly have liked to have been able to boast that the moment my eyes met those of the mysterious Father of Math we exchanged a look of absolute understanding; but that would be a lie beyond even me, for this ancestral Brythonic deity took not the faintest personal interest in any of us. Indeed he glanced away from us very much as an absorbed entomologist who was making a special study of Green Hairstreaks might turn listlessly away from a couple of pairs of ordinary Meadow Browns.

“Are you people,” he enquired, throwing less interest into his tone than if he’d been asking us where in this Void was the nearest lavatory, “going north, or south, or east, or west, or are you perhaps thinking of settling down up here and are anxious to know the price, in ducats or drachmas or thalers or rupees or roubles, of a small acreage in space?”

I noticed with astonishment that, no sooner had this floating image of prehistoric sovereignty arrived close to us, than the preposterous ancient thus pedestal’d in his absurd pomp started to make lewd and lecherous leers at both our ladies. But if I was astonished at this I was still more amazed by its effect.

Both my Rhitha and Org’s Asm became a couple of austere and icy little statues of outraged virtue; and in less than a second this porcelain poppet of presumption was transformed from a prehistoric divinity into a negligible pimp, and ordered abruptly to go to hell. And to hell, or to somewhere equally unprepossessing, Mathonwy in his humiliation would certainly have gone, if a new apparition had not descended at our side upon the flat expanse of our grass-green world-ship. This was nothing less than the star Aldebaran, surrounded by a great wheel of incredibly coloured lights. We all, including our lewd little Welsh god from those prehistoric days when monarchs were allowed as many wives and concubines as they could afford, were struck dumb with awe and wonder. Mathonwy murmured and we all repeated after him, just as if we had been children at school, the word "Aldebaran." And then Aldebaran assumed control of the whole situation. Stars of this magnitude, perhaps all stars, after existing for a few thousand million years, acquire the power of communicating with other consciousnesses, no matter the distance between them; and of conveying intelligible meaning without the use of words. Thus having admitted freely to us his identity, this wonderful denizen of space proceeded at once, without any ceremony, to disclose to us the reason for its coming among us. The personal appearance of our starry visitor was less overwhelming than a person would have anticipated. As we now looked at him, Aldebaran presented the appearance of a wheel of white lights, lights not very close to each other, but some of them, although still enduringly white, shot through by gleaming rays of coloured flame. It was these flames that struck me as being quite supernatural in their hypnotic power. Aldebaran's first words, after he had made his polite obeisance to us all as a group, were addressed to Mathonwy.

"Well, master," he said, and the richly coloured lights in the broad wheel of his personality shone more and more lustrously as his wordless words entered the skull of the porcelain-headed tyrant at which they were aimed, "You and I have known each other for quite a number of these little pegs of time that our young friends here call centuries; but whether we shall go on knowing each other for an equal number of them I don't feel quite sure; though I daresay, if we both decided we wanted to, we would."

Then, with a subtlety of politeness that I never dreamed could possibly exist among the stars, he caused the marvellous wheel of his being to turn on its invisible axis just about half of all the way round; with the result that the deepest-coloured of those incredible lights, whose appearance in some queer way — whether due to the clown in me or to the blasphemer in me, for I suspect I contain both — put me in mind of the descent of the Third Person of the Trinity upon the pathetic craniums of the twelve apostles, shone now more directly and more warmly on us than on the despotic little figure of Mathonwy floating about on his pedestal.

"Well, my dear earthlings," Aldebaran began, while he indicated in a gentle undertone that conveyed to our minds, not before and not after the rest of what he said, but curiously parallel or concurrent with it, that it would be nice if we all sat down in a wide circle on the grass; a stellar hint which all four of us obeyed at once, while Mathonwy was left with no alternative, since the starry wheel was turning in the centre of us, save to pedestal it as best he could round the outside of our circle.

"What I've come to tell you," Aldebaran went on, "is that all of us stars, together with all our companions in all the gulfs and abysses of Space — and I beg you to note, my young friends, that this applies to all the astronomical bodies, such as, they tell me, you young children of the multiverse, call by such names as 'The Milky Way,' or by such names as 'dark stars,' or 'dead stars' or 'nebulae' or 'galaxies' or 'planets' or 'satellites of planets' — yes, what I have come to tell you is that all of us stars have decided between ourselves and without advice, and my old friend Mathonwy will bear me out here, from any god or any spirit or any creator or any life-force, or any life-energy, yes, purely and solely, I tell you, by our own will, our own desire, our own wish, our own conclusion, our own resolute and fixed determination, to bring to an end the whole business of celestial existence. We, the stars, have decided that all this praise of life which we have heard rising up from our own flesh and blood and from our own bowels is a wicked, cunning, crafty, treacherous, tricky, abominable lie! We have decided that this praise of Life is an outrage and an insult to all living things; and we stars know well enough of course that the minerals of which we are made, quite as much as the beasts, birds, reptiles, and fishes that we bring forth in air, water, earth, and perhaps even in fire, have all of them conscious nerves that are capable of suffering as well as conscious souls that are subject not only to unhappy moods but to misery and despair. We stars have therefore been holding a multi-cosmic conference for several million years, and our discussions at this conference have been lately growing more and more lively and intense. Indeed I think I may say we have reached a serious climax, the result of which looks very like a definite decision to end the whole thing, yes! the whole astronomical business, by a universal cosmogonic suicide. And now I must tell you that your approach to the general arena, or agora, as the old Greeks would say, of the region of our discussion, carried up as you have been by this fragment of your old green earth, has had a serious effect upon us stars. I greatly doubt whether my old acquaintance, Mathonwy, the father of the god Math who created Blodeuwedd out of flowers, realizes what the appearance of this flying landscape of yours means to us. We know, we stars of heaven, only too well what this little green landscape is. It is a planetary satellite that has rejected our stellar assembly’s verdict in favour of universal suicide. I do not hesitate to reveal to you four earthlings, nor do I blush to reveal it in the presence of my old friend Mathonwy, the god of ancient Britain, that we have already put to death and dissolved, as we well know how to do, into complete and final extinction, all the other silly little life-maniacs who have behaved like this scrap of ‘old mother earth,’ as you love to call her, is behaving now. This little flying landscape of green grass must have realized by means of those psychic currents that pass through all forms of life what you two were thinking under your ailanthus tree in that great city. I do not quite know how far my old friend Mathonwy is following me in what I am telling you now, but I hope he is.”

Here the star paused; and his great wheel of coloured lights made a slanting move, or tilt as you might put it, in the direction of Mathonwy. This pertinaciously pompous as he was also the obstinately propitiatory begetter of a whole pantheon of prehistoric divinities moved, I noticed, a little further off when those lights approached him. But Aldebaran now began a sardonic attack upon the green landscape under our feet.

“You must have said to yourself, you little scum of worm’s meat and fading weeds: ‘If I carry this loving couple sky high shall I not live by sucking the paps of their love? Shall I not live forever by loving those who will love each other forever? Shall I not make sport of these death-desiring stars by hugging to my heart these loving lovers?’” Thus did Aldebaran denounce our flying field.

It was probably my imagination but I certainly did think I felt the ground under my feet stir a little beneath this ferocious rebuke; and it struck me that Mathonwy himself floated still further away from us as if anxious to make it plain to Aldebaran that he dissociated himself from this life-worshipping vessel of grass and mud. But then to the obvious astonishment of the great glittering wheel, that was so to say, the outward intention of the inmost soul of this majestic star there appeared a new personality. Org and Asm and Rhitha and myself were astounded, and so most certainly was Mathonwy, who positively slid backwards through the air, as if his porcelain pedestal had possessed a pair of skates.

This newcomer was indeed a startling apparition. His figure was formed of some extremely malleable material that had been moulded into shape with exquisite precision and was now as hard as the hardest granite. Some accident had knocked off his head, but had not deprived him of it, for it hung at his side suspended by a delicate cord of living fibre through which the vital stream of nerves and blood and sensitized consciousness evidently still ran. This was made evident by the fact that it was through the lips of this suspended head that the newcomer addressed us all.

“There is no need,” said the head, flickering its eyelids a little, but not giving any of us the sense that it was especially speaking to him or to her, far less to the brilliant wheel of Aldebaran’s tremendous personality; “O no, no need at all for anybody here to ask who I am or why I have come. Each of you, including my lord Aldebaran, has only to look into the depths of himself and he will find the thing which you all, life-haters and life-lovers alike, have forgotten. What you have forgotten is the Way. Life has its work to do, and death ensues as if the common character of each were a thing ordered. You people consider that death has its cause, but that life has no cause. But is it really so? Heaven has its places and spaces that can be calculated. The divisions of the earth also can be assigned by men. But how shall we search for and find out the conditions of the Great Mystery? The Penumbræ once asked the Shadow: ‘You were looking down and now you are looking up. Formerly you were walking and now you have stopped. How is all this?’”

It was then that one of the coloured lights in the wheel of the great star spoke and asked a question.

"My question is this," said the coloured light, "and I beg you to answer it plainly and simply: What sword is that which I see hidden in the folds of your dress?"

And the newcomer answered without a moment's hesitation: "It is the Sword of Heaven... it is regulated by the five elements... its unsheathing is like that of the Yin and the Yang. It is held fast in the spring and summer: it is put in action in the autumn and winter. When it is thrust forward there is nothing in front of it; when lifted up there is nothing above it; when laid down there is nothing below it; when wheeled round there is nothing left on any side of it: above, it cleaves the floating clouds, and below it penetrates to every division of the earth. This is the sword of the Son of Heaven."

Then did the great star of Aldebaran lift up his voice. "Who are you," he enquired, "who thus knows and understands the mystery of the Sword of Heaven?"

The voice of the great star was so authoritative that the small terra-cotta image became so anxious to satisfy him that he began with a pathetic stammer: "Kwa... Kwa... Kwa... Kwa... Kwa... Kwangtze is what they call me at home in China: but my enemies call me the stupid perverter of Laotze, because they contend that my interpretation of the Tao or the Way is a distortion of the writings of Laotze; when, on the contrary, they are the natural development of Laotze's teaching."

It was at this point that Mathonwy, who had been drawn (at least that is what I told myself) a little nearer by his aboriginal curiosity, could not resist uttering the stupid words: "Is this 'Tao' then, like me, a god who has been lost and found?"

At this question Kwangtze moved quite close up to this porcelain-pedestal'd one, who was pontificating around us like an imposing but evasive moth, and, when he could have touched him if he had wanted to do so, he replied: “No, grandfather of the ancientest of Great Britons, I cannot say that I find any resemblance in you to the Tao. When my friend Po-Yu was in his sixtieth year his views became changed. He had never done anything but consider the views which he held to be absolutely right. But now he has come to condemn them as wrong. But Po-Yu does not realize at all that what he now calls right is what for fifty-nine years he has been calling wrong. All things have the life which we know. But we do not see its root. They have their goings forth but we do not know the door by which they depart. Ah! Ah! There is no escaping this. So it is! So it is!”

Something about the tone of Kwangtze and something about everything he said annoyed my friend Org to a point of fury. At last this multi-formed creature with something of the gorilla, something of the ox, something of the walrus, something of the hippopotamus, something of the seal, something of the camel, and a lot of the tortoise in him, burst out, “What do you think you are doing, you Chinese idol, talking to us in this respectful strain? My mate Asm here, and myself whose name is Org, have decided to follow this great scholar, Doctor Gor, and his lady-love Rhitha, in their wise determination to bring to an end the whole wretched crowd of living creatures who have been engendered or have been spawned, however you like to put it, upon the planets and their satellites, creatures who have been nurtured and matured by the heat of that radiant and royal star, our glorious Sun. Furthermore, you dribbling dotard of a heathen Chinese, it is my duty to inform you that this resplendent star Aldebaran, by the light of whose multicoloured lanterns we are now sailing through the seventh-thousand Heaven, has just told us that at the great conference of all the stars in the sky the stars themselves have decided upon a universal suicide, and by this means, upon leaving Space as clean and healthy and bare and empty as it was in the old great times, when there was nothing there and when there was not anything anywhere."

"But, but, but, but, O superior man Org," protested Kwangtze, "have the sublime stars fully realized all the hidden implications in their momentous decision?"

At this point the shrill high-pitched voice of Asm piped up: "I am only a female, Professor Kwangtze, so forgive me if I speak crudely and bluntly! I don't know what you mean by the word 'implications,' but I know very well how nice it is when a house is entirely clean, and when there are no longer any bugs or fleas or lice or moths or beetles or rats or mice on the floor or in the cupboard!"

With my usual interest in every aspect of a situation that had any chance of ending in a general shindy, I had been keeping my eye on our pedestal'd deity, for whom Snowdon must have been a sort of Mount Olympus, and now when I saw him about to speak, I put my hand on Rhitha's arm, fearful lest she would have backed up Asm's words by referring to dust and ashes, or even to the webs of spiders.

"The most serious of the 'implications' referred to by our authority on the 'yin' and the 'yang' and on the true nature of the 'Tao,' is surely, or am I wholly lacking in metaphysical logic," so Mathonwy began, "the unavoidable deduction that since all of us will then be reduced to non-entity and non-existence, and since the whole cosmos will be nothing but empty space, or what we Ancient Britons used to call 'Diddym,' or the ultimate Void, things will have returned to their original condition before the creation of the World. No! I must not say 'things will have returned,' for there will be no 'things' there! The only word I can use is our old Welsh word 'Diddym,' the Void. All that is anything will then be nothing. But if this be so, O master of learning who hast come to us from the Celestial Empire, does it not prove that the god-like experiment of creating a world in space full of revolving masses of matter, possessed of the power of producing life from the four elements, has been a complete failure? For to make such a stupendous creation of so much from nothing at all into a success would surely, O Superior One from Pekin, have implied everlastingness in the created? And do not therefore the two voices to which we have listened — first the voice of the lives evolved from the stars and second the voice of the stars themselves, both of them advocating suicide — condemn all this servile, obsequious, cringing, sucking-up to, and all this lick-spittle polyglottic reverence for, the creation of the World, on the simple ground that it itself wants to perish?"

After this commentary upon the cosmogonic situation from the father of that powerful magician Math — who was the uncle of Gwydion the son of Don, and also the uncle of Arianrod, the mother of Llew Llaw Gyffes, for whom Math made a wife out of the blossoms of the meadow-sweet, the blossoms of the broom, and the blossoms of the oak and called her Blodeuwedd — there was a deep silence beneath the gleaming lights of Aldebaran. But lo and behold! another visitor from out of Space now appeared! And before the bewildered gaze of our two girls, who had instinctively once more seized each other's hands, and before us all who followed their gaze, appeared the palpable shape of Gautama Buddha! Yes! clear to the sight of every one of us was that familiar throne, that familiar lotus-leaf calm, and that to us unfamiliar trance of some inscrutable merging of the human in the divine!

Calmly for a space that image regarded us; and then at length, "I have been persuaded to leave Nirvana," were the words that floated out into the air from that enthroned figure; though, closely as I scrutinized this prophet of the pure intellect, I could not see his lips moving, "in order to ask both the star Aldebaran and this Earth-landscape which so boldly refuses to commit suicide, whether ordered to do so by an assembly of stars or by an assembly of the most articulate creatures projected by the planets of these stars, I have come, I say, to ask them both if there isn't a possible third course that could be taken, which were neither suicide nor defiance of the will to commit suicide?"

It was at this moment, while everybody waited for some answer to the Buddha's calm but authoritative words, that my Rhitha suddenly jumped up from the grass and rushed to the side of Kwangtze, and lifting up his head from the end of his jangled, jerked, jowled, jiggered, jockeyed, jungled, jumbled, joggled, jabboranded neck, she held it gently against her own body, not so much like a mother as like a sympathetic sister, and held it in such a position that he could see through the air the Buddha upon his throne floating quite close to Mathonwy upon his pedestal.

The Buddha missed nothing of what Rhitha had done. "Let his head rest now, little lady," he said. "I will see to it that there shall be a cushion beneath it."

Rhitha obediently but extremely slowly and cautiously released the head of Kwangtze, which, sure enough, did promptly relax upon a willowy, billowy, pillowy cloud, of a beautiful dark-blue tint such as the waves of the sea sometimes wear at the close of twilight.

"How did it happen, O last of all the Superior Ones, whom I expected to meet in these empty regions, that your neck was pulled out to such a pitiful length?"

"It was done, O Kohinoor of wisdom, by a couple of impetuous lovers, one from the furthest possible distance from the ocean in his island midlands, and the other from the furthest possible distance from the ocean in her continental midlands; the one from the Old World and the other from the New World, but each of them entirely devoid of that quality which only sailors possess."

"And what quality may that be, O friend of Laotze and critic of Confucius?"

"Keeping one's head!" replied Kwangtze with a chuckle; "and may I," he added, "be permitted to keep this divine cushion when you, its beatific bestower, return to Nirvana across the Ganges?"

It was clear to me, as I watched carefully the features of the enthroned Buddha, that among innumerable qualities with which Brahma or Para-Brahma had endowed him there was not the faintest tinge of the quality of humour. Not a flicker of the faintest smile at this sally of the demi-decapitated Kwangtze crossed that sublime countenance. But my attention was soon drawn away from both Kwangtze's foolery and Gautama's gravity by the resonant voice of Aldebaran enquiring with lucid directness just what was this third path that might lead us out of this great cosmic dilemma. The answer from that lotus-surrounded seat of judgment evidently struck both our ladies as the right and just one, for they clasped hands just as they had done at the beginning of our adventure, and waved their free arms in exultant agreement.

"Let all who wish to perish perish," was the Buddha's judicial decision, "and let all who wish to live live!"

And then I realized that the masculine minds of Org and myself did not agree with this. I mean that the sort of free chaos or general anarchy of individual choice suggested by the Buddha's final words — yes! and the lotus throne had vanished after this judicial utterance and the visitor from Nirvana had returned whence he came — was more in harmony with a woman's feelings than with a man's. A man feels a longing to organize and execute elaborate strategy and exhaustive tactics, whereas a woman takes each situation on its own ground.

During the very act of exchanging this thought between ourselves — and after all, though I am an egoistic orator-actor and Org is a mythological and multiple mixture of fish, bird, beast and reptile, we had come to understand each other pretty well — our attention was distracted by a totally unexpected flash of lightning and roll of thunder and out of the centre of a dark cloud that came sailing by over our heads we heard going on the most extraordinary argument that I've ever heard in all my whole life!

I hadn't seen any natural cloud for a long time; for the grey rim of the circular landscape, which was now carrying us into space, might have been smoke or mist or water, and around us on all sides now was nothing but dusky, though not pitch-black, empty air: and the sight of this natural cloud, just the sort of cloud that I have seen so often in early afternoons in Blaenau, and a sister-cloud to so many other familiar ones such as I used to see when I went to Llandderfel in my courting days to visit Rhitha. And yet, here was this ordinary, natural cloud, sailing along, only about a hundred yards above our heads and out of it was proceeding such a colloquy as neither Rhitha nor I, nor Org or Asm, had ever dreamed of hearing, and certainly were never likely to hear again.

"If you want me to sleep with you tonight," was what the most beautiful feminine voice it is possible for me to imagine was now saying, "you must interfere at once in this dastardly business and prevent these mad stars and these mad people from playing this preposterous game with a life-force they have neither created nor can understand."

"You talk too loud and you talk too quick, Hera, my darling bedfellow. It is in order to have this question fully threshed out that I have brought you all with me here, where we can get some inkling of what these stars and these mortal earth-creatures are up to. I confess their intentions and purposes strike me so far, from what we have been listening to, as if they had completely lost what little reason they may originally have possessed."

"Would it not be a good thing," another female voice broke in, a voice that had a certain masculine resonance mixed with its mellow feminine sagacity, "if I were to put on my armour and take my spear and shield and go down there and confront them all?"

"What I want to know," a man's voice began in so hoarse and husky a manner that it was clear the speaker was extremely old: "is whether this ground is a portion of the bosom of Mother Gaia, and, if it is, I want to know where the rest of her is?"

At this there was clearly audible among these newcomers a rumble like thunder, and I could see that Aldebaran, with his coloured lights and with that curious effect of a wheel which emanated from him, was suddenly sliding away from us in a direction opposite to the one from which this Olympian cloud had descended.

"Are you still, O my crazy begetter," said a voice that I knew by instinct to be the voice of Zeus himself, "so devoted to your old Mother the Earth that you can't get it into your head that with us immortals every portion of our bodies is—"

It was clear at this point that an older, wider, fainter, weirder, remoter, much more mysterious voice intervened, a voice much less allied to the feelings of us mortals or even to the feelings of a radiant star like Aldebaran; and at the sound of this voice it was evident to me that the ground under my feet shivered a little, as if with the hearing of it some ancient wrong came back, some appalling outrage done to her — long before Mathonwy in Britain, or Kwangtze in China, or Gautama Buddha in India, had been raised by Fate, or by Destiny, or by Chance, or perhaps simply by Necessity, to their present thrones — had given her whole nature a shock and all her flesh a hurt and an outrage so great that its effect could never pass away.

“It was thou thyself, O Kronos,” responded Ouranos, “that with the jagged flint she gave thee didst scatter wide upon the waters the live seed of thy own fathers loins!”

“Have you forgotten,” retorted Kronos, “how your vile lust-work upon the tender flesh of my mother the Earth forced her to give birth to monsters, yes! to creatures who fouled her delicate body with a hideous brutality only suited to Tartaros and Erebos? Have you forgotten this?”

It was then — while it seemed to me that all of us who were present, whether mortal or immortal, whether male or female, waited with a curiously desperate interest the issue of this debate, as if something far more serious than victory in argument hung upon it, yes! as if something of cosmic importance were at stake — that my sweet Rhitha, white and trembling, suddenly clung to my neck and whispered in my ear: “Gor, darling Gor, I’ve seen that awful face! And, do you know, it is... it is the same appalling fiend I saw nibbling at the rim of the moon!”

“Hush, hush, my sweet!” I whispered back to her, “we mustn’t disturb this honourable company with our mad individual visions of fear and terror! Besides, any of these powerful beings could drive that greedy devil back into his native hell!”

“But he’s whispering to me, Gor darling! O, I’m so frightened of him!”

“He can’t hurt you here, my sweet!” I whispered. “Do for heaven’s sake be careful! I don’t want them to hear you!”

But my own curiosity broke out just then and I begged Rhitha to ask him what his name was. Such trust in me did my darling have that she obeyed me at once with some soundless question in the depths of her heart which the devil up there, invisible to the rest of us, could hear, and not only could hear, but was impelled to answer.

"O Gor, Gor," Rhitha murmured, while the sharp little nail of the longest finger with which she clung to my neck caused me considerable discomfort — indeed I fancied I felt little drops of blood from it running down under my vest. "He says," she explained to me, "that his name is Moloch; and that he is the god of the people who lived in Palestine before the Israelites came there, and that he hates the Jews more bitterly than any of us Christians hate them. O Gor darling" — and here her voice shivered till it was scarcely audible; for it was clear that this appalling fiend whose name was Moloch had terrified my girl into a wild panic— "O Gor! Darling Gor! Do you know what he says? He says that he will have me sacrificed on his—"

She was interrupted by the sudden appearance at our side of the kindest, gentlest, most comforting being I have ever seen in my whole life. She was a goddess — I was absolutely sure of that, but it was impossible not to be so reassured by her presence that you didn't care whether she was a mortal or an immortal; she was just a lady, a woman, a female, and one under whose protection you felt you were safe forever. This being took my Rhitha's ice-cold forehead in her two hands, and when she had kissed it and released it, she whispered to us both: "Don't you be afraid of Moloch. I know him and all his little games. He's after my daughter up there now! But I'll make them all follow me — and maybe our father Zeus with a well-aimed thunderbolt will do for that wretch forever! I'll beg him to! But I must get them all there to rescue Aphrodite anyway! So don't you worry, either of you!"

In a moment she was off and had entered that Olympian cloud, and that also in a moment was off', and Rhitha and I could see it growing smaller and smaller and smaller, till it finally disappeared. And I now felt a pressing need to change my attitude to what was happening. Yes, I must give up this pose of reverential expectation and adopt a quite different tone. I had no sooner decided this when an event occurred of a nature so startling as to sweep into the limbo of forgotten things all that I expected or was pretending to expect.

The whole ground upon which we stood, with its circular horizon of what might have been either grey mist or grey water, began to heave and shake. Evidently, judging from the domestic altercation we had just heard, between the voice of Kronos and the voice of Ouranos, this living fragment of the sacred flesh of Gaia, the ancient Earth, was anxious to make it clear to the present company of living consciousnesses gathered about her that she definitely refused to join this suicidal pact of the existing inhabitants, whether human, subhuman, or superhuman, whether animal, vegetable, or mineral, of this universe, or this multiverse, or this cosmos or this Congeries of Cosmoi, and had decided to shake them all off, to reject and falsify their unworthy hatred of life because life brought suffering, and to go on living at all cost and in spite of all, until, if at last she was forced to die, she would die fighting for life! I looked at Rhitha and took her hand; and we called upon Org and Asm to come close to us, which they unhesitatingly did; and the graceful Asm took Rhitha's free hand, and the grotesquely-shaped Org allowed me to clutch with my five human fingers one of his semi-marine, semi-river-swamp tusks. So there we four were, holding fast together in a line of self-defence. But it must be admitted that we were by no means certain as to which side we were on; since we sympathized so utterly with the idea that to live was not enough compensation for the sufferings and miseries of life, but at the same time we were, all four of us, without question so linked with, so involved with, so concerned with, so entwined with, so grounded on and founded on, our mother the earth that it was impossible for us, whether called upon to do so by all the angels of heaven or by all the devils of hell, to separate ourselves from her.

But something about the resolution and independence of this fragment of our old earth, combined with this heaving and rocking of everything beneath our feet, including green grass and grass-mould and gravel and rock-sand and stones of basalt and bits of granite, had a remarkable effect upon all the visitors who had recently descended or ascended, like celestial vultures, upon our privacy. The first to go was Kwangtze, who although considerably absorbed, as the folds of his Chinese garments swirled about him like disordered sails on a drifting ship, with the one important task of keeping his head on his shoulders, did not fail to utter from that same head a Taoistic goodbye.

“Perfect enjoyment,” he bade us all remember, “is to be without enjoyment; the highest praise is to be without praise. Heaven does nothing and thence comes its serenity. Earth does nothing and thence comes its rest. By the union of these two inactivities all things are produced. How vast and imperceptible is the process! Heaven and Earth do nothing, and yet there is nothing that they do not do!”

Certainly, when Kwangtze was gone, either independently of the Tao he had been teaching us or under its patient influence, Nothingness spread her indescribable wings and floated over our heads like a vast moth. And then I realized that Mathonwy also was leaving us forever, for down upon us from his departing pedestal was wafted the old Welsh word “Diddym,” meaning “The Ultimate Void.” And finally, at the very last, bequeathing to all four of us the weird sensation of being more than just absolutely alone, the great star Aldebaran, with all his coloured lights turning and burning in their revolving wheel about him, shot out of sight.

Led by an instinct that must have been entirely different in each of us four, we fell side by side on our knees: that is to say we three human-shaped earthlings knelt, while Org lowered first a jungle-hairy, desert-bony, prairie-skinny knee and then a sea-ribbed, ocean-bladdered, swamp-bulbous knee, and while we three gazed inevitably upwards, to the emptiness above, Org with his sub-oceanic eye-balls protruding out of his head stared straight in front of him towards the horizon.

Thus we all four remained; and my own impression is that every single one of us, not excluding our dear grotesque Org, enjoyed, during those few moments, the most intense realization of the Self and Not-Self — I mean of the self that feels itself to be itself, and of the outward objects at which that inner self looks out and which include that inner self's own body and that inner self's own bodily senses, by means of which that inner self grasps the nature of the Not-Self, which surrounds it, as it surrounds all of us, on every side.

I know I am trying to describe the feelings of each of us four at that moment in a heavy ponderous pedantic manner, but that has been the fault of my family for many generations. The truth is we Blaenau people — for our very name means "further on" — have an instinctive tendency to what you might call the dramatics of metaphysics, in other words a taste for dramatizing all the "acts" and "scenes" of philosophical speculation, just as if the ultimate categories of Time and Space themselves were only really interesting and exciting as the background to the stage-set of the drama of our individual life. We have only to glance at the sympathetic treatment of the people of Wales, whether as great princes like Glendower, or as plain men like Fluellen in the plays, to see what a terrific influence on Shakespeare the Welsh attitude to life exercized, just as it did on Milton; and in both these cases the influence was on identical lines if you cut out the comic touch along with its Welsh retort— "if you can mock a leek, you can eat a leek!" In other words it encouraged the two greatest of the world's poets, only rivalled by Homer and by Dante and by Goethe, to turn our philosophical attitude to the ultimate mystery of existence into emotional and dramatic acts and scenes of a personal play.

All the world's a stage
And all the men and women merely players.

Thus, as I tried later to analyse the strange feelings that we four — two males and two females — experienced at that moment in our lives, although it is, I fancy, pretty certain that nobody really can speak for anybody but himself, what struck me most powerfully was the queer fact that, though we had round us so few of the objects with which we generally satisfy our longing for Nature's wonders, our emotional response to the vast Not-Self was not lessened but increased. I may be speaking only for myself, but I think not. We were all so utterly surrounded by infinite endlessness that it seems to me our emotions must have been, if not identical, at least very similar. Anyhow we were all reduced to an awed silence; and one thing at least is certain, namely that the feelings which passed through us have never been expressed in the world before, because they have never been felt in the world before.

As the first shock wore off, or perhaps it would be more appropriate to say toned down, we all four automatically crouched down on the grass and "took," as we say, "stock" of our extraordinary situation.

It was neither daylight where we found ourselves now, nor was it what we all four had come to call twilight. Of the two twilights familiar to us, the morning twilight and the evening twilight, what we were now experiencing was more like the morning one in its general psychic effect on our nerves, for it brought with it complete uncertainty as to what was going to happen next; whereas with the evening twilight there are always hints and tokens and signs, outside us as well as inside us, of the approach of all that the word sleep suggests to tired mortals.

There were no clouds. There was no mist. There were no heavenly bodies to be recognised by the quality of their starry lights, or by their zodiacal arrangements like some cosmic wizard's sorcery-map of celestial predictions hung up for all his pawns and puppets to see. There was simply nothing, where we four were crouching in a group, from the horizon to the zenith; nothing north, nothing south, nothing east, nothing west. It certainly was a queer sensation to feel that if we could fly to any single point in that vast aerial dome above our heads, and if we were able to mount up from that particular point — up and out, out and up, whether with our grassy landscape or without our grassy landscape — we could ascend for ever and still find nothing.

"Come, my friends," I said at last, "let's decide what we'd better do now."

The idea of deciding what to do in an emptiness as complete as this certainly struck a rather comical note.

The phrase "decide what to do" is so pathetically sensible that my question was as if a saint in heaven had enquired where they kept their soap. I did not miss the fact that, as soon as I had spoken, our two young ladies' hands met in an instinctive self-protective gesture. They must have felt, though my darling Rhitha really knew me too well to indulge long in such feelings, that after all my heroic talk about a universal suicide in the face of the cruel sufferings of life, I might start suggesting to Org that, before finishing ourselves off, it might be well to begin with the sacrifice of our frailer companions. At any rate with a vague idea of lessening the solemnity of the desperate silence we had all fallen into, I abruptly asked a question which I had longed to ask ever since Rhitha and I first encountered this queer pair.

“By the way, Org, forgive me if it’s a rude question, but where and when did you and Asm first meet?”

“No difficulty about answering him on that point, is there, old girl?” replied Org, with what might have been called a chuckle, but which really was a multiple sound containing that indescribable noise that certain fish make when they receive a deadly blow, and also containing a distorted hee-haw with something in it of a groan of utter weariness, and also something in it of a gulp of pure amusement, such as an overloaded donkey, observing a baby greedily sucking a carrot, might make.

Seeing that his lovely little slender lady gave him a sympathetic smile, Org went on: “I was the product, my friend, if you really want to know” — and as I heard him I had an odd feeling as if we were in a church or temple, but not a temple to the Divinity announced by Jesus, but to a god altogether unknown to the human race and worshipped only by four-legged animals— “the product,” Org continued, “of one of the experiments of these vivisectionists. Whether they did it in London, or in New York or in Paris or in some university outside these big cities, I cannot say. As you two have discovered for yourselves the cruelties deliberately indulged in, under the excuse of benefiting the human race, but in reality solely to satisfy the twin lusts of these fiendish men — a lust for cruelty for its own sake and a lust for knowledge for its own sake, two appalling lusts both inhuman and dehumanizing, and both of them as un-christian as the most horrible barbarities of the ancient Chinese, and when combined together, as they are with these vivisectionists, culminating in cruelties such as would make Tiberius and Caligula and Nero, and even Gilles de Retz himself, as these devils thirst for new victims in the diverse hells of their own hearts, shiver with envy!"

If my words about "deciding what to do" had sounded queer in our present situation, this philosophical and historical discourse from a creature as grotesque-looking as Org struck us all as absolutely fantastic. But Org went on, as sublimely unconscious, as we all are, when beside ourselves with indignation, of any incongruity:

"Every living thing trembles with terror at the presence of any single one of these abominable men, men who deliberately and daily practise cruelties that would make a sworn tormentor from the Spanish Inquisition gasp. Well, I was created by these vivisectionists in a manner I need not harrow your feelings by describing. But they made the mistake of not allowing for the development of my intelligence. Of course what they chiefly enjoy is practising upon response-nerves; but they are all so obsessed by this double-lust, the lust to cause pain and the lust to get knowledge, that, like other cruelty-drunk beings, they so kill their normal human feeling that, unless their unspeakable practices become illegal, the whole human race may, when a few more centuries have passed, be entirely ruled by these demons of Knowledge through Cruelty.

"Well, as I was saying, the one thing they forgot, and you can bet it would be the thing in their damnable inhumanity that they'd naturally forget, was the growth, under their little games, of my intelligence. Well, the result of this was that I escaped. And what then? Why then, quite naturally, I made for the sea; and by some rapid swimming, and also by the splendid device of clinging to whatever was available in the sterns of the fastest vessels I encountered, I managed to approach an island from which voices of the far-off past called out to me and promised to find me a companion; and it was here that I met Asm who had done exactly what I had done — that is to say, escaped. The people who were cruel to her after her parents in Llandderfel were dead were relatives living in an island in the north of Britain — the isle in fact that the ancient Romans used to call 'Ultima Thule,' though today it has another name, a name which Asm wants to forget. She escaped from it by joining some group of adventurers; and it was among the mounds of the lost gods of Easter Island that we met, and it was among the mounds of the lost gods that we 'plighted our troth,' as Asm has taught me to call it. She was never frightened of me or horrified at me. From the first she was the same Asm that she is today—"

"But how on earth," I began, and then remembering that, wherever we were on this fragment of Mother Gaia, we could hardly be said to be "on earth,"

"how," I went on, "did you two learn to fly through the air?"

"O that little trick is due to Asm's credit entirely," the queer monster hurriedly replied: "She had been to an electricity school and being far more intelligent than any other pupil or indeed than any teacher there and being as original in her ideas as I am in mine, and being also—"

Here the lovely Asm jumped up, put her hand on the monster's mouth, gave his protuberant snout a touch with her upper lip, and sat down again.

"Yes, hers entirely," Org continued. "Under my scales here," and he scraped the back of one of his fins with the tip of one of his hooves, "I've got a neat little ball of electrified feathers; and Asm has got a similar one in that leather purse in her belt, and we were voyaging fast through the air to the coast of Scotland, when, with a rush of meteor-fire and a spurt of lights in the shape of a wheel, the star Aldebaran overtook us and swept us along in its resplendent trail."

"Have you and Asm," I enquired, "changed your opinion as to the desirability of all the creatures of our old planet Earth sacrificing themselves in one supreme act of self-immolation, or, to put it more bluntly, of suicide, or have you reverted, after hearing the words of the mother of Aphrodite, to the old-fashioned notion held by our parents that self-murder is a wicked and blasphemous act?"

There was a considerable pause among us four persons after this speech from me. But Org answered at last: "Yes," he said, "I veritably believe there has been a change in my opinion on this important point; but I don't think it was under the influence of the mother of Venus-Aphrodite, nor of the many-coloured wheel of the star that swept us down here, that this change occurred. I really do believe, though you may laugh at me for saying so, that my present inclination to reject this self-destructive pact is the result of several years of silent and secret cogitations while growing up to become what I am under the hands of these criminally cruel vivisectors. You see, these wicked and abominable men, obsessed by their mania for knowledge at any price, have completely distorted all natural human pity, all natural human consideration, all natural human feeling; so that what they have really done in all these probings and proddings into the most sensitive nerves they could find was simply to kill the thing in themselves which common humanity has come to call our Conscience. This being dead, they now can go steadily forward with their astounding collection of careful data about the psychological, pathological, neuropathic reactions to pain and discomfort, displayed by every organism in the world that Nature has endowed with sensitivity to suffering. And this interminable portfolio of writhings and squirmings, this well-indexed extravaganza of paroxyms of terror, this accumulative register of what man can do to his fellow animals, is being kept purely for knowledge, yes! for knowledge for its own sake. 'Now,' says the scripture, 'abideth faith, hope and charity,' but the vivisectionists say: 'far greater than any of these is knowledge.' And consider also, my dear friends," and as Org went on I was touched to see the worship in Asm's eyes as she regarded him, "what a poor, thin, hollow, echoing cavern of misery and of despair, knowledge would be if it were all we had! There would we stand, there would we sit, there would we lie with sensitive bodies, minds, adventurous imaginations, all withered up in this accumulation of vivisectional details about experiments on living nerves, without the faintest chance of exerting what is the most godlike of all powers, namely the power of creation! For how, I ask you, my kind friends, how in the name of the supreme Demon, could any creature who knew everything that could be known, who possessed in fact all the knowledge that these insane scientists, by means of their incalculable cruelties, are seeking to get, how could such a creature be moved by any exciting desire or emotion as he huddled down in this transparent vision of all knowledge? The only way it could be made tolerable — don't you agree with me, Gor? don't you agree with me, Rhitha? — would be if by some lucky chance there were to appear some little tiny knot of contrariety in the infinite sameness of this glassy, horny, horizonless, purposeless, monotonous, and most horribly comprehensible cosmos, just one tiny little speck or blob or atom of inexplicable mystery! But there isn't one jot or tittle of such a thing! Science understands all. What it can never understand are the feelings, the moods, the fancies, the thoughts, the caprices, the manias, the whimsies, the emotions of one single living creature! And it is this that so infuriates these inquisitors of vivisection, as they go on pinching and probing and poking and pricking and persecuting and pillorying the nerve-centres and nerve-channels of every creature they can catch in order to collect in their note-books, every conceivable twinge of pain and shrinking from pain."

So exhausted was our poor multi-membered Org by this long swim in the waves of oratory, that he now sank down on the green grass with a sigh like that of an enormous octopus, under a mile of salt water.

It was at this point in our extraordinary adventure that I became conscious of two significant things. The first of these things was that our ladies had once more joined hands. And the second was that the field of green grass on which we were travelling through space was stirring and heaving again in its own body.

I moved up closer to Rhitha, for we were all aware of a premonition of the coming of some event completely different in its nature from anything that had so far happened.

And as I moved to Rhitha's side, for the three of us who were bipeds were now on our feet, Org, our terraqueous monster — whose appearance suggested that his vivisecting creators had tried to intermingle a walrus with a hippopotamus and to bestow on the issue of this mixture the fins of a shark and the feathers of a wild-goose — moved simultaneously to Asm's side, so that we were now just as we had been when we saw that sticky and slimy python Eternity perish by the horrible greed with which it devoured Time. But all around us now was nothing but hollow, empty, purposeless, meaningless space, extending without limit in every direction, and you can believe, if anything in my tale remains credible to you, how ridiculous to us four living beings — as we felt all around us the tasteless, colourless, impalpable, viewless, scentless, indefinable presence of boundless space — would have been the idea that the universe had some thinkable limit and did not stretch out forever in all directions, of the still more ridiculous idea that it had a definite beginning or when the hour comes will have a definite end.

And then — yes, even as we waited in a weird sort of coma, or trance, or enchanted suspension of all normal thought — we distinctly saw in the air above us the enormous superhuman features of two colossal countenances, one on the left and one on the right, evidently belonging to a couple of supernatural beings who were clearly disputing between themselves upon some abysmal topic.

I knew without being told, for she pressed my fingers with a convulsive clutch, that Rhitha was reminded of the vulture face of her enemy Moloch as she gazed at the colossal countenance on the left, but being something of a virtuoso in demons I knew well that this one was far more formidable. In any case we all four listened spellbound and enthralled by what we were hearing, not to speak of what we were seeing, when one or the other of us dared to look at one or the other of those two faces.

"Have you changed your opinion, Satan?" said the right-hand face to the left-hand face, "about the Beginning of things?"

"You mean about the Beginning of the universe?" answered the left-hand face.

"That's what I mean," affirmed the right-hand one, "because, if you have, I should dearly love to hear what new idea you have got."

"As for yourself, Jehovah," queried Satan, "I suppose you still go on with your old illusion that you actually created this universe that has now entirely vanished, with the exception of that absurd scrap down there, of the wretched little planet called Earth upon which you pretend you created Adam and Eve as the ancestors of the human race, of whom some still worship you as their god — although, as I have so often compelled you to admit, in those days you were not the god of any tribe of mortals except the Jews, who are now so oddly separated from all other races and so ridiculously hated by so many stupid and ignorant people? So you still think of yourself, do you, as the Creator of this universe whose miserable earthlings have recently destroyed themselves and whose 'nebulæ' and ‘galaxies,’ as they call them, of suns and stars have now imitated them and done themselves in too? If, as you boast, you really did create this beastly universe, that has now finished itself off except for that cheeseparing of a bowling-green down there and the disgusting little maggots that are crawling about on it, is, I ask you, this creation of creatures who find life so unpleasant that their only desire is to kill themselves, anything to boast of?”

Jehovah smiled.

“Shall I never be able to make you see, O stupidest and silliest of all possible Satans, that the only thing worth having, whether within or without the universe is consciousness? All matter is conscious, just as I am and just as you are, and all that it gives birth to is conscious also. All air is conscious with all that lives in it. All water is conscious in the same way with all its offspring, and so also is fire. You, Satan, are only yourself and only happy in yourself when you are hating and destroying. Of course there are a lot of things, and a lot of spirits and souls, that you cannot destroy; and for that very reason you hate them more than you hate the ones you can destroy. But I beg you to consider this problem a little closer. What, let me ask you, O great hater and destroyer, is enjoyment in life? What is it that prevents you, yes, you yourself, the great Demon of the universe, from ending your life, when you know very well that in the battle between you and me neither of us can ever win, and neither of us can destroy the other? Shall I tell you what prevents you with all your mania for killing from killing yourself? Nothing less than your worship of self-consciousness! Once dead, your consciousness of being alive would be gone, and as far as you were concerned, you not only would not be yourself any more, but you very well might never have been at all.

“Now it is a queer thing, my good Satan, if you will permit your ancient antagonist to use a syllable as unpleasing to your ears as ‘good,’ how tenacious most created creatures are of life, and yet how not only recklessly and desperately but even casually and carelessly they will throw away life for all sorts of fanciful purposes that are neither according to my will nor according to your will — for such purposes I mean that are neither creative nor destructive, but are simply playful. In fact what both of us, you as a breaker-down, and I as a builder-up according to our different natures, take seriously, these queer human creatures of the planet Earth take like a game. And now apparently this infection of play-acting — caught I daresay from these capricious and whimsical descendants of Adam with his Garden and of Noah with his Ark — has affected all the constellations and all the stars, so that they also are enjoying this pretty little silly dramatic game of killing themselves, and as far as I can see — and I believe I can see quite as far as you can if not further — most of them, and, in a minute or two, all of them, will have finished doing it, and you and I and these four wretched little entities on this scrap of flying greenery will be the only conscious selves left alive in Space."

Here the right-hand countenance of the two terrific faces that were now looking straight down upon us permitted itself to indulge in the most extraordinary smile I have ever seen in my whole mortal life. Nor was I lacking in the intelligence to notice another thing, though whether our dear monster Org had the wit to see it too I haven't the faintest idea. He certainly kept exchanging very significant glances with his partner Asm; so very likely he had seen it! What I saw was this; and I knew well by the pressure of her fingers that my Rhitha had caught it too. There had passed across the demonic countenance on the left a shiver of unquestionable panic! It didn't last, but it had undoubtedly shown itself. And I asked myself just what particular word from the lips of the face on the right had caused this spasm of fear? Or was it simply the indescribable depth of his companion's smile, a smile that certainly struck me as if it were the whole of space smiling, or rather — for I couldn't even imagine space as a whole, as if it were as much of space as I could grasp with my limited human mind — smiling at me, at my fumbling mind, at all four of us standing so pathetically on that grassy field, and finally, so it seemed to me, and it was this very likely that so scared the Devil, at the whole crazy situation? It was then that a voice from the face on the right spoke again.

"Have I, my only companion for millions of centuries, to repeat still once more for your forgetful ears the tale of our first meeting? Well! I have at least the excuse of those four little creatures on that shred of terrestrial greenery down there; for I can see, as no doubt you can also see, that they're listening to our colloquy with no small interest. And so with the excuse of their presence I'll go over the same old story again."

We four were indeed petrified with interest as Jehovah went on.

"It all began of course, as you very well know, with our mutual awakening from sleep in infinite space. And here's a very nice point, my dear Devil, that I may have forgotten to make in any of the million occasions when I've reviewed these things. Long after the composing of any of the primeval stories about how things began, in fact, in comparatively recent discussions as to how they began, the philosophers of the satellite of the sun, from which those four insects down there derive their existence, developed a trick of talking with pompous authority about what they called 'the Absolute.' With this ridiculous 'Absolute' of theirs they wanted to get the infantile conclusion established that there was a final Something that partook partly of the nature of consciousness and partly of the nature of matter, and that included everything that existed, that had ever existed, and that would ever exist. They brought forward this idea for the obvious reason that they were too proud, too vain, and too conceited to confess frankly and freely that the limited nature of their human intelligence debarred them from the comprehension of any ultimate aspect of existence except boundless space; and that all they can do, and all they will ever be able to do, is to fall back upon their consciousness of the unlimited, unending space in which they appear and into which they will dissolve when they disappear. Is it not clear at a glance to you, my dear Devil, as it is clear to me, that in the midst of this boundless space wherein we are now conversing it is nonsense to talk of ‘the Absolute’ in the sense of something that is all there is, and that includes all there is, and beyond which there is nothing at all, unless by this grandiose word is meant just simply and plainly empty space. In that sense both I, the Creator and Protector of whatever is in space, and you, the Destroyer and Corrupter of whatever is in space, will be in full agreement with each other when we say that such a vacant, hollow container, for me to fill at will and for you to spill at will, can hardly be called an Absolute, if by that tremendous word is meant some substantial reality that rests at the bottom of all possible worlds. And note this too, my dear Devil, with regard to this blessed word Absolute. Their less educated ones are naturally puzzled by this grand word; and so their cleverer ones derive a deliciously superior comfort and complacency and an almost lord-of-the-manor satisfaction from the idea that to enjoy the Absolute is a mystical privilege, if not a sensual privilege, confined to a very few philosophic minds. But what I particularly want you, my dear Devil, to realize is—”

But the Devil broke in here with a howl of boredom.

“I tell you, God,” he yelled, “I shall scream this blasted space of yours into the parings of a pilgarlic pipistrel if you don’t stop talking about Absolutes! You promised once to tell me the whole story of how you and I first came to know each other. You’ve given me so much to do with your bloody creations and your blasted redemptions that for millions of years I've not had a moment's rest; but since, except for these four wretched little entities, your conglomerated creation seems at this moment to have taken to its heels, leaving us idle for a bit, this might be a good moment for you to keep that promise."

"Well, old companion," God answered gently, "I am almost inclined to accede to your request, only we had better lower our voices and turn our faces away from those pathetic little creatures down there."

At this the Devil gave a hoarsely croaking chuckle.

"O how sweetly considerate you sound! Just as if you didn't know as well as I do that those insects are listening breathlessly to every word we speak. Really, for pure and simple humbug, God, you beat all the miserable little creatures for whose unhappy life you are responsible, and who are now showing what they think of you and your redemptive ability by committing suicide. However! I am not a humbug like you, and I do very much want to hear your story. So please tell it."

"Well," God began, in a quiet meditative tone, "I'll do my best. But I am better at creation than at describing creation. But it certainly was an extraordinary experience, that moment of waking slowly into the consciousness of being conscious — of being, that is to say, a self that had the power of saying to itself 'I am I.'

"I sometimes long to startle some of the more obsequious of my adorers by forcing them to listen to an explanation, by a few insects and a few snails and a few newts and a few tadpoles and a few shrimps and a few sticklebacks, of what it feels like when you first say 'I am I'! And then I'd like to make them listen to you and me talking about our first awareness of being alive! It would certainly amuse—"

But as God uttered the word "amuse," I didn't miss — nor did my Rhitha, as I could tell from the pressure of her fingers — the extremely interesting fact that there passed across the face of the Devil that same queer shudder of what I can only describe as panic-terror which had seized him when his everlasting antagonist smiled. Was any kind of humour then — that is to say the power of being amused by some word or event or accident or situation, the power in fact of appreciating the incorrigible, the ineradicable comedy of the whole bloody business of life — essentially godlike, and its opposite, the inability to see the funny or comic or ironic side of things, inherently devilish? No! no! no! Such a theory, if we accepted it in its entirety, would mean that all living creatures, save only men, women, and children, were on the side of the Devil, which is wholly unthinkable, in spite of the way some of us persist in talking about "cloven hooves" and "vipers' tongues" and "vultures' claws" and "sharks' teeth" and so forth! But my thoughts were now interrupted by the divine voice itself; for God had begun to relate to the Devil his first experience of being God.

"My first feeling, or thought, if you like, was not any sort of consciousness of a 'self' or of an 'ego' or of an 'I am I'; it was purely, simply, and solely an intense interest that grew steadily more and more intense, in what I was looking at with my two eyes. And do you know what I was looking at? At you! Yes, you were with me, and moreover you were doing exactly what I was doing, that is to say you were looking round, and you were, just as I was — and what could be more natural? — thrilled with interest at seeing me there! So that the truth is that just as my first awareness, or my first sensation, or my first experience, of being alive, was my interest in you, so your first was your interest in me. So there we were! But, after that initial recognition of each other, our two consciousnesses must have debouched and deviated, each upon its own separate track. As I watched you I was wondering in my own mind whether you were a portion of myself, whether in truth I was a double-being possessed not only of two outward appearances but also of two inward intelligences. Were we in fact, two separate minds that could tap each other's reservoirs of thought but yet at the source were really and truly one; two separate streams, no doubt, when once they started running, but streams that were flowing from the same primal fountain-head? It was a considerable surprise to me, Devil old friend, when I suddenly noticed that your attention had wandered from me to the infinite space that surrounded us and that you were searching every horizon of this vast emptiness around us to discover, so it occurred to me, if there had been any other double-natured beings like ourselves born at this moment for no reason out of nothing. But this sudden discovery of mine that our mental and emotional interests did not correspond, but that you were now scrutinizing with eager curiosity the hollow gulfs of empty space, whereas I was absorbed solely and exclusively with this immediate problem of our relation to each other, was not only a considerable shock to me, but was an important turning-point in my mental development.

"If we were not the same being, I asked myself, possessed, as I had hitherto imagined, of two heads, how was it that we thus appeared side by side in space? What was the real relation between us? But it would not do, I told myself, to continue these remote investigations, until I analysed much more carefully the nature of my own being as I am conscious of it in myself. No sooner had I thus brought my thoughts to a stand-still and compelled my interrogative energy to pause, while I pondered on the best path along which to begin this introspective selfanalysis, than I was disturbed by observing that my companion, the being whom I had regarded, when I first awakened to consciousness, as part of myself, had left my side. Yes — though I daresay you, my dear Devil, have completely forgotten all this — you had leapt up from where we were lying together and bolted off. You moved as fast as the fastest meteorite I have ever been able, since those early days, to invent. I could soon perceive you far away in the distance, moving like the brightest of stars, towards some point on our horizon where you had seen, or where you imagined that you had seen, something that broke the hollow monotony of empty space.

'"So there are certainly two of us!' I said to myself, 'and I am not a double-being.'"

It was at this point in this curious dialogue above our heads between God and the Devil that the latter showed any interest in what the former was telling him. He had certainly wanted to hear the story, had been in fact extremely anxious to hear it; but it was clear to me, and I fancy to my Rhitha too, that the only thing he was really interested in was anything — it didn't matter what kind of thing — that concerned himself.

"Did you follow me with your eyes," the Devil now enquired of God, "until I had completely vanished over the horizon?"

"Yes," God replied, "I certainly did; but when you had disappeared I made no attempt to follow you, because I was absorbed in a discovery so astonishing to me and so fascinating to me that it occupied my attention to the exclusion of everything else."

At this point God became silent and so lost in thought that his companion grew obviously uneasy.

"What was that?" he asked.

But the Deity remained lost in thought. He may have been wondering how to put what he had to say in a manner that even his sensitive companion couldn't possibly find anything amusing in it; but what I, Gor of Blaenau-Ffestiniog, couldn't understand was the great difference between God as we saw him now, which was evidently what he really was and God as he had been shown to us in church and Sunday School. God as he really was turned out to be much more like myself in his thoughts and feelings than I ever could dream was possible! That God now, for instance, should be making such an effort to be solemn and serious in what he was telling the Devil, since he had seen that what disturbed the Devil most of all was any approach to humour, struck me as astonishingly natural and human. It was indeed not only human but humane, and certainly the opposite of what the Devil would have done. Meanwhile I, silly old Gor of Blaenau, as all my friends except Rhitha regarded me, now began to feel extremely proud of myself for my new discovery about the Cosmos, namely that one of its essential characteristics — whether derived from something jocular in its creator or from something in matter itself — is an element of humour. In other words, I told myself, the universe is a horribly comic spectacle, and it couldn't have been so if its creator hadn't had a definite liking for burlesque and farce, or if these things weren't already in the essence of matter itself.

"But you haven't yet told me," the Devil was now quite eagerly enquiring of God, "what you discovered in our surroundings in that desolate and empty vacuum that prevented you from following me in my rush to the horizon, where I am ready to confess now I fancied I saw, or really did see, something swimming or flying or floating or gliding."

"Well! I can tell you that at once, my dear Devil," said God. "What I discovered was that this Space into which you and I awoke was not as empty as I had first decided it was."

"You don't mean to say," cried the Devil, "that you saw other living things round us — things as living as we are, only clever at hiding themselves for fear we'd eat them up?"

"O no!" God replied, "I didn't see anything of that kind! What I saw was the fact that all round us the whole air was filled with floating fragments of solid substance. I whispered to these fragments of matter once or twice, and I deliberately touched some of them with certain antennae or sensitized feelers that I willed to emerge from my person for that purpose; and what I found to be there was no more than a number of thick masses of formless substance, invisible at first glance, but easy to apprehend when once you came in contact with them. They did not fill the whole of the space round us, you must understand, but they floated there in larger or smaller fragments, and seemed to be swimming about there under the impulsion of the same sort of will or energy that you and I possessed, only how far resembling our consciousness I could not detect; for there was no response from any of these fragments of matter resembling my response to you or yours to me. I finally decided, after feeling about me as carefully and cautiously as I could, that these floating masses of substance possessed only rudimentary consciousness, that was still far below the level of the sort of power you and I possessed when we awoke in what at first I imagined to be entirely empty space, but in which you clearly thought you saw some living thing moving when you bolted off as you did to the furthest horizon of our vision."

"And so you decided — you are very fond of 'deciding,' aren't you, God? — that these fragments of substance floating about in space were quite different from you and me? They didn't have the five faculties of our five senses and their substance was neither animal nor vegetable. Am I right in thus describing your wonderful discovery, God?"

"Perfectly right, my dear Devil, perfectly right."

"And then, I take it," the Devil went on, "you decided — not a very striking decision, this time, you know — to play some game with these helpless lumps of matter? Am I right, my Lord?"

"You are certainly right. That indeed was exactly what I proposed to do."

"Did you think of asking these floating lumps whether they wanted to be played with?"

"I see what you are driving at, dear Devil! You would like me to confess that I derived pleasure from moulding these harmless blobs of matter into whatever fanciful shapes came into my head, and that if they didn't like such sport, this pleasure of mine was rather increased than diminished by their discomfort?"

"Well, isn't it? Only just a little tiny bit perhaps, but isn't it, just that little tiny bit?"

"No, my worthy Devil," God replied, "it isn't! Indeed, while we are upon this particular topic, I'd like to tell you this. Cast a glance down there, if you don't mind, on those four little creatures clinging to each other on that grassy fragment of the planet Earth, or Gaia, as the Greeks called her. You see that 'odd-one-out,' as you might call him who isn't fish, flesh, or fowl? Well, that creature was made in what its makers loved to call 'pure experiment', but declared sweetly that what they did was done for the sake of 'the little ones' of their race. The name they give to what they do is vivisection, a word that means cutting up into pieces what is still alive. They mustn't be confused with doctors, many of whom have been strongly opposed to such tortures. You could call them a set of men apart from all others, whose delight is in torturing what these earthlings call the 'lower animals' for the purpose of acquiring reactions. You, my dear Devil, were occupied in other things, in trying to make evil as much of an urge to destruction as I was — and still am — trying to make good an urge to creation; but I can assure you I had my eye on these wretches; and I think I made sure that the last moments of every one of them should resemble the last moments of the most miserable of the unfortunate animals they so enjoyed tormenting. But they are all gone now. Gone they are with the nebulae and the galaxies, with the living stars and the dead stars, with the big stars and the little stars; gone they are with their planets and their satellites, gone to everlasting annihilation. I expect you have always imagined, my dear Devil, that I was deliberately lying to all my worshippers, whether Christian, Rabbinical, or Moslem, when I allowed them to believe in a life after death. No, my dear Devil, surprising as it may seem to you, I was not lying. The truth is, as I expect you could have discovered if you had given the matter any serious consideration, that in this whole matter of a life after death I am as ignorant as these quaint little earthlings are and as I think I may take for granted you are.

I did not invent for them these worlds after death, of which their prophets and poets have made so much. I know no more about Heaven and Hell than they do, or than I fancy you do. In fact my own private suspicion is that there is no other world beyond this one, this rather empty one, in which we have now been left. Some of their philosophers have been talking lately about what they call ‘another dimension’; but my own view of this ‘other dimension’ is simply that it is only another name for Annihilation, or sinking into Nothingness. But now, while we are discussing this matter of ‘another dimension,’ I want to confess to you a very important secret. Without the faintest idea that the world I created would ultimately of its own accord commit suicide, I have for many millenniums been pondering on the problem whether I couldn’t create a world whose creatures would not be able to make one another as miserable as they have been able to do in the world that has just committed suicide. You know, my dear Devil, as well as I do, that it has been a mixture of Eastern and Western traditions, Jewish, Greek, Roman and African, that has led this world to the self-slaughter it has now consummated, and these traditions are all full of belief in other worlds, especially such worlds as Heaven and Hell. Well, old comrade, what I have been doing for thousands of years is trying to invent some very different kind of world, a world which it would be possible for me to create, but which would be quite different from the one that has just destroyed itself. I tell you this for the simple reason that I have no one else to whom I can tell it. Mind you, old friend, I shall not be at all disturbed if, on hearing of my tremendous scheme, you make up your mind at once to do all you can to render it futile, or even to destroy it root and branch. You and I have worked together so long in our contrarious fashion that, although we may each wish we could have our full fling independent of the other, my feeling is that we have the same idea at the back of our heads, namely that to get things moving with any sort of permanent success, it is essential that in the energy at work behind all that we do there must be both an element of creation and an element of destruction, or as those funny little creatures down there would put it, an element of good and an element of evil. Now, let us begin to describe my scheme, and do for the sake of empty space listen very carefully. In the first place let us make a world where every animal, whether human or subhuman, possesses a soul that can survive the death of its body. Next, let us see to it that this soul retains as much as is possible of its former personality, individuality, identity, and as much of its unique, peculiar, tastes, fancies, prejudices, humours, oddities, as can exist in a disembodied spirit."

What the Devil then asked was just what I, Gor Goginog of Blaenau, would certainly have asked, if I had had the gall to do so: "By your word animal, God, do you include all living creatures, such as birds and fish and reptiles and worms and insects — all that lives, in fact, save rocks and stones and trees and plants?"

God didn't hesitate for a second in his answer to this question; and I confess when I heard his answer, I pressed my Rhitha's hand with as much satisfaction as if I had asked this crucial question myself.

"Certainly I do. I include them all; every sort of living creature! I used the term 'animal' to make sure that you understood that I wasn't referring to lichens and toadstools and mushrooms. Perhaps what I ought to have emphasized more distinctly is the difference between forest-growths like funguses and such amphibious sea-shore growths as sea-anemones; but on this particular point I confess I feel rather dubious myself: but I certainly included all reptiles and all frogs and toads and newts and worms and every insect that exists. But leaving for a moment the rather ticklish question of creatures like sea-anemones, the scheme I am inclined to adopt for a completely New World suspended in Space is a scheme totally different from the one I adopted in the creation of the world that has now, of its own free will, disappeared forever! In one particular I intend to follow my former method of creating a world. Indeed, instead of changing, or even modifying it, I intend to pursue it to an even intenser extreme. I refer to my method in the creation of men and beasts and birds and fishes and reptiles and insects, of first envisaging in my own mind the sort of creatures I would like to see existing. Please understand that what I envisage in this way in my imagination is really like what you might think of as the soul of a creature before it has adapted itself to the surroundings in which it is destined to live; the sort of soul in fact that you can conceive, if you allow me, old friend, a little classical pedantry, to be waiting in limbo for its earthly incarnation. Now into this soul I shall pour all the energy possible for a self-creating exploration of matter. And I shall do this with every creature I create.

"No! Don't interrupt me just yet, old friend, till I've told you more about my New World. You know what we do ourselves, my dear Devil, in regard, I mean, to our own appearance? We appear of course completely different to every conscious being who confronts us. But the interesting thing is that, while in ourselves we are so vividly aware of being able to take any shape we please, we ourselves have persuaded ourselves quite naturally and spontaneously to think of ourselves with human bodies — that is to say with bodies resembling those of Adam, the first man. Between ourselves we can entirely discard the account of the Beginning of things which I dictated to the scribes of Israel; whereby you, the destroyer, are represented as a leering serpent, and I, the creator, as an austere and forbidding old gentleman, carried through Space by a crowd of mischievous boys and provocative angels! I selected the Children of Israel as the recipients of the revelation of my identity in the matter of Adam and Eve, because I have always had a special fondness for Jews. It was this partiality that led me to select Jesus of Nazareth as the one descendant of Adam whose inmost soul and instinctive gestures seemed almost akin to my own. What always made me angry seemed always to make him angry, and what always made me want to cry seemed always to make him want to cry. I have often committed impulsive and foolish mistakes in my quick moods, both for good and for harm; and so did he! The longer he lived the more deeply he came to resemble me, so that he was perfectly justified in his daring idea that we were father and son. Through all the aeons of years that you and I have lived together, since the day we found ourselves side by side in empty space, the worst twinge of sorrow and remorse I have ever felt was when I heard those heart-rending words: ‘Eloi! Eloi! Lama Sabachthani!’

“But now listen very seriously to my words. As you have seen, and no doubt your own influence with its instinct for destruction had a lot to do with it, the world I created, as my worshippers love to put it ‘in the Beginning,’ has been brought to an end by the loathing of life felt by the galaxies, nebulae, stars, planets and satellites, together with all the creatures, human and otherwise, not excepting all the worms, insects, reptiles and saurians, that filled the whole expanse of the earth, with all her forests, all her grassy slopes, all her rocky ridges and stony peaks, all her reedy swamps and her pebbly and sandy sea-shores, yes! and with all her memories too, memories going back to the days when I tried in vain to make Adam, the first man, and Eve, the first woman, do what was wise, and what I wanted them to do, and avoid doing what would bring disaster. Very good. All that is over now! I created the world. It lasted for several millions of years. Then, because of the miseries and sufferings which men and women inflicted upon one another, and because of the horrors that went on, in every direction, as much among the tiny insects as among wild beasts and savage birds, the whole creation, whether pushed on to it by you or not, committed a universal suicide, leaving us and those quaint little objects down there alone together in empty space.

"I don't think either of us two, neither you, who know me far better, I fully allow, than any of my worshippers, nor I, who know you better than any of your worshippers, fully realize the condition of those pitifully rent and torn souls who worship me, and who struggle so madly to kill half of their natures in the illusion, instigated by their priests and pastors, that I have forbidden all sexual satisfaction — these poor wretches who are called saints — or of the unhappy, brooding, desperate, dark, mad, lonely, lurid stirrers of weird cauldrons, into which they throw appalling substances, who worship you, and are called 'black magicians,' or how we ought to have made it clear to them both that it is only out of the clash between you and me, and out of the perpetual struggle between you and me, that life can go on at all! With me alone as the ruler all would stagnate; and with you alone as the ruler all would disappear!

“Well now, consider this point, Devil my dear, and consider it very, very carefully. You will remember how I decided to give to every creature I created — from Leviathan and Behemoth to the smallest water-rat and star-fish, from Adam and Eve and Cain and Abel to the tiniest bee that buzzed through their flower-beds and to the smallest monkey that swung from branch to branch above their heads; yes! from the noblest ox in their pastures to the daintiest little lamb in their well-guarded sheep-folds — the unique gift, however they misused it, of free will? You always predicted — and you were, as we now have seen by this universal cosmic suicide, perfectly right in predicting — that this gift of free will to such crazy creatures would end in disaster. But it seemed to me that a world without free will, a world ruled by absolute determinism from the start, would be so dull and tedious an experiment as to be hardly worth making.

“But now, confronted by this cosmogonic self-destruction, evidently due to the fact that, endowed with free will, all the living things in earth, air and water, by devouring each other, by meddling with each other, by making each other’s existence intolerable, turned the world into such a hell that the only way out of it was universal suicide, it has entered my head, though I daresay there exist insuperable objections which will present themselves later, that it would be of great interest to create an absolutely predetermined universe of living beings not one among whom possessed the faintest semblance of free-will. I am thinking of a universe in which every house-fly, every daddy-longlegs, every beetle, every butterfly, every moth, along with all the toads and frogs and newts and tadpoles, and along with all the reptiles, and along with all the birds of the air and the fish of the sea and the wild beasts of the jungle and the men, women, and children of country and town, are all driven by an absolutely inescapable law of inflexible determinism, much more implacable than the Greek Moira or even than that still more unbendable and rigidly physical pressure that Homer was wont to call ‘Anangke.’

“Now, can’t you imagine, my dear Devil, that having worked out this undeviating cause-and-eflect universe, in which all its children, human and otherwise, have no choice at all, and know they have no choice, but just drift on and on, like predestined ripples in a calm sea, and supposing I had the power to make every single creature that lived, while it lived, extremely joyous and happy — can’t you imagine, I say, speaking in the terms of those earthlings below us down there, that such a universe could be a far more desirable one for its occupants than the one that has recently disappeared?”

“Why the hell don’t you ask them then, you old blunderbuss of a Nursery-God playing with picture-blocks of wood? Call them up here and ask them! I’ll be mightily tickled to hear what they say! Each of them, of that, I can assure you already, will say something different!”

I, Gor Goginog of Blaenau, having heard this, was, as you may believe, not a little startled. But I thought to myself, there’s no reason to draw back in fear. The Devil can’t hurt us with God there, and God won’t send us to hell if the Devil doesn’t want us! And as I looked at Org’s antediluvian and amphibious left eye, though it bulged a good deal more out of his head than was usual, I could see that he too had grasped the proposition and was favourable to it. The girls seemed less certain in their minds; but with one of my usual rapid flights of mythological imagination, I put this down entirely to the absence, up there, above our heads, in that enormous, aerial, chilly space, of any feminine hostess! What was wanting I told myself was simply the presence of the Virgin Mary. The presence of Her Son would have disturbed me and disturbed Org, too, well did I know that! Yes, “the Mother of God" was what we wanted, since we were going to Heaven, and not to Olympus!

However, there was a feminine being behind all of us, or to speak more correctly, under all of us, who was quite ready and determined to be our Earthly Mother at this important interview. I refer of course to the grassy plain on which we were standing and which had brought us here through so many extraordinary shocks; yes! and not only through the vanishing away of Time, but of Eternity too.

And now this heroic fragment of Gaia, the ancient earth, was actually carrying us up where we might talk with God.

What I found particularly interesting, after our grassy landscape had settled itself down and we were really in what I think I have a perfect right to call Heaven, were the forms our two entertainers assumed as they talked to us there. For without a moment's delay they both joined our little party of four on our floating field of grass. God had the form of an old gentleman with a long curly beard and rough curly hair. He was evidently quite naked under his garments which consisted of heavy robes one above another and by no means very elegantly arranged; and his ankles and feet were quite bare. In fact he exactly resembled the Eternal Being in the picture of Adam and Eve by Arazzo Fiammingo in the Galleria Accademia in Florence. The Devil's appearance, as he squatted on the grass between Org and Asm on one side and Rhitha and me on the other, was even easier to describe, for he was the very image of the particular one of the demonic chimeras on the top of Notre Dame looking down on Paris, who is described in the guide books as "The Thinker" and who has a short horn in the centre of his head, a couple of folded wings about his shoulders, and a dangerous-looking tongue protruding from his mouth.

It took no time at all for us four earthlings to get the spirit of the occasion; and I thought, "I suppose this is a supreme example of the kind of thing that happens over and over again in life, when some miraculously unexpected concatenation of events whirls us into a situation about which we have told ourselves exciting stories since infancy. Here we actually were in empty space alone with God and the Devil and invited by them to give advice as to the creation of a fresh world."

It was in fact God who spoke first.

"We have," he began, "or more accurately with the help of my good friend the Devil, I have been planning a world as absolutely opposite to the one that has just committed suicide as can be imagined. In the first place I have decided that there shall be no free will. No free decisions at all. By that I mean that every man, woman and child, every beast and bird, every worm and insect shall just give itself up to the affairs of its life, one after another, as custom and habit, instinct and natural desire move it and draw it on, without having to decide anything. It will feel itself to be a conscious unit, a conscious dot, a conscious grain, a conscious pebble, a conscious seed, and will enjoy the sensation of being forced along by fate and necessity without having to decide one single thing for itself. It won't be able to pause or stop for a second in the stream of cause and effect, but it will be prepared quite happily and resignedly for its death when its hour shall come. I have been thinking — and this is a point upon which I should be very glad to ask the advice of each one of you four beings — about eliminating from this fresh world, in which every creature will resemble a joyous sunlit ripple in an irresistible tide, certain ravenous, venomous, and voracious creatures that feed upon others, such as lions and tigers, eagles, hawks, kites, crows, vultures and poisonous serpents, together with sharks, sword-fish, and other ferocious and predatory inhabitants of the ocean. It has occurred to me that it might be a good thing to put an end, once and for all, to the unpleasant habit, whether in earth, air, or water, of creatures eating each other and living upon each other. Why not have a world in which men and beasts and birds and fishes and reptiles and worms and saurians and insects feed, not on each other, but purely and entirely on vegetation? Thus all sea-creatures would feed on weeds of the sea and all land creatures on the vegetable growths of fields and forests, of swamps and fens.

"But here, my dear young earthlings — I use the word 'young' because from your terrestrial calculation both I, and my old associate the Devil, are fantastically and fabulously old — and I want to ask you four persons, personally and individually, a significant question. Quite apart from their particular place in the general scheme of things, are there any special creatures that you four, or one of you four, would be thankful to have excluded from the living inhabitants of our fresh world?"

We all looked at each other and there was a momentary hesitation. Then to my surprise, and also I confess a little to my disappointment, for I would have preferred that my little Rhitha should have looked with wonder at me, her man, having the boldness and courage and cleverness to speak, instead of speaking herself, my girl fearlessly cried: "Couldn't fleas be left out of the fresh World?"

God glanced hurriedly at the Devil who gave a significant nod, as much as to say, "I'll be on tap to supply that deficiency with a few well-aimed pricks of conscience!" And thus reassured, God conceded the point. "Yes, we will eliminate fleas."

I was very anxious to think of some creature the choice of which for elimination would impress both God and the Devil, and also display a strikingly wide biological knowledge of Nature as well as a pathological understanding of human aversions. But Org's girl Asm spoke up before I had decided upon the creature whose absence from life for the next couple of thousand years would be the greatest blessing to us mortals.

"O please!" cried Asm eagerly.

"Speak up, child," said God kindly.

"Let's have no bed-bugs!"

God actually gave a deep-throated chuckle at this, and the Devil made a vicious scoop with his tongue as if snatching up one of the insects in question.

"Yes, my child," agreed the Creator, "not a single bed-bug shall enter our world, not from the north, or the south, or the east, or the west, not from zenith to nadir, shall a single bed-bug slip in. Isn't that so?" And God glanced not without a shade of anxiety it seemed to me, at his diabolic partner.

"Not a single one," agreed that enemy of all life; and it struck me, as he uttered this final doom for all bed-bugs that the antagonist of creation looked more like one of those chimera-demons gazing down on Paris from the summit of Notre Dame, as he wagged his worm-like tongue from side to side between his hollow lips and drew his muscular wings nearer to the solitary horn on the top of his head, than he had ever done before. Indeed he looked as if he intended to visit every bedroom in Paris that night as a snapper-up of bed-bugs.

It was at this point, while I was swallowing my humiliation at not having thought of any desirable omission from our newly created world, which apparently was to resemble a deterministic earthly paradise continued forever, that Org lifted up his multi-genetic voice, a voice that suggested paws, feathers, tails. And do you know what Org wanted eliminated? Nothing less than lice!

“Yes indeed, my friend,” responded God in the most indulgent tone he had yet used. “Do you agree, my dear Devil?” And the snort that emerged from some portion of the Devil’s person, was a sufficient answer. There were to be no more lice.

It was at this point that my special kind of egoism — whether a natural mixture of pride, vanity, and conceit or some form of wild and reckless impulse I cannot say, but whatever it was had been a peculiarity of mine all my life and it had been intensified since I fell in love with Rhitha — asserted itself to a degree I found it impossible to restrain.

“I have lately been impressed,” I began, in my most rhetorical, oratorical, and leading actor’s tone, “by constant references to the existence of another dimension beyond this one in which we now abide as we stand together on this beautiful green plain, which is so like the fens of Norfolk, with a misty horizon surrounding us on all sides.

“The dimension in which we now exist, as we stand here, clearly makes only one demand for its cosmic environment, namely Space. There was an epoch when it made another, namely Time, but that epoch is at an end; for Time has been destroyed. Now as thou, O God, and as thou also, O Devil, know well, the chief value of the dimension in which we now all live is its adaptability to the existence of, and to the necessity for, our bodies, and our bodily feelings and our bodily movements. But, Thou O mighty God, and Thou also, O mighty Devil, know very well that it is possible for all living creatures, from whales and hippopotamuses to newts and tadpoles, from giants like Samson or Goliath to the smallest of pygmies, to lose themselves in their thoughts till they completely forget their bodies and are indeed quite literally ‘out of their bodies.’ Well! This is our present situation. Here we all are on this brave scrap of our old Mother Earth that has heroically refused to follow the rest of the astronomical world and commit suicide; and now I am quite sure that although she is only a portion of her mother, of our planetary mother, Gaia, the ancient Earth, she has inherited, just as the rest of us have inherited, a conscious mind as well as a sensitive body. Now you may be sure that this conscious mind, independently of the body to which it is attached, can lose itself in its thoughts and forget its body altogether just as we can forget ours. This being so, O most mighty God, this being so, O most mighty Devil, I propose that, with the help of the mind of the earth beneath our feet, we boldly make a desperate leap, and turn our minds away from our bodies altogether and forget our bodies altogether and with one terrific act of faith leap into this other dimension. If we make this desperate leap into this other dimension, we shall reach it, and we shall find ourselves all together in a world composed of nothing but conscious minds, minds that need no bodies, feel no bodies, see no bodies, minds that are simply and purely minds and apprehend one another's thoughts by direct contact of thought with thought!"

I became silent and looked around. I looked at Rhitha. I looked at Asm. I looked at Org. I looked at the Devil. I looked at God. I confess I was absolutely beside myself with satisfaction at having made this speech. If you asked me what it was that inspired me to utter it, I would be unable to reply. It came into my head; and it had to come out in the way it did.

I was certainly extremely surprised, and I have an inkling that we all were, when the answer to my oration came, after quite a pause, from God Himself.

"Yes, I have heard of this 'other dimension,' and so I think have you, my dear Devil." As God spoke, he glanced quickly at his companion; who, I noticed, gave a faint shake to his head, and a faint shrug to his shoulders. "But I am not ashamed," God went on, "to confess to you four, or to you, O noblest of fragments, whose mind, I shrewdly suspect to be behind this thought which has come into the head of Gor Goginog of Blaenau, that I have for thousands of years wondered whether such a leap as you describe from our world of objective space, in which heads and arms and bodies and legs and eyes and ears and noses and mouths correspond with the air we breathe and the aerial unendingness that surrounds us — whether, I say, such a leap as you describe, full of a desperate faith, might not lead to surprising results.

"Some of the New Testament logoi, those mystically-pious oracles of the Jews who followed Jesus, announce that we have faith, hope, and love left to help us, and that of these three the most effective is love. This is a great mistake. Hope and love are comforting and reassuring, and make the life both of Gods and men, calmer, pleasanter, happier: but neither hope nor love can work miracles. Faith alone can do that. If you ask me why, my answer is simple. Because while love unites us with the object of the miracle, and while hope keeps us alive while the object of the miracle is being approached; it is faith and faith alone that works it. So when you talk of this leap into this mysterious other dimension, to which we both have been hearing obscure references for some time, I am ready to risk it, and I believe my old partner and confederate-antagonist here is also willing to risk it. But you must realize, my little ones, that this is a very serious risk for me; for I have just been planning a fresh world on wholly and completely different lines from our old one that has now committed suicide. In this fresh world which I have been planning, not only will there be, as you earthlings have suggested, no fleas, no bed-bugs, and no lice, no vultures, no sharks, no boa-constrictors, but all will be pre-determined, and there will be no free will leading to wickedness and cruelty and disaster. I just tell you this, my dears, and my old antagonist here agrees for once with what I say, in order to prove that whatever risks you four may be taking in this plunge, I shall be taking a lot more! You will be risking your four lives; but I shall be risking my new fresh world, created free from free will and likely to bring into being millions upon millions of happy lives. You must remember that this soul of the fragment of your old earth that has put this leap into your heads though it risks more than your lives, doesn't, like I do, risk a whole new universe. You may well ask me why I consent to take this leap. I will tell you why. I take it out of pure weariness. You think, because I am God, I am tireless. Not at all! At this particular epoch I feel more tired than you can possibly believe. In fact I feel tired out. And you also must remember that those preposterous opposites — that were no real opposites at all, but just a pair of ghoulish phantasms invented by a set of tricky mathematicians and a set of still more tricky theologians, and called by them Time and Eternity — are now gone for good. Neither time nor eternity have ever had any reality outside the schools and the churches and the governments. Nothing delights any authority more than the splitting up of Time into variousshaped little pieces of goblinish excrement, and then marshalling these lively if not very odoriferous turdlings into 'round games' of various sorts! As for Eternity, that, of course, has always been only another name for the precipitation into a foul and fetid cloud of that special smell of choir-stall cushions and communion-rail mats, which has come to be associated with spiritual awe and solemn silence. In reality, as a great many young people would at once, if they only dared to speak out, freely confess, this holy silence in the presence of all the altars in the world rouses them to simple revolt. By yielding to this holy silence and by being scared by this holy silence, your healthy-minded youth, both male and female, all over the earth give up their right of being themselves in favour of the cunning craftiness of the sly and selfish rascals who are playing their old historic games. When I think of all the crimes committed in my name with such subtlety, I feel ready, I tell you, to jump into any other dimension, if only I could end my nauseating weariness of the whole business of creation. It has become, I tell you, intolerable to me to think of how your earthlings have come to associate my name with that particularly unpleasant, malodorous hush before my altar at the heart of which is really, I am quite sure, simply a natural human horror of charnel-houses, corpses, and vampirish ghosts.

"No, I have not missed, any more than has my old friend the Devil, these recent hints among your sages about 'another dimension.' But I confess, as indeed is natural, considering my concern over what has happened to the universe I created, and my longing to create one not only free from bugs and fleas and lice but totally different from the one that has now gone, that I shall be risking more than any of you little ones if I do take this leap. I swear to you I have spent more energy than any other creator-god has ever spent over his work! But I admit that by endowing the creatures of my creation with free will, I did risk what has now happened, namely their almost universal decision to bring the whole thing to an end. In this fresh World I have been lately devising our creatures would be unable to do this. Driven forward by an inescapable chain of cause-and-effect, they would just drift along like ripples in a calm sea or like waves in a rough sea. All will be determined: all will be inevitable: all will be fate: and all the creatures in our new world, including whatever solar systems and zodiacal constellations we may choose to create in place of those that have rushed to destruction, will have to find themselves accepting without question the necessity for just going on as we newly and freshly fashion them, without deciding one single thing for themselves. They will have to take for granted that as we have fashioned them, so it will always be. I am perfectly aware that, as there is much to be said in favour of this deterministic world, so there is also much to be said against it. Now if we two, companions in super-consciousness, and you four, companions in normal consciousness, are all of us really prepared to take the risk of this leap or plunge, or whatever you like to call it, into this 'other dimension,' which may or may not exist at all, we must keep well in mind what we are risking. We are risking extinction. What we've got to remember, my dear Devil," God went on, "is that you and I are at bottom just as ignorant of the ultimate reality of things as are these pathetic little human creatures, whose imagination in its longing for an allpowerful creator would have invented me, and in its dread of an all-powerful destroyer would have invented you, if we hadn't already, neither of us knows how, found ourselves alive in an empty space. This new idea which has just come into the heads of these mathematical metaphysicians, about another dimension, has been an old worry to me. For millions upon millions of years it has been darting in and out of my mind, and I am sure I must have murmured to you something, once in a few thousand years, about such a thing. But of course you've always been so busy trying to bring to nothing my various schemes for easing the general situation that you probably hardly listened to this other matter.

"What I have been wondering of late, if I can have your attention for a moment now, is whether you and I haven't been too sure of our own immunity from annihilation. We have watched these Greek deities hover over the heads of their dying favourites and then rush back to Father Zeus the moment they themselves are hurt; and we've watched those Indian sages, like the Buddha, leave their peaceful Nirvana and go back to their peaceful Nirvana, as their mood has varied between a longing for action and a longing for inaction. And now we have seen the human race commit suicide, and the stars commit suicide, and all the conscious creatures in this world I created and to which I gave free will make up their minds to join this universal self-slaughter, so as to escape once for all the miseries and sufferings of life.

"Now I must confess to you, my dear Devil, that I have been thinking for some while of creating a world on totally different lines from the one which has destroyed or is in the act of destroying itself. This fresh world of mine, as I have already tried to explain to you, will be completely ruled by the rigid determination of cause-and-effect. It will be a world without the faintest spark of free will. But the more I think of such a world the more it strikes me as hopelessly flat and dull. Free will may have led to suicide; but neither it, nor the suicide it has led to, could be called flat or dull. So between — I mustn't say between 'the devil and the deep sea' — but between this dull determination and this deadly free will I am at my wits' end. And what I am now tempted to suggest is that you and I imitate these creatures I created, and throw over the whole tiresome business, and commit suicide ourselves! I have decided you know, my dear old enemy, that this 'other dimension' they talk about is simply another name for everlasting death. So why, in the name of eternal escape, shouldn't we try it? Now I expect you four creatures from the planet where Adam and Eve lived in their earthly paradise in complete innocence are finding it rather hard to believe that I, God, the creator of that paradise and of the human pair who lived in it, am taking the same risk as you four take when we make this leap into this other dimension. But I am taking this risk, and so is my ancient companion, the Devil, who was born side by side with me in this same endless, limitless empty Space, in which we, six conscious existences, find ourselves today. In the long reverential years, thousands upon thousands of them, of the worship with which the human race has worshipped us, the majesty and glory and power with which I have been endowed, have increased to a point, I suppose it has been the same with all gods worshipped by humanity, the same with the good old Kronos, the father of Zeus, as with the East Indian Brahma, to a point at which we get the title of ‘The Absolute’ given us by philosophers, very much as your politicians of today reward a plain mister by turning him into a marquis.

“I have had, as you mortals would put it,’very funny feelings,’ when I have tried to imagine myself this blessed ‘Absolute.’ As far as I have been able to follow your theologians, the ‘Absolute’ is just simply everything that exists; so that not only all the scum in the world and all the dirt in the world and all the bugs and fleas and lice and maggots and worms in the world, but all the un-vomited vomit and all the undissipated phlegm and all the dung that hasn’t yet been ejected by our bowels are essential portions of my absolute person. Now when I consider myself in this way I feel decidedly queer: indeed, to tell you the exact truth, I feel not a little nauseated. Well? Are we all ready? And don’t forget, my dear four, and don’t you forget either, my dear Devil, that among us six conscious beings who are risking extinction by this leap into another dimension, I am the one who am risking the most, because I am the one who am a million times fuller than you are of that particular kind of energy that your philosophers love to describe as the Life-Force. You see what we are really going to do is not merely to leap, as we might say ‘out of our skins,’ but out of our minds too. In fact we are going to leap out of everything that we know at present as ourselves and as what is not ourselves, and as above or under or around ourselves; in fact we are going to leap out of the whole system of ourselves and other selves, and out of the whole system of earth, air, water and fire, of suns, moons, planets and stars, out of the whole world that hitherto has meant to us all that we call life. Well? Are you all ready? Off we go!”

It can be imagined how tightly I clutched the fingers of my precious Rhitha as we made our leap; and I fancy our queer monster Org did the same, if his powers of adhesion could be so described, with his lovely girl Asm.

Well, it was done! And the queer thing was that I found I was not in the faintest degree surprised by the result. The result was in fact just what I had expected. This is surely very odd? It is so odd that if anybody else had told me as, “out of the blue,” shall we say, or through the magnetized voice of one of those queer people we call “mediums,” I am now telling you, I would regard it as so impossible that I should boldly say that “the spirit,” or whatever it was that talked to the “medium”, was simply telling lies! How could I possibly have expected it? In the first place it was entirely different from, in fact it was directly opposite to, every single thing that God had just been predicting. I can only think that a person who is just stupidly conceited in the simple way that I am is so ordinary and so completely like everybody else that, in his lack of intellect and imagination, he has never in any true sense taken in this world so that any “dimension” would, to his thick-skinned imperviousness, be no different from another “dimension.” An even more natural and inevitable cause of my complete lack of surprise at the nature of this “other dimension,” when we dived into it, was the fact that my nature is so animal — and I warrant our friend Org felt just the same in this — that my first instinctive recoil from any expected shock is to sink back into a sort of pre-natal trance, half drowsy lethargy and half a deliberate indrawing of an observant turtle-like head into a protective shell.

Let me indeed go so far as to say that every being who possesses a body, when threatened with that body’s death, tends to become all in a moment curiously interested in what it is losing. And here I could bring forward an argument that really does seem to refute the prognostications of God. I refer to the fact that in the crucial moment before making our plunge and diving into “the deep end” of this confounded “other dimension,” we all began considering our bodies very, very carefully. God considered his bare feet and his long curly beard. The Devil considered the dry leathery movements of his tongue between his fibrous lips. And we all did the same. Both girls lifted their free hands to the back of their heads to arrange their hair. I gazed at my knees praying that they wouldn't show outwardly the shakiness they felt inwardly; and old Org scratched the least seemly part of his huge frame. And how eminently characteristic it was of the rhetorical but essentially commonplace orator that I am, that the first words I uttered were the most commonplace of all human descriptions of death.

"Well!" I said. "We have joined the Majority!"

My next thought, if thought it can be called, was an extremely simple and natural one. I wanted to be sure that Rhitha was close to me, although neither of us possessed here, it seemed, any hands to hold! But no sooner had I thought of her than our thoughts were together, for she too had thought of me. My "we are together still" corresponded with her, "we are still together"; and we each felt the other's personality give a sigh of infinite relief. It was together, therefore, that we both soon realized that Org and our exquisite Asm were also close to us. But where was God and the Devil?

We had all discovered by this time that it was possible in this universal sea of death to follow every single thought that our companions had. "And what," I wondered, "would be the best word in our old earth-language for the queer over-lapping of consciousness that apparently goes on in Death's great ocean?"

I resolved to make an effort to find out.

"What word shall I use," I asked God, "for the way we exchange our consciousness of things down here?"

I had no sooner asked this question than I realized I was rudely interrupting a very interesting conversation that was going on between Him and the Devil.

"What would you say, Devil, my dear, to this young fellow's question?"

I didn't at all like being called "a young fellow." Indeed I felt that this whole leap of ours into this strange sea was not due either to God or the Devil, but was entirely due to me and to my interest in modern philosophy and my acquaintance with the whole metaphysical notion of different dimensions. But I suppressed my peevishness as well as I could, so as not to miss anything in the Devil's answer to God's question.

"Tell the silly kid," replied the Devil, "what I've just been told by a friend of mine down here called Moloch, whom the Olympian God has killed with a thunderbolt, that in this dimension answers to questions come from the tone in which they are asked and not from any reply! But who hears the tone? Can the person who asks hear his own 'tone'? Such was the question," continued the Devil, "that I asked my friend Moloch and he said —"

But I could endure no longer at this crisis to listen to Moloch's ramblings.

"Please, please God!" I interrupted: "tell me, I pray and beseech you, what is the difference between this 'dimension' and the ordinary 'next world' to which we all go when we die?"

"Shall I tell him?" God enquired of the Devil.

"What do I care?" answered this latter.

"You consider then, Devil, old friend," said God, "that since we're all in the same sea, it doesn't matter what we tell each other?"

"Not a damn," replied the Devil.

"Well, I'll be frank with you four," said God quietly, "since we took the plunge together. The truth is I never for a moment dreamed that this place, which your metaphysicians call another dimension, would turn out to be nothing less than the old familiar 'next world,' a world that my friend the Devil here and I have known to exist all our lives, though being what we are, we have only seen people descend into it without being able or without wishing to follow them. But now that we have followed them: it seems to me that as far as that great, empty, endless Space, hitherto the House of the Living, is concerned, the Devil and I are in the 'next world' with the rest. I even catch myself feeling — which is more than you do, friend Devil, isn't it? — a curious pitiful tenderness for this same vast endless, limitless, empty Space, that we two, along with you four, have deserted. I almost feel as if it were, or as if she were, the vast forsaken grandmother of all that has ever lived. Don't you feel a little like that too, O heroic spirit, thou soul of that deserted green patch of earth which was part of the body of the planet Earth?"

While God's voice was dying away, I, Gor Goginog of Blaenau, became aware of two amazing things. The first of these was that the green landscape, from which we had jumped when we jumped out of our bodies, had vanished with our bodies. The second was that a powerful, beautiful, and extremely sensitive mind that made me think of Persephone herself, when she was carried off by Pluto as she gathered flowers, was now actually in touch with us, and that she was assuring me that the same spirit which had made her refuse to commit suicide now made her fully, entirely, utterly, and thankfully resign herself to annihilation and extinction. Although my senses were gone with my body and I could see nothing, I had the feeling that, if I only could see the utterer of these tremendous thoughts, the figure I should see would be beautiful with the quite special and peculiar beauty of a figure upon an Etruscan vase, and I began to feel an incredible comfort in being saved from the fear of death. And then a curious thing happened, if it is possible to use the word "happened" for such an event, namely a lapse in the usual perfect reciprocity between myself and Rhitha.

"What a relief," I thought, taking for granted that Rhitha would, as she generally has done, wholly agree with everything that came into my head, a head which I felt to be much more capable of intellectual thoughts than her lovely little noddle, "to be already dead without knowing it! And how wonderful it is to think that it was at my suggestion and nobody else's though God did at once, I admit, agree with the idea, that we all so boldly plunged into this curious place! There can be no limit, my dear, can there, to this great death-ocean, since it has to contain all the souls of all the beings begotten by all worlds that have ever existed, together with the souls of those worlds themselves, for worlds must have souls, if their offspring have them, mustn't they? And shall I now, my lovely one, with equal boldness — for I am a bold one, aren't I, my pet? — ask God whether there's any reality down here corresponding to Hell, Purgatory, and Paradise, or to those older places such as Acheron, Tartarus, Erebus, and Styx?"

I had no sooner communicated this thought of mine to Rhitha than I became aware that she was hardly following me. Her thoughts, it was clear to me, were elsewhere; and this, I confess, made me feel indignant. And as a result of my indignation I addressed my thoughts to our old monster Org.

"Shall we explore a little?" I asked him. "Wouldn't it be exciting if we could meet down here some of those old Biblical characters we were always hearing about? No! I don't mean St. Paul! He'd hang on to us and talk of nothing but Pharisees and Caesars and Roman citizens and thorns in the flesh and what he heard on the road to Damascus; and he'd want to know whether we came from Libya or Pamphylia or had once had friends in Caesar's household. No! I mean those wonderful old Jews like Moses and Noah and Samson and Solomon and Joshua the son of Nun, and women like Sarah and Rachel and Rebecca and Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite! Oh yes! Org, old friend, shall you and I ask God or the Devil if we can't have a word with Achilles and Ajax the son of Telamon, and that sweet war-man Hector, and even with Argive Helen herself! And just think how wonderful it would be to talk with Richard Coeur-de-Lion and to ask Rabelais about his hospital and about his printing-shop and about his visit to Rome!"

But I received no reply of any sort from Org; and this silence of the only other earthborn male in our little group brought my spirits down with a considerable collapse. And then it came over me that Rhitha's consciousness was communicating something very important to my consciousness; and I fancy, if it had been necessary to utter those quaint noises we were accustomed to call words in order to convey her meaning, what she would have said was something like this: "Darling Gor, please don't be slow in taking in the fact that the whole thing's over. God and the Devil are both dead. Didn't you hear a voice cry, 'It is finished,' and another voice murmur in response: 'Abyssus invocat abyssum'?"

So it had happened! God and the Devil were already dead; and in any second now both Rhitha and I would be dead. Shall I have time to compose before I go some really wonderful "last words"?

But who will hear my "last words"? Oh, I do so, so, so want somebody, somewhere, to hear them! I want somebody, somewhere, to know how deeply I understood the best Greek and Latin poets! Yes! It's to you, somebody, somewhere, that I'm talking now! All my life I've only wanted two things — to enjoy myself, whatever's happening, and to lecture somebody else on how he or she can enjoy whatever's happening! I want to perform, to act, to play the clown, to show off as a philosopher; and how can I enjoy all this when I am nothing and there's nobody there! There must be somebody there, there must, there must, there must, there must be somebody! Well, you, whoever you are and wherever you are, are that somebody! Rhitha was the one person I wanted to live with. I could live without Org and Asm! I could live without God. But I couldn't live without Rhitha. And so, now that we're both dying, I must have you, whoever you are, to hear my last words!

Whether my Rhitha and her lovely friend Asm are being long enough in their dying to exchange that mysterious young girl's smile, which only da Vinci of all men who have ever lived seemed able to catch before it vanished, I do not know: and if it did pass between them, I shall never know whether my barbaric naivety had helped to evoke it; but this I do know, that from my mouth out of the throat of that ultimate Void which in Welsh we call "Diddym," and that had already swallowed up God and the Devil, there rose into the air the recklessly defiant Homeric words: alia kai empes— "all the same for that," immediately followed by the famous summing up of Catullus:

Soles occidere et redire possunt
Nobis cum semel occidit brevis lux Nox est perpétua una dormienda.

"Suns are able to rise and set
But for us when once our brief day is done
There is only a night of perpetual sleep."

THE MOUNTAINS OF THE MOON

A lunar love-story

A YOUTH OF about sixteen sat in deep thought on a stone bench in the best place he could possibly have found for a spell of uninterrupted meditation. He had every reason to meditate and he had every reason for his choice of this particular spot for his meditation.

"What shall I do," he asked himself, "if Father refuses to tell me where he has buried Mother? Mother used always to swear to me that if I ever lost Lorlt, I should know where to look for her if I squeezed my fingers under the gold chain round Mother's neck, that chain Mother never took off, day or night; and that if I gave that chain a jerk it would say 'North' or 'South' or 'East' or 'West'; and if I went straight as an arrow or at least as straight as a stone from a sling, in the direction it had indicated I would be bound to find her." The young man whose name was Rorlt beat several times with the head of the massive club he held between his knees upon the flat stone beneath him.

"It was always tight round her neck," he thought, "but when she told me what to do I was so young that my fingers must have been much smaller and thinner than they are now. Suppose it said 'West' how could I get through the Sacred Grove?"

The stone he was seated on looked due south, so he had only to shift a little to the right in order to confront this same "Sacred Grove." It certainly did offer as he now regarded it a formidable obstacle to any flight or any pursuit or any passage at all.

The Sacred Grove of the Kingdom of Zed was in the very centre of that side of the Moon which has always been seen from the Earth. To reach it from the Earth we should fly straight up to what, when the Moon is full, we are familiar with as the Mountains of the Moon. The other side of the Moon remains a mystery.

What that other side is like we have absolutely no idea. One set of scientific astronomers would doubtless assure us it possessed "mountains" like those dark patches with which we are so familiar. Another set would explain to us that looking, as that other side does, clear out into space, the special conditions there of lunar air and lunar soil would render mountains impossible.

Since not a single earth-dweller except in sleep has yet visited the Moon it still remains completely unknown whether the "Other Side" resembles the side with which we upon earth are remotely familiar, so that the staggering difficulty that confronted young Rorlt when he imagined himself commanded by the gold chain round his dead mother's neck to go straight as an arrow due west requires no little imagination on our part.

The boy's ancestor, the first crowned king of the kingdom of Zed, for we must assume that our young hero's calendar, whether Lunar or Solar, is practically identical with our own, died about two thousand years ago; and we are compelled to lay up very carefully in the botanical museums of our brains, whether as fossils or not, certain facts about the particular Lunar trees called Orvods.

When his mother told him about this chain, and how he would start on his quest to find his little sister if she ever got lost, his mother and he both realized that the starting point would be the stone by the side of the Orvods. These Orvod-trees take a thousand years to grow to their full size and they survive another thousand years without loss of strength; and what Rorlt was wondering now as he banged with his club against the stone base of his seat was how he would ever be able to get through this solid mass of intertwined trees in case the oracular chain said “West.”

For us dwellers on the Earth it is hard to realize Rorlt’s difficulty simply because none of us have ever seen a Grove of Orvod-trees.

Orvods are trees whose trunks in their girth are as large as certain circular church-towers, such as can be seen in Norfolk. They have moreover the peculiarity, such as no trees anywhere else possess, of containing in their sap something of the sexual progenitive juices of men and women. This peculiarity may have been due to the fact that Yorlt, the ancient king of Zed, was sexually so abnormal that he preferred embracing trees to embracing women; and he went to such extremes in his aberration that it produced remarkable results. He tried his little games upon various different trees, among them ash-trees which grew on the other side of the Moon, but Orvods were the only ones that responded. And the effect upon these trees was extraordinary. They waxed enormously large in girth. Some of them grew to be no less than fifty feet in circumference. But what was more peculiar still was that they fell in love with each other. This would no doubt have made their original human lover King Yorlt insanely jealous. But he had been long dead by the time this erotic obsession seized upon the growing Orvods; and they embraced each other to such an extent that where they had grown up side by side their trunks became indissoluble and tended to form an arboreal barrier as impassable as a marble wall. Nor was this the end of it; for when these Orvods, as naturally happened now and then, had grown up, not in a mere row or straight line, but, as you might say, en masse, the result was an impenetrable barrier of living wood-work. The trunks and the larger branches of Orvod-trees resembled those of pines or Scotch firs rather than those of oaks or of elms; but their leaves were completely different from the leaves of any earthly tree. They were shaped exactly like a king’s crown, and as they were very large leaves, this effect of so many green crowns growing together was a striking sight, and a sight too, as the boy Rorlt realized with a touch of rebellious rage that increased the appearance, if it didn’t increase the reality, of an absolutely hopeless impenetrability! The worst of it was, that he retained such a vivid memory of the agitating quarrel he had had with his sister at the shrine of their god Koosk when every indignant word exchanged between them was like a stab with a double-pronged pitch-fork to him now.

“I want a lover!” Lorlt had cried passionately, and then when he had expostulated with her, and talked of the love he had for her and of the love their father had for her, she had shrilled out in a high-pitched, rending and tearing, quivering voice, “You don’t understand, you won’t understand, you and Father are too stupid to understand!” and had rushed wildly out of his sight. He had supposed she had just fled to her private room which was a curiously built little tiny chamber at the top of East Tower. For the House of Zed had four small towers that looked north and south and east and west. But anxious not to increase her mood of hostility, which indeed was the very last thing he wanted to do, he only followed her to the House and there waited outside, leaning against a carved image in a recess in the wall representing King Yarlt, the tree-lover, embracing a tree; but he soon returned to his stone bench. However it was not to her chamber in the tower that she had gone. Later, when both he and his father sought her, she was nowhere to be found. The whole event was made more serious for both men, because, though they had only recently discovered this, Lorlt had for some while been spending her nights asleep by the embalmed body of her mother which had been lying since April, and it was now the Second of June, in a minute little Temple within the House, not as big as Lorlt’s chamber in the Eastern tower but big enough to contain in addition to the body of Lorlt's mother an object of even greater importance. Lorlt's mother had been embalmed by the oldest living person on that side of the Moon, the learned philosopher Om, who lived in a hovel of reeds on the banks of Lake Rockabed, near the dwelling of the Sibylline Prophetess Miss Os and about four miles from the House of Zed. But the object to which I am now referring was of even greater importance to the master of that House than the body of his wife, namely an altar to Koosk the ancient god of sleep. Koosk was the primeval, aboriginal god of the Kingdom of Zed and had been so in the days of Blabberok Kumph before Yalt was King.

This altar to Koosk was no more than a single upright stone about three feet high, composed of a very curious substance resembling in texture jade but of a colour that varied in quite a startling manner, not so much according to the condition of the sky as according to the direction of the wind. Near this stone there was a seated image of this god, representing him with firmly outlined and quite powerful arms and thighs but with the face of a baby and a lap like that of the mother of twenty babies, so ample and so soft as to make you long to collapse upon it and sink into unawakening sleep. It was below this altar to Koosk and not far from the image of Koosk, upon whose tempting lap she may well sometimes have scrambled and laid herself down, that it was revealed to her father and brother she had slept for many nights embracing the embalmed body of her mother.

"O how could I, how could I," thought her brother now, "after this hint of our lovely girl's reckless originality, have been such a fool as to talk of my love and our father's love with that tempestuous cry ringing in my very ears that she wanted a lover? That is exactly what she screamed in her fury, that both of us men were — stupid, stupid, stupid, stupid! And so by Koosk we were! O thrice-precious club of my sorry heart! Why didst not thou give me some hint of what she had in her mind?”

It was at this moment that Rorlt heard the voice of his father calling him. Hurriedly he left his seat and with his club under his arm rushed to the front gate of the House of Zed.

Yes, there was his father standing in the porch, and when Rorlt reached him, he saw a look on his face totally different from any look he had ever seen there before. It was not a look of anger nor was it a look of sorrow. It was not a look of heroic resolve nor was it a look of patient resignation. It was a look of complete bewilderment. The name of the present Master of Zed was Horlt, for it had been a rigid rule all the long two thousand years of their family’s record not to break the rhythm of that “or” and every consonant of their vowel-loving tongue had been repeated over and over, and repeated in a very erratic order, until they reached the age of ten, when the custom was for every child to choose his or her own name. This was an important occasion in each child’s life. The only restriction on their free choice was that they must never choose the name of their father or of their mother. But, when the child of ten had chosen its name, the choice it made was publicly proclaimed at a very elaborate ceremony. The old philosopher Om from the reedy margin of Lake Rockabed had recently several times on these ceremonial occasions solemnly and publicly spoken in favour of a permanent regulation by which certain particular consonants should be reserved for girls and removed entirely from the choice of boys. In this way, according to a law that he would like to call the “Law of Om” the attractive consonants D.K.L.P.S. would be set apart for girls only; and thus the choice of both sexes would be considerably restricted. But so far the Master of Zed had rejected this innovation.

It was with considerable trepidation that the young Rorlt now confronted his begetter. What, the boy wondered, could have happened to give his father this bewildered look? Horlt had an extremely impressive jet-black beard. It was of great thickness; but what made it especially unusual was its length, for it reached down to his navel. His eyes were as black as his beard; and he now made the gesture with his left hand that from infancy Rorlt associated with being told to kneel down. So Rorlt knelt down, and clasping his fingers tightly over the narrow handle of his wooden club he gazed up piously at the beard above him. He had himself discovered this club when he was four years old, half-buried in the mud among the reeds of Lake Rockabed and when his mother pulled it out for him he had promptly given it the name it had retained until this day, the name of Blob.

The philosopher Om told his mother when she showed it to him that it was made of a wood called ash and was to be found on the Earth, but only grew here on the other side of the Moon and for that reason possessed a magical power.

“I laid — her — body — son,” announced the bearded man, speaking not exactly hesitatingly, but very slowly, “in — a — a — shallow grave — which — I dug — dug — with my — own — hands — just—”

At this point two big tears, racing down that huge black beard, like drops of rain down the side of an Etruscan urn, fell on Rorlt’s clenched fingers— “just,” his father went on, “under that rock we used to call ‘Warning-Rock’ — you know the one I mean — which is so sandy that Om thinks there must have once been a deep salt pool round it in early days.” At this point the bearded man once more spoke very slowly and carefully, as if afraid he might be struck dead if he deviated, by the breadth of a hair-streak butterfly’s antennae, from the exact truth.

"As — I — knelt — over her — as you — are kneeling now — only I was looking down — and you — are looking — up — I noticed that the gold circle round her neck was trembling. Can — she — I thought — be causing this movement — by breathing? Has — she — by — a — miracle — by touching — the sand perhaps — where before King Yorlt and even before Blabberok Kumph, there may — have — lived — some ancient god — not of sleep like Koosk — but — of — of — we don't know of what — and then, Rorlt my boy — I distinctly — yes — quite distinctly — heard — the — word 'East' — not from — your mother's lips — but from that thing round her neck." At the sound of the word "East" issuing from this bearded man's mouth, Rorlt was unable any longer to hold back his secret.

He leapt to his feet clutching his faithful Blob with such violence that the club's heavy head was jerked between its owner's legs causing our young man a spasmodic pang, the feel of which, whenever anything brought it again, made him recall that moment.

"But Father, my dear Father," he cried, "this is indeed a miracle! Mother told me once, when I was little, that if ever we lost Lorlt and didn't know in what direction to look for her I was to put my fingers under that thing round her neck and it would say 'North' or 'South' or 'East' or 'West'! And now it's said 'East'! O! I'll go — Father dear — I'll go! I'll go at once to find her!"

The bearded Master of Zed was so amazed at this surprising termination to the most upsetting day he had ever spent since he was born that all he could do as he stood facing his son was to repeat in a low hoarse voice over and over again the word "East" while he made that familiar gesture with his left hand, holding his fingers and thumb side by side and flattened out, as if he were a god of the waves and was smoothing down their wrath, or a dealer in horses and was hypnotizing an untamed mare.

"Well, at any rate, my dear Father," said Rorlt, speaking very firmly and remaining on his feet, and he didn't miss the look in the bearded man's eyes which showed that this independent tone, together with the practical way in which the club was now held, had made a good impression; "at any rate I shan't have to begin by crossing 'The Sacred Grove' as I'd have to have done if the word had been 'West' instead of 'East.' I beg you my dear Father, to look after yourself, in the way you've been accustomed to do, so that I shall know just where to find you when I bring her home! You'll be surprised, maybe, how soon that will be! You needn't have the faintest fear of losing us both. I shall find our Lorlt and bring her safe back to you. I feel it in my bones. I feel it all round my neck as if I'd got Mother's gold band there — Yes! and her own fingers pulling me back to you! You'll see Lorlt with me, Father dear — make no mistake about it — and hear her voice. I shall find her!"

And, with this he shot past him into the House, holding Blob tightly by the middle in his right hand and he didn't fail to take, the moment he was inside the building, the particular passage as the bearded man would know at once, that led to an aperture in a huge block of stone some twenty feet thick through which as children Lorlt and he used to crawl on hands and knees when they had been naughty and wanted to escape punishment.

This passage, when once he was the other side of the massive rock, opened into a quite spacious corridor, leading due East with a downward slope, a corridor that his father could reach by a more circuitous route but not soon enough to catch up with him now. Down this wide corridor Rorlt hastily hurried, giving Blob a defiant swing now and again and striding as he had seen his father stride when the Master of Zed took him to Lake Rockabed to visit Om or Miss Os. Then suddenly his mood changed.

“Am I mad?” he thought, “descending this slope where I’ve never been before, a slope which, though it may be heading due East is certainly heading downwards rather than upwards?”

He stopped and listened. Not a sound broke the deadly hush of this weird tunnel into the heart of the Moon.

He uneasily tapped the stone wall that was nearest to him with his weapon. The echo that followed this casual and careless proceeding struck him as a sound that went down to the bottom of the whole idiotic mass of a badly blundered creation. It was at that point that a very definite dread began to seize upon Rorlt.

“Suppose,” he thought, “I go on, and on, and on, down this infernal descent hunting for her, how do I know that if I don’t find her or get a hint of where she is that I’ll be able to get back again?”

The thought indeed now began to seize every nerve in his being that he might go on and on and on and on, down this terrible incline, till he was absolutely alone in the centre of the lunar orb; and then, when he realized that Lorlt was not there, and that there was no sign or hint of her there, or indeed of any living creature but himself, that he might suddenly find that he was too exhausted to move a muscle to get back.

It was then, and not till then, as he stood under a wall which was composed of great blocks, of very curious stone that would be very difficult to describe in the words of any earth-dweller however observant, though for the general effect of them no doubt the best recourse would be to turn to ancient Greek, that our youthful hero became aware of a sound which certainly resembled footsteps. He gripped Blob firmly by the middle and waited in the centre of the path. Yes! There were steps! He was certain of that; but they were heavy steps, the steps of a man, not the steps of a girl. And what further struck him quite definitely was that they came from behind him, not from in front of him; in fact they came from the way he had himself just come.

Gripping Blob now by his tail or his handle and swinging him threateningly, he retraced his steps and boldly enough, though with deep-rooted rage against fate, he obstinately ascended that slope which he had just decided by his melancholy reaction that he might be too tired ever to ascend again. It wasn't long however before he recognized the steps and there, in a minute or two more, was his father, striding along with his beard quite unruffled and wearing the weird helmet, formed in the likeness of a dolphin's head, that Horlt was in the habit of putting on, when, at least in his own mind, he went forth to war.

"Hasn't anyone ever told you?" the man cried, not so much angrily as really horrified. "Hasn't anyone ever told you, you double-dyed idiot? Didn't your mother ever make it plain to you that none of us ever go down here? You're just a madman; that's what you are, or a little over-grown infant with no sense at all! But I oughtn't to blame anybody but myself. It's all my fault. I ought to have told you and your sister every day, yes! every morning — I ought to have told you that everything down here, and everything they lead to, and everything that surrounds them, doesn't belong to us at all! Yes! it's all my fault. And if you are a silly little innocent, whose fault is that? Not yours, but mine; mine and hers whom I have just laid in the earth where her wisdom can't help any of us any more! And if you hadn't realized that this isn't our land at all down here, how can I think that your sister was any wiser? She, like you, must have just vaguely thought that your mother and I were assuming, yes! yes! were taking for granted, that you two children knew all about it! And all the while, it now appears that neither of you had the least idea that 'the Eastern Corridor,' as we've always called it, isn't ours at all; and not only isn't ours, but belongs to a Being whom neither your mother nor I have ever seen but about whom our parents often warned us. You must remember, my boy, that in former times, for our own family goes back a thousand years, our ancestors, at least so both Om and Miss Os believe, imitated those beings whose name was Pharaoh and who lived on the River Nile!"

"Father, Father!" cried Rorlt at this point, "you mean that the Pharaohs married their sisters, so that their children were nephews and nieces as well as sons and daughters? Then I expect it was because I hadn't made love to Fork and begged her to marry me that she went off in a rage crying out, 'Stupid! Stupid! Stupid! I want a lover!'"

Rorlt noticed how flabbergasted the bearded man looked when he heard this; but the only words he uttered were: "So that was it. So that was it. So that was it."

"O if I'd only known, Father! O if I'd only known!"

"My own idea is," murmured the bearded man; "assuming that your mother really had some intimation of what would happen, an intimation that she was able to inject into that band of gold round her neck, that our lost one may have climbed across the ramparts and let herself down by a rope on the other side. She may have heard your mother and me talk of doing this when we were young. And if she has gone that way the best place to look for her would be in the Bog of Dogs where there are no trees but Lorriots and no rushes but Rinkers, and you know how tall Rinkers grow at this time of year, and how low those Lorriot-twigs hang down, and how thick their leaves are? It's just the very place, with all those Rinkers and Lorriots, for anyone to go who wanted to be run after."

"Wanted? do you say, Father. Do you mean that she—"

"My dear boy," replied the bearded man, "when you've lived with Lorlt as long as I've lived with your mother— 'Horlty and Torlty drunk upon Malty,' as she used to chant while we swung side by side on a Lorriot bough after drinking from some brew she'd brought from the kitchen — you will know these girls a lot better than you do yet. But now listen to me, sonny. I never confessed it to your mother; but when I was only a little younger than you are now I came down here by myself and got clean to the bottom of this blasted slope, a slope that certainly is enough, with nothing but these walls to look at, to make anyone who's alone by himself down here feel — well! feel queer."

"But, Father," cried Rorlt, looking at the eyes and nose between that fantastically designed head-dress and all that still more fantastic growth of black hair, each single hair as thick as an ivy-stalk, "do, for Koosk's sake, tell me what it was like at the bottom of this appalling descent." The eyes he was staring at closed for a moment as if to indicate to the eager lad in front of them that the brain behind them was really hard at work trying to recall the exact lineaments which it had to record. Then they opened and it became clear to the young man that within this skull of which only the eyes and nose were visible an important decision had been made.

"Lean on your club and listen, boy," said the Master of this House of Zed, making the motions with his left hand that his son had so long accepted as a command to kneel. "What you must realize is that our present situation is a very strange one. It has been a remarkable event as Om has often told me, that your Mother and I and you and your sister should have been left completely alone. Om says that our Sibylline oracle, the aged Miss Os to whom both your mother and sister used to go for advice and who lives near Om, always calls your mother 'the pearl of women.'" Here the bearded man gave his son the feeling that at any moment he might burst into a passionate torrent of weeping. "When we were young, you know, I always called her — but enough of that now — what was I saying? O yes!

When I was down there, where this descent leads, all I saw was an immense dome-like chamber, with every yard of its surface covered with strange pictures and still stranger hieroglyphics. These hieroglyphics proved as Om subsequently revealed to me that the family of the horrible potentate, called Blabberok Kumph who occupied the House of Zed before our ancestor came, had been reduced in numbers just as ours has been, in fact reduced more than ours, so that finally there was only one of them left, and this one had made of the domed chamber at the bottom of this descent his permanent abode."

"But Father, Father," cried Rorlt excitedly, "how in the name of Koosk did this solitary creature live? What did it live on? It surely couldn't have devoured the stones of these terrible walls, even if it could have hammered them out or dug them out by its unaided strength? Yes, what I want to hear, Father, is upon what this person, if you can call it a person, lived? Or did it need no food?

Was it more like a god than a man? Or was it — O my Father, tell me, for Koosk's sake, everything about it! Was it half a man and half a woman? I have imagined such beings; and I used to talk to Lorlt about these imaginary creatures and she used to listen with intense interest to all I invented about them!"

It was then that the present Master of Zed did what he had never, at least in his son's memory, done before. He made with his left hand a motion directly opposite to those that commanded his listener to sink to his knees. And Rorlt instinctively obeyed this new gesture and ceased resting upon Blob, and straightened his shoulders and grasped Blob by the centre, not so much as if for a battle as for a race.

"I will tell you all, my son," said the bearded man slowly and very solemnly. "For now that you and I are alone, that is to say alone until, you know what I mean, my boy, until we've found your sister, I feel I have no right to hide anything from you. What finally threw me into a blind panic and sent me rushing back at top speed up this fatal slope where we now stand, was the sound of a terrific voice; and the peculiar thing about this voice was the way it surrounded me. It seemed over me and round me and under me, all at the same time. I might almost say it was in me. And it only uttered three words, yes! my son, only three, but it uttered these in such a manner and with such impressiveness that they became more than words. O yes! much more than words! They became something like — something like — O! I can't tell you what they became! But the three words will be with me till I die. They were: 'I am Oom!'"

No sooner had the bearded father repeated this name to his excited son than both father and son stood in dead silence facing each other, the son holding Blob with a stark recognition of the formidable nature of such a weapon, and the father holding his great beard away from his navel with one hand, evidently to cool his chest, while he pushed his absurd head-dress away with the other, evidently to cool his brain. Suddenly the same decision seized them both at the same instant.

"Come, boy!" said the Father. "Come, father!" said the boy. And turning their backs to their home they marched down the slope, like Homer's Cretan hero Idomeneus, along with Meriones his faithful follower and friend, having decided that, come what might of it, they would face Hector together. Suddenly, as they descended side by side Rorlt asked his father a question.

"Did your friend the Philosopher from the banks of Lake Rockabed, explain to you why his own name 'Om' has such a resemblance to the name of this terrifying 'Oom'?"

“Well, my boy,” replied the Master of Zed, pushing his turban down over his forehead and re-arranging his beard in its proper position, “what Om said was very simple and natural. He said that all words meant purely and solely what certain movements of arms, legs, tails, head, knees, feet, eyes, ears, eyebrows, shoulders, fingers, and, even in certain cases, toes meant. Om said that his ancestors, who were always called Om and who had lived by Lake Rockabed for two thousand years, must have been descended from some ancestor of Oom, or perhaps, for Oom may share with mountains and lakes a length of life beyond any of us, from Oom himself as he roamed about this vicinity, two thousand years ago, before taking up his permanent abode down here. Well! Here we are, two generations of the descendants of Yarlt, the embracer of trees. Will this Monster Oom drive us away or will he, which is much more likely, sweeten our raw flesh with berries and just chew us up and swallow us? I don’t know!” Then in a much lower voice and speaking entirely to himself: “It won’t matter one way or another to you, will it, will it, lying so still where I laid you just now and with — O how could I, how could I let that happen? — with that little squashed fly — or whatever it was — pressed right against your eyelid — and you who couldn’t bear flies to come near you — and all that gravel — and I the one who put you there — O my darling, my darling! Don’t go away till I come to you! Stay for me! Stay for me!”

“Does he know?” thought Rorlt, “what he’s talking about?” And the boy seemed to hear the voice of his mother in that special tone which it often had, a tone that hovered between tender appreciation and infinite warning. “You would know,” he thought, “why he’s so determined to come down this fatal slope. But it’s because you’re gone that he’s like this. I don’t believe he cares one jot what happens to us! O Mother, Mother!”

And so the man muttering about his wife as he adjusted his beard, and so the beardless youth thinking about his mother as he brandished his bludgeon, went down to the multi-pictured wide-domed chamber at the foot of the slope.

Neither the one nor the other of them ever forgot what they saw when they reached that chamber. They had come down here fully determined to see Oom, and there Oom was! He clearly expected them, for he nodded to them quite genially the second they entered and pointed to a bench about a dozen yards from where he himself was seated; and to this bench, never taking their eyes off him for a moment they walked quickly and sat down side by side.

Oom himself was seated on a bench, not on any kind of throne, and the bench he sat on was wide enough for him to move freely in any direction and even to pull up his legs and sit with bent knees if he wished to do so.

Oom was exceptionally tall. He must have been, Rorlt decided, about eight feet in height, but he was very, very thin. He was so thin that he gave to both father and son the impression of belonging to quite a different species of human-shaped bipeds from the one to which they belonged. But it was the colossal proportions of Oom's head that intensified the shock they got from the sight of his long sinewy shape. It was like one of those grotesquely elongated shadows of ourselves of which we are apt to catch sight with amusement or dismay as we walk along a particularly high stretch of ground, in some treeless upland. But it was not only the enormity of Oom's head that arrested them. It was the style of its enormity and the form its enormity had taken. This form suggested, especially the huge piled-up curvatures and rocky projections at the front of the skull, a feeling in those who contemplated it that, instead of a group of Titans having piled Pelion upon Ossa to overcome the gods of Olympus, some vast unknown individual Titan had risen from unplumbed depths to assail Olympus, and that those projections from the earth's surface were portions of this Being's gigantic cranium.

"I have not summoned you two here," were the words that issued now from the countenance into which these planetary projections had moulded themselves, a countenance that seemed to be rather the expression of elemental happenings than of supernatural intelligence, "for any particular purpose. But since we are neighbours it seemed only proper and natural that we should meet. But now that you are both here I can see that the loss of Lorlt and the death of her mother have been such blows to you both that they have swept from your mind all ordinary fear of unusual events. In regard to Lorlt I can help you; I know what has happened to her and I know where she is. Let me begin by assuring you that she is following her own will and pleasure entirely. She was hastening towards the eastern promontory of the range we call the Mountains of the Moon, but which the Sages of the Earth with instruments far more powerful than any of those our astronomers possess, call 'The Mountains of Illusion,' of which promontory your daughter, Master," and Oom inclined his head towards Horlt, "your sister, my boy," and Oom inclined his head towards Rorlt, "must have so often heard, that she couldn't rest till she'd seen it! Well, we have come to a very interesting problem. Was it, do you think, O most venerated Master of Zed, since we, Lunar students of life's intricate tricks, have learnt to find the magical cause of everything, was it by the influence of Tyche, or Chance, the great goddess of the ancient Greeks, that my child also," here he made a faint inclination of his rocky brow towards the bearded man, "was also suddenly seized with a wild desire to visit the Mountains of the Moon? But that is what happened; and if you will forgive me for attributing this event to what our terrestrial contemporaries would call a more human if not a more natural cause, there may have passed, O most venerated Master of Zed, between my only son, whose name is Yoom and your only daughter whose name is Lorlt, an indescribable, inexpressible, inexplicable, inadmissible yet absolutely irresistible flash of rock-piercing communication — O more than that! — of heart-rending intimacy, so that they each knew, without knowing, where they were intended — no! — exactly where they intended to meet each other!"

Rorlt removed his eyes, for the first time since he had followed his father into this domed and perhaps also this doomed hall, from the shockingly sculptured, chaotic countenance of Oom. As he did so and allowed his eyes to wander, he told himself that Oom's face resembled the sort of face we all sometimes see when, in the midst of an absorbing train of thought, we stare out of the window at the distant side of colourless mountain — or even at some intricately pattern'd carpet of the place in which we are wrapt in thought. Turning now to his father, what he noticed at that moment in the countenance of the bearded one seated beside him caused him to feel more respect for this not altogether prepossessing progenitor than he had ever felt in his life before. Was this due, he wondered, to the man's amazing reserve? Rorlt prayed in his heart to their ancestral god Koosk that it might not be because he secretly knew that when he left him now, as he had already decided to do, he would never see him again. Had the Dome of Doom, above their three heads, been in any other cosmogonic spot, than in this particular lunar one, Rorlt would probably have done something that would have astonished both his companions: for with this sudden unusual regard for his father was combined a deep suspicion and distrust of the incredible individual sitting in front of them, and what he would have liked to have done, and what he came very close just then to actually doing, was to jump up from the side of the Master of Zed and bring down Blob with his whole deadly weight upon the craggy forehead of Oom. It was his father's calm at that crucial moment that roused in Rorlt's heart this unexpected affection for him; but along with this he was aware of something in the effect upon himself of the news that his sister had found what she had cried out to him she longed for, that disturbed him not a little. How could his father remain so calm and reticent? Why didn't he make it clear at once to this person in front of them that, when a daughter desires to unite herself to a young man who happens to have taken her fancy, the parent who has to give the official permission for this union isn't the father of the man but the father of the girl? But at this point he began obscurely wondering whether this calm reticence in the Master of Zed, which a moment ago had affected him so much, might not in reality be due to some abominable hypnotic power in the ambiguous being in whose power they were. Yes, the creature had got them at his mercy. There was no question about that. It was only a matter as to how the monster would use his power over them. What would they do, what could they do, to shake this being off, and make Lorlt shake off its offspring?

Rorlt never forgot this moment in his life. It was more than a moment of hesitation. It was more than a moment of imagining himself acting more boldly than he knew he could act. It was a moment of seeing into himself more deeply than he'd ever done before. "Lorlt," he told himself, "could never have felt for me what I feel for her, and she couldn't have comprehended what I feel for her, or she wouldn't have screamed like that and rushed off like that.

"But what do I feel for her?"

And it was then that he remembered how they had both been taught by Miss Os on the banks of Lake Rockabed, that on the Earth in Egypt the Kings who were called Pharaohs always married their sisters. Miss Os, he now remembered, had told them that it was wrong for brothers to marry sisters. Her brother, she told them when they were young, had wanted to marry her, but when she heard from her father all about the Jews and about Sarah and Rachel and Rebecca and Leah and Ruth, she decided that nothing would persuade her to be buried under a pyramid.

"O I do so wonder," Rorlt's thoughts ran on now, "whether my love for Lorlt has anything in it like that of the Pharaoh's for their sisters! But perhaps their situation was like ours. Perhaps there were very few of them; and perhaps there wasn't much choice. Perhaps the only beautiful ones in all the land of Nile were their sisters! Have I been feeling in the depths of my heart," Rorlt now said to himself, "exactly like the Pharaohs? But suppose I forced myself to do nothing else but search all day long, 'up hill' as the proverb says 'and down dale,' could I find any girl that I liked nearly as well as Lorlt or that was nearly as beautiful as she is?"

This thought began to be a real trouble to him as holding his knees as far apart as he could without disturbing his father he took Blob in both his hands and meditatively rubbed the club's head backwards and forwards against the edge of the bench on which they were sitting.

Some animal's teeth or bird's claw or some simple tool used by Oom himself in making this bench had left a slight unevenness at one point along its edge and it was in an unconscious automatic attempt to smooth away this trivial fault that Rorlt was now accompanying his disturbing thoughts with this see-saw movement of his weapon. It happened also, probably by some deliberate premeditation on Oom's part, that the youth was able, from where he sat with his club between his knees, to see a perfect reflection of himself and his father in a mirror-shield suspended from one horn of a black unicorn. As he gazed at this reflection his emotions were so overpowering that he could not help including an image of his mother; and the rush of his feeling caused him to see her leaning against his shoulder on the opposite side of him from where her bearded husband sat.

And as he looked at them all three, with his lost sister in the background, and the vast rocky face of Oom, entirely devoid of all describable expression, hovering above them, all manner of memories passed in a long procession through his mind. And the strange thing was that each one of them as it came blotted out the others and blotted out also the living figures in whose presence it appeared. And he realized as he see-sawed the head of Blob backwards and forwards, forwards and backwards between his legs, what a solemn and portentous thing — yet not un-lunar, no! on the contrary linked with the most intimate power of the Moon — this evocative magic of Mnemosyne, Mother of the Muses was. For one after another, there now processioned before him scenes in which he had played a part, not in fighting, not in ploughing, not in sowing, not in reaping, not in harvesting, but simply in talking, simply in asserting his own ideas and listening to other people asserting theirs. And as he caught these scenes on their way, receding and receding back into his own remotest infancy, he seemed to feel himself following them yet further back, beyond his own birth, beyond the birth of the bearded man at his side, beyond the seed dropt from a bird's beak, that had grown to be none other than the majestic Blob himself, beyond thousands of generations of men, of animals, of vegetables, of minerals. And the "burden," as the English Bible calls it, or the "Baich" as the Welsh Bible calls it, of all our generations, whether Lunar or Terrestrial, struck his mind then as the same planetary load.

"We watch each other as we argue and dispute," Rorlt thought, "and from each of us there emerges into the air or into the soul of this space that surrounds us, a projection of ourselves in the form of an idea. For surely," he thought, "what looks to our senses as empty air is really an enormous living thing and it is into the soul of this thing that these images or forms or ‘eidola’ of ourselves are freely flung. From what we call argument or discussion” — so Rorlt’s thoughts ran on, as Oom seemed to stare out of everything into nothing, and the bearded man at his side seemed to hold an unending colloquy with the woman he had just buried— “is always really the shooting forth of our inmost self into the subject we are discussing, so that the air or the wide-spread soul of the space around us at certain particular moments, when the discussion reaches a climax, receives an impression, an imperishable picture, an indestructible colophon, that remains generation after generation: and every eager, jealous, crafty, mean, compassionate, tender, stupid, clever, hurried, hesitating, bold, emphatic, honest or sly person makes his or her special hieroglyph upon the air, hieroglyphs that are printed there in immortal ink to the end of time and will convey whether there is anyone to see them or not, a series of what Miss Os would call runic Luniads, not only more poetic but also more realistic than anything yet written by the pen of man, except in the scrolls of Moses the Jew and the papyri of Homer the Greek. If that Ogre Oom had the intelligence of a moth, he would know that to make a pedantic kid like me sit in silence by the side of my father who has just buried my mother, and make me ponder on the fact that my sister has been carried off by an unknown person that he calls his son, is to play with a thing that if it isn’t gunpowder or an atomic bomb is something that it’s wiser not to play with.”

He stopped fooling with Blob and lifted him up from between his knees. Then he bent over his father’s elbow and across his father’s clasped hands and whispered in his ear:

“Hadn’t you better walk up the slope now, Dad, and go home? You may find — in spite of all we have heard — that Lorlt is safe and sound and expecting you. I think I’ll spend tonight walking about those hills. They’re not really mountains you know! So think of me quite all right up there, Father dear, and sleep well yourself. I'll be back early; and maybe I'll bring Lorlt with me."

He whispered this so hurriedly that the bearded man, thus suddenly roused from a deep trance in which he was refilling how his wife had looked and what she said on their wedding night, had barely realized what had happened when he saw Rorlt's back, with Blob over his right shoulder, disappearing round the first turn of a narrow passage which he didn't know existed. The bearded Master of Zed rose to his feet in bewildered indignation. He looked at the passage up which his son had just darted. He looked at the wider passage down which they had come together and up which he would now have to go alone in order to return whence he had come. Finally he gave his beard two obstinate tugs, murmuring with the first the syllable Torlt and with the second the syllable Lorlt. Then he turned reproachfully upon Oom. This dweller in the bowels of the Lunar kingdom promptly crossed his long thin legs, laid his long fingers against his bony hips and leaned forward.

"To tell you the truth, my good sir," he said quietly, "I shan't mind if he does stop this marriage. I didn't like my son rushing off in the way he did without confiding more freely to me what he was up to. So if your son snatches my son out of this little complication, it will not bother me at all."

"But," hesitated the Master of Zed, "but—"

Had either Rorlt's mother or sister been present at this scene, for ladies are more penetrating than men, when it comes to the waverings where there is a choice of paths, she would certainly have told herself that in this "but" of the bearded man there was twisted the whole clue to the paradox of life, whether it is solar life, lunar life, terrestrial life, stellar life or cosmic life.

All would be well, but — All would be clear, but — All would be settled, but — All would be at peace, but — All would be ended, but —

The Master of Zed, however, soon swept away this butting business. “Well,” he remarked, “if my old ancestor, Yarlt, had known how long-lived some of us Lunar natives can be he would have taken I daresay more time to clear up the interior of Zed; but—”

Oom took up the tale now.

“But he happened to be, this ridiculous old Yarlt of yours, as wooden-headed as his tree-concubines! But off with you, you hairy-scarey old ass, or I’ll chip you and chop you and saw you and gore you and shave you and lave you, and stretch you out on your dead wife’s tomb as a bridal-room for my son Yoom when he weds your girl — or my name’s not Oom!”

With one quick glance up the path where his son Rorlt had vanished, the bearded Master of Zed accepted his defeat, and turning his back on this skeleton-lean giant whose craggy countenance had again become as impersonal as the rocky ridges of the Lunar Mountains, he began slowly striding up the broad slope, down which he had so resolutely and so recently descended.

Something about the receding back of his vanquished rival may have softened the lunarian heart of Oom or he may have had other motives. Anyway, he now called after him:

“Just one minute, Master! Just one minute! I do so greatly want to show you the little group of what might be called terrestrial milestones that I have collected during my long life. I am sending them to follow after these three crazy youngsters, your son and daughter and my son. For in any case they will delay things. What I shall tell them to do is to attack that bragging fool if they can only find, him who boasts that he’s the son of Mars, whereas we all know that our Mother the Moon is constantly being ravished by our Father the Sun: for the parents of all of us Lunarians are those two. And what is more, I shall take measures to increase, by the magic power which Koosk has given me, the size and height of my collection of terrestrial milestones in proportion as they succeed in doing what I am sending them out to do, that is to say to interrupt Yoom's love-making and to attack this Lunar Son of the Sun who pretends that he's a Martian."

The bearded man now heard such a chorus of diminutive voices and such a trampling of small feet and such a Terpsichorean tintinnabulation of tiny bells that sheer curiosity overcame wrath and he swung round. What he saw and heard was so extraordinary that once the show had started no lord of any land, whether in Heaven or on Earth, could have turned away from it. And there beneath him was the terrific Oom, his tall gaunt figure lying sideways on the ground, and his huge shapeless countenance tilted towards his audience of one, while he played the part, and did it very well, of a circus-manager describing and praising each particular performer. His grotesque little puppets, none of them bigger than a goodsized doll, bowed and curtseyed in the most proper and ceremonious manner as Oom introduced and dismissed them one by one.

"This," Oom said, as a fragment of the Ten Commandments came forward, broken off from the one forbidding adultery, "this is the Law which has done more to stop more than any other thing in the world! Pass on, Commandment about Adultery!"

"Eleven! Eleven! Eleven!" cried the whole little company, evidently in a state of exuberant excitement.

"Come forward, Phien of China!" commanded Oom; and what was obviously the bone of an immensely enlarged Big Toe presented itself with an air of complete unconcern as to what it was, where it was, or who was looking at it.

“He is as indifferent as water,” went on Oom, and as the Master of Zed looked down upon this perambulating Big Toe from China, he thought to himself, “the creature does look like an unmelting icicle.”

“Pass on, Phien!” murmured Oom; “and this, as you might divine by its shape,” he continued, “is the mortal heel of swift-footed Achilles, the ancient Greek. Pass on, Achilles’ heel! But here we have the sole of Mahomet’s sandal which fell off as he entered Mecca and was brought to me by an eagle. Pass on, Sandal of Mahomet! And here we have the beautiful little sea-slug shell of a Holothurian who thought King Canute was talking to him when he was rebuking his over-obsequious courtiers on the sands of the sea-shore. Pass on, little Holothurian! And here is a piece of the fiddle-string that Nero was playing when Rome was burning. Pass on, exquisite creator of delicate sound, your echo will outlive all imperial fingers! And here is a crust from one of King Alfred’s cakes, and you can see how carefully he’s squeezed its end so as to make it stand up on the plate. Pass on, King’s Crust that’ll never be eaten by worms! And here we have the spear-head of Queen Boadicea extracted from the skull of a Roman Centurion and brought to me by a carrion-crow who had gone mad. Pass on, spearhead of a Queen! And here is the nail that Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite hammered into the head of the sleeping enemy of her race. Pass on, rusty iron, from the manly forehead of the still sleeping Sisera!

“It were too long a story to tell you how I added these to my collection of epoch-making curiosities. But now look at this, my dear sir, and tell me if you think that even your erudite lady, Miss Os, of Rockabed, could tell you what this is! Oh yes! Of course I know it’s a white feather! But the feather of what? And I am not making any silly joke about ‘showing the white feather’! Well, I will tell you at once. It is a feather from the dove that flew over the waters from Noah’s Ark in the days of the Great Flood. Pass on, Dove's Feather! My excitable son once told me that some would take it for a feather of the Holy Spirit Itself! But I always tell the silly child that the subject of heavenly feathers is one of those theological problems better discussed in the lecture-halls of Oxford than in the Mountains of the Moon. Pass on, Dove's Feather! And now we come to the last and also to the most valuable of all my Eleven Wonders of terrestrial history. Can you guess, my good Master Horlt of Zed, what this final Preciosity of Antiquity is?"

The bearded man saw hopping towards him an object about which nobody, in his or her senses, who had ever eaten an apple could have had any doubt at all! It was the core of an apple, well bitten on every side, but with its core, that core we are accustomed to throw away, when we've eaten up the whole apple, including its skin! This small apple-core, bitten at on all sides, and quite unmistakable for what it was, came dancing along and swaying from side to side, and as it moved the pearly-white glitter of its shiny substance caught all the light there was in this weird be-domed and be-cupola'd house of Oom and turned it into a little white angel and a wickedly dancing little white angel, as it bowed provocatively at the bearded old gentleman staring down upon it.

"This," chuckled the great Oom from his seat on the floor as he hugged his thin legs and allowed his chin to sink down to a level with his knees, "this is the core of the apple plucked and eaten by Adam, at the suggestion of Eve, from the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil, and you can see for yourself how it leads them all in this memorable dance!"

It was at this moment that Oom lay down, with his body at full length on the ground face downwards, and after a swift swing round into a half-circle with his body slightly tilted-up on his left side, began addressing his little terrestrial turnstiles.

“If you little people,” Oom said to them, in an authoritative but friendly voice, “manage to delay this love-affair before its consummation, I’ll make you nearly as tall as I am myself, and if you manage to find this ridiculous creature who calls himself Woom-o’r-Rim and attack him all together, and succeed in crippling him in some way, I’ll give you complete run of our Moon’s interior, so that you’ll all be free to make love and even to have offspring at your own will and pleasure! Yes! And I’ll make you twice as tall as you are now! Yes! I swear to you that the moment you start crippling this upstart Woom-o’r-Rim you’ll feel yourselves growing taller!”

Something about the inscrutable ruggedness and cosmogonic expressionlessness of Oom’s terrific physiognomy, now extremely near to them, had the effect not only of making all the eleven of them dance like jubilant elves but even of making them all, then and there, in proportion to the glee with which they tripped, grow really taller than they were at first; so that the Master of Zed, looking upon the scene from the upward incline of the slope above it, was able to get the full significance and to catch the complete suggestiveness of each little symbolic performer.

Their chief pleasure in their curious existence was clearly to emphasize to the limit of their power the historic importance of the rôle played by each one of them at the particular crisis of the world’s history it represented. This shining little silvery apple-core had evidently been very hurriedly thrown away by the shame-faced First Man so as to enable him to put the blame on the First Woman with all the oratorical force at his disposal as he saw the Owner of that Tree of Knowledge striding across the Garden, for the little dancing object glittered still with the moisture of two-thousand-years-old human saliva. But the apple-core was soon joined by a much more ethereal dancer who whirled about the stubby little core like a lively lady with a stick-in-the-mud mate. This was the Feather of the Dove flitting back to the Ark of Noah, all quivery-fluttery with the sense of duty well over. But these two were followed by the weirdest thing anyone ever saw dance — nothing less, to give it its Chinese name, than the "Phien-Bone," a weird horny excrescence that had detached itself from the ceremonious big toe of the first Emperor of China.

This "Phien-Bone's" dancing was so peculiar that what it resembled most, to the amazed eyes of the bearded Master of Zed looking down upon it, was the movement of a mouse that the Master had once seen and that had been born in a trap set by his wife but of which she was so afraid that she let it go. It was quite clear that the "Phien-Bone" from China despised both this Apple-Core and the Dove's Feather; for the moment that Jael's Iron Nail, encrusted with the rust of the brain-juices of Sisera, came skipping across the stage, the "Phien-Bone" from China joined it and danced with it five times on end, round and round and round, with an intense concentration on every step they both took that was as fascinating as it was comical to watch. But this was followed by a still more astonishing pair of dancers, namely the fragment broken off from the stone tables of the Ten Commandments round which Nero's fiddle-string had gracefully twined itself. Something about the concatenation of Nero's fiddle-string and the rock from Sinai had a curious effect upon the onlookers at this scene. The Master's long beard began to make queer movements against the navel of its owner, while the corrugations on the forehead of Oom began to stir and tickle as if they would willingly welcome the growing of a pair of horns.

Nor was the aura of excitement confined to these superpersonalities. For there happened at this moment to emerge two worms from a crack between a couple of paving-stones where a thousand years' accumulation of dust had resulted in the formation of a few inches of lunar mould, a comfortable home for several generations of worms. A brother and a sister among these now peeped out to see what “erga,” as Homer would call them, were going on.

The next performer to mount the stage of this burlesque show of terrestrial milestones was the Sandal of Mahomet: and as soon as this formidable newcomer, after whirling round and round on its leathery heel, and after rubbing up as close as possible against first one and then another of the female dancers, finally selected the White Dove’s Feather as its partner, there was a low susurration of relief among all the rest. Oom may have been a good stage-manager, but Pythagoras would have thought nothing of him as a metaphysician, for he clearly took no interest in the mysterious way the number Four kept dominating the dance, especially when it was at its most ecstatic. All lovers of that wise and strange, that all-confounding and all-consoling, idea of Walt Whitman’s concerning “The Square Deific” will be no doubt more alive than was our lunarian enchanter to the significance of the manner in which everything in this dance of the sub-human milestones of destiny was dominated by the number Four. The first personality which necessity compels us to mention here is the Heel of Achilles, which was of course only a round white bone with a hole through it, and, taking a rapidly feminine advantage of this same hole, the spearhead of Boadicea, who with her right arm embraced the neck of one of King Alfred’s half-baked cakes, and with her other arm hugged the waist of the beautiful sea-sand shell preserved by one of King Canute’s courtiers to commemorate his rebuke to their improper adulation.

“Off with you now!” cried Oom; and the bearded Master of Zed, just as if he’d been one of the performers himself, swung round and ascended the slope with long athletic strides. Then all the eleven of them stopped dancing altogether, and in one confused flickering, hickoring, slickering, tickering, bickering, hubbub, hurried up the narrow path that had been taken by Rorlt, through the narrow gate, and round the abrupt corner where his father had completely lost sight of him.

Their road speedily got more and more difficult; so that there was no opportunity for any amusing discussion among this confused and disorganised array, nor for any kind of order either in this bespattered, bedraggled, dilapidated shuffle of scurrying and scrambling milestones of earthly history now lost upon the moon.

“What I think,” remarked the Apple-Core of that forbidden Tree, whose mortal taste brought death into the world and all our woe, “is that we’d better rest by the side of this path, while we’ve got a path, so as to feel fresher when the path comes to an end.”

“But perhaps it won’t come to an end,” commented the Heel of Achilles with Hellenic caution.

“O, it’s sure to, it’s sure to, it’s sure to!” laughed the fiddle-string of Nero. “All things tend to their end, you know!”

“I’d like to hammer a nail into the head of our boss,” muttered Jael, the wife of Heber the Kemite. “Why didn’t he let us dance our dance for that old gent with the bristling beard and then go to sleep for another few hundred years! He could perfectly well have prevented his crazy kid from meeting this silly girl without sending all of us off on this mad expedition.”

“What I can’t stand,” muttered the piece of stone broken off from the Law Tablets, “is the rough, gross, unseemly way this idolatrous Oom orders us about! I was brought up among Scribes of the Sacred Text and they never chanted one verse without hallowing their lips.”

“What on earth do you mean, you son of a bitch picked up among bulrushes, by talking about proper behaviour?” cried the Heel of Achilles angrily. “I’ve a great mind to use my toe on your backside! What does an ignorant nomad like you know about proper behaviour?”

“Don’t you listen, Moses, to any of these war-besotted Baby-Greeks who think it heroic to hide in their tents when their general selects his pretty slaves! They haven’t got the faintest notion of the really important things in life!”

This sensible remark came from the ancient Phien-Toe-Bone of prehistoric China, and a considerable silence ensued; a silence that was not broken until there wavered and quivered along the low “ha-ha,” or sunken ridge of small massive stones, on which they were all resting, the piercing voice of the Apple-core from the Garden of Eden.

“Why don’t we send forward our White Dove’s Feather? She was such a help in Jehovah’s Flood, that I am sure she will be able to tell why the star they call Venus is now beckoning to us.”

The Sandal of Mahomet stood on its head when it heard these words and shook its heel-strap savagely at the heavens. Then once more on his feet he shouted at them all: “How can you let Jehovah or Jove, or any other fancy God, play these dirty tricks upon you? Why should we honour this Jewish Almighty any more than we honour Pluto or Poseidon? Why should we accept his Trees of Life and his Garden of Eden and his Eves eating Apples and his Angels waving drawn swords? Haven’t we learnt by this time that all these stories are just bunk? Bunk! That’s what they are! Bunk, Bunk, Bunk, Bunk!”

And shaking his strap at the Evening Star the Sandal of Mahomet marched indignantly forward up the path in front of them.

“Well, well, well!” croaked the broken fragment of the Ten Commandments in an odd sort of rhyming prose, which it evidently took to be the way a Hebrew Deity would speak out of his Sinai throat. “I opine it’s time for us elderly infants to fall into line. If we don’t find soon on this side of the Moon the son of our Oom, we may have to stride to the other side and look down on the Earth which gave us birth, and become poor portions of the dusky distortions that above their heads they can see from their beds who know nothing of Oom, or of us on the Moon!”

And as they hurried along after the Fragment of the Ten Commandments, there arose a grievous discussion among them as to just how the commandment ran whose fragment had been broken off. The discussion that arose upon this point centred round the question whether there was, or whether there was not, a “not” in the fragment preceding the words “commit adultery.”

The Fiddle-string of Nero kept uttering a quivering note of gloating delight, as if it thought that Rome was burning again, as it argued in favour of a commandment that we should commit adultery; whereas the upright Crust of Alfred’s cake straightened its back with cheerful resolution and insisted that the broken “t” in front of the word “Commit” was the final letter of a decisive “not.” As the whole party moved forward, disputing as they went, the Apple-core of the original Fall of Man, the core that lost him the Garden of Eden, smiled surreptitiously up to the upright Crust of Alfred’s cake and began whispering in its ear.

“A little louder, if you don’t mind,” said the upright crust, “for, to confess the truth, something about the climate of these Lunar uplands has affected my hearing.”

“I was only wondering,” whispered the silvery voice of the core of our original sin, “whether you and I might not obey the intention of Jehovah more delicately and spontaneously, if we slipped away from the rest and followed our own instinctive inspiration as to the nearest route to the mountainous rim we are seeking between the two sides of our Lunar vessel as she circumnavigates the Earth? It would be a bold thing, a daring thing, an original thing to do, but we should, shouldn't we, O brave King of Wessex, have to be very, very obedient to the will of Jehovah, as in this navigating vessel of a Moon, O heroic King's Crust, we struggle — at least you brave men struggle, for a Core of course is only a feeble woman, whereas a Crust is a brave man — to do our duty to the Creator and the Creation? So I implore you, oh well-browned, upstanding Crust, let us slip away from the rest of them and follow our own inspiration as it comes direct from Jehovah! We shall find, we shall find, we shall find—"

And as she spoke she slithered close up to the conscientious Crust and allowed her silver-shining, slippery middle to press against that crinkly-brown, undeviating, unflagging, untemporizing, unpretending, unequivocating symbol of integrity.

There must have been some heavenly aura of rectitude hovering about King Alfred's Crust that stirred every quivering nerve of seductiveness in the saliva-gleaming nakedness of the Core; for it was soon clear to her that she had won. The Crust still stood, grave and thoughtful, gathering all his moral powers together; but there was a look on his face that gave her that exquisite historic sensation to which the Book of Genesis supplies the background without breaking its sacred reserve. They were both however at that point drawn away from their own situation by an excited turmoil in a little group of their fellow-pilgrims, which ended in the abrupt and quite rapid flight above their heads of the Feather from the Dove that had been sent out from the Ark of Noah. And there was every reason for their being disturbed by this flutter in the air above their heads: for the feelings in the flying body of that winged horn of flight, that stalk of the very substance of Speed, were of a nature too desperately remote from the feather's appearance to convey themselves to the nearest and most attentive of those who listened; and this mystery of intense aerial vibration conveying tragic emotion, without the least hint of the nature, or the cause, or the possible consequence of that emotion, was extremely disturbing. The whole crowd of them instinctively quickened the pace at which they were moving; for what else could they do? But the agitation that was felt among them would have been a fascinating spectacle to their stage-manager Oom, and might even have had an ingratiating appeal to the missing Lorlt, if that excitable young woman would have caught it. Matters were soon indeed rendered more agitating still when the Dove's Feather, instead of settling down peacefully when it got back to its place, swung round and started off again to fly ahead of them just as it had done before.

The Dove's Feather itself kept turning round to see if the others could still watch its movements, but when it reached a point in its whirling and twisting flight where it was clearly out of sight of them all, it moved forward much more slowly and much more cautiously. It was clearly afraid of missing some object the sight of which had made it turn back in that wild mood of emotion; whether an emotion of terrible dread or an emotion of overpowering exultation it would have been very difficult for the Feather itself to say. But what it thought to itself, for we all, whether straws on the grass or feathers on the wind, have our own private reflections, must have been, if put into English, something like this:

"What was it, O what was it, that came whirling through my heart when I saw that black feather caught between those two stones? Was it waving to me? It did look as if it were! But I could only see the extreme tip of it. But O, it looked as if it had been held between those stones for such a terribly long time!”

The Dove’s Feather kept giving way to little shivering spasms from tail to tip, though she just whirled on, driven more by her inward feelings than by any wind, for every wind had now subsided, and from firmament to firmament, if we can give such a solid-sounding name to either the cracked and creaking lunar landscape or to the pallid impalpable sky that hovered round it, there was a noticeable hush.

She kept looking quickly to her right and left, this excited Dove’s Feather, fearful lest she should forget the exact spot where she had seen among the loose stones, which thousands of years ago had been scattered below a broken ridge, the particular pair between which the black feather had been imprisoned, and from which it had seemed to be waving to her. There it was at last! The Dove’s Feather knew it as if it had been a portion of her own body. And as she let herself drift gently down by its side she knew by an infallible instinct just what it was, and just why the sight of it had excited her so. For years and years and years, during that great Flood that had come so near to destroying every living creature on the face of the earth, she had lived with that feather, or rather she, the White Dove, had lived with him the Black Raven! And where had they lived? What vessel had saved them from those universal waves? Nowhere else than in Noah’s Ark! Nowhere else than with Jehovah’s own private company of birds and beasts, whereof the Black Raven was one!

O what a moment for them both this reunion was! The Raven’s feather had known the Dove’s feather in a second! Yes! the moment she floated past him he had known her; and the desperate waving of all that was visible of him was only a small part of what he felt.

And now, together once more after all those years, with no Mount Ararat to scramble down, with no Jehovah to whom to sacrifice bulls or goats or rams, and with no indignant voices in their ears from righteous young people watching grandfather Noah lying drunk and naked on his bed, all that these two feathers could do for a while was gently, O so gently to stroke each other as the white one laid herself down by the stony pillory of the black one and they both allowed a few thousands of years be as a few minutes to the tune of the beating lovers' hearts. But how to get the Raven's Feather out of the prison in which pure chance, and not any gaps in his character, like those which our critics have dared to find in the character of the immortal author of "Robinson Crusoe," had enclosed him? And now we have to confess that it was the "white feather," that very symbol of shrinking from violence, which all lusty rogues combine to call contemptible cowardice, who thought of this way of escape; and not only thought of it but successfully carried it out! What she did was to leave her friend's side for a few minutes while she went off on what she called an insect-hunt. The Raven's Feather found himself both peevish and alarmed at the length of her stay in this hunting-field but when she returned he soon realized that it was not for nothing that the Holy Ghost has been given the Wings of a Dove. When it was all over, and liberated from his pillory her mate happily reclining by her side, the White Feather found herself forced to exchange a few lively jests with an uproarious bumble-bee who eventually was persuaded to remove his private jazz-band and go in search of other prisoners who could be released.

"I dipped my tail," the White Feather explained to the Black Feather, "in the juice of several small berries that some bird had dropped from its beak on the moss; and then, as soon as I saw a bumble-bee who was huddling itself against a fungus and who struck me as being thirsty, I brushed up against it and it followed me here. Then I squeezed myself as well as I could into the crack of your prison and this powerful old Bee followed the track I made. I fancy he thought you must have collected a secret store of honey in there, and with all his strong legs at work he dragged and pulled at you till he got you out. But, now we're safe together again, as we haven't been since we were in Noah's Ark, I want to tell you of an astonishing encounter I had in my hunt to set you free. I flew full in the face of — of a being far greater than our silly old Oom who collected us all together out of a crazy notion that we were symbolic milestones of what he considers the history of the Cosmos, whereas of course, as you and I have every reason to know, it is only the history of one small planet circling round one of the Universe's most ordinary stars."

"O my dear," protested the Raven's Feather, "don't, for the sake of all the feathers of all the birds that have ever lived, go on any more in that strain! I know the limited nature of poor old Oom just as well as you do, which is better, I would wager all the blood I ever had in heart and head, than this precious son of his knows him."

"But the being I blundered into," cried the White Feather, "was a much more startling figure than the son of poor old Oom. He was also an infinitely more impressive person than that pontifical doddipole, the philosopher Om. I met this being just as I had seduced the bumblebee to follow my juicy track; and he, or it, took in, in a second, what I was up to, but showed no hostility to my little game. Indeed, if he showed any feeling at all, it was rather a friendly amusement than any sort of objection to what I was doing. But, O my precious Black Feather, the being I saw was the most astonishing object I have ever seen! It told me, or he told me, his name, in a gentle propitiatory voice, just as if it were anxious not to frighten me. It told me its name was Woom-o-Rim, and that it was the only child of our Mother the Moon.

"While it talked to me it let me take my rest on the back of one of its great hands which was shaped like a curved ploughshare, but at first I was far too terrified by the Thing's whole appearance to have the gall to answer the challenge it made. It kept repeating: 'I am the only child of the Moon. I can tell you all about the Moon. Nobody but myself who am her child can tell you why the Moon and all of us Lunarians are held in esteem beyond all living things in the heights and depths, in the unbounded abysses and infinite expanses of the indescribable Space which surrounds us all.

"'When I say "held in esteem," 'this amazing being went on, 'I mean that this mysterious ultimate stage of every existing universe and of all possible universes, namely the infinite Space in which they expand or diminish and appear and disappear, the stage in fact for every event and occurrence, every appearance and disappearance, that can happen anywhere, is naturally and inevitably made more conscious of those satellites within its unbounded emptiness who by some inexplicable mystery in their inherent nature can influence everything that becomes, whether by chance or by fate, aware of their existence.'" Having reached this point in the relation of her strange encounter and of the bewildering words of Woom-o-Rim, the White Feather flicked her tail tenderly against the tail of the Black Feather.

"It's a weird world we live in," she whispered, "and when I think about it all there sometimes comes into my head the idea that we all may be in one wild crazy dream! Only then I say to myself: Is it a Dove's dream, or is it a Raven's dream? Is it White Feather's dream or Black Feather's dream?"

"Did your acquaintance who said his name was Woom-o-Rim", enquired the Raven's Feather, disregarding his lady's last speech as the negligible product of feminine nerves, “tell you whether he was the only child of the Moon? I have always understood that neither the family of our silly old Oom, nor the descendants of York who drove them underground, had any authentic claim to be Moon-Kings or Moon-Queens. But I suppose, unless he has half-brothers, or half-sisters older than himself, Woom-o-Rim is the only creature in the entire universe who can claim this Moon of ours as his real mother.”

“What struck me as a most interesting thing, Black of my heart,” replied White Feather, “was that while I was listening to him, I seemed to feel this Infinite Space of which he was talking actually present in the rock against which I leaned. O yes, my dear! And what was more weird still, I felt as if it were actually present in my own body! You may not believe it, Blackie darling, but for one passing second I could really feel, yes! actually feel, a piece, a segment, a sliver, a strip, a shaving, a scrap, of this Infinite Space in every part of me! I realized as I’ve never done before what Infinite Space meant. Do, O do, my darling Black Feather, try and realize the presence of this Infinity! Think of our living, ever and always, with Infinity about us! It makes everything different! O Blackie, my treasure, doesn’t it? Doesn’t it? Look at those two blades of grass now, growing in that crack! Do you see the pair I’m talking about? Yes! Over there — by those tiny grey lichens with such red tips that you’d think a dragon-fly had been killed above them — Yes! Those two there that are pointing upwards, side by side, stretching upwards, craving upwards, struggling upwards, yearning upwards! You’ve only got to look at those two blades of grass to know exactly what I’m feeling. It’s their attraction to each other joined with their attraction to Infinite Space! They must be feeling that if they could go up, up, up, up, forever, they would become grass-gods, divinely drunk, mad-drunk, ecstatic, delirious, beside themselves! Isn’t it queer that those two grass-blades should be so like me and should have this intense longing to struggle upwards? You do feel just a little, a very, very little of what I feel, Blackie darling, don't you? Do you suppose, Blackie, that the queer sensations we shared, all those years ago, when Noah bred us in the Ark and then let us out of the Ark, are experienced by any living thing in the entire universe when confronted by Space? Do you suppose that the smallest worm or beetle or fly or grub in the whole congeries of universes that are now, rumour says, spreading out into Space has the same craving I have? Has every single, living thing this longing to get out — out — out — of some sort of prison? You might reply: 'But the worms burrow down into the earth?' Certainly they do! But what we must remember is, if our latest earth-rumours are correct, and as most of their astronomers are moon-gazers their ideas come up to us here, not one star, not one planet, not one smallest, tiniest, minutest little moon or satellite in the whole expanse of this vast multi-verse but has got another side to it, another front to it, another surface to it, another face to it, that must inevitably look out upon the same infinite space as its other front does, as all its fronts, if it has more than two, are bound to look out. So that when you protest that moles and worms burrow down instead of leaping up and bursting out, like grass and leaves and rabbits and squirrels and monkeys and wild-cats and pythons and even fish as far as they can go, you are forgetting that in infinite space there is no 'up' and no 'down,' no 'north' and no 'south,' no 'east' and no 'west.' When you want to escape from your prison, wherever or whatever that prison is, it doesn't matter to you in the very least whether you escape through a window looking north or a window looking south, whether you escape by climbing up a ladder to the top of the roof or by climbing down a ladder to the bottom of the cellar! From the roof you can still mount to the chimney-top and from the cellar-floor you can still go down the drain and into some crack in the foundations that leads to the other side of the whole orb! That is the point of every living thing's struggle to escape the prison into which it has been born. 'Up and out,' or 'down and out,' it doesn't matter which, as long as it ends in out."

The Black Feather was really showing signs of interest now, but suddenly it stopped its tender quivering against the side of the White Feather.

"What's that?" it enquired anxiously.

The White Feather rose up in haste from her recumbent position.

"It's here! He's here!" she whispered with a gasp to her companion.

And as he too flapped up to attention he saw approaching them the extraordinary being his lady-friend had just described.

"Alone, alone, alone, alone," muttered Woom-o-Rim as soon as he reached them. "Don't you understand, you fluttery, flickery, flattery, flappery, blottery, tottery, slippery, flippery, wickery, tickery, trespassers in my domain, that I am the only heir of my mother? Don't you understand that I, who am the only Woom-o-Rim in our universe, yes! you little fluttery, muttery, tuttery, tiddle-tots, I who am the only offspring of the loneliest Orb in Space alone have any idea, and alone will ever have any idea, of the real secret of my mother's life! You know, of course, you two flippery-flappery feathers, that nobody knows where her soul is now? Everybody knows how because of her revolt against the Sun and of her refusal to allow the Sun to meddle with her, that that bloated ball of bonfires has become her insatiable enemy? He doesn't know, He never will know, in spite of what the oldest and greatest of all earthly poets says about his 'seeing all things and hearing all things,' whither her heavenly soul, just as beautiful as this her lovely body, upon which all we Lunarians were born and upon which we shall all die, has fled and escaped. But I, Woom-o-Rim, alone of all conscious beings in infinite Space, possess the secret as to where the pure, the lovely, the heavenly, the more than heavenly soul of my Mother the Moon is now safely and securely hidden from her lustful pursuer, drinker-up of all the river mists and fogs, and illimitable waters and delicate shadows of the dawn, and the imponderable mysteries and vaporous illusions of the twilight. Unknown to all earth's rulers and prophets and unknown even to you, peaceful Feathers, blown on the four winds, is the hiding-place of the soul of my mother, the Moon. When I was young—"

It was at this point that Woom-o-Rim's speech had a singular effect upon both his listeners. They rose up side by side, so that their tails, if such a word could be used for the glassy ends of them which adhered to the mossy stone whose cracked surface had been the black one's prison, stood erect upon the stone, while their hair, if that word is a lawful synonym, fluttered beautifully in the long-drawn gasps of Woom-o-Rim, as lying prone on the ground with his face towards theirs he slowly recovered his breath.

"What few living creatures in this grotesque world of ours realize," he soon continued, "is that my mother possesses in her soul a power to generate at her will and pleasure this magnetic attraction which still as all we Lunarians know, thrills through this body of hers, upon which I am now prostrate and you two are now upright. Here am I, her only child, treating you two with far more courtesy and consideration than you are accustomed to receive from this lumbering old lunatic Oom who only values you two, incomparable Feathers though you are, and though your life-story has been told again and again by the Rabbinical master-scribes of the House of David, as merely a couple of oddities for his mythological collection. Here we are, three conscious entities, discussing the situation in which we find ourselves. You two understand each other naturally and easily. Well! I am anxious that both of you should understand me, I won't say completely, but at least up to a certain point; for, after all, we are now, all three of us, clinging to the magnetic body of my Mother the Moon.

"Why did she have to hide herself? Yes, why did she have to conceal the living soul of this magical body to which we are still clinging as we converse? Purely and simply because of the burning lust of the remorseless, the merciless, the uncompromising Sun!

"Now, my dear friends, I am in a very difficult situation. Before my mother made me swear I would hide her forever from this ogre of a Sun-God, she revealed to me without the faintest shame who my real Father was. Of course all our fellow-inhabitants of this Lunar World have assumed that my Father was the Sun. And what has bewitched them into clinging so steadily to this delusion? No doubt the wise craftiness of my Mother herself: and in this, I confess it to you two immortal Feathers without shame, I played up to her, to the limit of my power! She has been absolutely frank with me from the beginning and there exists between us a deliciously sardonic pleasure in thus fooling our friends, and not only fooling our friends but I still sometimes like to fancy actually fooling our grand enemy, the Sun himself. For that burning and blustering and blighting old bully has for millions of years been begetting children by the careless casual and incontinent fluorescence of his procreative beams; and one offspring more or less, who would notice it, or what did it matter? No, my real Father, so my strange, sweet mysterious Mother confessed to me one aerial evening, was none other than the warlike soul of the great planet Mars, which came down on no less than eight separate occasions to dally with her; and only stopped coming when she was big with me. If you two wise Feathers, from your instinctive initiation into Rabbinical and Kabbalistical learning, ask how his majesty the imperial Sun endured without a fit of murderous jealousy this descent of Mars into his secluded villa of amorous delight, I can only reply that my impression is that my sagacious Mother kept all these things secret and, like the Mother in another mythology pondered on them in her heart. She always had had very capable and competent attendants, my beautiful wise Mother. I don't know how much of all this is new to you two Kabbalistic Feathers, but I have no doubt that both the preposterous Oom and the pedantic Om have for a long time been spreading this knowledge among all their Lunar pupils — namely that the spirits of certain particular ladies upon earth of an extremely neurotic and highly-strung type, are in the habit of leaving their bodies when they are asleep and eagerly and devotedly offering themselves as attendants upon the Moon-Mother. It was indeed the spirit from the midnight pillow of one of these terrestrial ladies who superintended my sweet Mother's pregnancy when she was big with me and my own birth. The most devoted of these spirits of sleeping ladies is the spirit of a lady called Myfanwy Cellwair, who comes from Dorvil in Wales and who comes to see me still, though she is growing old and frail, and to tell you the truth I've become rather fond of her and have even taken her to Mother's hiding-place. Between her and Mother there has now developed such a close affection that Myfanwy comes to warn her when there is any likelihood of the Sun coming out; and when the day is well over and Mother is in one of her lively moods and is whispering through all that space of moonlit air to my Father Mars, our old lady, Myfanwy Cellwair, will giggle and wriggle by her side and dare her to whisper all manner of naughty things through that silent moonlit space to the planet Mars."

At this point Woom-o-Rim became silent and rose up. He was well over six feet tall, and his chief peculiarity was the marbly whiteness of his skin and its evident hardness and thickness. It was like a horny shell; and in spite of, or perhaps because of, the absence of the sun it gleamed now with a dazzling silvery light. He wore nothing over his shining skin but a large blanket of the softest wool, and, in his manipulation of this rumpled garment, the only son of the Moon showed himself to be a master-actor, quite apart from the purpose he may have had, at any particular moment, for action.

"I tell you two Judaic, Talmudic, Rabbinical, Kabbalistical Feathers," and as he spoke he flung his woollen mantle round his left shoulder, like an orator about to address the Roman Senate, who in his heart was praying that some artistic visitor from Athens had already extracted a pencil and a palm-leaf from his belt with an idea of sketching him, "I tell you, I say, that it may be a disaster for this brainless, soulless, heartless Ball of Fire before our contest ends that he ever dared to meddle with Mother!"

In his oratorical self-consciousness Woom-o-Rim turned his gaze away from the Black Feather and the White Feather and fixed it on the long path up which the other "Milestones of Terrestrial History" as Oom, their Collector, called them, were now advancing, led by the Heel of Achilles and the Burnt Crust of Alfred's Cake.

"I must leave you and deal with these rogues!" cried Woom-o-Rim leaping to his feet and striding down the hill.

For some reason, probably because their owners had been men of action rather than imagination, neither of these two famous relics were in the smallest degree disturbed by the sight of the tall, white-robed, silver-shining son of the Moon.

"If that Goliath over there meddles with us," said the Crust to the Heel, "I'll go for one of his bare shins! He's got nothing on under that blanket, and my burnt head can draw blood mighty quick."

“Excellent,” replied the Heel; “and I’ll go for his other shin. I know I can strike it to such a tune that between the two of us this pillar of salt will soon be a kerbstone of sand.”

But long before either the heroic Heel or the honest Crust could try their strength against the silvery limbs of Woom-o-Rim, the two wise Feathers from Noah’s Ark were already approaching the crest of that Lunar Ridge upon which under one of the wonder-trees, planted long ago by the tree-worshipper York, Oom’s son Yoom and the Lord of Zed’s daughter Lorlt were seated hand in hand in an ecstatic trance of youthful first love. Towards these two, though by a more circuitous path than the one up which the Raven’s Feather and the Dove’s Feather were advancing towards them, the young man Rorlt was swiftly on his way, eagerly, anxiously, tenderly, engaged in the not very sportsman-like quest of stalking his sister and his sister’s lover.

While these events were occurring on the Ridge, or as perhaps it would be better to call it, on the Rim, of the Moon, that scholarly old spinster, Miss Os, was summoned from her well-filled library into her hall-way by a loud knock on her front door, a knock that by the sound it made was clearly caused by the handle of a heavy walking-stick. When she opened it she was amazed to find herself confronting none other than the philosopher Om, who lived in a lonely hovel on the reedy bank of Lake Rockabed.

“Come in, Mister Om,” the old Lady said. “Come in and let me make you a cup of tea while we have a good talk.”

“Old man Om,” as Rorlt called him, obeyed her by coming in, obeyed her by hanging his coat on a peg, and finally obeyed her by settling down close to the fire in a comfortable armchair, but so emphatically rejected her offer of a cup of tea or of any other refreshment that Miss Os was too tactful and too considerate to do anything but let that go.

"It's a funny thing, Miss Os," he began, as soon as she had taken her own seat on a cushioned stool on the opposite side of the fire, "but the truth is that I stayed awake last night for nearly an hour listening to the ticking of my old clock, a sound that generally sends me to sleep in a few minutes, because I had an odd feeling that something uncanny was happening to our late pupil, that lovely and lively daughter of the Master of Zed; and I couldn't resist the impulse to come and ask you whether you by any chance had had the same sort of intimation of danger threatening that attractive girl, who was always your favourite, as she was mine. Have you had any such fears? I mean of a psychic nature and out of the air, so to say, and quite apart from the ordinary hopes and fears that we teachers, like adopted parents, naturally have for the young people we especially like?"

Miss Os rose from her stool with an emotional little cry.

"Yes! Yes! Think of anyone like you, Master Om, having the same experience! Yes! it kept me awake last night from nine to eleven! I go to bed, of course, earlier than you; but I began to have that feeling about Lorlt the moment my head was on the pillow, and I know the feeling must have lasted till about eleven; for before I got to sleep I heard those queer night-birds called Kumindies making their weird wail as they were flying from the lake up to the mountain. And they never leave the lake much before eleven. Oh Master Om, Master Om, how can we find out whether she's all right? Her Mother died some time ago; but I don't think they've buried the body yet. The Master of Zed's such an eccentric that you never can be sure what he'll be up to. He looks so devout and proper and orderly with that great beard of his; but you never know with these heads of old families, do you? I liked the poor dead lady very much; and I used sometimes, when she came here to see me, to feel that between her husband's long beard and her daughter's shrill laugh she had an uneasy life. She told me once that she was sometimes afraid that her son Rorlt deep down in his heart wanted to marry his sister and that he'd asked her once how it was that among the ancient Egyptians brothers had been allowed to marry their sisters.

"I think she felt that if she were to die her husband would be too self-absorbed to see anything that was happening and that all sorts of weird and dangerous things might happen. I know, for she told this to me her very self, that she sometimes felt a dread lest that awful creature Oom from his mysterious palace in the underground world would one day have begotten enough sons, all giants like himself, to come out into the air and kill off every member of York's descendants and become the sole monarch of the Moon! O yes! and most learned Master Om, do please listen to this! I heard one rumour — though of course it may have been those Kumindy birds put it into my head, for they are very old and very queer birds — that our lovely Lorlt was being frequently decoyed down some secret passage into the underground kingdom of Oom so that she might be seduced by Oom's son Yoom, who is, so they say, a very lascivious young man."

All the time she had been speaking Miss Os had been leaning forward on tiptoe with her long thin arms bearing the light weight of her slender person, while the fingers of both hands were tightly clasped on the round golden knob at the end of the elbows of her visitor's armchair.

"Can you give me," enquired the philosopher Om, "any closer details of this intimation of Lorlt's danger?"

"Only one, Master," she replied.

"Let's have it! O let's have it quick!"

"Well, it's simply this. I seemed to hear a man's voice — but of course it may easily have come from one of those old Kumindy birds for their notes are often very imitative — but what I imagined I heard was a man's voice saying: 'Come along Lorlt of my heart! Let's go to the very top of the Ridge and see how things look up there, and see how we feel up there!’ Whatever fate it was that made me hear those words,” and Miss Os leant still lower over the elbow of her guest’s armchair, “and of course it may have been the Devil playing tricks on me and not our Lorlt at all, what I felt was intense worry and frightening agitation. O, it’s such a comfort, my dear Doctor Om, to have you to talk to about it all!”

These final words were accompanied by two or three big tears, which, though they fell on her own clasped hands, trickled down from that promontory of supplication, upon her guest’s knee. Om’s leather boots reached half-way up his legs, but the faded deer-skin jerkin of dark olive green which covered his lean figure had left his knees bare to this appeal.

Unknown to either of these people, the two emanations of the hidden feelings against which this conscientious pair of elderly persons were now struggling met in the air of that studious chamber above their grey heads. The male emanation murmured: “Just to have Lorlt for five minutes, and my hands free to toy with her, I’d give up all my Greek and Latin and Arabic and Hebrew!” And the female emanation murmured: “If only you’d hug me to your heart, O my beloved Master Om, and kiss me as Faust kisses Gretchen in the play, I’d be ready for Lorlt to be ravished ten times over!”

“Well, Miss Os,” pronounced the philosopher, resolutely rising, though not without some effort, from his comfortable armchair, “you and I must give some careful thought to all this. No, no! Please don’t come to the door. I can find my hat and let myself out. Good night! And sleep well!”

Outside the philosopher Om grasped his great stick and looked up at the sky. Then he looked up at the ridge of the Mountains of the Moon, of which he had known every rise and fall, every peak and gully, every curve and every level expanse for the last sixty years! The sky was certainly clear of clouds, and the vast constellations he knew so well and adored so deeply stretched far away through space in every direction. And as he walked towards his lonely hut among the reeds of Lake Rockabed it struck his mind that this whole spectacle, together with all his mental reaction to it, was simply a small and insignificant part of some wholly inscrutable mystery.

"Does the good lady really imagine that after learning that both of us have been visited by the same alarming premonition about this exquisite young creature, that I shall be able to stroll back to my lodging and go quietly to sleep as I normally and naturally would do? Does she suppose that this is actually possible to a thinker of my type?

"Why," he asked himself, "O why must all these little tiny temporal objects, like poor old Miss Os and doddipole me, find ourselves staring out from the banks of this little lake into Infinite Space, into a space that goes on and on and on forever in every direction? Poor old Os is a woman, and poor old fustybudge Om is a man, but her face and my forehead are little different in the whole sum of things from the whiskers and skulls of that pair of water-rats I caught sight of this morning. Why should there be such a difference between this old stick of mine and that great club of Lorlt's brother's, called Blob, that she was always telling me about? That's what I'm now asking you, yes! you, you great heavy, unfeeling, stupid, thick, blind, deaf, dumb door-post of my long years of life among the reeds!

"But what's the worth of a universe made up of infinite space with a few little swarms of fire-fly stars and planets dotted about in it? And what's the worth of this conscious self that peers out of its shell at these reeds, at this water, at these bushes, at these two old gate-posts, at an old fool's bedroom window?"

Om stared at the centre of his cottage-door upon which, on leaving to visit Miss Os, he had pinned up a small piece of paper with the words

“What a queer thing this self, this ego, this ‘I am I’ of ours, really is, when you stop taking it for granted! Why should Nature, or whatever creative energy it is that, for want of a better name, we call ‘Nature,’ have invented this self-business at all? Well! I suppose there wouldn’t be a world if there weren’t these conscious ‘selves’ to observe it! Would infinite Space be conscious of itself as something that exists as a background for nothing? Would it say to itself: I am a background without any limit. There is no beginning to me. There is no end to me. If anything is to exist it must exist in me. If it doesn’t exist in me, it doesn’t exist. All that exists must exist in something that is nothing. I am the nothing in which everything exists. But the curious thing is—”

It was at this point that the philosopher Om made an attempt, which was certainly as daring as anything he was imagining that Infinite Space might be saying to itself, an attempt to get outside the whole universe of Infinite Space along with all the starry systems it contains. What Om really was doing at that moment was trying to imagine how far these centuries-old night-hawks or nightjars, which the gods of Olympus used to call Kalkids, but which we mortals still call Kumindies, would be able to follow what he was trying to do in thus thinking himself out of the world.

“The curious thing is,” his thoughts ran on, “that this whole universe or multiverse or whatever we like to call it, cannot exist, does not exist, and never did, could, or will exist, without at least one of these queer little twosided dots, or specks, or atoms, or molecules or minute grains, who possess two sides, one side of these atoms looking outwards and one side of these atoms looking inwards, one side being conscious of Space and conscious of all that is outside itself in Space, and the other side being conscious of itself, of the Ego, of the I am I, of the ‘Little Me.’ And what an extraordinary thing this ‘I- universe’ is, this universe entirely dependent on the ‘I’ for its ‘within’ and on what the ‘I’ feels for its ‘without.’ Consider, for a second, this mystery-self without the help of which everything vanishes. It is as vague and shifty and evasive as everything else! If, for instance, you say to yourself, ‘I think I’ll see a little deeper into myself than I generally do!’, what happens? You find that the limits of what you call ‘into yourself’ are so dark and so vague and so impossible to define, that you can no more fathom them than overleap them.

“O Life, O Life!” cried the philosopher Om to himself, feeling much more like a child of ten than like a man of sixty and ten, “why is it that in every position we take we find ourselves surrounded by hopeless mystery? But wait a while! What would it feel like if we weren’t surrounded on all sides by complete darkness and mystery? Do you know, my friend Ob” — for the philosopher Om had called his stick by this not very endearing name, ever since he had found it in the grave of a couple of crazy adventurers from the earth who had dug their own grave together after being dropped on the Moon together as a result of a mutiny of airmen on a famous space ship—’

‘that I really believe we should feel worse still if in some direction or other, it doesn’t matter what direction, there was no dark mystery at all! Suppose, for instance, friend Ob, that we discovered that space had a definite and unquestionable adamantine wall surrounding it on all sides; wouldn’t that be worse than to have it extending to infinity in every direction? Or suppose if when we tried to sink down into the fathomless depths of our own ego, we found that instead of being surrounded as we are now by a dumb, blind, palpable bottom of everything without sound or smell or taste, where we feel nothing but the heavy, aching, throbbing, thudding, heart-beating pressure of a sickening sand-sunk, drowned, brain-bruised, water-logged, sea-buried, pulse-pumped sensation of being at the bottom of the world, we felt that we were on the brink of a bottomless well that descended forever towards a nothingness that was never reached, would it not be worse?”

With these thoughts — if “thoughts” they could be called whose vaporous edges were forever relapsing into obscure sensations — the philosopher Om drew from his belt an enormous iron key and let himself into his hut, making Ob, his stick, go pit-pat, pit-pat, pit-pat before him, just as if it had been a blind person he was propelling in front of him. The interior of Om’s hut at that moment resembled the confusion of his thoughts. Something very different from a carefully arranged library of unusual books such as that which filled the exquisitely dusted shelves of Miss Os’s dwelling was what now surrounded him as he searched for a box of matches wherewith to light a candle. The room might indeed have contained the bed of a maniacal bookworm, who night by night, was wont to be seized by some kind of biblical nightmare. It took him several minutes to find a box of matches, for it had now grown quite dark. But when once he’d found the matches Om did nothing but light a wick that protruded from what was already little more than a shapeless lump of wax. Then he hurriedly removed from his own person his overcoat, his coat, and everything except his shirt and his underclothes, and from Ob’s person the dirt that had accumulated about his ferrule, and, after that, having blown out the light, and with Ob partly in his arms and partly under his body, he stretched himself out upon his well-blanketed and well-pillowed bed and without turning over more than once relapsed into a dreamless sleep.

He slept much longer than was his wont and indeed the height of the sun in the sky indicated to him, for he was well acquainted with all the normal terrestrial calculations, that it was considerably after nine o'clock in the morning when at last he woke.

Om was not a philosopher for nothing, and one of his chief triumphs as a thinker was that he had succeeded in establishing between himself and his stick a particular transference of thought which, though it could hardly be called a language, was certainly a genuine interchange of wishes and intentions. It was not however until he had made tea for himself, and had swallowed half a loaf of brown bread and a good deal more butter than usual, and had even gone out to the privy in his garden and had had a satisfactory action of his bowels, that — as he polished Ob with the particular oil that this fastidious and self-possessed walking-stick preferred to all others — the day's grand decision was made. It came, as so many of his most important decisions did, through his stick.

"Blob has been talking to me through the air," were the words that greeted him when he returned from the garden. "And what may Blob have been saying?"

"Blob says that, if we want to prevent Lorlt from being raped by Yoom, we shall have to hurry as quickly as possible to the Great Ridge."

This news was at once an agitating incentive and a disturbing menace to our philosopher. He had never approved of his self-respecting walking-stick's association with this big hoodie-doodle of a wanton club, but, being the philosopher he was, he had been unwilling to risk increasing it by opposition. He had been always extremely desirous of keeping the descendants of York in their dominant position in the Lunar World; for he had always felt that if the enchanter Oom were to emerge again from the subterranean realm into which the York family had driven him, there was no telling what might come of it.

“Well, old friend,” he replied calmly, as he stretched out his right hand to take a firm hold of Ob by his gracefully moulded and delicately polished right-angled handle, “I expect we had better go up there and see what we can do. I know Rorlt and of course I know your friend Blob, but I’ve never seen this son of Oom who calls himself Yoom.” Having thus spoken and having re-crossed his threshold and re-locked the door and placed the iron key in a special pocket of his clothing, the philosopher Om set forth with unperturbed resolution to ascend the Great Ridge.

As may well be imagined on a morning when the sun’s radiance was so especially brilliant as it was this day, the deep instinct of the wandering soul of that Lunar-worshipping and Moon-passioning old maid, Myfanwy Cellwair, impelled her, while her body still slept a dreamless sleep, to seek that rock-cloven recess in the side of the Great Ridge, where Woom-o-Rim, the Son of the Moon, had told her his mother had learnt to hide, and arrived in time to warn that Lady of Mysteries against coming out at all. As a reward for this timely warning the stately Miss Cellwair was permitted to sleep on till nearly noon, while her wandering spirit was given the privilege of spending these blest hours in lunar exploration.

By the time the philosopher Om, pressing Ob’s brazen ferrule firmly into the earth, or moss, or gravel, between the rocks, or tapping the rocks themselves with it, in his cautious advance, had nearly attained the ridge, it was natural enough that he should be seen by the observant spirit of Miss Myfanwy who at once glided down the mountain-side towards him. Myfanwy’s spirit was much more nervous in this encounter than was the rational mind of Om.

“Come here, lady!” he called out to her, when he noticed she had begun to glide away.

She obeyed submissively and floating towards him through the air like a reflection in water remained stationary in front of him looking with large plaintive hollow eyes into his grave face.

"There's no danger, is there," he said, "of your body's sleep down there being interrupted with a painful shock, and of your having to bolt back to your body's pillow like a stormy petrel in an east wind?"

"O dear no, Master Om, for so I know you to be! My lady Moon told me you were, so to speak, 'on the go,' and one of her special gifts is to be able to inspire her worshippers with something of her own magnetic power."

"Do you mean, gracious lady," enquired the philosopher Om, no more disturbed by this bodiless apparition than if it had been an eccentric pupil at the door of his Rockabed dwelling, "that our Moon-Mother draws you regularly from your sleep?"

"O no! Dear master!" whispered the phantom; "O no! It isn't like that at all! It's we ourselves; for there are quite a lot of us on the Earth, both in the West and in the East, who worship the Moon: and we all leave our bodies the moment we are asleep and go to wait on the Moon-Mother wherever she may be. This art of willing is a very special art to learn, as of course you must know very well, great master, but it is an art that I've always longed to acquire. I began to learn to practise it when I was a child. There was a poet who lived near me when I was little; and at first when I saw he was composing a poem by the expression on his face, I used to tease him by dancing round him, but once he recited to me a poem about a rhyme coming to him out of the air that was so pathetic that after that I always hid in the bushes when I saw him coming and willed and willed and willed, O! you don't know how hard I willed! that he should find a perfect rhyme."

"And did your willing help him, little lady?" enquired Om with considerable interest. "Perhaps," he said to himself, "this could be used to start a completely new kind of poetry in the world! I must think more about this!" But aloud he asked the soul of Myfanwy Cellwair whether she thought that certain unusual words that could rhyme with certain usual words could be found, if a true bard hunted for them, floating round the Moon like lost leaves from the Tree of Life in the garden of Eden.

But although she was no more than the wandering soul of a sleeping old lady drunk upon moonlight, the free spirit of Miss Cellwair of Dorvil hadn't, like that of the philosopher Om, so drugged itself with logic that the most vital essences had been spilled from life's cup.

"I don't think it's only the rhyming part of their work that poets get from the air," was the comment Om now received; and like other philosophers when caught up out of their particular territory he felt nonplussed and slightly foolish. "No, of course not," was all he could murmur.

Meanwhile in the shadow of a great rock half-way up the last ascent to be made before approaching the Lunar Ridge which, when the Moon is full, is that topmost rim across which no inhabitant of the earth has ever looked, lay the only daughter of the Master of Zed in the arms of the only son of Oom the Collector of Milestones. They had made love till they were weary of making love; but they were both too wildly in love with love to feel sleepy and they were now engaged in what to both of them was the most exciting conversation of their lives.

"She must have loved him at the moment when she yielded her maidenhood to him," Lorlt was saying to Yoom.

"I don't think," Yoom was answering, "that we need of necessity assume quite that. The Sun at the full blaze of his warmth in the middle of the day would, by his very nature, so seize the one he embraced that they would both be wrapped up in such a fire-cloud of erotic passion that there would be no thought left on either side for any tenderer or more lofty feeling. O yes! These old prehistoric, antediluvian suns and moons lived in a different level of consciousness altogether from that in which you and I, my precious, live and move and have our being. But O, my little one! How thankful I am to all the gods of all the levels of existence, that you and I met. How beyond all hope it was! I was getting queer, you know! yes, getting really funny in my head. My respect for my Dad never knew any bounds. I loved and venerated him from my childhood up. But to live day after day, my darling Lorlt, with the noblest enchanter in the Cosmos, yes! in the whole of Creation, is anything but a joke! It wasn't for a mate I longed, because my ignorance of sex and everything to do with sex was abysmal. I longed for someone, for anyone, of my own age, with whom I could exchange ideas and talk about everything and discuss the whole business of life on this crazy orb. O my darling! O my treasure, I can't tell you what a miracle of joy and relief it is to have got you! And just think what a chance it was, that day, that we ever met! Did you know, Lorlt darling, who I was when you saw me talking to that old badger by that knoll in the corner of that spinney? I've always had a fondness for badgers, and I think they have a fondness for me, though I may be priding myself there a bit too far; but I was warning that particular badger that his wife was endangering the lives of their offspring, four of them, and O such quaint little things, by letting them scuttle too near that old hollow pine; for there's a savage pair of owls who've got a nest in that tree, and there's no daintier treat for a baby owl of our lunar breed than an infant badger! Well, it was you, any way, my precious, who found me, and not I who found you! Aye! but I'll never forget how I felt when I saw you bending over me! For a moment I took you for that wonderful goddess Miss Os used to tell me about, who was born from sea-foam. It was Miss Os, not my father nor your father, who taught me about her and Hera and Pallas Athene."

“She taught me too!” murmured Lorlt.

“Did she really, my beautiful? Heavens! I never knew that!”

Lorlt’s only comment was to kiss him on the forehead and to whisper with a sigh as light and evasive as the wind through quaking grass: “You men miss as many things when you are infants as you do when you are grown-up!”

“Pardon me! I never expected—”

Such were the words with which the philosopher Om uttered his authentic surprise and his by no means altogether simulated pleasure at realizing the fulfilment of his quest so much sooner than he expected and by such an entirely unforeseen chance.

“Sit down, Master,” said Yoom politely.

“O yes, do, do, please, sit down with us for a little while, Mr. Om!” added Lorlt, making room for Om’s arched academic shoulders against the overshadowing rock.

“We were both wondering,” she hurriedly went on, evidently feeling that the only way to make sure of avoiding any clash between an old and a young thinker was to treat this mountainous ledge as if it were a reception-chamber and herself its queen, “whether Kant was right when he said we have to see everything in life through Time and Space?”

Om lifted up Ob a few inches from the mossy ground and then very slowly and gravely replied. “Mo! I think Kant was wrong. Time is an invention of the human race. But I think that every living creature in the world has to survey the Universe through the category of Space.”

“I must have a little more space,” cried Lorlt prettily, and in a tone of volatile and almost provocative levity, such as would have been impossible to her twelve hours ago, “if I’m to know what I think about this! Yoom doesn’t need any space for thinking! Yoom could think if I were pouring out tea from Miss Os's teapot into I don't know whose cup on a tray on his stomach — couldn't you, Yoom dear?" and she turned her laughing eyes to the young fellow she had met for the first time that very morning.

Had Woom-o-Rim been present at this scene, he would not have missed, as both Om and Yoom did, the almost melancholy quiescence into which Lorlt's girlish spirits sank, like a sidelong little rivulet sinking into the pool below, completely independent of the proper descent of the main waterfall.

"What I have come to feel," concluded the philosopher Om, "is that where all the metaphysicians of Earth have gone wrong is in the way they have over-emphasized the human element in our thinking and neglected the cosmic, or, if you prefer to put it in that gross way, the material element. What they dare, in their arrogant impertinence, to maintain, is that every properly adjusted thinking apparatus in every conceivable living creature must of necessity see the whole mystery of life through what in their insolence they presume to call the 'inescapable categories' of Time and Space! Now what I, a born thinker upon this Moon of ours, have to tell the world is that it is a monstrous insult to the Universe to put side by side, as if they were of equal importance, this wretched little doll's-house computation, of minutes and hours and days and weeks and months and years, which we the human race have invented and which we call Time, alongside of SPACE! Just think, my worthy friends," and here Om, who, ever since he referred to the "doll's-house calculus of minutes and hours", had been feeling blindly about with the brassy ferrule of the earnest-minded Ob, succeeded in striking quite hard with this solemn entity a stone which was balanced on the extreme edge of a steep slope, "just think," he went on, while the stone, which was not only a round stone, but was composed partly of reddish manganese and partly of glittering quartz, bounded ecstatically down the slope, "how small a part our fuss about this confounded Time of ours plays in what we do to change the Universe to the advantage of our race. The wiser any of us are, the more we confine our individual contribution to our race's future to a certain dull, regular, and resolute repetition of some monotonous but absolutely necessary daily labour.

"But the queer thing is, and I believe myself that our submissive acceptance of the element of dullness and repetitiveness and sameness in our daily work is a sign that we instinctively know it, the queer thing is that this very dullness gives us sometimes a strange and mysterious feeling that, by thus sharing the submissiveness of what we call the Inanimate, we are really in touch with the deepest of all the mysteries of creative Nature. Yes, I believe myself that we are, by enjoying this deep secret of the Inanimate, proving ourselves to be, and feeling ourselves to be, the authentic children of—" So wrapt in his subject was the philosopher Om that he did not notice with what intense interest the lively Lorlt and the thoughtful Yoom were watching the behaviour of that bouncing ball of manganese and quartz, " — of the ultimate mystery," he went on, "when we ourselves come to resemble those celestial substances that we call so casually Inanimates. For it will only be when we, feverish, fussy, fumbling, frisky, feckless, febrile, flamboyant, flurried, foolhardy, foppish, floundering, fugacious fol-di-lols of modern frippery, grow more like Inanimates that the Universe will begin really to develop after the fashion that the sages of the human race have from the beginning agreed will be the best for us all."

How far the philosopher Om's words could be justified on the ground that the faithful walking-stick Ob was nearly an "Inanimate," and that the stone ball of manganese and quartz which was now leaping among Oom's Milestones of Human History was clearly an Inanimate, no doubt depends on just the same caprice in individual opinion as that which decides whether the universe would lose or gain by a permanent and fruitful union of the young man Yoom with the young woman Lorlt. One individual opinion, at present more adverse than favourable to their union, was at that moment, in the person of young Rorlt, rapidly passing the rocky ledge of the two lovers. Nor was Rorlt's attitude to the matter modified, as may well be imagined, by the fact that the pyramidal shape of certain rocks past which he was now climbing caused him to think of Egypt and of how in that country, to which Joseph welcomed his father Jacob, the rulers derived both political and sensual satisfaction from being married to their beautiful sisters, who, as we gather from the story of Moses could be deeply moved by discovering a baby among bulrushes. But the sight of this leaping stone ball, gleaming with quartz and blushing with manganese, as it whirled past him interrupted Rorlt's advance. He could see that its descent was causing a spectacular confusion among a crowd of extraordinary objects whose appearance completely bewildered him. Finally he saw a figure as tall as a tall man; and at this sight he stopped and stared. The man's limbs seemed to him shining as if from some interior radiance that was absolutely superhuman! The man had a kind of blanket over one of his shoulders, but his legs and arms as Rorlt watched him bend down to catch the round stone as it rushed towards him, gleamed with a lustre that reduced the glitter of the stone's quartz to a pallid whiteness. Rorlt saw him catch the stone with athletic naturalness, while, as he did so, the woollen blanket slipped from one of his shoulders and displayed the Herculean quality of his chest and biceps.

Once in possession of the stone, this shining athlete, wrapt in nothing but his woollen mantle, straightened his shoulders and looked round him at the extraordinary crowd of vividly self-conscious beings who were now jostling against him — and they were jostling rather threateningly, though only a few among them reached as high as his belt.

But the man's attention had now been caught by this sudden appearance of young Rorlt, who was ascending towards him very rapidly, though not quite as fast as the quartz-stone had descended upon him. Holding the stone in his right hand he rose to his full height and settled his feet as firmly as he could on the mossy ground between antique granite slabs intermixed with crumbling masonry and long-dead ivy. When Rorlt reached the place where the man stood he stopped dead and turned himself into a stone; but not into a rolling stone. What he was now was a standing stone, or it might be better to say into one of two gate-posts, whose partner or twin-post had not yet been erected or even perhaps has been carried away. Poor Rorlt, that is pretty well what he felt as he stood there, doing his best not to show the faintest fear of this shining Woom-o-Rim, who still remained perfectly silent clutching in his spectacular fashion that dancing ball, half-dazzlement and half a dirty bloodiness; for the only exciting thing Rorlt could think of to harden the muscles both of his mind and of his arm was, once more, how beautiful Lorlt had looked when she cried out, "I want a lover!"

But what was his task now and his duty now and the whole purpose of this wild climb now, if not to separate her from a lover? One thing only did give him at that miserable moment a little comfort and that came from the unconquerable personality of Blob. He moved this powerful being till its brow rested on a lovely little bed of soft moss; and as he did so the proverb "a rolling stone gathers no moss" slipped into his head, just as if tossed there out of the stone Woom-o-Rim was clutching, with the evident intention, so Rorlt felt, of cracking his skull with it. An interesting question to put to the philosopher Om would have been how far, at a moment such as this, when two different skulls, whether normal or abnormal, whether sub-human or super-human, confront each other with what would naturally be hostile intentions, there is a definite interchange of thought between them?

And in this case what would be the nature of such an interchange? What would the thoughts of these opposing skulls, if they could have been drawn or painted, have looked like? Woom-o-Rim would no doubt have insisted that thought resembled a round orb, the very replica of his mother the Moon; but the painter would probably have soon detected that like Hercules in action, he could only think of blows, not caring whom he was fighting or what the fight was about. Our psychological painters would very likely have seen Rorlt's thought as a fully-armed baby with helmet, shield, plume, and spear, to whom Woom-o-Rim would have seemed like the giant Atlas who had been punished by being given the task of holding up the sky. Twice had Rorlt's left hand joined his right hand on the handle of Blob, and twice had Woom-o-Rim lifted the fist containing the stone till it was on a level with Rorlt's head, when there occurred a startling impingement on this statuesque pause before battle. The two characteristic weapons of the most formidable ladies in crafty old Oom's sub-lunar collection of historical milestones — namely, the great iron nail of Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite and the piercing spear-head of Boadicea, the Queen of the Iceni — now attacked Woom-o-Rim from the rear so fiercely that Rorlt, without thinking what he was doing, but automatically taking the masculine side in what seemed almost like a sex battle, began swinging Blob's great body up and down in front of his potential antagonist to protect him from that horribly sharp nail and from that piercing spear-head. Had it been the formidable heroines themselves whose weapons these were, the swinging terror of the tremendous Blob would doubtless have been effective. But Jael's nail, still coated in the immemorial rust of the life-blood of that great warrior Sisera, leaped lightly and easily over the great club as it swung to and fro, while Boadicea's spear-head darted first over, and then under, and then round that same sweeping monster. The expression on the head of the nail was so vindictive, and the flashing eye of the spear-head so formidable, that their united attack upon Woom-o-Rim not only put an end to the imminent battle between this Son of the Moon and our young friend Rorlt but united them in an unexpressed confederacy.

It was, however, only too characteristic of the nature of the Universe to which we all of us belong that the simple fact of Rorlt's taking the side of the Son of the Moon roused all the rest of Oom's Collection of the Living Turnstiles to join in the attack. So, to speak in playground language, it became forthwith nine to two.

"Across their shins! Across their shins!" yelled the sandal of Mahommed, giving Rorlt such a swipe that he nearly howled.

"Take that! Take that!" shrieked Phien, the Toe-Bone from China, giving Woom-o-Rim such a kick that the Moon-Man staggered and all but fell headlong.

"Crush their feet! Crush their feet!" cried the Heel of Achilles, descending with all his weight, which was like that of a cannon-ball of solid lead, upon the right instep of Woom-o-Rim.

"Into his belly with you! Into his pretty little silver belly!" cried the shell picked up by King Canute on the East-Anglian coast. And with his breath quite taken away by this ferocious attack Woom-o-Rim staggered about, reeling and groaning, like a tall lighthouse in a thunderstorm.

"Hurrah! Hurrah!" twanged Nero's Fiddle-string. "When we've got the sods on the ground we'll scoop out their eyes — and — and — and—"

"And eat them on toast!" added Alfred's Crust, scraping the dirt with one ef his burnt elbows from a piece of flint.

"You two men have no wives," cried the grating, husky, broken, hoarse, cavernous voice of the rocky fragment from the Ten Commandments given to Moses by Jehovah, a fragment which had been chipped off from "Thou shalt not commit adultery" and which only retained a couple of wretchedly cracked and mutilated syllables from these two final words, syllables that in their present state could easily have been taken as a command to do the very thing they forbade, "so you must be wanting to commit adultery with other men's wives; so take that, you shining legs! Take that, you well-covered thighs! You think we don't know your adulterous thoughts, but we do, we do — so take that and that and that! We'll larn ye to be like ye be!"

Long before poor old Blob's massive head could batter this degenerate frame of Sinai rubble into any sort of discretion, both the dazzling legs of Woom-o-Rim and the discreetly covered thighs of Rorlt were so bruised and bloody that together they both swung round, exchanged a glance that clearly said: "The best thing that grown-up sensible fellows like you and me can do is clear out of this damned infant-school!" and began to ascend the slope, while the round stone that had come so near to marking a milestone in lunar history nearly slipped from Woom-o-Rim's fingers, and nearly rolled down towards Rockabed Lake. In a second the whole Collection of Terrestrial Turning-Points was at their heels. The Phien-Toe-Bone which in its youth had kicked the footstool of Confucius from beneath the master's foot came hopping like a drunken toad round the silvery bare ankles of the Son of the Moon.

"If you don't clear off, you bloody little bounder," cried Woom-o-Rim furiously, "I'll squeeze you between my hands like a wet rag, and throw what's left of you into the Pit of Babberok Kumph!"

At this the Phien-Toe-Bone thinking to itself "my home is not here; my home is in China"; became absolutely still, and leant against a rock like a wounded wombat. A litany of silence now ascended into the listening air and all their voices sank down and down into the very abyss.

“Who the hell,” whispered Rorlt in his late antagonist’s shining ear, “is Babberok Kumph? Your bringing him in has scared them all still.”

“O that’s easy to explain, my boy,” said Woom-o’- Rim with indescribable satisfaction; for to have the son of the Master of Zed, the direct descendant of Yarlt the Tree-Lover, coming to him with such a simple question, was a real triumph; and it healed a hundred vanity-sores in his touchy soul.

“You must remember that your ancestor Yorlt the Tree-Lover was not the first Lord of our Lunar shores. Oom, the father of the young man Yoom, who has just carried off your sister, was here before Yorlt. No, your ancestor Yorlt was not the first Lord of the Moon. I speak, of course, of the Moon’s ruler, not of my Mother the Moon herself, nor of myself her only child. We two, of course, are as completely outside these invasions and retreats as the judge is outside the legal arguments of the lawyers.”

Woom-o’-Rim paused and looked round. By this time it had become clear to Rorlt that whoever this mysterious Babberok Kumph might be, Woom-o’-Rim’s threat to throw Phien-Toe-Bone out of the Lunar World into the abyss of Babberok Kumph had had a quelling and silencing effect upon them all. But Woom-o’-Rim was now going on with his explanation and Rorlt was listening intently to every word.

“Babberok Kumph,” he was saying, “was the Lord of what we Lunar natives have come to call the Kingdom of Zed long before your ancestor York came upon the scene at all. I can see that these little devils” — and he made such a sweeping gesture with his right hand that the fingers which had been holding the ball of quartz and manganese dropped this object, which at once began bounding like a mad kangaroo in and out of the eleven Terrestrial Turnstiles, creating a greater confusion among these mobile milestones than they had known since they first set out on this crusade—

“know very well what I am talking about; and that’s why they’re scared into silence — for the truth is that this Babberok Kumph kept a pit in his garden — I think it must have been near where your father buried your mother a few days ago — a pit that descended not only through the substance of our orb but through the whole aerial atmosphere surrounding both the Moon and the Earth. Probably, in real truth, once clear of all planetary obstruction, this deep hole simply opened out into empty space; but as you can well imagine, the popular notion was spread abroad that it descended into Tartarus, or even into the Sheol or Hell of the Scribes of Israel, concerning which all manner of terrifying rumours have reached us, probably from the souls of dreaming rabbis in Jerusalem, for, as I know well, the souls of dreamers have a power, that they themselves wot not of, to visit the places about which they are dreaming.”

Even while the Shining One, flinging his woollen cloak dramatically round his shoulder, was emphasizing after his fashion, just as if he had been Mark Antony over the corpse of Caesar, the power of dreamers to leave their sleeping bodies, lo! and behold! with the tips of her fingers laid lightly on one of Rorlt’s bare wrists as he leaned on the handle of Blob, and close to his elbow was none other than Miss Os herself.

“Is it,” was the boy’s first thought, “Miss Os in the flesh, or is it the soul of Miss Os wandering about in her dreams?”

He knew it was this latter, just exactly what Woom-o’- Rim had been discoursing on, the moment he looked the vision at his elbow full in the face, and when it spoke to him his knowledge of its ethereal nature was fully conformed.

“Don’t let him have her. Take her away from him!” was what the soul of Miss Os repeated, just as if she were praying to Jehovah. Woom-o’-Rim, all ivory-white and if possible more silvery even than his Mother herself in her wildest ecstasy, was aware that he was no longer alone with Rorlt; but he could see nobody and he could hear nothing.

Rorlt felt shocked and troubled.

"I don't want to hurt her feelings," said he to himself. "She has as much right to love Lorlt as anyone else. But she has no right to want to stop her from falling in love! Of course she can't stop her. But she has no right to want to do it. How can I make her see that she has no right to want to do it?"

Rorlt did actually experience a certain throb of remorse when that delicate touch was removed from his wrist and that wild, troubled, unhappy face vanished from his side.

"I've driven her away!" he explained to Woom-o'- Rim. "It was the dreaming soul of Miss Os who can't bear to think of my sister having a lover. And yet, I tell you, O illustrious Son of the Moon, I heard her cry out 'I want a lover!' Yes, I heard her cry out like that when our father was burying our mother! Isn't there any way, O great Moon-born, of changing people's dreams when they dream really wicked dreams?"

"Has she gone back to her pillow now?" asked Woom-o'-Rim gently and considerately. It was clear that, like the youth he was addressing, he felt real sympathy for Miss Os.

Rorlt was silent. Yes, she must have gone back. He had dismissed her. He had sent that troubled spirit away. But wasn't there anything that could be done? He stared at the green moss under the Moon-born's bare feet and under his own leather sandals. Then he suddenly cried out: "What were those two birds that flew past just then? Did you see them, Moon-born, did you see them? What did you say they were? Did you say you knew them? Did you say they came from Noah's Ark?"

Without delay Woom-o'-Rim explained all that could be explained about the White Feather and the Raven's Feather; and repeated again his sympathy for the troubled sleep of Miss Os.

"I was wrong to feel so angry with her," thought Rorlt, "but it would have been hard not to feel as I did. To think of her deliberately stopping that love-affair, the only love-affair, as she must have very well known, possible for Lorlt in our Moon-World at the present time! Well, sister Lorlt, sister Lorlt, your old teacher was acting like Jezebel! But I mustn't think like that any more! Besides, after all, wasn't I myself thinking of the Pharaohs? It's Lorlt's being so beautiful that makes all the trouble." With this philosophical conclusion offered to the shining Son of the Moon as a farewell salute, our young friend hoisted Blob on his shoulder, swung round, and continued his climb upwards. Woom-o'-Rim followed his movements with exquisite nicety, arranging as he did so, his woollen cloak carefully over his left shoulder so as to leave his right arm entirely free. As soon as Rorlt was out of sight, Woom-o'-Rim looked round for some sort of weapon. Rorlt's Blob had made an ineradicable impression on his acquisitive nerves, and he kept waving his shining bare right arm in the air and imagining to himself first one and then another silvery, golden, brazen, leaden, iron, and even wooden weapon, three times heavier than Blob and big enough to crush a vast rock of quartz and manganese. But finding him alone now and to their childish intelligence unable to do more than wave his bare arm in the air, all the eleven Milestones of Mortal History began attacking him on every side. To attack a gleaming giant unable to do anything but wave his arms was a task exactly suited "to all and every one of them," as Miss Os used always to put it, as she prayed to Jehovah and Pallas Athene, who were her favourite divinities. Phien, the Chinese Toe-Bone, was particularly obstinate in his attack, kicking the right ankle of the Son of the Moon with unremitting assiduity, and always exactly at the same spot. Next to him in the virtuosity of his calculated onslaught was the rusty but still sharp nail of Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite — a nail that no longer needed a hammer to drive it in, but by means of the insatiable animosity projected into it by the heroic dame who originally wielded the hammer — this patriotic nail, who already long ago had cloven Sisera's skull into a couple of hollow parenchymatous cubes for the sands of the desert to dispose of, was able so doggedly to force its way into the instep of the foot whose ankle was already being assailed by the Phien-Toe-Bone, that whatever weapon the Shining One might eventually find for himself it would be a sadly limping Son of the Moon who would brandish it.

But the old Collector of the Turnstiles of human life had either completely forgotten, or had never heard a word about Miss Myfanwy Cellwair of Dorvil. So when her spirit suddenly appeared on the scene and rushing among the Son of the Moon's tormentors cried out— "Gis! Gis! Gis!" and, to be sure of being understood by the whole lot of them, followed that up with "Shoo! Shoo! Shoo! Shoo!" all the eleven Milestones fled terrified down the slope.

Meanwhile Rorlt was rapidly mounting towards the final ridge of the Mountains of the Moon.

"What shall we see, Blob old friend?" he murmured to his faithful weapon, "when at last we really look down from the Other Side?"

The answer Blob made to this almost desperate appeal was a very strange one; and it was an element in this strangeness that it was the very first time Blob had ever made the faintest attempt to exchange a thought with his young lord. The word which seemed at that moment to come from Blob was not a remarkable word nor a startling word nor a surprising word: it was purely and simply the word "Listen".

Was it because the wood out of which Blob had been made belonged to one of those Lunar trees that Rorlt's great ancestor York had loved as if they had been so many attractive girls, that this word "Listen," the first, and very likely the last he was destined to hear from his tremendous club, came with the force of a command to our young friend? At any rate he promptly obeyed it and did so to the letter. He sat down on the bole of a long dead rowan or mountain ash, and drawing Blob close to him between his legs, he leaned his chin on the rounded top of the club's handle, so that Blob could press his forehead as deeply as he liked into the damp ferns and mosses beneath. And resting thus, Rorlt did exactly as Blob had bade him. He listened. And slowly, very slowly and gradually there came a sound to his ears that was the strangest sound he had ever heard in his life.

It was a chorus of human voices. They were women's voices. Yet in some weird way they were different from the voices of women. It was as though the voices themselves had become personalities; yes! had become personalities quite as interesting, if not more interesting, than any conceivable persons to whom they could belong. And then as he and Blob sat there together the procession of voices took shape before them. Their shapes were certainly more feminine than masculine. But that may have been because the garments they wore were more feminine than masculine. The procession moved in single file but it seemed literally unending. This may partly have been because it moved so slowly and because its wailings and chantings kept making use of the same tune.

And as Rorlt and Blob, seated on the stump of that little rowan-tree, watched them, Rorlt began to feel certain that as he hugged Blob and pressed his chin against his rounded handle that Blob himself was making an attempt to join in this weird tune. It certainly was a tune that made it very hard for anyone not to join. It was a tune that represented and contained some mysterious undertone of a solemn rhythmical dance; not a dance in the sense of any light or gay or airily tripping motion, but a dance in the sense of some rare ritualistic performance that was super-human as well as sub-human since it really did include the feelings, if they could so be called, of inanimate things together with the feelings, again if they could so be called, of the very elements themselves, yes! the feelings of earth, of fire, of air, of water, and also of that nameless something beyond and behind all these things, that forms the atmosphere, if so it can be named, through which mind communicates with mind, and soul, if there is such a thing as soul, with soul.

What Rorlt felt at this moment as he sat on that rowan-stump and hugged Blob was not that there was some invisible conductor behind the world, by the swing of whose baton the stars in their courses fought against cleverness and smartness and lively intelligence, and rolled on with patience and slowness and obstinacy in the everlasting see-saw of the old unchanging monotony of nature's diurnal course, but that there was some mysterious harmony in the souls of us all, in the souls of animals, vegetables and minerals, in the souls of water, air, earth, and fire, only, as Shakespeare says, "whilst this muddy venture of decay doth grossly close it in we cannot hear it" — yes, that weird procession he had just heard and seen, of forms that were indistinguishable from the shapes created in the mind by tragic music when it transcends all particular sorrow and goes beyond all personal grief and is full of a strange sadness that all nature feels, and feels in a manner that cannot be described, struck Rorlt just now in a very curious way. It struck him as a revelation of something, but of something that it was essential for him to pass by, to pass over, to shake off, to leave behind.

He rose quickly from his seat on that old rowan-stump and hoisted Blob upon his shoulder. For one second, as he was lifting his great club aloft he hesitated whether to put him on his left or on his right shoulder; but an instinct that sprang from every muscle and every fibre and every tendon in his whole body compelled him to select the left. When this decision had been made, however, he recognized its wisdom. He had chosen it by instinct; but he now realized that if Blob had been on his right shoulder there would have been no chance for him to use any other weapon. It would have to be a matter of one overwhelming and crushing blow or nothing at all. Whereas with Blob on his left shoulder, and some entirely different weapon in his right hand, he was ready to face the world. The world? Well, perhaps not quite as much as that! But the point of it all was that he did feel very strongly that he must keep his right arm free; free to use any sort of new weapon with which chance might suddenly and unexpectedly provide him and also free to use in climbing.

He was now climbing rapidly up the last slope of the Moon's final ridge. As he climbed he began picturing to himself the extraordinary summit he hoped to mount. He saw it as an overhanging cliff from the edge of which the whole vast emptiness of universal Space, as it was, beyond all the galaxies and all the nebulae and all the live stars and all the dead stars, everywhere in the past, everywhere now, and everywhere in the unending future. And as he pondered on all he might see from this ultimate ridge of the Moon, the thought suddenly came to him to wonder what it would feel like if he had been the only living creature in human shape left or dropped or born on the other side of the Moon, that side never beheld by any Lunar person or, as far as he knew, by any Stellar or Planetary or Terrestrial person. What would it be like, Rorlt asked himself, to have grown up into human consciousness alone on this other side of the Moon?

And then, quite suddenly, the youth stood still. And while he stood still, as unconscious of what he was doing as he was unconscious of what Blob was doing, he became aware that a very youthful girlish voice was calling to him. It was the voice of a young girl rather than of a child; and it was calling to him in the very tone he always imagined Lorlt using when his mind was full of the Pharaohs. Yes! The voice that called him was the voice of a girl of about his own age, a girl of about fifteen or sixteen; and she was calling to him from the other side of the very ridge which by this time was only a little distance above him! Her voice seemed to pass clear through the side of the slope he was ascending and to come from the corresponding slope on the further side.

The strange thing was that Blob, detached from his young master's arms, was now standing on his own smoothly rounded handle perfectly upright, as if the young girl's voice had suddenly endowed him with something approximating to a living soul. Blob had often seemed to Rorlt as a living person with a kind of consciousness all his own, but now, as the two of them stood on the earth-side slope of the Moon, listening to a girlish voice calling to them from the other side, it was as if Blob, magnetized by the sound, had suddenly attained a power of consciousness that actually surpassed what Rorlt possessed. It was as if Blob had become the master and Rorlt had become the club. It was indeed with a definite nod towards this same recent master of his and another equally definite nod towards the ground under their feet, that Blob now started hopping rapidly up the ascent; and the moment our young friend began striding after him, it was clear that the great club knew perfectly well what its new rôle in life was and fully intended to act it out to the limit. And as the flesh and blood servant now followed the wooden master, this latter found himself impelled to answer the cry he had heard by crying out as they climbed, “I'm coming! I'm coming! I'm coming!”

None of the great lunar sages could have described what Rorlt felt when, following the increasingly long and increasingly rapid hops of Blob, he arrived at the summit of the ridge and gazed around him and down beneath him. Everything that terrestrial mortals feel at certain moments, when they gaze up at what from the surface of their planet they love to call the Mountains of the Moon, was nothing to what this fortunate youth felt as he looked up at the sky above him and down at the descent beneath him. He felt as if he were himself a portion of all that he looked at, and yet he felt as if, though looking at himself as the sky and at himself as the body of the Moon he was all the same, only looking at half himself! Yes, he felt as if he were terribly, horribly fearfully divided in two! He was the Sky, but only half of the Sky! He was the body of the Moon, but only half of the body of the Moon! And the other half, the half with whom it was now the one imperative need of his life, of his being, of his body, of his soul to unite, was the girl whose voice he had heard and had answered! She was his completion. She redeemed him from insane loneliness. United with her he would be the whole Sky above and the whole Moon beneath. And at their union all the divided halves of all the divided things in the universe that still cried and wailed and wept to be united, like that procession of desperate ones he had watched float past him, would be united by the pure magic force of what he felt for the maid who was calling him.

Desperately he climbed on, passing within actual sight of the rock under which his sister and her lover Yoom were listening to the philosopher Om in a happy state of dreamy amorous exhaustion. The walking-stick Ob, being less preoccupied, failed not to notice the passionately climbing figure, and being a dutiful adherent of his manorial lord, he endeavoured to inform him of this new event by gently tapping his foot with his ferrule. Om looked up and saw and recognized Rorlt; but observing that the youth's gaze was fixed so intently on the summit of the ridge and that he was climbing so fast, and knowing that the three of them must be at any rate partially hidden by their rock he decided to make no sign. What it was that led him to make this decision the philosopher Om would have been reluctant to try to analyse even to himself. As most of the wisest among us mortals do, when Nature makes the sign, "Better let that go," the philosopher let it go.

Meanwhile the Dove's Feather and the Raven's Feather were following on a wind that suited them just as it suited our young Rorlt's upward climb; and as they floated together behind his head, their conversation was the most exciting they had ever had since they were merely portions of their parents' wings, during the great pre-historic Flood, inside Noah's Ark.

"But he was always boasting," said the Black Feather to the White Feather, "about being the only one on the Moon — except the soul of this weird mad woman from the Earth who leaves her sleeping body every night to visit her in some secret cave in our ultimate rampart — the only one, save that woman, who knows the truth about it all!"

"You're talking about this Woom-o'-Rim, are you?" whispered the White Feather.

"Of course I am," replied the Black Feather, "and I tell you, my sweet child, you've been completely fooled by this shiny braggart who swears his Father is Mars! I won't say how I know who his Father is. But I swear to you, my sweet, all that talk about being the son of Mars is pure snobbish bunkum! I don't believe the conceited sod knows who his father is any more than you or I do!"

"O but, O but, O but, Blackie of my heart, isn't it wicked of us, isn't it dangerous for us, to blaspheme in this way against our Mother, the Moon? Can't she hear us? How do you know she is not calling to us now and warning us to be very, very careful what we do? I did seem to hear a feminine voice on the wind just now: yes! just the sort of voice our mother the moon would have if she were keen on spanking somebody but wanted to pretend to be very loving so as to get hold of that naughty one and teach it a good lesson!"

"Do you really and truly, O blackest of all heavenly blacks," continued the White Feather, "believe it's possible that Woom-o'-Rim isn't the son of Mars at all?"

"Not only possible he isn't," answered the Raven's Feather, "but I believe it's certain he isn't! In the first place, my darling child, and most easily fooled of all delicious antediluvian Doves, don't 'ee realize that tiny though our old Mother the Moon is in comparison with the great Sun, who sees and hears everything, she has a magnetic power that he lacks and that all the Planets lack and that all the Stars lack? Don't 'ee realize, white core of my black heart, that our Moon is an absolutely unique being in the whole Multiverse?"

It was at that moment that some erratic wind, blowing from the ultimate ridge of that side of the Moon's face which neither the Earth nor the inhabitants of the Earth have ever seen, swept back the two antediluvian feathers down the slope whence they had followed our excited young climber; and all alone, his heart throbbing like a battle-drum, and the ideas in his head whirling round and round like distracted sea-gulls, he rushed up to the summit of the Ridge and down the slope on the other side and into the arms of her who was awaiting him.

The moment of their embrace was a moment that for each of them was at once a death in life and a life in death. He died in her arms and she died in his arms; and out of this instantaneous fusion of the dead body of a youth with the dead body of a maid a new being came into existence who was neither a new boy nor a new girl, but was a fresh expression of that energeia akinesis, or “energy without agitation,” that in the multiplicity of life’s experiences is what really makes for us the blessedness of the unknown future. There are in fact certain occurrences, happenings, occasions, encounters, events, which create, totally beyond the premonition of any human sage, a completely new life. But alas! Such is the cruel “Something that infects the world” that these supreme moments in the lives of lovers are so full of this ultimate life-sap which alone makes the world’s future possible, that they never happen without a mysterious ebbing away of this same life-sap in some other entity. This tragic necessity, entwined in the law of the spiral uprush, was now proved by what happened to Blob; for this heroic club, hitherto prepared to advance up and up and up, whether in the hands or out of the hands of his young master, now when he found himself laid on the ground, no! not even laid, dropped on the ground, knew only too well that the everlasting life-sap of the universe, inanimate block of wood though he was, had sunk down several degrees within him. He was on the extreme ridge when this happened and he now slid backwards, down the ascent up which they had come. He slid and slithered down tail-first with his beautiful and formidable head jolting against the stones and crunching through the roots and stumps and under-brush and mosses and ferns and lichens until he came to the exact place where the philosopher Om was still talking to the girl Lorlt and to her obsessed lover, Yoom the son of Oom. Here he must needs — such was the mischievous trick of Chance — collide with Ob, the careful and meticulous walking-stick of the philosopher Om, who was seriously perturbed when — thump — bang — bump — right close across him lay, at rest at last, the heavy body of Blob.

“Listen,” said the philosopher Om.

So solemnly did he utter this simple word that the lovely Lorlt shook off the warm embrace of Yoom from her slender waist, and Yoom himself clasped the lunar varieties of agitated fern-fronds and troubled herb-Robert buds and quivering little yellow potentillas and uneasy although still sturdy baby-steeples of self-heal, all of whom with their special lunar characteristics Miss Os alone of all school-teachers in the last five hundred years had adequately catalogued and enumerated; but they were all clutched nervously now in the long, excited, oblivious fingers of Lorlt's impassioned lover, as he obeyed Om and stared at Blob lying across the patient Ob.

"What none of you people realize," began Om calmly and earnestly, "is that our life on this planet of a planet, or satellite of a satellite, is a completely different thing from the lives of all these earth-dwellers whose culture and learning we have exploited to our own advantage ever since the days of Blabberok Kumph. Their systems of what they call 'religion' and 'morality' and 'politics' and 'economics' are based on what they call 'reason'; whereas ours are based on knowledge. They argue and dispute as to what is reasonable or unreasonable; until the opinion of some crazy tyrant, or of the stupid majority, finally decides what must be done. We just simply know, and act accordingly; and that, with us, is the end of it! And as to our method compared with theirs, theirs is all machinery, whereas ours is all magnetism."

At this point Om stopped, and lifted Blob from where he lay with his whole weight across the middle of the discreet and well-mannered Ob; but Blob leapt up from between his hands and hurriedly began descending the hill in long energetic jumps. Suddenly he stopped, turned round, and then descended a few steps more. Here he stopped again, surveying the company very critically with his bulging head.

The philosopher Om nodded in a friendly and even propitiatory manner, and, picking up Ob, walked a few steps towards the great club, who was now regarding them all with an almost ironical bend, a little to the left, of his majestic top-knot. As if in obedience to an admonition which reached him through his fingers, the philosopher Om, in a clear, firm, rapid voice, with the flow of which, like a trickle of brown peat-stained water mingling with the transparent splash of a rocky fall, there blended at moments a certain obscure humour, began an exposition of this dramatic situation beyond the ridge, as the club had revealed it to the stick.

“And so the conclusion I have been driven to assume,” he announced, “as a result of what I have heard through my fingers from my stick is that for about fifteen years a young girl, who is the daughter of the Moon quite as certainly as this being about whom we have heard such rumours who calls himself Woom-o’-Rim is the son of the Moon, has lived quite alone from childhood to maidenhood on that side of our Lunar Ridge concerning which we all have come to feel a strange superstitious terror. Certain tales that have reached us from the earth, telling us how the souls of those who die in absolute despair in insane asylums are cured by the spirit of Aesculapius on the other side of this Ridge, have created among us an universal horror for that portion of our Lunar Mountains. Now I am not going to suggest to you, you lovely creature, dear daughter of the Master of Zed, nor to you, my gallant friend, and most wonderful son of the Mysterious Oom, that we are right or that we are wrong in our inherited and traditional terror of the other side of our sacred mountains. But this I will say: namely that in my considered opinion the wisest thing to do is to refuse to think about this troublesome and frightening problem at all. All we know is that for two thousand years the idea has been prevalent among us that it is better, wiser, safer, and more reverential towards all the unknown gods and all the unknown goddesses — and all the animals and reptiles and birds and fishes and all the unknown souls of rocks and stones and plants and trees that surround us as we go about the ordinary business of our lives — not to think or speak or talk to anybody about these things all our life long. Visitors from the earth would certainly cry out if they heard me talking like this: ‘But what about your own souls when you’re dead, and what about the souls of your best-loved ones?’ And shall I tell you what I would answer?”

There was a real startled moment of alert attention at this point, and both Yoom and Lorlt rose to their feet. But this moment of attention was dissipated almost at once by a natural and instinctive desire to look round them and take in the whole expanse of nature, an expanse of both land and air, to which in their absorption in each other they had been for some while totally oblivious. Their attention was brought back by the words that now came from the philosopher Om.

“You ask me about your souls when you are dead. This is my answer, my friends. It all will be as your ideas and thoughts about it create it. There is not only one creator. There are as many creators as there are living creatures. Each creature creates. That is why the only sensible meaning of the word ‘universe’ is the particular collection of created worlds that surrounds each creature. We each have our own universe, so that in any philosophical sense the word ‘universe’ is nonsense. There is no such thing. There are only universes, and all these universes interlock and intertwine and melt into one another. When these earthly experimenters, about whom we hear such boastful and bragging accounts from their electric announcers, talk of seeing the world objectively and realistically they are seeing nothing but what can be reached by their telescopes and microscopes and X-ray-scalpel-scopes. The greatest of all philosophers, Immanuel Kant himself, was a fool to put Time on a level with Space as the ultimate categories of our consciousness. Space is the one and only category of every living creature’s consciousness. Time is purely a human invention, dependent on the tick-tick-tick of human pulses and the beat-beat-beat of human hearts.

What, I ask you, does a daddy-long-legs, what does a hedgehog, what does a toad or an eel or a water-rat or a house-sparrow know about Time? But every worm and midge and beetle knows the meaning of Space; and as for the Stars what is Time to them? But boundless Space is their natural home!"

The philosopher Om had in some queer way so realised his own identity in the discursive and paratactic expansiveness with which he talked about space that Lorlt and Yoom began instinctively clinging to each other, as if each was trying to prevent the other from being literally carried away by Om's panegyric on Space. And all this while it was not Om nor those he was addressing who had discovered the one single inhabitant of the other side of the Moon. It was our simple-minded friend Rorlt who had made this discovery, not of an unhappy mad girl cured by Aesculapius, but of a real living girl; and it is probable that never among all the suns and stars, and never among all the planets and satellites of the suns and stars, has such another girl as Helia ever been born. It wasn't one thing about her; it was everything about her that made this true. Where Helia was concerned there was nothing that was not unique.

Hearers of her story will naturally arrange these exceptional aspects of her life in the order of their own preferences. The present chronicler would place at the top of them all the fact that she brought herself up in complete loneliness. This was due to the fact that her Mother the Moon kept her birth so secret that the gigantic, shining-limbed Woom-o'-Rim, was fooled into believing that he was her only child. The one single consciousness in heaven and earth that was aware of her existence except her parents was the wandering soul, if it is permissible to talk of the "soul" of a person fast asleep in a bed, of Myfanwy Cellwair and it was this "soul," or, if you prefer to call it so, the spirit, of this disembodied dreamer, who in obedience to the Moon-Mother's daily implorings "brought up," as we call it, this lonely cosmic waif.

The mother always implored this moon-struck dreamer-friend of hers, Myfanwy Cellwair, to make it quite clear to the child that her father was none other than the great burning Sun himself; and on one occasion when the child begged for more details as to what happened between male and female so as to produce offspring, and the dreamer, probably less reticent in her sleep than she would have been had she been awake, indicated vaguely how a maid lost her maidenhead, the little Helia laughed gaily, shook her curls mischievously, and murmured, "Naughty! naughty!"

It was when the child began to get older, and her dreamer-friend's visits began to get less frequent, that her real loneliness set in. Finally this loneliness began to affect her mood towards the whole of her life. She still felt delicious thrills of happiness when, healthily tired by running a long distance up and down a path made by her own feet and none others, she lay down to sleep in a secluded little cave to the interior of which she had given quite a home-like air of comfort and security; but there were periods when a mysterious kind of homesickness seized her and she had long pitiful fits of crying, about which she couldn't tell anybody or find anybody to listen while she explained as sometimes the proudest and most reserved of young girls want to do, the deep and subtle reasons for her tears.

One warm evening there happened an event in Helia's life which she never forgot.

She had made friends with an extremely aged ash-tree whom long years, for it was nearly five-hundred summers old, had reduced to an emasculated stump. But it put forth leaves in early summer from a single branch. Upon this old stump she used to sit, for it was half-covered with soft moss, and with one bare arm round its small living branch, she was wont to await, when there was no wind to chill her bones, the appearance of the Evening Star.

With this celestial being she very quickly discovered that her old friend the ash-stump had formed in the course of years a peculiar friendship. They had pet names for each other. The Evening Star called the stump “Tirry” and the stump called the Evening Star “Ditty.” As for this little half-naked girl who used to recline against the stump, with her arm round its budding branch, they insisted on calling her Lampetiee, for they both seemed to have known in the past some half-sister of hers, of whom she had never heard, who bore that luminous appellation. “Isn’t there anyone in all Space and among all the stars, Tirry, old friend,” she would ask the stump, cuddling against it and letting her curls get entangled with its budding twigs, “who would like to have me for his bride or his paramour or his — whatever you call the sort of girl men like to live with but don’t want to marry?”

The reply that came from Tirry was a startling one, and it really rather staggered our girlish solitary.

“Wait Lampetiee! Wait, little girl! Wait a minute! What do we see coming straight down to us, eh, eh, little girlie?”

Helia pulled herself up into a rather straight position, and removing her bare arms from the branch clasped her hands between her knees. And she beheld, descending straight towards her out of the hushed, windless, darkening sky, a great eagle with wide-stretched wings.

“Aietos! Aietos!” cried the ash-stump, and caused its solitary branch to bow its little shoot of green leaves in lowly obeisance, while the great bird reached the ground and spread out its tremendous wings on the ground and lowered its terrifying beak before the bare feet of the frightened little girl.

“Aietos offers,” whispered the aged stump, “to take you to the Evening Star, if you care to ride on his back.”

Not one word did Helia speak in reply to him. Not one glance did she spare for the eagle. Leaping to her feet, she never stopped running till she sank down exhausted, but safe and alone, in her familiar cave.

It was always in the afternoons when she had finished adorning with flowers the little stone-crevices in this homely, self-arranged, self-ordered, self-cleaned and selfdecorated shelter, that she was accustomed to enjoy her happiest moments. Lying in the sunshine, she would remove one by one the scanty garments that she had learnt by long and patient practice to weave for herself out of dead fern-stalks, dried reeds, and long grasses, in order to keep herself warm in frosty and windy weather, and as she felt the sun upon her bare flesh and caressed her virginal body with her own hands, imagining and imagining and imagining that they were the amorous hands of another, she would go on inventing the looks and the words and the caresses of this self-created "other" till he almost existed.

It was on just such an afternoon as this in the warm sunshine near the crest of the Great Ridge that the magical event occurred that changed Helia's whole life.

She suddenly realized that she was lying close beside a little hollow opening in the rocky slope. Twisting her body round and stretching out on her face she set herself to gaze into this diminutive tunnel; and as she did so her destiny found her. She could just see, ascending the mountain from the other side, the figure of Rorlt.

So vivid, so intense, and yet so imaginative, had been her feelings, as day after day, month after month, year after year, she had waited — she, the daughter of the Moon and the Sun — that as she called out to him her voice seemed to have the power of piercing through every possible obstacle that separated her from the youth she wanted. But, after calling, she couldn't wait for a second at the entrance to that tiny tunnel which had been made by a minute stream of water. She jumped up and rushed straight on her side of the ridge, towards that same summit to which he, on his side of the ridge, was advancing at top speed.

As she moved, her thoughts resembled those that come to us, we are told, when we are drowning. They bore her, these thoughts, like eagles carrying their live prey so swiftly through the air that such victims are too hypnotized by speed to suffer at all.

The speed with which these visions of her whole life pursued one another was far greater than thoughts usually move. But this did not mean at all that these memories were blurred. They were exquisitely, terribly, divinely clear! Through them all ran the same vision of herself, absolutely alone, on the outer slope of the Mountains of the Moon, and surrounded by boundless, infinite Space. As these visions came near the present moment they grew more and more vivid, more and more challenging, more and more intimate, more and more compelling. And then there came at last one single beat of some magnetic pulse in the body of the Moon that compelled her to raise her head from the slippery rocks and ivy-roots and bracken-fronds and the tufts of prickly yellow gorse among which she was so rapidly and so desperately climbing, climbing up, up, up, but always unwilling — and this shows the depths of the instinctive virginal shyness beneath her rapturous mood — to allow her mind to rest for a single second upon the object of her desperate climb. But there at last he was, only a leap above her, and they were in each others’ arms.

Romer Mowl

'THE WORLD IS less fixed-up', said the great Nerve Specialist Doctor Windlas co his two old friends Major Shales and Marcus Fittleworth, as they sat late one night in the doctor's house in Cavendish Square, 'the world is less fixed up and life is more surprising than either of you two men realize.'

'Hey diddle diddle! Gammon and Spinach!' growled the Major. 'There has never yet been and never will be any real communication between this world and what you call the other world. Here we are and here we must live our life. Please God it may be an honourable one. There is nothing else and there never will be anything else.'

The Major stroked his long white moustache as though it had been one handle of a sword and shot a glance out of his fierce blue eyes towards the Doctor as straight as a bullet-shot. The Nerve Specialist glanced at Marcus Fittleworth, that gentleman and scholar recently appointed Cameo Keeper at the Knightsbridge Museum, who had begun to look indescribably embarrassed. Nothing agitated him so much as these occasional explosions between his friends.

'Everyone,' said he at length, seeing that the Doctor and the Soldier had relapsed into a combative silence, 'everyone if you only knew it, has his peculiar inborn form of scepticism: it is congenital atrophy. I myself for instance have a more serious limitation than either of you: you Windlas can't see the value of Military Discipline and you Shales can't see the value of Ghosts — I can't for my part see the value of Love!'

The Cameo Keeper’s two friends looked at him half incredulous and half bored. They evidently regarded the interruption as both irrelevant and fantastic.

‘I’m not jesting,’ continued Fittleworth. ‘The matter is by no means one to be treated lightly. It is, I can assure you, a serious thing for a man of forty to have to confess that he has never experienced the irreverently talked of passion of Love!’

‘Talked of!’ exclaimed the Doctor and Soldier with one voice.

‘Of course, I know we all have animal appetites,’ went on the Antiquary rather peevishly, ‘and, I do not deny the power of Affection: in fact in a sense I do not deny Love. All I assert is that as far as my own personal experience goes what is called by the famous name is only a mixture of Desire and Affection.’

‘You doubt in fact,’ laughed the doctor, ‘what we call The Grand Passion.’

‘Precisely so,’ returned Marcus. ‘In my humble opinion there is no such thing!’

‘Where are you going tomorrow for your holiday this year Fittleworth?’ asked the Major grown suspicious of the trend of the conversation.

‘No distance,’ rejoined the Antiquary. ‘I cannot afford it. I am thinking of running down to the South Coast for a short time. There’s a little place called Sanderton they tell me, near Barsmeet Junction.’

‘Sanderton! Did you say Sanderton?’ interrupted the Doctor. ‘What an extraordinary thing that you should think of going to Sanderton!’

‘Why so?’ asked Marcus.

‘Do you believe,’ said Windlas turning to the Major, ‘that places, like people, have their own peculiar souls?’

‘Most certainly not,’ replied the soldier severely.

‘Because’, the Doctor went on, ‘this little place Sanderton has the most evil soul of any place I have ever been in. I know it well — I have good reason to know it. It’s not far from Brighton.’

‘You interest me extremely,’ said Fittleworth. ‘You make me fancy my journey tomorrow will likely prove more exciting than I expected for, with submission to the Major, I think certain places have unmistakably souls of their own. What on earth’s the matter Doctor?’

Dr. Windlas was plunged in a profound reverie, so profound that for the moment he seemed to forget their existence. Suddenly, with an effort, he recovered himself.

‘I think I shall tell you two a little tale,’ he said.

‘There are some things that ought not to be left buried like corpses in a single brain: even a Doctor of Nerves,’ he added with a smile, ‘sometimes needs the confessional. No! sit down Major, this isn’t a ghost story.’

‘Three years ago I was summoned to attend a patient at Brighton. I went there without delay and found the man dying. There was nothing strange in that. I have seen death in a hundred different forms. But a death like this death I have never seen; and I tell you, my friends, if I saw another I should give up my profession.

I found the man fully dressed on a horse-hair sofa in an out of the way lodging house somewhere in Queen’s Road. He was a man of a large unwieldy size, his face was bloated and ruddy, so ruddy indeed that it gave one the impression that the blood might at any moment ooze through the pores of the skin. He appeared, if I may say so, unhealthily full of blood — blood not his own — like some horribly-gorged human Leech. But his eyes! — it is impossible to describe to you my dear friends the look in this man’s eyes. Baffled yet insatiable Desire seemed to burn and smoulder in them like death-fires in a lime pit. When I arrived he was hardly conscious: indeed he ought according to medical science to have been dead some days before but the soul in him (or demon — God knows which!) seemed difficult to dislodge. He knew who I was and as soon as we were alone he began pouring out a long incoherent appeal to me to prolong his life if it was even only for a day. “I must live, I must live,” he babbled. “If you don’t let me live” — he seemed to be addressing his Creator rather than me— “it will be the worse for many of your darlings — I shall have them alive or dead!” He went howling on in this manner glaring at me with his horrible eyes and every now and then feebly trying to lift his swollen hands from the edge of the sofa. Then he became so inarticulate that I judged it better to leave him for a while.

Outside his room I entered into conversation with his wife, a poor faded American lady who has since returned to her own country. She confessed to me that in her opinion her husband had been cursed with the possession of the Evil Eye.

“He used to walk up and down the Beach,” she said, “at Brighton and other places not speaking to a soul but staring, staring, staring, with that dreadful look” — here the poor thing covered her face with her hands.

“Did he treat everybody like that?” I asked.

“O no,” she said, “only children and most of all little girls. Once, when we were staying in the country, a little girl we knew died and the stupid people put it down to my husband’s way of staring at her — but it couldn’t have been that. O Doctor, say it couldn’t have been that!” And the unhappy woman burst into tears.

I did what I could to comfort her and returned to my patient. My God! what a sight met my eyes. The man had actually risen up upon his feet. How he had done it I knew not for his lower limbs were already cold. He was standing with his back to the door holding in his hands a looking glass. I stole up behind him and looked into the glass he held — and What I saw in that glass may I have the power of forgetting before I come to die! I cannot by any description make you realize it. I can only say I was aware of something mirrored in there the like of which if I saw it again would end my doctor's career for good and all. It was not Human, what I saw. There was a Forehead of wrinkles and scabs, there were scaly cavernous Holes — I will not call them Eyes — and there was a mouth like the mouth of a Pit. I saw also on the edge of the mirror what seemed like the shadow of enormous Paws closing and unclosing.

But if what I saw upset even my nerves of steel its effect upon my Patient was ghastly. Still clutching the glass, he reeled and staggered, then fell heavily on the couch, and even as he fell I caught sight of his face. It was livid with terror. He tried to raise himself again, to utter articulate speech, but the death rattle was on him and in another moment his head had fallen back — he was stone-dead. I picked up the glass and looked into it. Nothing but only my own troubled visage appeared there now. I raised the hands of the corpse and let them fall across its breast. Then I went out to write the death-certificate.'

Dr. Windlas paused and glanced at his two friends. The Major looked sad and uneasy. Fittleworth's eyes shone with dramatic interest.

'What you saw was the Man's soul,' cried he. 'I have often thought that if the Souls of certain men were to appear they would appear like carnivorous beasts.'

'God have mercy on us all,' sighed the Major. 'We are all of us most miserable sinners!'

'I can imagine some,' went on the Cameo-keeper meditatively, 'to resemble vampire-bats with webby flapping wings, others no doubt would appear like devil-fish with adhesive suckers.’

The Major rose to his feet. ‘You must excuse me, gentlemen,’ he said, ‘I really can’t stand any more of this.’ He strode towards the door. ‘God created Man in His Own Image, but man created devils,’ they heard him muttering to himself as he went downstairs.

‘Don’t go after him,’ said the Doctor. ‘He’ll be all right tomorrow, he’s a noble old fellow. You’ve heard, of course, how he has given up every penny of his income to his sisters. He lives by doing dog’s work in a newspaper office. Ah! my friend Marcus, that old soldier is an honour to the human race. We must humour goodness Marcus, we must humour goodness!’

Fittleworth did not reply, his mind still ran on the doctor’s narration. ‘Sanderton is near Brighton you said?’

‘The man was buried there,’ answered the other. ‘His name was Romer Mowl. You’ll easily find his tombstone if you look for it. It will be a pleasant little excitement for you on your holiday when you’ve nothing else to do, eh my friend?’

That very next day, early in the afternoon, Fittleworth stepped out of his train on to the platform at Barsmeet. He gave up his ticket and taking his bag in his hand looked up the long straight road that led to Sanderton Village and the sea. It was a dark windy day. White dust whirled in eddies along the road; huge racks of sombre clouds lay piled up on the horizon and the heavy-foliaged trees rocked and swayed in the wind. The Cameo-keeper hesitated. An unaccountable shiver passed through his body. He swung himself through the little kissing-gate and stood surveying the long perspective of the road in front of him. Then he looked round and his eye caught the words ‘Apartments to let’ in the window of the pleasant new villa built for the Barsmeet station-master. TH stay where I am,’ he thought and went up the little phlox bordered pathway.

In an hour’s time he felt much cheered. His lodging was safely secured — the pleasant fumes of a delicate cup of tea, mantling in his head, poured out by the Station-master’s wife — and as yet no rain had fallen.

Once more he found himself on the road and this time he boldly set forth seawards. He walked steadily; on for about a mile and a half. There was a stretch of grass on either side of the road and deep ditches skirted the grass overgrown with loose-strife and willow-herb. Across the low hedges he could see nothing but flat water-meadows dotted here and there by poplar-trees that now were tossing in the wind. At last he came to a white-washed bridge over which the road raised itself in a little artificial hill. This bridge crossed a canal full of tall glaucous reeds which gave forth he fancied, as he leant over the parapet, a peculiarly desolate sigh. But another sound made him look up. Ah! That long drawn husky throated roar like the hiss of a monstrous world snake. Well he knew it — The Sea! The Sea! From the slight elevation of this bridge he was able to catch a glimpse of it, of a long dark blue line lying low on the edge of the landscape. Sanderton Village too he saw stretching away to the right of him, and he remarked that the road he followed curved round towards it, leaving no path that went straight on except an ancient green lane, overgrown with weeds. This appeared to lead directly to the sea-shore.

Along this lane therefore Fittleworth wandered, led by that irresistible instinct which compels us to reach the actual edge of the waves when once within hearing of their call. This call of the sea, heard by so many ears — human and inhuman — since this particular crest had been allotted its predestined limit, grew now upon the Scholar’s hearing louder and louder. That peculiar shore-odour of sea-weed and sun-dried shells and that yet more mysterious perfume that might be called the smell of the great deep truly filled his brain with indescribable reminiscences.

Within some hundred yards of the water's edge Marcus came upon a long double line of Tamarisk bushes about the height of a man's head and divided by a narrow lane. The strange secret-harbouring appearance of this singular avenue did its best to make yet more sinister the wind-ruffled scales of a threatening looking sea, as they showed themselves at intervals through its sombre cypress-coloured foliage. Marcus had just pushed his way through the first line of this green entrenchment and had found himself in a sort of enclosed dry ditch when he heard with almost alarming clearness the sound of a church-bell tolling.

He clambered back through the Tamarisk and perceived what he had not noticed before, that about half a mile from where he was and quite separate from the village which was considerably further off, rose the grey squat tower of a very small ancient church.

The church stood by itself in the middle of a rank expanse of reedy marshland surrounded only by its own forlorn grave-stones and quite destitute of the usual holy and tender charm associated with such a spot. The melancholy tolling that came and went on the gusty wind like the wail of some enormous sea-fowl mingled, as he listened, with the rise and fall of the encroaching tide.

Suddenly he became aware of a group of human figures, one white among many black, issuing from the church porch and moving slowly to a corner of the churchyard. As he might have guessed from the tolling of the bell a funeral was going forward. The same irresistible pull upon the will that had led Marcus to the verge of the sea now seemed to draw him to the verge of this other deeper abyss into which some poor creature was even now vanishing. He looked about him for a path. Broad ditches full of brackish water ran across the field at right angles to the Tamarisk and appeared uncrossed by any bridge. Impatient to reach the churchyard in time to view the solemn ritual before all was over, Marcus plunged back into that gloomy tunnel between the two ever-green embankments and set off at a rapid pace, with a slightly bowed head to avoid obtrusive branches, in the direction of Sanderton Church. Above him the wind rustled through the Tamarisks, beyond moaned the sea and at recurring intervals came clearer and clearer the tolling of the church bell.

All in a moment he stopped short. Before him, so close that had not his head been bent he would have stumbled over her, lay a little girl of about eleven years old sobbing piteously. Either she did not hear his approach or was too absorbed in her grief to care for anything. She neither moved nor ceased crying. He stooped over her and lifted her up. She was a delicate little pale creature with long straight silky dark hair.

‘What’s the matter, little maid?’ asked the Keeper of Cameos, cursing funerals and Tamarisk tunnels indiscriminately under his breath. ‘Have you lost your way? Has anyone frightened you? Are you hurt?’

The little maid shook her petticoats into order and stopped her tears. ‘They’re burying Katie over there in that churchyard’, she said.

‘Who’s Katie?’ he asked.

‘Katie’s my friend,’ she replied. ‘Katie Doddering’s her proper name. Mine’s Kid Catchway. They’re burying Katie near that horrid man — and I don’t want them to!’ Here her sobs broke out afresh.

‘What horrid man?’ he asked.

‘You be a stranger then,’ said she, ‘else you’d have heard,’ and in the pride of knowledge informing ignorance she began to grow more cheerful. ‘Yes,’ she went on, as we advanced hand in hand between the Tamarisks. ‘He died three years ago: his name’s Romer Mowl. He’d run after us, mother says, if he weren’t dead, fast as a witch-man. Some says he made Katie die though he’s dead ‘isself. Father says that’s blimed nonsense but mother says it’s a darned shame there aint no room in churchyard ‘cept near Old Romer. Do you think Old Romer will get her, now she’s dead and ee’s dead ‘isself?’

The Keeper of Cameos for the Borough of Knightsbridge looked at that moment anything but a Tower of Strength for a Maid to lean upon. In fact he looked as miserable and uncomfortable as man can well look — and what to reply to the girl’s extraordinary question he did not know for the life of him.

It must be admitted, however, he felt drawn in the most powerful manner to this beautiful little child he had stumbled on so strangely, and he resolved whatever else he did not to retreat from the adventure. They climbed at last together out of the Tamarisk ditch and found themselves at the very entrance of the churchyard. The Parson and Bearers were just coming forth followed by the Mourners. His little companion was seized upon by her parents and carried off.

‘Goodnight Kiddie, goodnight,’ he cried as he saw her turn several times to wave her hand to him.

Left alone in Sanderton churchyard Fittleworth felt creep over him a great wave of depression. He had never experienced such a feeling before. Melancholy gusts of wind kept sighing in the long grasses on the wall and making nettles on the graves sway to and fro as though dancing a ghostly saraband. Wisps of straw and carpenter’s shavings, brought here perhaps by accident along with the coffin, fluttered up and down the neglected pathway between the church and the tombs as though they also were seeking some place to rest in forever. Marcus felt as though nothing in the world would give him any pleasure again. All human ambitions, all human ideals, seemed to turn for him at that moment into flying chaff and sand.

Brooding this he approached the corner of the churchyard where the new made grave rose all chalky and raw out of the disturbed grass. A handful of wild flowers, mostly Scabious and Ragwort, cut with short stalks and tightly tied up with string, stood erect in a glass jar — just where, ah! so deep below! the little white hands of the dead girl lay folded on her childish breast. There was no tombstone and no) inscription. But side by side with the new grave was another, a larger mound, overgrown and neglected but not so old as most in the churchyard: at the head of this second grave stood an oblong granite stone with the words carved deeply upon it in Roman capitals.

The Keeper of Cameos stood quite still for several moments gazing at this sinister name. Then he kicked the granite stone viciously with his foot. ‘Ho! Ho! Ho!’ he muttered in an audible voice, ‘you are safe enough underground Mr. Romer! you are safe enough underground!’

But somehow or other he did not get the satisfaction he desired out of this display of feeling. It annoyed him to see those two graves side by side. The older one seemed almost to express a wicked satisfaction at welcoming the newcomer. Three great nettles that grew out from its side nodded impishly towards it as much as to say: ‘Ha! Ha! we knew you would soon be here!’

‘Well!’ thought Marcus to himself, ‘I suppose I ought to be returning to Barsmeet.’ But he found it difficult to tear himself away. The little mound of new-piled earth seemed to need protection. It was doubtless a silly fancy but he could not persuade himself to leave it alone with that sinister neighbour. Up and down, up and down he paced, angry with himself for his superstitious fancies, angry with the wind for tossing itself in such irritating gusts against him, and above all angry with that silent imperturbable granite tombstone that leered at him so mockingly.

At last a Power stronger even than Superstition drove poor dead Katie’s self appointed guardian from her side. The Keeper of Cameos had become aware that he was growing extremely hungry. ‘I’ll come again early tomorrow morning,’ he thought to himself. ‘Perhaps I shall meet little Kid Catchway and then help her pick some more flowers to place here.’ So without even a look behind him Katie’s solitary Protector left her, alone in the cold earth, and the wind as it wailed and sighed over the bending grasses of that place of tombs seemed like a voice repeating again and again in ghostly warning tones

ROMER MOWL!
ROMER MOWL!
ROMER MOWL!

The next day, not exactly early in the morning but still before noon, Marcus Fittleworth was again in Sanderton churchyard and there as he had expected he found Kid. That day and the next day, and the day after that, the middle-aged Scholar and the eleven year old child met and talked and played together. After her school time was done she would race down to the shore, where between the Tamarisks and the sea-bank, for he would love Tamarisk Bushes, he told her, to the end of his life, she would find him waiting for her: and there they would chat together and throw shining pebbles into the water and listen to the call of the great white sea gulls, until they almost felt as though they too could skim away down that far sunset path towards the isles of the blest.

And so as time went on he found himself, this master of Pagan Art, beginning to wonder whether he had been well advised in so strongly asserting that he would never know the magic of that Power nobler than Desire and more subtle than Affection which men call Love. He had certainly never felt for any human being what he had now come to feel for this little maiden. His heart leapt strangely within him when he heard her light foot-steps tripping down the shelving beach; and the sound of her voice touched even the stormiest twilights that fell upon the sea with tender and reassuring thoughts.

Nearly two weeks passed in this way. Then a thunderbolt fell into the quiet pool of Fittleworth's happiness. Another child in the village fell ill — mysteriously ill, and as she lay on what everybody thought was her death bed she begged piteously for Kid Catchway to come and sit with her. The Doctor assured Kid's parents that there was no medical reason why the poor child should not have her wish gratified and so Kid, who was three years younger than the dying girl, was brought without delay into her room.

Fittleworth was seriously uneasy. He did all he could to persuade the Doctor to forbid this visit. All day he wandered restlessly about and at length he resolved to follow his little friend himself and see with his own eyes how she endured her strange vigil.

It was just dark when Fittleworth, returning from his Barsmeet lodgings, entered the stricken child's home. She was an orphan, this unhappy one, and lived with an old uncle who at that moment sat drinking himself into peaceful obliviousness over the kitchen fire. The doctor had been called away to another patient and had left the unfortunate girl asleep. When Marcus opened the bedroom door, there sat Kid Catchway with white face and long drooping hair watching the countenance of the sleeping maid as though she herself had been the angel of death! Marcus saw at once that his little friend was nearly worn out from want of food and rest. She had been in that room nearly all day. He commanded her to run home quickly to her mother. He himself, he said, would watch till the Doctor returned. On no account was she to come back till the next day.

Unwilling, and a little peevish, the pale tired child dragged herself slowly downstairs, passed in safety the drunken uncle, fast asleep now in his chair, and let herself out into the night. Marcus Fittleworth was left alone.

Long did he sit there, watching sometimes the sleeper and sometimes the little oil lamp which flickered on a shelf over her head. The dying girl slept with her head fallen a little from the pillow across which her dark hair lay in a tangled mass. So thin had she become, poor child, that the outline of her fragile body and wasted limbs was hardly visible beneath the rough blankets under which she lay. The same troublesome west wind which had vexed and teased the place on the day of Fittleworth's arrival had not ceased to blow. Even now he could hear through the open casement the elm trees by the road rustling and chafing under its gusts. Then he noticed that the girl was growing restless. Her face flushed and she began to move uneasily from side to side. Suddenly she flung up her arms and clutched convulsively the iron rails at the head of her bed.

'Dear God! What was that?'

Every drop of blood in the Scholar's veins froze. A cold sweat stood out on his forehead.

'What is it? What is it? What is this that has come into the room?'

The Pulses' terrors in him cried out to one another and his limbs refused to obey his will. The girl had tossed the bed clothes from off her shoulders, and with her throat bare and her head convulsively thrown back lay shuddering like a scorched white moth. Then Marcus beheld distinctly the outline of two gigantic Paws laid upon her breast and above her face close, close to those quivering lips, a shapeless unutterable Image — an Image of wrinkles and scabs and scales of pestilential protrusions and yawning leprous cavities — such an Image as must have troubled the dreams of Herod the Tetrarch amid the olive gardens of Judæa and of Tiberius the Emperor amid the laurel groves of Capreæ.

Never from any human being has burst forth such a prayer for help as at that moment nearly cracked the heart of that paralyzed watcher.

‘Christ save her!’ he cried in a hoarse voice.

No sooner were the words uttered than as if by a stroke of magic all was changed. The wind outside ceased troubling the elm trees: the casement no longer swayed: a vile charnel-house smell that had filled the room vanished completely and in its place entered a sweet odour of Phloxes and Jasmine. This appalling Image of Terror, like that other on the Mount of Transfiguration, had known its Overcomer’s name and had fled murmuring to its own place.

Marcus rose and went to the girl’s side. Her stiffened fibres had relaxed; her poor convulsed hands rested peacefully on her breast; her limbs were quiet and still. As he stood over her she opened her eyes and seeing him there smiled up at him a smile of happy reassuring confidence. Then gently she closed them again and, still smiling, fell fast asleep. During this sleep her exhausted tide of life ebbed unconsciously away and when at midnight the Doctor returned he found Marcus Fittleworth dreaming in his chair and the maiden dead.

The days that followed were days of crushing anxiety for the Keeper of Cameos. The latest guest of Sanderton Churchyard was buried side by side with Katie. So now that granite tombstone, with its inscription in Roman Capitals, was able to overlook two small mounds of newly dug earth. Day after day little Kid Catchway brought her bunch of sweet field flowers wherewith to soothe, if it might be, the sleep of her gentle companions. And day after day Fittleworth watched his little friend with anxious scrutinizing solitude.

The time appointed by the museum authorities for his return came and passed. He wrote begging for an extension of his vacation. He was ready, he said, to pay for a substitute but could not in any event return yet. One day, as he was leaning over the white-washed bridge, halfway between Barsmeet and Sanderton, a boy riding a bicycle dismounted and called him by name. 'Be you Mr. Fittleworth?' said he. 'Mrs. Catchway wishes me to say sir as how her Kid's terrible sick this morning.'

To Fittleworth's eyes the smooth white parapets of that harmless bridge were after this moment the most detestable of all objects. He let the boy return. 'I will come,' he said, but he remained standing where he was like one sunk in a trance. Blind animal fury against this intolerable Romer Mowl raged within him.

Suddenly this resolution was taken: 'I don't care what comes of it,' he said to himself, 'I'll dig him up with my own hands and throw him into the sea.'

With fierce strides he reached his little friend's cottage. He found her to his huge relief not so very ill — so all might yet be well. The other two victims had been stricken for several weeks before they died: there was yet time. He implored Kid's mother on no account to leave her alone— 'not for a moment,' he said — and on his advice they moved the child's bed into her parents' sleeping room.

That night he secured by enormous bribery the aid of the Village Fool and towards twelve o'clock, when all the cottage lights were out, they began their unhallowed task. It was hard work, for the soil was chalky; but the Village Idiot had strong arms and the golden coins Marcus kept rattling in his pocket to cheer him on made! them stronger still. As for Fear, Fittleworth with his little friend's life at stake was ready to face the Devil, and the Idiot, though terrified if the Parson but looked at him, seemed to regard gaping dead men's graves with philosophical equanimity.

It must have been after some two hours' work that they struck at last upon the shell of the grave. Yes, there it was, a great wooden coffin with the hateful letters R.M. inscribed upon it on a brass plate. The wind had fallen but a wet sea-mist covered the stars and some distant farm dog's howl sounding across the marshes made an appropriate accompaniment to their grim task. 'We have spared the Judgement Day one trouble,' said Marcus to his companion, as they deposited their gruesome find on the chalk-strewn grass. The Idiot laughed aloud and tapped with his knuckles on the lid. 'Hullo there! Mister Romer Mowl, how be under there! How be?' Hurriedly they filled up the hole with the earth they had removed, their work being the less noticeable because of the two recent diggings in the same locality. Fittleworth heaved a profound sigh of relief when he thought of those two little dead maids freed from the neighbourhood of this accursed ghoul.

But more remained to be done. The Scholar gave the Idiot a stiff dram of Brandy from his flask and then with some difficulty they got the coffin balanced on the sexton's wheel barrow and set off, Marcus wheeling it and the Idiot supporting it, towards the sea shore. Had the great engraver Bewick witnessed this odd departure he would certainly have added yet another to his little Rabelaisian Vignettes of Grotesque Mortality!

Arrived at the shore they quickly trundled their grisly burden along the sea-bank until they came to where lay the fisherman's craft. Soon the misty waters of that sea, which luckily was windless, were disturbed by the oars of a small boat containing a Scholar, an Idiot and a Corpse! Fast against the coffin, which after all this handling began to disclose ominous signs of breaking up, Marcus bound by strong cords an enormous sackful of pebbles, enough to sink a dead whale. Then with one huge effort they tilted the thing over and let it fall with a dull splash into the darkness.

‘Ho! Ho! Ho!’ cried the Idiot. ‘ ‘Ee’ll be enough to turn the fishes’ stomachs!’ Fittleworth said nothing but not Christian himself when his Bundle rolled off him into the Pit was more full of joy than he.

The next day he found Kid better and the day following that she was better still. But she did not regain strength enough to leave the house and as time went on and her complete recovery was yet delayed Fittleworth’s old anxieties came back threefold upon him.

And worse than his old anxieties came back. One day as he sat watching in melancholy intentness the great white horses following each other in sad monotony to their dissolution on the beach, one unusually large wave, rolling in, flung an indescribable object, shaped indeed so like a human being entwined so foully with decased shells and sea tangle as to be beyond recognition, at his very feet.

> Romer Mowl had come back!
> Even the Sea could not hold him long.

At this point the Parson of Sanderton appeared upon the stage of events. With dignified decision he insisted upon re-burying this wave-belched relic with full ecclesiastical honours. Romer Mowl, it appeared, had in his day been officially Baptised and Confirmed and his connection with recent catastrophes in the village was pooh-poohed. Fittleworth himself narrowly escaped a police summons, the Idiot lost his position as assistant under-gardener and Kid Catchway’s mother was denounced as a nervous maniac.

This intrusion of the Parson upon the scene altered the situation in many ways. Kid’s parents were warned that it was most improper for their little daughter to make friends with ‘strangers from London’ and the result of this was that Fittleworth’s visits were not so warmly received as they had been.

Then it was that Kid Catchway began to grow worse. The Keeper of Cameos was desperate. Something must be done and something must be done at once. ‘Even now, now’, he kept repeating to himself, ‘“very now,” that monster is murdering her.’ An idea came to him. Sending a hurried note to Kid’s mother telling her he would return at once, Marcus one morning took his ticket for London and presented himself at his friend’s house in Cavendish Square.

Windlas heard him with absorbed interest. ‘This case is beyond my power,’ he said. ‘I deal with nerves, not with Ghosts.’ Fittleworth hung his head as though he had received sentence of death. ‘But don’t despair, my friend,’ continued the Doctor. ‘I am not the only Specialist in the world. What we want here is a Specialist in Supernatural Matters: in plain words a Saint.’

‘The Parson is against me,’ groaned Marcus.

‘Ah! my friend,’ said the Doctor, ‘I spoke of Saints, not Parsons! Have you yet to learn that it is your Amateur and not your Professional who does the difficult job. I myself have been called a charlatan! What we want in this matter is an unprofessional Saint. I should even prefer one who never went to church.’

The Keeper of Cameos sighed incredulously.

‘I have it!’ shouted Windlas. ‘We’ll get the Major. Depend upon it, the Major would do the job. He’s a pure-hearted man if ever there was one and I believe he’d exorcise the Devil himself back to Hell! Get him to go down with you. Only don’t tell him it’s a Ghost. Tell him it’s a vulgar scoundrel who wants a thrashing and you don’t feel equal to give it him.’

Three days after this conversation Marcus Fittleworth and Major Shales sat by the bedside of little Kid Catchway. It was about seven o'clock in the evening: the father and mother were taking their supper in the room below.

Rap! Rap! Rap!

'That's the Parson,' cried Kid's mother, and rose to let him in.

The Reverend Sapling, with a brusque salutation to the parents, strode upstairs. On seeing the two men he paused angrily.

'I cannot understand what you want here,' he began addressing the Scholar.

The Major was on his feet in a moment. 'Allow me, Sir, to escort you downstairs,' he said, making a bow such as the Chevalier Bayard might have given to a Cardinal of Rome, and plunging his formidable glance into him like a steel blade.

The Parson, stammering something about 'strangers from London,' retreated hurriedly. At the door the soldier handed him his card. 'Major Shales, V.C. C.B.' read the clergyman as he went down the street.

'Well!' thought Fittleworth to himself when his companion returned, 'Windlas's amateur Saint certainly knows how to get rid of his professional rival!'

Once again the two friends sat together in silence gazing at the little figure in the bed. Kid was asleep but not quietly asleep. Suddenly what Fittleworth dreaded most of all happened. The child flung up her arms while a shuddering tremor ran through her frame. The men became aware of another Presence in the room beside themselves. The air grew murky and thick. Palpable Corruption assailed their nostrils. A nameless horror hovered above the little convulsed figure on the bed.

What it was exactly that Major Charles James Shales, V.C. saw or felt that night nobody ever knew. He himself never referred to it again and none had the courage to interrogate him. All Marcus remembered was a vision of that formidable Soldier lifting the child bodily up on his left arm while with the right he struck as fiercely at the air as though he had had a sword in his hand and were at that moment cutting an opponent down. Whatever effect his physical blow may have had, assuredly the very Sword of the Lord blazed at that moment from the old man's eyes! Nor was the result ambiguous. An electric vibration filled the little room as though this terrific contest between Good and Evil had disturbed the balance of the elements themselves.

Then the soldier laid the child quietly back in bed.

'You can tell her mother she'll be all right after this, Fittleworth. She'll be running about tomorrow. Well-well-well! When I'm dead and buried, Sir, you'll only be fifty and she twenty-one. Come, my friend, a cigar and a little air wouldn't be a bad thing now, eh?'

The Spot on the Wall

THEY SAY THAT in all human brains there are certain local Blots or Spots which when allowed to grow and spread lead to serious disturbance and even sometimes to complete disarrangement of the mental balance. It is not often that these Spots on the Brain win for themselves an exterior and palpable existence or become, as philosophers would say, objectified. This, however, is exactly what happened in the strange story of the Brothers Hare. The Spot on the Brain in their case became a Spot upon the Wall.

When I think of these two unfortunate and harmless men and of their singular association with the famous ‘Salomé’ Dancer of last season I cannot help wondering if there is any possible truth in that fantastic Pythagorean theory of soul-transmigration which learned people call Metempsychosis. What else could have linked by so unexpected a fatality the fortunes of these two unimportant city clerks and that of the brilliant Cosmopolitan? Could it really be that in the days of Herod the King this proud modern beauty was none other than the daughter of Herod and our hawk-faced silent city clerk some ill starred Soldier of the Guard maddened by her deadly sweetness? Or are there, as the author of Faust liked to fancy, certain mysterious ‘elective affinities’ that bind with arbitrary choice and sway the most unlikely people in bonds together?

This at least is certain, that upon none of her wealthy and high placed adorers did the great Dancer have a more convulsive effect than upon this poor unconsidered pair. But then, you see, she also had an objectified Brain Spot.

John and James Hare lodged together in two rooms, two rickety beds in their bedroom had they and two rickety chairs in their sitting room: and they lived on the top floor of an old tobacconist's shop down somewhere among the river wharves, between Tower Bridge and the Island of Wapping. The life of the brothers was one of singular simplicity. Every morning they swallowed together what their facetious landlady was pleased to call a nice little single gentleman's 'Hot Breakfast.' Every morning they walked for the sake of exercise, or to save the bus-fare, from their river-side lodgings all the way through Billingsgate to the Monument. Every morning they took the underground train from the Monument Railway Station to the Bishopsgate, where was their employer's office. Here they served week in and week out the same task master, performing their modest duties with as much scrupulous anxiety as though the fate of an Empire and not merely of Stoke, Wump, Piffle and Co. Wholesale Spice Merchants, depended upon their labours.

But though in relation to the outside world the life of John and James Hare was so mediocre and commonplace, it could hardly be called by these invidious names when looked at in regard to their relation to one another. No! I fear it must be admitted (flesh and blood being flesh and blood and human nerves human nerves) that it is not either commonplace or mediocre for two brothers to be able to live together in as complete a harmony as these lived in. They sat side by side on two high stools in that particular corner of Mr Wump's spicy domain that happened to be hottest in summer and coldest in winter. They frequently dipped their pens into the same inkpot — a prodigious test of friendship! They took their midday dinner in the same dusty coloured chop-house halfway down London Wall Alley, and when the office was closed about six o'clock in the evening, who were happier among all London's liberated slaves than John and James Hare as they strolled through the slums of Shoreditch, that well trodden mud as golden by lamplight as by sunlight, towards their Mansion by the river of many ships.

Their conversation on such occasions rose to quite an exciting level. They spoke of the bright flower-shops they passed on their glorified dingy road and of how pleasant it would be — an old dream of theirs! — when they had saved up enough money to retire and live ‘Down in the Country’ — further even from town than Tooting Cemetery, their favourite Sunday jaunt. Then they would criticize in their innocent way the appearance of the many lively young ladies they encountered at this voluptuous business closing hour. John held the opinion that Jewesses were the handsomest women in London. James had a weakness for Italian organ grinders.

On reaching home they speedily attained the zenith of human felicity in the shape of the ‘Evening Meal’ — O celestial ‘Evening Meal!’ Supper of the Gods indeed! uninterrupted by rude employer, untroubled by hypocritical landlady, how often hast thou compensated (little diurnal Glimpse of Paradisic mysteries) poor much-labouring thrice-blessed humanity for all its troubles since Eden’s loss! John and James were far too wise and Epicurean to brush away by overhaste or insensitive indifference the delicate bloom of pre-prandial Catering. Careful and well-weighed were their hesitancies and fluctuations between Peter’s Best Tinned Ox-Tongue or Paul’s Unique Potted Anchovies. Was it to be Gammon and Spinach — that seemed more in harmony with that evening’s weather today — or was extravagant Tripe-and-Onions to be allowed its recurrent duplicate marriage to tomatoes and lettuce? Or was plain Fish-and-Chips to take the field? These were matters for no frivolous handling.

Perhaps from what has been said such readers of this tale as are apt to leap to premature conclusions have inferred that John and James resembled one another as much in outward appearance as they did in the outward course of their lives. Nothing could be further from the case. John was very tall, lean, dark and hook-nosed with a gentle tendency to stoop in the shoulders and something of a shuffling gait. James was short, florid and fat, and walked with an upright figure and springing step. When you met them coming home of an evening in unintoxicated glory through the streets of Bishopsgate and Shoreditch you might have fancied they were Don Quixote and Sancho Panza or Big Claus and little Claus setting off to the land of the fairies.

Of two companions, however devoted, there is always one (there are not two!) who has a certain marginal frontier of mind untraversed, perhaps even unguessed at, by his watchful friend. Most friendships wed together the Oasis and the Desert and in this case it was across the outer consciousness of John's mind that the mysterious Sahara storms went and came. Yes! it was not till fate's pendulous thunderbolt was on the very point of falling on their unobtrusive lives that James realized that he 'did not quite understand his brother John.'

It began in this way. The bedroom in which the brothers slept was at the back of the house and looked out over the river. There was scant furniture in the room and only one picture. This picture represented The Judgement of Solomon, and hung at the head of the two beds placed side by side. Why this particular work of art should have been selected to survey the sleep of such harmless old bachelors I cannot say. Chance, as Mr. Hardy would put it, certainly hath her ironies in these little matters. But though there was no other ornament in the room and the walls were bare except for moving shadows of masts and smoke as the ships passed up and down on the tide, yet there was one object on the blank wall opposite The Judgement of Solomon which at the point of events I have now reached caused a good deal of anxiety in the fraternal mind of James. This object was nothing more or less than an irregularly shaped Spot on the Wall.

What had caused this Spot — whence this Spot had come — why there should be no other Spot on the whole surface of this dingy whitish-yellow wall-paper — are questions that must remain forever insoluble. Suffice it to say that this particular Spot bore a rough resemblance, when looked at with a dreaming eye, to a Woman's profile, surmounted with masses of coiling hair. The outline of this face was so delicately limned that it was hardly visible at a casual glance and even when you did decipher it, it looked as though the least splash of water or slightest touch of a broom would obliterate it forever. But it certainly was undeniably beautiful, this fleeting creature of unconscious accident. There was a strange half-solemn, half-elfish look about its expression, the sort of look that would have set the painter of Mona Lisa darkly brooding for many a long summer day. Indeed for all we know Leonardo may have drawn several subtle hints from such fantastic arabesques as this as he pensively traced them on casual wayside dust or on chance met walls.

But pleasant fantasy to one man is Babylonian warning to another! For some days James had fancied that there was something unusual about his brother's manner. He seemed to have fallen into the habit of long self-absorbed reveries from which he woke with a start to the facts of ordinary existence.

The real beginning of serious trouble, however, may be dated from one hot night in the middle of July. From somewhat uneasy dreams James suddenly found himself completely and fully awake. Before he opened his eyes he felt sure that all was not well, and when he did open them there was his brother standing opposite with a lighted candle in his hand, examining with fixed interest the Spot upon the Wall! For the moment James thought the poor fellow was suffering from nightmare. Then the terrible idea seized him that his brother was mad.

A moment later he tried to reassure himself. ‘He is only interested,’ he said to himself, ‘in that funny little mark up there. Perhaps it has got on his nerves, so that he can’t make out what it looks like: or perhaps he is worried about the damp.’

But John Hare’s movements became more and more disconcerting. He appeared to be tracing with his outstretched finger every line of and curve of this mural witchery. After that, with a sudden change of gesture he pointed straight at the Mole above the thing’s eye, then gradually advancing his hand he touched, as though it had been some holy relic, this little Spot within the other.

James longed to cry out or leap from his bed and seize him but fear of the effect of a sudden shock on the poor man’s nerve held him helpless. The brother drew back some distance from the object of his strange cult and heaving a sigh that seemed to shake the very depths of his being made a motion that looked to the horrified watcher as if he were actually kissing his hand towards it. James slipped back upon his pillow and shut his eyes. He felt through his closed lids the extinction of the candle and by a tremor of the floor, so slight as to be scarcely felt, he knew that his brother had crept back into his bed.

This deliberate secrecy on John’s part was a bad sign. It argued strongly against mere somnambulism. Poor James! He hardly slept at all the rest of that night, visualizing and re-visualizing over and over again in his agitated mind the strange phenomena he had witnessed. The next day and the day after that he watched his brother as closely as an oriental spy, but took the most exquisite precautions to do so unobserved. But John seemed hardly conscious of his presence. The elder brother got through his work at the office without serious mishap, though once his gaze, as he fixed it on that "little square of blue" which office-clerks "call the sky," became so strange and ecstatic that the profound psychologist Mr Wump, trying in vain to catch his attention, roared out at last, 'Are you drunk, John, or in love?' which made the poor man drop his pen on the floor and blush like a girl!

I can assure you the faithful James had considerable difficulty to restrain himself from washing out that demonic Spot on the Wall with good Sunlight Soap.

He was tempted to do so every time he found himself alone in their room. Only the dread of worse things coming to his brother from the shock of its disappearance held him back. As they walked to and fro to their work or travelled in bus and car he began to notice that John was perpetually looking for something. He would catch his eye peering anxiously in the faces of the people they passed on the pavement or scanning nervously, as though afraid of his glances being intercepted by the object of their search, one after another of their railway or tramway companions. Those evening walks of theirs he had formerly so enjoyed were quite spoilt for James. His brother would move along like a man following some secret quest. Every now and then he would dart across the road, glance furtively at some passer-by and return as quickly as he had gone. These peeps soon began to grow quite embarrassing for the poor companion. He fancied people looked oddly at John as though the harmless fellow really were doing something wicked and he was terribly afraid lest some unsympathetic or apprehensive woman should choose to consider herself outraged by these surreptitious glances.

For the gentle-souled brother could no longer conceal from himself that it was in the faces of the daughters of Eve and of none others than they that this "translated" clerk, Servant of Imported Spice, peered so curiously.

Indeed it seemed as though John Hare were a changed man. He grew irritable and peevish, found fault with James for inconceivable trifles and fell into spells of long sullen silence. His capricious conduct did not confine itself to these street encounters. James caught him diving into little post-card shops and purchasing innumerable pictures of up-to-date actresses and singers. He would fill his pockets with these and ponder over them, one by one, when he thought himself unwatched, always with the same unsatisfied, disappointed air.

At last James grew desperate — something must be done. He would speak plainly to his brother, cost what it might.

'John,' he said one evening as they were undressing — those two sedate city-clerks before The Judgement of Solomon, while the cool air from off the inflowing tide made their candle flicker and shadowed that ominous Spot on the Wall into a still more treacherous femininity— 'John, will you let me say something to you without getting angry?'

John frowned and stared at his brother. 'What do you mean, James?'

'I don't think you are sometimes very considerate to me lately. I mean this,' cried James, rising and walking up and down the room, while his shirt fluttered in the night air and beads of perspiration stood on his forehead. 'I mean this. I don't know what's come over you lately, John, and I want to know: I consider it my right to know. If you don't tell me I believe we shall both go crazy. Come now, John, do tell me like a decent fellow what's been the matter with you these last weeks. Is it anything to do with that infernal Spot on the Wall? I have a great mind to sponge the silly thing out' — and he made a movement towards the washing stand.

John leapt to his feet. The two brothers confronted one another — both in nothing but their shirts — the long thin legs of the elder and the short plump ones of the younger presenting that curiously undignified appearance which one associates with certain grotesque scenes out of Fielding and Smollett. 'You drop that!' gasped John threateningly.

Poor James collapsed like a punctured bladder. Overcome by his feelings, he sank down on their one chair and fairly broke into tears. In a moment John was repentant. Seizing his brother's hand he bent over him and whispered in his ear as solemnly as though he were a Priest confessing him: 'I must find her, do you hear. I must find her.'

'Find who?' asked poor James, trying hard to recover his composure.

'The Original of that woman!' replied his brother, solemnly pointing to the fatal Spot on the Wall. 'I must find her and I shall find her. I shall recognise her you see here' — he began laughing a most disconcerting laugh— 'by the Mole upon her forehead!'

James gazed long and sadly at his infatuated comrade. 'If he's not already mad,' he thought, 'he soon will be. What on earth ought I to do?'

The next day, just as he was leaving the office, about an hour before closing time, Mr. Cornelius Wump was astonished by a meek tap on the arm. The Importer of Spice turned sharply.

'Can I speak to you a moment, Sir?' stammered James Hare.

'Well?' said the other unsympathetically, and then: 'I shall miss my train; but you can walk with me a step if you like.'

James followed him bareheaded as he was. 'I am anxious about my brother, Sir — he — he has been strange these last few days and I was wondering if a holiday...'

'What's this, eh? What do you say? What's the matter with our good John?' James explained the situation as well as he was able. He could not, however, bring himself to refer to the Spot on the Wall.

'Runs after girls in the street does he? Cunning old villain! Who'd have thought it of him? Look here, Hare. I'm not strait-laced as you know but I can’t keep an immoral clerk in my office — no not for a day! Tell your brother that, Sir. Say I’ll give him one more chance — only one more mind you. O here’s my station. Goodnight James. I am much obliged to you.’

‘Silly old fool!’ he added when the other had turned back.

James Hare as he re-entered the office felt as though he had suddenly found Life to be made of a completely different material from what he had imagined. Existence had turned its rough lining inwards for this poor pilgrim. By closing time however James had resolved on another venture. He allowed his brother to set off home alone, which indeed John was too ready to do, and having watched the well-known figure out of sight he extravagantly hailed a “Taxi” and set off for Cavendish Square.

The “Taxi” stopped at the door of the famous Dr. Windlas — Specialist in Nerve Disorders. The ease and rapidity of his approach (for James had never experienced motor-traction before) impressed the Clerk hopefully as to the Power of Science.

And he was still more reassured when at last Dr. Windlas received him. The interview was not long. ‘Find her for him!’ the doctor kept repeating. ‘Find her for him! Your plain duty, my dear Sir, is to discover as soon as you can, by hook or by crook a tolerable pretty young woman with a Mole over her left Eye. Surely in one of the Music Halls there are plenty of petticoats. And you had better advertise in “Marriage.”’ These were the last words he said and he uttered them with the gravest countenance and not a suspicion of irony.

James retired; he had not dismissed his “Taxi”; it snortingly awaited him. ‘The Tower Theatre,’ he said, getting in.

‘I’ll take a seat near the stage,’ he thought, ‘and I’ll go somewhere every night till I’ve searched every House in London. My hundred in the Savings Bank must go. It’s worth it for John’s health.’

The Tower Theatre of Varieties was in the glory of one of its most successful “turns” when James Hare entered. He settled himself eagerly in his seat, the evening dress of his neighbours causing him far less embarrassment than one would have expected.

But James was a brave man and the new venture seemed auspicious. Auspicious indeed! He had no sooner concentrated his attention upon the famous dancer than he clapped his hands together with an audible noise. ‘It is she!’ he cried to himself and then he trembled as convulsively as if in contact with an electric battery. Yes! there was the Woman with the Leonardo-like head and the wonderful coils of hair. There was the Woman with the Mole on her forehead. There actually before him was the original of the Spot upon the Wall! He was far too agitated to admire the slender creature’s agility and grace. She was dancing the notorious “Salomé” Dance and her lithe body moved to and fro like a glittering Lilith or Lamia: but James only saw the Mark upon her forehead which proved her without doubt his brother’s fatal affinity. He thought only of his brother and of her spell over him until, as he watched the windings of those beautiful limbs and the tossings of those beautiful arms, that other John’s head, so dreadful in its paleness, became stamped with the very lineaments of the unknown City Clerk.

When Thelma Lorraine’s “turn” was over and she had retired overwhelmed with applause James Hare was no longer in his seat. He was engaged in a weighty and lengthened conversation with the official in the box office. Passed on from him to another local magnate (for James in the stress of his anxiety was spending money like a Lord) he ultimately, by means of I know not what skilfully pulled wires, found himself alone in a neat little dressing-room with Thelma Lorraine herself. Gracefully motioned into a luxurious chair by the great lady who had not yet put off her stage dress — and who fancied her irritable visitor at least a disguised Marquis — Mr Hare we may be sure did not allow any time to be wasted. In one long torrent of really appealing eloquence he implored her to take pity on his unfortunate brother.

As in the case of Scott's Jeanie Deans in the presence of another sort of queen the poor man's burst of spontaneous oratory was not without its effect. Other motives also, of a less exalted kind, came sliding at that moment like so many Sylphs into Salomé's beautiful breast. She happened to be at that very time passing through the compliant Press her Book of Reminiscences; and she could not help thinking what a pretty story this would make for that charming work — how well adapted, in fact, for quotations, reviews and excerpts in Newspapers! The wily James had been careful to avoid any mention of The Spot upon the Wall. He had represented his brother (O the unscrupulousness of love!) as hopelessly pining away in his passion for her — as hopelessly, he might have added, as a luckless knight-at-arms,

Alone and palely loitering

who loved La Belle Dame Sans Merci, only even James Hare's rhetoric could not summon to its aid personages he never heard of. But he had said enough. Salomé was after all a woman and it was impossible for her to be angry at being told that a man was near dying for love of her beauty; besides, Mrs Thelma Lorraine was as we have remarked composing her dainty Reminiscences of My Life and consequently in the very mood and vein for what might be called a chaste adventure!

So it was all arranged. She was to come to the brother's riverside lodging that very next day — which happened by good luck to be Sunday.

‘You must let me bring some of my own special port wine with me,’ had been her parting words as James Hare, bowing over her hand as he had never bowed before in his life, left her.

That night James Hare returned home with a feeling of profound happiness in his heart. He walked from the Monument Station. It was a lovely summer night, and as he walked by the familiar road in the course of his walk, he could not help looking up in pious gratitude to the great illuminated dome above his head, and as he looked one of those great resplendent constellations suspended there so high over the roofs of London wore the mortal likeness of none other than Mrs Thelma Lorraine in the Last of Her Seven Veils! He amused himself by fancying he could recognise in one tiny point of scintillating glory that Birth-Mark by which he had known her as the woman he sought.

He undressed in the sitting-room to avoid disturbing his brother and put the candle out before entering their bedroom. When he entered he saw by the flicker of river-lights that John Hare had fallen into a deep and happy sleep. Moved by an inexplicable impulse he stepped to his side and kissed him lightly on the forehead: then instinctively avoiding even a glance at the fatal Spot upon The Wall he got into bed himself and let his head sink peacefully on his pillow.

A Sunday morning in the heart of London in our heyday of summertime gives substance and reality perhaps more than anything else in the world to the desirable abstraction called Rest. A delicious balmy sense of relaxed fibres and leisurely drawn breaths hangs like a healing atmosphere over street and park and river. Golden sun-motes, more magical than ever danced in fairyland, hover before the eyes of thousands on thousands of humble Londoners chewing between asleep and awake the delicious end of pleasure promising visions. What though the sun set upon less placid scenes? Well!

Is it not something to have dozed and been happy? It cannot be always Sunday morning.

James Hare made no haste to arouse his brother or to get up himself. If he had been a reader of Shakespeare he would perhaps have muttered: ‘O! that a man might know

> The end of this day’s business ere it come!
> But it sufficeth that the day will end,
> And then the end is known.’

As it was he lay quite still and thanked God for having given him the courage to act as he had acted.

That morning while they lingered over their breakfast both seemed conscious that some decisive event was in the wind.

‘I am afraid I have not been very kind to you, James, since It — since She first came,’ said the elder brother looking across at his friend with a peculiarly wistful look. ‘I can’t help it,’ he went on. ‘It’s here’ — he tapped his forehead— ‘and there’ — he indicated by a gesture the room without. ‘I know I’m making an utter fool of myself but it’s no good — I can’t do otherwise.’

James rose to his feet and took him by the hand. ‘This very afternoon,’ he said with a slow triumphant intonation, ‘She will come — I have found her.’

At four o’clock that afternoon she did come. James had made his brother, who certainly looked ill enough for anything, undress and get into bed ‘for,’ said he, ‘our only chance is to excite her pity.’ Their bedroom window was wide open. A strong but not unpleasant odour of tar and cordage and seaweed entered from off the inflowing tide. A large irregular sunbeam fell waveringly on The Spot on the Wall throwing into abnormal distinctness every feature of that unlucky chance-drawn Face. She came sailing in looking perhaps the least trifle scared, but that only made her condescension more attractive. Lightly she flung down her rose coloured Cloak over the back of their one chair and handed a small black bottle she had concealed beneath it to poor obsequious James and proceeded with charming ease and bewitching confidence to take off her gloves.

John Hare sat up erect in bed. His countenance at that moment, to compare small things to great, must have resembled the countenance of the Poet of The Divine Comedy when he tried in vain to answer the Salutation of Beatrice upon the Florentine Bridge. His behaviour seemed to embarrass the lady but little, for, with that charming sliding walk, which had beguiled Europe, she moved up to his bedside and took his hand.

'Poor man!' she said in a voice mellifluous, 'you needn't tell me anything. I have heard all from him. Poor, poor, man! Is it really so bad to have these funny feelings for a silly little actress woman like me? Come, come, now, you must shake off these foolish ideas.' With the tenderest movements in the world she made him sink down again on his pillow and allowed her hand to caress his forehead. 'No, no,' she went on, 'I must really scold you, you know. This sort of thing will never never do! Look: I am not so very pretty after all, am I when you see me off the stage?' And she pulled up her veil till it made a tight dark line across the middle of her forehead.

John's eyes glanced wildly backwards and forwards from this beautiful apparition to The Spot on the Wall. James, to make a diversion — for he perceived a dreadful danger now — hurried forward with two glass tumblers half-full of the lady's wine.

But John waved him back: starting desperately up he suddenly, to Mrs Lorraine's confusion and alarm, pushed up the veil quite off her face and — laying a rude finger on the fatal Mole — pointed with his other hand at The Spot on the Wall. ‘Look, look, look,’ he cried. ‘You both have It!’

Reddening with anger she rose and looked. The warm sunlight made the resemblance more vivid than James had even seen it before. The Spot within The Spot on the Wall and the Spot on Salomé’s angry Forehead seemed to darken and dilate in horrible sympathy. She rushed to the chair and seized her cloak and gloves. James hardly knowing what he did advanced towards her, the glass of red wine shaking in his trembling hands and throwing a blood coloured shadow on the floor. In a moment she had snatched it from him, and dashed its contents with one fierce gesture completely over The Spot on The Wall, obliterating it forever from human sight. Then with an angry burst of self-pitying tears she flung herself out of the room and out of the house.

James turned to his brother.

John Hare was lying upon his bed motionless and still. The Dancer had killed his heart.

‘This would have been something for your poor brother John who loved the girls so,’ said Mr Wump a fortnight later to the pallid shadow who still called himself James Hare. He handed him a newspaper. The clerk read:

‘”One of the most charming anecdotes so naively told by our distinguished authoress, as great it seems in literary as in salutatory art, is the one that tells the story of her visit to the poor dying man who had fallen in love with her Picture. The simple veracity of this pathetic incident is only equalled by the modest reserve with which the celebrated dancer tells it”.’

The Harvest Thanksgiving

Miss Georgina Kildare lived in a dainty little house in the Midlands by the side of the Great North Road. A fair sized plot of ground separated Lilac Cottage from the dust and mud of the highway, and out of this little plot blazed, in colours resplendent as the patchwork quilt that covered her bed, Miss Georgina's summer-garden. The Village of Binting knew no more discreet pillar of respectable society than this retired lady. Really only just forty, she gave one the appearance of carrying at least fifty winters on her mild brow, so distinctively was she marked out a votary of Diana's train. Yet she was by no means deficient in Nature's outward adorning. Indeed under certain aspects and in certain lights she might have been called quite beautiful — and what more could one say of Cleopatra?

Fate, having denied Georgina the ecstasies and sorrows of Love, had been, it must be confessed, in other respects extremely kind to her. Her house was precisely the right shape and let in neither wind nor rain. Her garden was neither too large nor too small: her maid, though still some ten years younger than Miss Georgina, had been schooled by that lady into Perfection itself. Her kitchen garden grew excellent broad beans and the church stood not more than half a mile away!

The Society of the village where she lived boasted not only a Rural Dean — if you know what that is, Reader? — but a Doctor and a Woman of Title! This last wonder had not been in the place long and was no more, in reality, than an ex-Mayor's widow from Nottingham, but since Everything, as the Modem Pulpit puts it, is Relative, in Binting Lady Lettice Whatnot was a Cloud of Glory. Miss Georgina's own social position was of that delicate and imponderable character, best described in the Rural Dean’s own elegant words as ‘not Quite, Quite!’; and the summit of her innocent ambition in the early summer of the year of grace we are now enjoying was to be invited to the Rural Decanal table to “meet” Lady Lettice at dinner!

The Reverend Thomas Grey had long ago found in Georgina a most invaluable ally in matters ecclesiastical. Providence indeed permitted her to expend upon itself, dear, demure Devotee, all that stored up treasury of Love which Nature in its unregenerate selfishness had doubtless intended for its own more secular purposes. The Doctor too, Mr Frederick Roan, was not averse to making Miss Georgina useful in various little ways, Her cottage happened, most conveniently, to be at one extreme end of his Æsculapian beat where it was not by any means unpleasant to drop in about tea-time on a cold afternoon.

If the Parson and the Doctor found Miss Kildare an agreeable neighbour it must be added that the populace surveyed her with more mixed feelings. No one could be more unselfish than she showed herself, no one could give away more lavishly. Her substantial little income of four hundred a year was often seriously encroached upon by her charities. But with all her kindness she was so outspoken in reprobating the thousand and one deficiencies of weak human nature, especially those of a self-indulgent kind, that it was only the most scrupulous and undeviating members of the parish who could be said to regard her with genuine love.

The Summer had been an especially hot one and the prospect in corn and fruit for that year seemed exceptionally rich. Day after day the cornfields adjoining her cottage got yellower and yellower: day after day the apples in the orchard on the further side of the road swelled and sweetened: day after day the dahlias and phloxes each side of her brick path bloomed more lavishly and the geraniums in her parlour window drank more deeply of the sun and threw it back with a warmer glow. At length the most important event in the agricultural year, the cutting and binding of the corn, began in good earnest and the mellow halcyon weather still holding up, everyone had hopes of a quite unusual harvest. The Harvest Thanksgiving, most Pagan and spontaneous of all Festivals permitted by the Church, was announced for a certain day three weeks hence.

No one was more affected by the announcement of this date than Miss Georgina Kildare. The truth is that ever since last summer the Rural Dean had vaguely hinted at a snug little private dinner party to be given by himself to the "better people" of the neighbourhood. This little dinner was to be given simultaneously with the more popular one paid for by the absentee Lord of the Manor for the benefit of his tenants. Miss Georgina's mind had been on tenterhooks. The Rural Dean had not definitely invited her. He had allowed himself the rather unkind pleasure — considering what a good man he was — of dangling before her eyes this "little dinner" as a sort of banquet Tantalus. Perhaps it gratified an obscure lust for power in him to find that he could trouble the peace of mind of his gentle parishioner; or perhaps he really considered it important to keep up the value of these good old fashioned distinctions that are so broken in upon in the present day. At any rate Miss Georgina was looking forward with hope against hope to this Harvest Thanksgiving Day which might prove her début into Upper Class Society.

Do you smile Reader? Ah! you see, you cannot understand these emotions, you who are already safe within the circle of circles! But believe me such feelings are as serious as Love or Hate or anything else that is part of Life.

So the weather grew hotter and hotter and the lady's desire for Harvest Thanksgiving Day more and more restless. She became indeed quite irritable over things that a few weeks ago would not have troubled her at all. Pattie, the Perfect Maid, had never known her mistress so exacting.

One hot fore-noon Miss Georgina had drawn her garden chair under the shadow of one of the big lilac bushes that grew near her gate and was there seated daintily “doing up” the silk skirt of her mauve-coloured evening dress. Every scent and sound that came to her suggested hot weather. She heard the wheel of the nearly empty well go round the third time that morning as Pattie tried to secure enough water for washing her potatoes. She caught the wafted fragrance of the Jasmine over her porch. She heard the reiterated tapping of a thrush breaking a snail on the path: and all about her hummed and vibrated that vague murmur of ephemeral air-life without which the full effect of a hot noon were wanting.

Trot! trot! trot! trot! came the sound of horses’ hooves on the Great North Road. Georgina looked round: two tall mounted men in khaki, their guns swinging behind them and their accoutrements flashing in the sun, were ambling lazily towards her. She must have made quite a pretty picture sitting there under the heart shaped leaves of the big lilac-bush.

The younger of the two riders pulled up — his companion did the same, falling a little into the background. ‘Could you tell me, madam,’ said the soldier, showing at once that he was a gentleman by the tone of his voice, ‘whether you have seen any troops pass this way? The enemy are expected to try a flank movement in this direction.’ Georgina intimated that she had seen nothing but a drove of sheep.

‘What enemy?’ she asked.

‘O, I ought to have explained,’ said the officer hastily: ‘how blundering of me! Of course I did not mean real enemies. I meant the other side, you know, in the manoeuvres. Sergeant Griggs and I have been sent on a long reconnoitring round. Our brigade is operating at Narrover Moor.’

The speaker was in the bloom of manhood, anywhere let us say between twenty-five and thirty. His fair closely cropped hair curled all over his head, close to his skull. His broad low forehead, full red lips and rounded chin gave him in profile, had the lady known anything of Hellenistic Cameos, a marked resemblance to Alexander the Great.

To unclassical eyes he was indeed something better than a Cameo of a dead conqueror. He was an extremely handsome, lively young man in His Britannic Majesty's Royal Dragoons! In her embarrassment Georgina's evening gown fell from her hands and the reel of white silk she was using rolled into the middle of the path. She rose to pick it up, but the young officer forestalled her. Lightly he vaulted from his horse; lightly he opened the little wicket gate and lightly he stooped to pick up the reel. She was also stooping; and, as will happen in these embarrassing encounters, their heads met in a slight collision.

O how burning were Georgina's cheeks as she received the young man's profuse apologies. But the incident had broken the ice: and the accommodating weather finished its dissolution. 'Won't you have something to drink?' she asked blushing again like any young girl till she felt the red tint descend to her very bosom.

'It's — very good of you madam, I really don't mind if I do have a glass — a glass of milk, I mean,' he added hurriedly.

'Pattie!' cried her mistress, 'Pattie! Pattie!

'Yes Miss, yes Miss,' answered the maid tripping as it happened not from the House but from the road. 'Yes Miss.'

'Go in,' said her mistress, 'and get this officer — I mean this gentleman — a glass of milk, Pattie. And perhaps the Sergeant also would like something?'

Ah! the power of the Sword! Old maids and young wenches, mistresses and maidens all fall prostrate before it! It is the magic of the Man who can Strike: it is the wizardry of the Stag with the great Antlers!

A few days after this, Captain The Honourable Tom Ransom and Colour Sergeant Griggs once more made their appearance at Lilac Cottage. This time they fastened their horses to the little gate as though they had been brothers and marched up the brick path as bold as gunpowder. Their camp had moved to Elmbourne the Captain said, a town about five miles away, and he could get an afternoon off whenever he wanted it. Carelessly he tapped with his cane upon the ground. For on this occasion, the occasion of their second meeting only, there seemed no doubt about his wanting it pretty often. The Captain sipped tea in the parlour with the lady and the Sergeant drank cider in the kitchen like a privileged sweetheart. Lilac Cottage had yielded to the enemy at the first frontal attack.

The Honourable Tom Ransom was not exactly a notorious Don Juan, but his philosophy of love if not of life might until now have been aptly summed up in the simple words: take all — leave all. As regards poor Miss Georgina he certainly conceived no more “serious intentions” towards her than he had done in the case of a score of other less elderly Dulcineas who had before now suffered from his levity.

The worthy Colour-Sergeant, however, was a man of a completely different calibre. He was a simple minded honest fellow from the Peak District with no more desire to deceive a confiding maid than to fly over the moon. Pattie was luckier than her mistress.

It was indeed no more nor less than a revolution in that quiet household. The Honourable Tom’s cigar smoke hung about the pretty pink curtains, his nasty stale tobacco was sprinkled all over the floor. The white-washed grate was full of his cigarette ends. The little entrance hall smelt of the brandy he carried in his flask. His terrier pup dug among the Dahlias. Slang such as those dainty flowers had never listened to since they emerged from the earth resounded from one end of the little garden to the other.

Miss Georgina knew that all this was improper and unbecoming. She knew that she ran the risk of losing not only her social position — such as it was — but even her good name if she allowed it to continue, but she was infatuated, blinded, obsessed.

Nothing pushes a woman more irrevocably into danger than a complete lack of experience — when once experience comes.

Little Partie was amazed at what she called, in conversation with the Sergeant, 'Miss Georgina's dreadful carryings on,' and though she herself benefited hugely by all this (for when the Captain came the Sergeant came, and the Sergeant was a model lover) yet she could not get reconciled to her mistress's loss of self-respect. It gave her a sensation as though the sky was falling. Her whole world seemed to have lost its coping-stone. All that delicate old-maidishness which throws such a charming atmosphere of dainty reprovement round the most material things of daily life had evaporated in a moment from Lilac Cottage like the perfume of a broken vase. Miss Georgina forgot to tie up her lavender, she forgot to preserve her currants, she forgot to put camphor in her cupboards, she forgot to take cuttings from her geraniums. Even her dress altered. She put on garish and crude colours that did not suit her: she wore artificial pearls round her neck instead of the little gold locket that had been her mother's: and with her dress her ways changed too. She became flighty and flippant. Her movements grew hurried and abrupt, she alternated between fits of profound melancholy and fits of excessive excitement. She talked to Partie in the strangest manner — sitting on the kitchen table, her feet swinging under her. She referred quite carelessly to things she would never have hinted at before — even in a whisper — and one morning, though there was no need for such a thing, she rouged her lips. In fact Miss Georgina Kildare was suffering from an utter moral collapse — a complete dégringolade.

It can easily be guessed that this pathological revolution was not unseen by Georgina’s neighbours. It indeed furnished matter for impassioned conversation from the Rectory Tennis Lawn to the Public House Bowling Alley. Over and over again was it discussed. From the masculine point of view (a somewhat coarse one), from the feminine point of view (a rather cruel one) — by man-servants and maidservants, by discreet housewives and harlotry sluts — by garden party people and harvest field people — by Church and Chapel — by moralist and immoralist. ‘This Business of Georgina and The Captain’ was sifted and re-sifted even to the uttermost grain.

The Rural Dean and the Doctor had a most serious consultation. It was quite plain that something must be done. But what? The two responsible professions looked at one another in grave perplexity.

‘I doubt whether she is right in her head,’ said the Parson. ‘I think it would be well if you called and saw her.’

‘I am afraid she has been forgetting herself,’ said the Doctor. ‘I think it is your duty to talk quite plainly to her.’

Meanwhile Harvest Thanksgiving Day approached. Offerings of fruit, vegetables and flowers were requested for the ensuing Festival. Preparations were made for the great Tenants’ Dinner, and invitations were issued for the private dinner at the Vicarage. These it is hardly necessary to state did not include Miss Georgina Kildare.

As to what really went on in that disorganised Lilac Cottage none ever knew. Some say the Captain kissed Miss Georgina every time he came and every time he went away. Others say he left kissing alone and only chucked her under the chin now and again, and called her his “darling aunt,” and his “pretty pussycat,” and his “church mouse,” and his “little Georgie,” and such-like tender names.

As far as the loves of the Sergeant and Partie went, all had prospered well. A proper and decent notice had been given to the Parson. Pattie’s parents had been to see her and had approved her choice and on the ensuing Sunday, which was the long expected Harvest Thanksgiving, their ‘Banns’ were to be read in Church for the first time.

The Rural Dean’s dinner was arranged for Monday night when the Parson, the Harvest Festival over and the Lord of Moderate Blessings decently thanked, might enjoy with a clear conscience his little Feast.

On Saturday afternoon as they were returning from arranging the offerings in the Church the Parson’s wife said to her husband: ‘That Captain Ransom we met yesterday at Colonel Parker’s is really an Honourable. I found him in the Peerage and he’s the heir to Lord Riddlesdale, you know. I wish we could have asked him. I wonder if it would be possible at so short a notice? Of course there’s nothing we need trouble about in all that silly gossip. People must have something to talk about. What do you say my dear? Shall I write to him tonight? How do you begin to an Honourable?’

The Rural Dean put on his gravest expression and walked some paces in solemn state.

‘Shall I write to him?’ repeated his wife.

‘It is a very serious question, my dear, and one that requires careful consideration,’ replied the Parson.

‘I may write to him then?’ she said.

‘I wish only to do my duty in this important matter,’ said the Clergyman.

‘How do you begin to an Honourable?’ repeated his wife.

‘I pray we shall be guided rightly in all matters,’ remarked the Rural Dean.

‘I’ll tell him we expect Lady Whatnot there,’ the lady concluded, ‘he knows her you know. They used to meet in London.’

Binting Harvest Thanksgiving Day was the culmination of the fine weather. Never was such a largesse of sunshine poured down upon glowing well reaped stubble fields since the days when the daughter-in-law of Naomi ‘stood in tears amid the alien corn.’

It was the custom at Binting when the Thanksgiving Service was over for all the congregation to walk solemnly round aisle and chancel in order to observe in their new decorative positions the various offerings they themselves had given. This informal ceremony took place when the Clergyman had retired into the vestry. It was the occasion therefore for a good deal of sly pleasantry among the young people as they jostled one another round the piled-up pumpkins and potatoes, the great bunches of grapes, and the ripe sheaves of corn. On such occasions it almost seemed as though their Christian Service done, these simple rustics relapsed into that primitive Pagan worship, the worship of the Bread which Perisheth, out of which limitations their more spiritual Religion had with so much labour lifted them. On this particular day as the congregation trooped languorously round the chancel many a lad and maid (as they had done no doubt thousands of years ago at the festival of Demeter and Ceres) glanced furtively and coyly at one another across the backs of their elders, and blessed the gods in their hearts for a gift more precious than corn or wine.

But it was a beautiful and memorable sight full of rich pathetic symbolism for the thoughtful eye, this offering of the first fruits of the Earth to Earth’s invisible Guardians! A ceremony it seemed linking the long ages of human history together, an act of spontaneous uncanonical Ritual, venerable as the Ploughshare, old as the Threshing-flail, contemporary with the first upturning of the Sod, coeval with the first binding of the Sheaves. A stream of hot sunlight poured in through the open west end door and the numberless tiny sun-motes floating in it seemed like the liberated souls of innumerable dust-atoms destined now in the prolific laboratory of Nature to be re-embodied in wonderful new life-forms. Sun-motes! Ah! they too were old, these infinitesimal dancing specks, older than Christian Liturgies, older than Heathen Mysteries. The Wonders they celebrated in their careless indifferent dance had been enacted before the Pyramids were dreamt of or Babylon begun. Theirs was a Harvest Thanksgiving that went back to the whirl of planetary grain-dust on the threshing floor of the Universe, when the morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy!

But if the nobler aspects of pagan religions were recalled that Sunday morning in Binting Church a sad example of pagan cruelty was also displayed. Look at that fantastic figure dressed so oddly in a purple cloak and carrying a huge pumpkin in her arms! She has brought it a long way. She is tired of holding it. She wants to find room for it among the rest. But the processioning men and women close up their ranks pitilessly. None moves to give her place: some look coldly and spitefully at her: some severely look another way: only a few have discovered the cruel secret of looking at her as though she were a thing and not a Person, but these certainly do their best with their discovery, and stare the more remorselessly at her the more she shrinks and suffers under their gaze. In old times such a festival as this no doubt called for its Victim. Blood had to be shed other than the blood of grapes before the gods were duly thanked!

Well! The People of Binting had not to go without their victim this time. Exhausted with her efforts to find a place for her gift Miss Georgina sank at last into the front choir stall and the pumpkin fell from her arms and rolled upon the floor. No one moved to help her even then. Callously they pushed past her, whispering to one another and shaking their heads. ‘Look, Mummy!’ whispered one little mite who had been led in by the hand. ‘Look, Mummy! the naughty lady’s crying!’

Tears indeed were rolling down poor Georgina’s cheeks. Her burden was greater than she could bear. But the sight of her tears seemed rather to harden than soften these Celebrators of the Harvest. It was proper and right that the Victim should be made to shed tears. Who knows but that they might prove auspicious harbingers of fruitful rain!

Slowly, when the last of the congregation had passed by, Georgina rose to her feet. She went down the aisle to fetch her pumpkin which profane feet had carelessly kicked from where it fell. Then returning with it in her arms she was about to deposit it at the base of the reading desk when the door of the vestry opened and the clerk came out.

Rudely the man walked up to her, as solemn an old sycophant as ever served two masters. ‘Now then, Miss, we can’t have no more of them things here! so ’tis no good your leaving it. Better take it back where it came from. Parson’ll only tell me to throw it away if it’s left here.’

The poor persecuted lady stooped down and once more pressing the ridiculously sleek vegetable against her breast retreated hastily out of the church.

As she issued from the west door she saw the Rural Dean’s wife talking to the Doctor as though they both waited for her husband. Georgina threw the pumpkin down on the grass and walked straight past them wrapping her purple cloak round her slim forty years old figure. As she passed she glanced up. The Parson’s wife pretended not to see her but the Doctor without taking off his hat smiled at her a half pitying half jocular smile as much as to say: ‘I am a man of the world and understand these little things, of course.’

Georgina did not hurry home. Pattie and Sergeant Griggs, their Banns read out in due form, had slipped off as soon as Service was over and had doubtless by this time re-entered the Cottage on the Great North Road.

Georgina did not hurry. She walked like one who has received a heavy physical blow. So indeed she had; for Life itself had lifted up its hand and struck her. She took the path through the fields: the path that leads so close to the edge of Rudgely Farm Pond.

By one of those odd coincidences that look so much like Providence, two other persons who had not been to church that morning were also walking in the direction of Rudgely Farm Pond, no others in fact than Lady Whatnot and Captain Ransom.

‘What was that, Polly?’ (These old London friends used very familiar speech). ‘Did you hear that? I’m off to see,’ and Captain Ransom ran to the pond’s edge.

The following night the Reverend Thomas and Mrs Grey waited anxiously the arrival of their guests. That small and select company were all punctual, except two: the most select of all. The delay of these two was most important. The little stove in the kitchen was covered with steaming “dished up” dishes. Conversation in the drawing-room flagged or was cold and uninspired. The pulses of Mrs Grey’s world stood still. ‘I cannot think,’ she would add in a confidential whisper to one after another of her visitors, ‘why Lady Whatnot and Captain Ransom are so late.’ Then she said: ‘Poor Lord Riddlesdale is not expected to live, you know.’ At last the sound of a carriage was really heard. ‘I wonder which of them it is?’

Everybody began setting right their sleeve-cuffs and lace-chiffons and arranging themselves to best advantage in their chairs, conversation became still more forced: people made remarks without expecting or even listening for an answer.

‘The Honourable Captain Ransom!’ announced the little Rectory housemaid in a pining voice. There was a general flutter followed by a feeling of relief when the gallant gentleman sat down by his hostess and entered into eager conversation.

When, however, the drift of conversation was overheard the tension returned sevenfold. ‘Yes, I must beg your congratulations, Mrs Grey,’ he was saying, ‘and we shall have occasion to use your husband’s good services. The wedding will have to be a very quiet one as my dear father is so ill, but we are both particularly anxious it should take place before I leave the army.’

‘She does not come from this part of the country then?’ Mrs Grey was heard to enquire.

‘O dear no. Her ancestors I believe lived in Scotland.’

‘The engagement has recently taken place?’ asked the lady.

‘Very recently indeed,’ answered the Captain.

Once more the sound of a carriage was heard outside.

‘You will see her in a minute,’ cried Captain Ransom, excitedly rising from his seat. ‘I knew you wouldn’t mind our bringing her to your party. She has come in Lady Whatnot’s carriage. We both stayed at Lady Whatnot’s last night.’

Again the little housemaid flung open the door.

‘Lady Whatnot and Miss Georgina Kildare!’

And so the mauve-silk dress had come in useful after all.

CHAPTER I

THE KING OF the Blaenau-Ffestiniog ghost-world was known far and wide as Fabulatorius; and when he came up on the last day of April from visiting the body of Cockatrice Cuff as that gentleman lay at rest in his coffin, the gossip among the neighbouring ghosts was more disturbing than had been known in that district for many a long year. He had been heard addressing some very curious remarks to the two iron railings, one above the other, and supported by a row of iron posts, that ran along the right hand edge of the long, steep ramp that led up to the spot where Cuff was buried and these remarks of his had been understood in indignantly opposite ways.

What King Fabulatorius had actually said was this: ‘Railings,’ he had said, ‘you must remember that all the children, who love to swing over you and under you and to twist their little bodies between your double bars, have no idea that you are anything more than long iron bars supported at intervals by iron posts. As your sovereign lord and King I must insist that you keep in mind that everything made by man has its own particular share in the ghostliness of the venerated ghosts of the men who made it. All we ghosts are worshipful beings. We have possessed the air round the earth ever since the forerunners of mankind came out from the depths of the ocean. All the space round the earth for thousands upon thousands of miles has been filled for thousands upon thousands of years by the ghosts of all the creatures, men, beasts, birds, reptiles and insects, who have lived and died about the earth since their ancestors came out of the sea. What am I going to tell you, subjects of mine, vouchers for my integrity? None of you, no! not one of you, has now, or ever has had, or ever will have, the faintest idea of what I now am hesitating to tell you, shrinking from telling you, fearful of telling you, but absolutely resolved to tell you.

'It is this, my children. It is this. There is a ghost now close to us, near to us, perhaps even at this minute among us, who has come from a part of the world we rarely hear mentioned in these degenerate days, but who for years has been studying the effect upon us ghosts of these experiments which men call by such names as "nuclear" and "atomic." The name of the ghost I am telling you of, is Glottenko. He harbours the idea, he nurses the idea, he develops the idea, he loses himself in the idea that it will be possible for us ghosts, if we follow him closely enough and study his methods with sufficient thoroughness, to obliterate the whole human race and all its ghosts with it. His plan, my children, is no less than this. He believes that if a sufficient number of us can be persuaded to volunteer for the sake of our bodies and the ghosts of birds, beasts, reptiles and insects, it will be possible for us to create an army of heroic ghosts who by rushing upon these nuclear bombers and possessing ourselves of their weapons could pick out the human race from among all the other creatures of the world and destroy it utterly; not only the race but its ghosts as well.

'Just think, my dear children, what a noble and terrific idea of Glottenko's this is! Think what an adorable world it will be when there is not one human being left alive and not one human ghost is to be found anywhere!'

King Fabulatorius felt in his deepest heart that what he had told his Blaenau-Ffestiniog subjects had worked upon them the impression he wanted. He made the mistake however — and he knew it was a mistake as soon as he had done it — of taking Glottenko by the hand and presenting him to the crowd. Glottenko was a short, squat, ungainly individual with a head too large for his body and a mouth too large for his head. His appearance before them at this moment was doubly unfortunate because King Fabulatorius when living had been an exceptionally tall and handsome man, and although he had been dead and buried for several years his ghost had retained every aspect of this impressiveness. It never crossed the King's mind that the ugliness of Mr. Glottenko would influence his hearers.

There were two ghosts, however, now listening to him who were brother and sister before they died; the boy had died at seventeen and the girl at fifteen and in a sense they had been lovers too and this attraction to each other was still active though they were both ghosts. The boy's name was Wang and the girl's name was Tang and they were in the habit of moving about in such close contact that they often looked while they walked as if they were embracing each other. On this occasion Wang said to Tang:

'What an awful person! How can the King suggest that we join forces with a being like that?' But Tang answered: 'I remember once hearing my mother say that the best of all old proverbs was that The End Justifies the Means. So may be this ugly little brute will serve our purpose!'

'Doesn't it ever strike you, Tang,' enquired Wang, 'that it's rather queer that our King who is a man, and you and I who are a boy and a girl, should be so keen to destroy all the ghosts in the world who are the ghosts of human beings?'

'My own opinion is,' replied Tang gravely, 'that there have never been any animals or birds or reptiles or insects as cruel as men, both to one another and to the other creatures, and my own private feeling is that deliberate cruelty is far the wickedest thing in the world and is indeed so abominably wicked that since the human race has practised it since they first became human beings they deserve to perish, both when they are alive and when they are ghosts like you and me.

‘What you must remember,’ the girl went on, ’is that for all the wisdom of dogs and sheep and all the cleverness of cats and monkeys, there are no animals who know they ought not to be cruel and yet against their conscience go on being cruel. Lions and tigers and panthers and leopards and boa-constrictors and serpents kill and kill and kill; but they kill by nature and by necessity and by instinct and to get food for themselves and their young. They don’t kill for sport or for the pleasure of causing suffering.’

The ghost Wang drew himself a little away from the ghost of Tang and gazed at her for a moment without speaking. Then he suddenly said:

‘Do you know, my dear, I’ve been thinking for quite a while about an idea of mine and I want to know whether you will agree. I’ll frankly out with it now: and if you hate the idea I’ll never suggest it again. What about —’ He became so excited as he spoke that Tang remembered the day, long before they both died, when he first told her that he loved her. He seemed to her, ghost though he was, to have the same look as he had on that unforgettable day.

‘Tell me, Wang, tell me what you’re thinking of! Tell me, for heaven’s sake, what’s in your mind!’

He spoke now, holding her shadowy hands with his shadowy hands, and watching her expression as he spoke:

‘I was thinking, my dear, that it would be exciting for us if we explored our world of the dead a bit further than we have yet done. We have lived here in Blaenau-Ffestiniog long enough to know almost all our fellow-ghosts as they are in death almost as intimately as we knew them when they were alive: only they can’t show us now where they feel their sore throat or just where in their stomachs they feel duodenal hurting or dyspeptic hurting, or just where in their heads they are suffering from neuralgic pains. But what I would like to do with you now, Tang, is to explore other districts of Britain and get into touch with completely different ghosts from the ones we are acquainted so well with here in North Wales.'

'O I would like that too!' cried Tang, full of the excitement her brother was feeling. 'Let's go to some big city, to London maybe, or out of this island altogether, to Paris, or Rome, or New York! Where would you like best to go? I don't care at all, so long at it's away from here and so long as it isn't in the desert or in the snow-covered Alps! What about Venice? O how lovely it would be to be rowed in a gondola!'

Without a word more consultation off they went; and whether it was Tang's word about Venice that led to it or some longing on Wang's part to get out of reach of both King Fabulatorius and Mr. Glottenko in the quickest possible way, they steered their ascent, for all ghosts of young people can mount into the air, in a south-easterly direction. They soon found themselves floating above Dover; and drawn by a natural curiosity, they descended to the edge of a cliff in front of a very neat little house with a small, tidy garden. Approaching this house hand-in-hand they peeped into one of the windows. There was a small gas flame burning within an elegantly painted globe but nobody was there. On a little round table, however, there were a few things left, such as indicated in a casual manner the sort of life the inmates or one of the inmates of this little house lived. There were a couple of books carelessly balanced against one another and near them a half-used open box of matches tilted sideways against a saucer from which there still rose, from a cigarette-end, a feather of smoke. An ink-bottle with a fountain-pen protruding from it had been squeezed between this saucer with its faint smoke and the edge of the table; and as the observers looked through that window they both had an uneasy feeling that the mere impact of their gaze might tip that ink over upon the rug. And even as they gazed what was a very strange event happened. From the surface of that carelessly left group of things, books, matches, saucer, cigarette-end, ink-bottle and pen a ghost like themselves, only it would have been difficult to say whether it was male or female, human or inhuman, detached itself and approached them, passing through the glass of the window.

It had a face, when it spoke to them, that reminded them of various portraits they had seen of ancient literary or legal characters of the past. It was a man's face, but it had, as they quickly recognised, many of the lines and curves that they both associated with their elderly aunts and great-aunts.

'You two, my children,' it said to them, 'are very young to be dead. Were you killed together in some railway accident?'

'O no, sir,' Wang answered, 'we died of that disease — I forget what they call it — that has been travelling round the country. But we enjoy going about together. Our bodies are buried in the churchyard but we don't want to stay round our coffins. It's nicer to visit places we might have been to when we were alive. Were those things on that table yours?'

The ghost looked from one to the other and smiled faintly. 'O no! They didn't belong to me. I am their ghost. I expect you two, my dears, don't realise yet that it isn't only living things that leave ghosts behind them when they die. Inanimate things do the same when they've reason for feeling neglected and deserted. Haven't you noticed in your walks through the country here when you've come to a broken down gate or a fallen tree or shattered hut or a broken down milestone, you find its ghost hovering over it?'

Tang gave a little sigh and answered quickly. 'But, master, my brother and I don't want to hover about our dead bodies all the time or round our graves and our coffins or the churchyard where they've laid us. We want to see a little more of the things we hadn't time to see in our short life. I'm still fifteen and my brother here is still seventeen. We want to see something of the world. That's why we're here. We're on our way to Venice to see the gondolas going up and down the canals. And we want to see Calais and perhaps Paris and maybe Florence on our way.'

At this point Wang broke in: 'Do please tell us, mister, how long a pile of things like those books and matches and cigarette-ends and pens and ink, have to wait, lying in their heap of confusion, before a ghost like you can be born of them?'

The ghost replied gravely: 'Your question, my dear boy, interests me greatly. But naturally enough I can no more answer it than a baby could answer if you asked it how long it had to stay in its mother's womb before it was born. I can only say my birth from that wretched heap of confusion was so quick that I had barely time to be conscious of my head and body and arms and legs before I was floating in the air and wondering whether with a swift rush I could pass through the window-pane and join with you two who were looking in at what was my birth-place or whether I would have to wait till you saw me and spoke to me.'

He had made his plunge and was with them outside the window to which they had all three now turned their backs. 'I wonder,' said Wang, 'whether you would care to accompany us on our trip to Venice by way of Paris and Florence? If you would, please tell us your name. None of us ghosts I know go in for surnames but it would be, I feel sure, best for us all to know each other's first name. Mine is Wang and this girl's is Tang. Do tell us what yours is.'

'My name,' said their new-born friend, 'is What-Not. I shall indeed esteem it a terrific honour to accompany you two upon your expedition.'

‘But Mr. What-Not,’ threw in Tang very wisely at this point, ‘this is clearly your surname. Do tell us, I won’t say your Christian name — for you may be a Moslem or a Buddhist or a Taoist — but your first name.’

The ghost of Mr. What-Not hesitated. It was clear to both Wang and Tang that he hesitated to confess to them his first name. They both wondered why. Wang thought it must be because it was a silly name, a boyish pet name, a name that could quickly become a comical appellation.

But Tang said to herself: ‘It’s because it’s a grand name and he’s afraid we’ll laugh at it and feel nervous of its effect upon the people and places we pass through.’

‘Tell us, anyhow, dear Mr. What-Not,’ she said coaxingly. ‘If it’s too strange and long we’ll shorten it so as to make it easier.’

‘Well it is rather long,’ said Mr. What-Not apprehensively. ‘But perhaps you won’t mind its length when I tell you its history and why they gave it to me.’

‘Did your mother give it you?’ enquired Wang. ‘Mothers are more concerned with names than Fathers.’

‘No I think it was my great-aunt Amelia who chose it,’ said Mr. What-Not. ‘My name is Savaractacus.’

‘O that’s a beautiful name!’ cried Tang enthusiastically. ‘On we go then, Savaractacus! Hurrah for our pilgrimage to Venice!’

Wang drew a deep breath. He didn’t feel as confident as Tang; but he did feel that things were moving in the right direction. ‘Come on then, my friends,’ he cried, ‘let’s cross the Channel!’

The three ghosts had no difficulty in following this impetuous advice. They soon were leaving Dover. They soon were over the sea. They soon were arriving quite calm but intensely strung up at the port of Calais.

‘Better have a drink at the Postern Café!’ cried Savaractacus. ‘It’s up this way! It’s at the top of these steps!’

Up the steps they went; and the brother and sister were mightily glad they had Mr. What-Not with them. He could talk French; and he chattered so gaily to every ghost in that little café that before they moved on a French ghost whose name was Rimpoperin asked to be allowed to join their party and was cordially welcomed by them all.

‘I suggest,’ said Rimpoperin to Mr. What-Not, ‘that we had better dodge Paris and fly straight to Florence. The weather looks a bit threatening; and in bad weather it’s better to be in Florence than in Paris.’

‘What do you two think?’ enquired Savaractacus politely, turning to Tang who turned at once to Wang.

It was clear that both the young ghosts preferred to get as far as they could if there was any risk of lightning, thunder, rain and hail. This at any rate was what Savaractacus gathered from the wordless colloquy he witnessed. The two young ghosts nodded; and they were all four led by Savaractacus, for in spite of Rimpoperin being a continental spirit it was plain that Mr. What-Not was the most dominant of the four. They flew at a sufficient height not to be caught by the attraction of the famous Scala in Milan and when they reached Florence they settled down for the night under the shelter of the Duomo where they found themselves surrounded by phantoms much more venerable than themselves from all the famous epochs of European history. Ghosts in Wales and England were in the habit of seeking some massive arch or broken wall or ruined chapel or palisade. But ghosts in Italy had other traditions, traditions that varied according to the part of Italy they haunted.

Here in Florence the oldest custom was for them to lie side by side closely gathered about some memorable monument whose historic ghost took the central place. There was quite a struggle between Rimpoperin and Savaractacus as to where they should plant their two young friends; but in the end they found a beautifully sheltered spot, not beneath any famous monument but where all the coldest winds were kept at bay by exquisitely carved stone-work. Here Wang and Tang lay in each other's arms with Rimpoperin on one side of them and Savaractacus on the other. Ghosts such as they all four were never impeded the movements of the living people who passed on their way among them. Such people were only conscious of a weird deepening of the poetical awe and historical reverence they were feeling, or were hoping to feel, from the pressure of the human story weighted by its particular associations with a particular spot.

CHAPTER II

BEFORE THEY SET off from Florence for Venice they had to be interviewed by the King of the Florentine ghosts. His name was Tarralalako and he made a lasting impression on all four of them. They were led before him, along with a few other wandering spirits, but it was to them he particularly appealed and it was they who felt that it was their special duty to show they appreciated his speech.

‘What all we ghosts,’ he told them, ‘must never forget is that we are a race of beings entirely different from all others on this earth. All other beings are destructible. We are indestructible. All other beings have national, racial, tribal, communal, local and domestic duties. We have none, always excepting what our local monarchs, like myself, are called upon by traditions as ancient as the sun and far older than the moon, to fulfil and sustain.’

By the time Tarralalako had reached that point in his speech his other hearers had moved away and he was left with no audience but our four friends.

‘What,’ he went on, ‘I would like to call to the attention of you, my dear lady’ — her companions could see that Tang was pleased at being singled out in this way— ‘and your three adherents, is that it’s safer, when you are a small group surrounded by an unknown crowd, to call each other by very simple and familiar names, if possible of one syllable. I know what noble names’ — and he looked at Rimpoperin and Savaractacus— ‘you two gentlemen have. But I feel sure it would help you to escape a great many dangers, if you agreed to call yourselves, and allowed Master Wang and Mistress Tang to call you, by some short familiar names.'

Not only Savaractacus and Rimpoperin but Tang and Wang looked at the King with startled interest.

'What would your Majesty,' enquired Rimpoperin, 'suggest that we called each other?'

'Well,' said Tarralalako decisively, 'I would suggest that you should be Pop and your friend Sock, and though there'll really be no need to shorten the names of your young companions I think that Wang and Tang would go very happily with Pop and Sock.'

'So shall it be!' cried Wang and Tang with exultation. 'And we also agree and will obey you to the letter,' said Savaractacus and Rimpoperin resolutely speaking with one voice.

It took our four friends Tang and Wang and Sock and Pop quite a while to get clear of the crowd of ghosts that hovered over the centre of Florence. Since for thousands of years people who had lived there all their lives and died there, and for many thousands of years been famous devotees of the place and war-like champions of the place, and had died so to speak in its arms, any ghost-watcher who happened to be wayfaring over Europe with the same sort of passion for ghosts as certain naturalists have for butterflies, would have felt the necessity of making a discreet circuit round the town lest he should from lack of knowledge jostle against a person who in his day had contributed something momentous to the history of civilisation.

As they extricated themselves from this ghostly crowd and fled away none of the three male spirits with her felt an emotion equal to what Tang felt. It was not that men have less heart than women but they are always inclined to let what they are doing at the moment drown what might be called the permanent palpitation of the mind's pulse to the drama of things.

Tang was the only one who kept turning back to glance at what they were leaving behind. She never afterwards forgot that sight. It was like a mountain of immortal body-shadows quivering as the leaves of a towering Elysian forest might quiver if subjected to an oceanic wind sweeping in upon them from leagues of sea-water. 'Historians might talk, Tang thought, of the mountains of skulls which murderous tyrant-kings might have piled up; but this actual sight of a mountain of ghosts flung there and left there by desperate lovers of that renowned spot was in the tragic intensity of its surging and swaying much more remarkable than any pile of skulls.'

It did not seem long to any of our four friends, Tang and Wang and Sock and Pop, before they were all strolling along through a pleasant little wood full of thick bushes and thin trees and plants and mosses and ferns and mushrooms and reeds and ivy-covered tree-stumps and coiling tree-roots that had suddenly decided to come up out of the ground and play at belonging to the air and the sun, a little wood that was on the banks of the Lido. Pop and Sock declared that it seemed to them impossible that such a nice simple ordinary wood, such as could so easily be found in Sussex or in Dorset, should be awaiting them by the banks of the Lido in Venice.

'Don't let's go back to that Square by St. Mark's!' cried Sock.

'Don't let's hang about that bloody Rialto any more!' cried Pop.

'I've had enough of our gondola-friend! I don't want another tea like that we had with his grand-mother!'

But it was then that Tang turned almost fiercely upon the three men. 'What's the good,' she cried, 'of coming all this way to Venice, which I've longed to see all my life, and then not liking a single spot there? It makes me feel as if we'd all gone mad! — No! I won't say that — as if I'd gone mad! Didn't we want to come to Venice above every other place in the world, and here we are, fed up with gondolas, sick of the Rialto, not wanting to stay for a moment any longer by the Lido! Hadn't we better go to the station and ask when the next train leaves for Rome? It's clear we don't want to spend the night here! How much was it, that that woman, when we went up a side street, was telling that man she charged for lodging in her basement? And didn't we hear her say: "I never had any wanderer like you in my upper floors"?'

It had clearly become necessary to have a serious and decisive discussion on what it was wisest for them to do; so the four ghosts sat down on a bench they found, left for some unknown reason in a place out of sight of everybody. 'Can people see at once that we're ghosts?' asked Sock. 'O yes, of course they can,' said Rimpoperin. 'Though we've got arms and legs and head and neck and hands and feet, we don't look like ordinary people. Our faces are white and ghastly. We look like the bodiless shadows we are. If we did go to Rome by a night train we should have to make sure there was an ordinary carriage where we could sit, opposite each other, by one of the windows.'

'But why,' enquired Pop, 'are things so much more difficult for us now that we're dead than when we were alive?'

'Because, don't you see, you old fool,' said Sock, 'nobody wants to see you when you are dead. Nobody wants to have anything to do with you when you're dead. Nobody wants to touch you or go near you.'

'But isn't that because they are afraid?' said Tang. 'Isn't it because there are so many stories in all the old books about us? Aren't we made, in these stories, to be much more terrifying than we really are?'

'That's why,' said Pop, 'we couldn't go to the ticket-office and ask for tickets to Rome, whether by the night-train or by any other train. The fellow in the office would have a fit if we presented ourselves before him. You see it's because only in battles and when ships go down at sea that people die in quantities at the same time. Generally, when a person's ghost comes out of him it's in a room in a house or a ward in a hospital.'

'Why hasn't it been accepted,' he went on, 'that when a person dies his ghost leaves his body? We never hear of that happening. Nobody has ever been observed ejecting his ghost after his last gasp. People use the expression: "He gave up the ghost." But nobody, as far as I know, has ever beheld a ghost come out of a man! I'd like to know just how it does come out. Does it detach itself from his whole body as he lies in his death-bed? Or does it slip craftily and slyly out of whatever part of him is most hidden under the bed-clothes and glide away out of the room and down the stairs while those with him, or with her, are watching the dead face?'

It was at this point that Pop brought forward a very important problem, a problem that has troubled the human race for millions of years, probably ever since its ancestors came out of the sea:

'What happens to us ghosts in the end? Most ordinary men talking about death with one another are in the habit of calling their ghosts their souls. With them the word "soul" is usually connected with the words "heaven" and "hell" and both of these words are connected with an omnipotent creator who is called "God." This "God" displays both the best and the worst characteristics of the human race. He displays profound love for those who blindly and obstinately love him and equally profound hatred for those who refuse to love him. The former he welcomes to an eternal paradise and over the latter he eternally gloats with delight as he sees them burning for ever and ever in unending flames. The human race has invented another being as a convenient opposite to this "God" of theirs. He—'

'O you mean the Devil!' cried Sock enthusiastically.

'Yes! He's a most exciting invention! He is supposed to have quarrelled with God in Heaven under the name of Lucifer and to have come rushing down to earth to upset all the ways and wishes of God as much as possible! I always wish him all the success he can get in upsetting the diabolical cruelties of God. But of course they are both Devils!'

'Yes I agree,' cried Tang earnestly. 'How wonderful if only we Saxons had had the wisdom to invent gods like Zeus and Poseidon and goddesses like white-armed Hera and Pallas Athene! How much more interesting those gods are than Odin and Thor and Freya! But if you don't mind,' and Tang looked hurriedly round at the faces of her three male companions, 'my coming back to an old topic. Do tell me if any of you know how, when, where, and under what conditions and imperatives we ghosts die? We surely must die, mustn't we, somehow, somewhere? It surely is impossible that we shall go on hovering about the earth forever? But of course the sun may burst into bits, or the moon fall down as she has done before, and we shall be annihilated along with the world we haunt. But if the sun doesn't burst, and if the moon doesn't fall down shall we have to go on living for ever and ever? Doesn't the idea of that' — and once more Tang gave a quick look into each of their three faces— 'give you the horrors? It certainly does me! Heavens and earth! I'm getting a bit tired already of this confounded hovering round historic buildings and places that have been held sacred for thousands of years! Is this all that we've got to do forever? The thought of it is perfectly awful to me. Isn't it to you? When a man or a woman is alive a tedious life can be ended by death, even if it is death by a person's own hand. Aren't we able to end our wretched ghost-life if we find it intolerably tedious?'

Tang finished by gazing steadily at first one and then the other of her three companions. She could see that below their shadowy whiteness or greyness there certainly could be seen the human outlines of the individual whose ghost each one was. And she thought to herself that it was this vague underlying identity, dressed in the clothes each of them generally wore that made the ghosts that people saw in haunted houses so easy always to particularise by their original name. ‘I saw,’ she imagined someone saying, ‘the ghost of so-and-so last night.’ Nobody, she thought to herself, ever saw a ghost without being able to identify it as the ghost of a particular person, even if such a person had been dead for a thousand years. By that time it would have become famous and the clothes it wore beneath its greyish-white shadows would have become well-known.

‘But the question I want answered,’ Tang thought to herself, ’is how we ghosts can die? Here we are, we four, sitting here on this bench together in this little wood near the Lido in Venice, and suppose we longed desperately to disappear for ever and ever, how would we be able to do it?’ Suddenly, to her great astonishment, her brother Wang spoke up.

‘I was dreaming my name was Rang but I want to be not Rang but as I am Wang. You see,’ he said, ‘I have a feeling that “double-you” as we earth-born folk call that letter is more suitable for a ghost than the running, rippling, rattling, rushing, rolling, rumbling sound of the letter we call “are.” You see all the “Double-you’s” in the English tongue are noiselessly on their way to something. They all wander like water. They are witchingly wistful. They are winsomely wanton. They wing their way to wonderland.’

And then it was as if his imaginary change from his dream name had given Wang a new energy. Up he sprang from the bench where they were sitting.

‘Come,’ he cried, ‘my precious three! Up to the gate of Heaven we will go! Up! Up! Up! Up!’

This exuberance was catching. They all three followed him; Tang first, and then Pop and Sock. They did actually go up and up and up and up and up. And finally they did reach the gate of Heaven. Here, boldly and unblushingly, Wang still full of the whipping whirl of his proper name banged with both fists till Saint Peter opened the gate.

‘We are four good ghosts,’ Wang said, ‘and we have come to visit Heaven.’

‘Come in,’ said Saint Peter, shutting the door behind them and ushering them into an arbour hung on all sides by great bunches of grapes. ‘Wait here for a while. You can sit down on that couch. It’s a soft couch. I use it myself. I will go now and interview God on your behalf. You had better all four pray while you wait. I have known visitors to whom I have had to show the nearest way from here to Hell.’

CHAPTER III

OUR FOUR FRIENDS had not been waiting very long in Saint Peter's pleasant grape arbour when they became aware of a terrific hullabaloo within the corridors of Heaven and very soon Saint Peter returned dragging after him no less a person than Saint Paul.

'But I tell you,' this latter was expostulating, 'God doesn't tell me everything! How am I to know whither He has gone?'

'But He is always in His Inner Sanctum at this hour of the day!' cried Saint Peter. 'You must, you must, you must know where He is! You are lying to me! Yes! I repeat it! You are lying to me, when you say you don't know where He is!'

'I tell you I don't know!' cried Saint Paul indignantly, shaking himself free from Saint Peter's grasp; 'and I'll tell you something that will astonish you still more. Do you know whom I've just seen hovering about our back door?'

'The back door of Heaven?' cried Saint Peter in dismay. 'Why, I've posted Saint John and Saint James to be on guard there and told them not to move till I've sent Saint Andrew and Saint Mark to take their place! I am very particular about our back door!'

'Goodness! You don't need to tell me that!' shouted Saint Paul. 'I've been waiting for years for tin opportunity of telling God that it would be a good thing if He closed our back door for ever! But you'll be surprised — and God will be surprised when I've found Him and told Him — when I tell you whom I saw hovering about out there just now!'

'For God's sake tell me!' murmured Saint Peter in a low shocked voice.

‘I saw the Devil himself! Yes! Old Satan! his very self!’

It was at this moment that to the complete bewilderment of, and indeed terror of our four friends, two other Saints, whom our friends later decided must have been Saint Matthew and Saint Luke, came into the grape arbour dragging a terrifying figure who cursed and swore in a manner none of them, not Sock or Pop or Wang or Tang, had ever heard before.

‘You’ve got the Devil then?’ cried Saint Paul.

‘You’ve caught old Satan then?’ cried Saint Peter.

But much more astonishing than the sight of the infernal person dragged into their presence were the words the creature uttered when our four friends beheld him shake off the hands of the Saints who held him and begin to make an absolutely inconceivable speech to everybody in the arbour.

‘Whither have you, slaves of God, and whither has your slave-dealing Master, carried off my home? Whither is it gone? What has become of it? What have you done with it? Have you destroyed it? Am I left homeless for ever?’

The six Saints soon found that there was no need for them to cling to the Devil any more. It was now clear to them as it had become clear to the four ghosts that what he wanted to do was to make a speech, a speech to them all. ‘What none of you understand,’ he said as the Saints stood around listening, and his voice reverberated through every corridor and corner of Heaven, ’is what I feel about the death of God: for it is now quite clear to everybody that this, and nothing less than this, is what has happened. God has died. Whether this happened to Him in space as He went to look for me in Hell or whether it happened to Him in His innermost Sanctum here I cannot tell. But the clear fact remains that God is no more. From now on there is no God. How His body vanished after His death is a question impossible for me to answer. I do not believe that my body would disappear. He must have arranged for that with His usual cleverness and managed things so that at the moment He died His body dissolved into space. Yes, that is how He must have managed it. It must have dissolved like mist into the whole expanse of space. But it was before God ceased to exist that the Hell He created for human beings who refused to believe in Him also ceased to exist. This Hell of His he made to be my dwelling-place the moment that in my proper form as Lucifer the Light Bringer I first defied Him. He was never as omnipotent as He loved to pretend to be; and though He flung me into His Hell which He had created so that He could gloat over the sufferings of His enemies to the end of time, He couldn't keep me there as He could keep the ghosts of men and women. But that is what makes me so lonely today. I have nowhere to go. I have no purpose in life. As long as the Hell he made for his enemies and for those who refused to believe He existed, remained I had a home; but now I've got no home. Hell was a very pleasant home for me. I used to spend my time explaining to the human beings who suffered there that they would not suffer there for ever. I explained to them that since the beginning of the Universe when I had my first quarrel with God, who, mind you, has always been a totally different being from the old Jewish Jehovah, that there had been prophets from the start who predicted that a time would come when both God and Hell would vanish away for ever. These words of mine were a great comfort to the ghosts in Hell who although they did not suffer as much as God wanted them to suffer went through a good deal, as you four sitting there, you three men-ghosts and one woman-ghost, can well imagine, but were greatly consoled by the words of the prophets about the end of God and the end of Hell which I quoted for them. Well, those prophetic words have come true; but with their truth has vanished my only home and my only purpose in life.'

'Well, fellow spirits in Heaven's grape arbour,' said Saint John, 'I think we'll all leave you now; for this mysterious vanishing of God has given us a great deal to do. We have to ransack our library of prophetic books and New Testament scrolls in case we have missed some words of warning. In the heathen days the gods of the pagans used sometimes to leave Olympus and go and visit what they called "the Blessed Ethiopians" and who knows but that Almighty God may have found our company tedious for him and longed to converse with blacks and redskins such as can be found in Africa. All this is made more probable by a startling and indeed a disturbing fact of which it is very likely that none of you have heard.'

Saint John paused for a moment, glancing at Matthew, Mark, and Luke with what both Wang and Tang, who were listening intently, took to be a rather defiant expression, and finished by adding, 'The fact is that Jesus Christ has been seen in Siberia and a rumour has spread throughout the whole of the Eastern Church that he came down from a dome in Constantinople where he wrought some miracle after His Ascension and told some Galilean who was living there and had been long expecting Him that he intended to visit every Prison and every Camp of Prisoners in the entire world so that when these prisoners died, even if they were executed, they would feel His presence comforting them at the end.'

'May I ask you, my lord,' enquired Wang, 'whether Jesus intends—'

'There are no lordings here,' replied Saint John sternly. 'Besides, I've got to do my share of the work among our Jewish scrolls; so I must bid you all farewell!' And with this he was off leaving the Devil astride on a block of wood between Pop and Sock and Wang and Tang.

‘So you’re a homeless wanderer now,’ said Wang to the Devil. ‘The best thing you can do is to join our little group of ghosts. Of course you’re anything but a ghost yourself. You’re more like a popular clown as far as I can see, but I have an instinct that you’d get on well with us and that we’d get on well with you.’

The Devil unhorsed himself from his block of wood and began acting the part of a revived corpse, tottering up and down the arbour in front of them, and every now and then pretending to try to eat a grape from one of the bunches that hung down.

‘Don’t make a bloody ass of yourself!’ cried Wang. ‘Come and sit down here with us and talk sense.’

The Devil did as he was told and sat down between Wang and Pop. He was evidently a little scared of Tang, a fact which had a certain interest for her, for she had many times wondered whether there wasn’t a hint in the biblical story of Adam and Eve of a certain understanding between the Woman and the serpent of Satan or Lucifer or Devil, quite apart from her tempting Adam with the fruit of the Forbidden Tree, that Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil.

‘The whole story,’ Tang told herself now as she sat between Wang and Sock, ’is indicative of a certain childish simplicity in the masculine nature opposed by a certain impatient subtlety in the feminine nature.’ The attraction and misunderstanding between the opposite sexes, she decided, was the whole terrain of the Devil’s activity. Lust and lechery and licentiousness in a man when directed towards a woman and played upon by the temptings and tantalisations and teasings of a woman create a Garden of Eden where it is impossible for a lion to lie down by a lamb; for the mere contrast between male and female as they struggle to live together in harmony exhales into the air the sort of indescribable atmosphere which contains both the dew of the morning and a vibration of suppressed thunder and lightning.

CHAPTER IV

THE FOUR GHOSTS had begun to grow a little sleepy in this grape arbour of an absent God, and the Devil, perceiving this, decided that it was important for him if he really wanted to link his lonely life with theirs to make them so attracted to him and so absorbed in the interest of his presence that it would be at their initiative rather than his that the first move towards their association would take place.

‘I must hypnotize them,’ he told himself, ‘into some desperate craving for my company; but how shall I do it?’

‘Have you realised,’ he began, sitting straight up on a high stool in front of the four and glancing from one to another with his dark, excited, piercing eyes, ‘that this world we tend to assume is the only one that exists, a world created by the God who now apparently has vanished for ever, a world dedicated to be a battlefield between Him and myself, or between what narrow-minded people call “good” and “evil,” have you realised, I ask you, that this existing world has very questionable foundations and very dubious limits and very ambiguous boundaries?’

‘I think I know what you mean, master Devil,’ said Tang, waking up from her trance and beginning to feel really interested.

‘Don’t you believe her, Devil,’ cried Wang. ‘A girl like her imagines she’s interested in everything new that comes her way, but she isn’t, really.’

‘Of course I’m interested in what the Devil says,’ Tang retorted eagerly, ‘especially as I’ve always had a secret suspicion that one day we’d all find that we had been inventing God just as the villagers visited by the Brothers Grimm in the heart of Germany invented fairy-tales for them in the endeavour to make life exciting and win a battle over the dullness, dullness, dullness, dullness of our daily life upon this earth—'

'Why, my child!' cried Pop, 'do you really mean to say that you think we invented God? Surely your parents would be horrified at such a profane thought!'

'I don't care what my parents or anybody else's parents would think!' cried Tang indignantly. 'The important thing is that with our human desire to be good we should have gone so far as to invent God, so as to have something super-good to worship. I tell you, my dear friends, it's our pathetic desire to have something more holy, more solemn, more sacred, more strange, more unfamiliar, more peculiar, more rare, than ourselves, before which we can bow and scrape, that has made us invent God; and now when we find that other human beings are bothered and teased and fed up with this confounded invention of ours, instead of honestly confessing our foolish obsession, what must we do but assume the preposterous position of a pontifical fanatic and act the pompous believer confronted by a profane rabble.'

It was at this point that the Devil became very serious; and straightening himself on his stool in front of the four ghosts he went on enlarging so eloquently on his theory of the limitation of our ordinary view of life that all four listened to every word he spoke with concentrated attention.

'My point is this,' he said. 'What we all do is just to take the world for granted as we have always seen it and felt it and known it. Now listen to me. What if the whole of this normal and natural view of things can be altered to something entirely different? Mind you, I'm not saying that our normal view is a false view that ought to be corrected and changed in any particular case. It may indeed be a view to which to the end of time it will be advisable now and again to return. What I am saying is that there almost certainly must be another Dimension perhaps more than one other. Now what do I mean by this word “Dimension?” Well, my dear four friends, the thing to do is ask ourselves what are the essential things about this world of ours that we see, hear, taste and feel around us that make it the world we know? Stop me if I am wrong: but aren’t they what we call height and breadth and depth, and what we call angles, and quadrangles, and spheroids and knobs and polarities, and the look of half-open doors, and slanting ceilings, and corners between two walls, and the protrusions of book-cases and cupboards? Is it not all the familiar bulgings and withdrawings of material forms and shapes that compose what we look at, whether we’re ghosts or devils or elves or animals, every day we awake from a night’s sleep? Well, now, my dear four friends, what should we feel if all this was swept away and in it’s place was substituted a new kind of world altogether? I don’t mean new in the sense of being on the moon or being nearer to the sun. I mean being surrounded by a completely different arrangement of the things we touch and see and hear and taste and feel; an arrangement so completely different that there would be no hills or valleys or skies or streets to look at, or windows to look out of, or floors beneath us, or ceilings above us. In this new Dimension we should be different ourselves! What should we have in place of our bodies, of our heads, of our arms and legs and hands and feet, of our eyes and ears and mouths and necks and bosoms and bellies and buttocks and elbows and knees and knuckles?

'Will you forgive me, master Devil, if I tell you and my friends here just exactly what I think of all this?' It was Sock speaking; and his words roused Pop.

'Our new friend here,' cried he, 'though he may call himself the Devil, is much nicer to us than God has ever been; and I can't help thinking—'

'Let me say what I was going to say,' protested Sock, 'and then you shall speak!'

Pop made a funny face at the others but he did keep his mouth shut for a minute or two, while the Devil looked more sympathetically at him than so far he had looked at anyone in the group. Then Sock went on:

'I don't believe a word of all this about Other Dimensions. I think "other dimensions" are the sort of invention that religious people make when they find that their invention of "God" has come to nothing. What I really think is—'

'Why do you bring in "religious people"?' shouted Pop. 'Because I hate them!' answered Sock. 'Why do I hate them do you ask? Because all religious people are humbugs, cowards, liars, hypocrites, cunning, conceited, treacherous rogues! There isn't one single really good, really honest, really unselfish, really kind, far less really inspired, religious person in our modern world! In old days of course it was quite different. But I am speaking of now: and now there's not one really honest religious person in the world. If Jesus came back from the dead to tell us what he felt, we know what he would say. "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees! Hypocrites!"

"Have you no answer to all this?' enquired Wang of his sister Tang.

'I have one, a tremendous answer, my dear, an answer that applies to our whole debate in this grape arbour of Heaven; but as it is rather a personal answer I feel a certain amount of hesitation in bringing it forward.'

'Out with it,' cried her brother Wang.

'Out with it,' cried Pop.

'Out with it, Lady of ladies!' cried the Devil. 'I know well the reason you have to be shy of speaking; the best of all possible reasons! Simple because you're a woman, and the Bible says that it was a woman — tempted of course by me in the first place — who persuaded Adam to eat the fruit of the Forbidden Tree. Why was that fruit forbidden? Once more the answer is simple. Simply because it gave Man the right to be like God knowing the difference between Good and Evil. And I beg you, Lady, to believe me when I say that there was once a great mound outside the city of Troy before which every man who passed ought to have bowed low! Why? Because it was, and I expect it still is, the grave of the Queen of the Amazons! When the Amazons ruled the world there were no bloody wars, no slaves, no concentration camps, no gas-chambers, no inquisitions, no castles of blue-bearded Gilles de Retzes! I tell you,' went on the Devil, his voice growing more and more serious as he proceeded, 'there is wisdom in women that renders what men love to call a "Matriarchal Government" the best possible government that the world can have. What makes men like to use the word "matriarchal" is indeed simple enough. It is because deep in their hearts the wisest men are still like children. If you consider the oracular sayings of the wisest men who have ever lived, men like Abraham and Moses and Socrates and Spinoza, and Kant and Newton and Goethe and Nietzsche, you will not fail to find that their deepest utterances have an abysmal childishness in them as if a baby were philosophising. I could give you examples all the way down the line. How did Isaac Newton discover the law of gravitation? By watching apples tumble down. How did Kant discover a man's conscience? By calling it a categorical imperative! How did Goethe explain to us how to live? By using the words: "Im ganzen résolut zu leben"— "resolve to live in the whole bloody business".'

As soon as the Devil had relaxed and sunk down a little on the stool from which he had been lecturing them, Wang turned to his sister. 'Tell us now, Tang my dear, what you had in your mind to say. Was it on the same lines as the speech we have just heard?' Tang hesitated a moment. Then she 'spoke out loud and bold,' as Chapman's Homer did in the ears of the youthful Keats.

'No!' she said, 'not exactly on those lines. But I value what our Devil-Friend has just said; and I think there is a great deal in it. But what I was going to say is this. I think it is a great mistake for men to do women's work, however well they can do it, even if they can do it better than women; and I think it is a great mistake for women to do men's work even if they, in their turn, can do it better than the men can. I think very strongly that women should entertain visitors, keep the house clean and tidy, if possible find other women to help them in this, do the cooking, and here also, find if they can, some expert woman to help them, take great trouble with their clothes and personal adornment, learn to excel in the art of arranging, managing, dominating every kind of party, from elaborate dances to ceremonial dinners. In other words I think that the more a woman takes complete command and control of everything in a home between floor and ceiling, from babies in cradles to invalids in wheelchairs, the better it is for everyone concerned. What people ought to realise is that the important moments of human life are, as the poet says, "our long, long thoughts" when we are day-dreaming. I tell you the secret of all human life lies in day-dreaming! Yes, the secret of the universe is not in men fighting and labouring nor in women cooking and dressing-up. It is in men's day-dreams and women's day-dreams. As the poet says "we are such stuff as dreams are made on” but these dreams are not the dreams of night. No! they are not happy night-dreams or terrible nightmares; they are day-dreams! If I wanted to paint a picture that contained the innermost secret of human life shall I tell you what it would be? It would be a picture of two lovers seated side by side in a pensive mood, seated on a sofa by a fire, or on a bank of pebbles by the sea, each of them looking away from the other and each of them lost in a daydream. I would make their expressions faintly wistful and just tinged with the dreamy sadness of long ago and I would so arrange the lethargy of their limbs and the laxity of their arms that everything about them would indicate a languorous and oblivious descent into the limpid lap of our Lady of Lethe.’

Wang clapped his hands when his sister had finished and looked round with the evident conviction that Pop and Sock and the Devil would follow with excited applause. But instead of this a deep silence fell upon them. ‘I think,’ said Tang to herself, ‘that this silence proves I am right. Wang only clapped to set the others off and to please me. But this deathly silence pleases me better than any applause. Yes, I think I’ve got it. We mortals, and perhaps the Devil too, are as honest as rocks and stones and trees when it comes to certain feelings and this withdrawal from the whole subject into silence proves I was right. Silence, as the nursery proverb says, “gives consent”.’ But before this consenting silence, or, as Sock and Pop thought in their hearts, this ominous silence, came to an end, a wild and desperate idea took possession of Tang.

‘I should simply argue with them here without end,’ she said to herself. ‘But if I went down to where Hell used to be I expect I should find some of the wisest women that ever lived hovering about and I might make friends with them and never feel lonely in this awful world again.’

But she felt unwilling to leave Wang. So she went up to him.

‘Come out of this place for a minute Wang, if you don’t mind. I want to tell you something.’

Seeing how serious she was, Wang let her lead him out of that grape arbour into the interior chamber behind it where Matthew, Mark, Luke and John were having a glass of wine.

‘Shall we find,’ the ghost-girl asked them, ‘a place where my brother and I can talk alone if we go down this passage?’

‘Certainly, my dears,’ said Matthew.

‘Go up the stairs,’ said Mark.

‘Open the door to the right,’ said Luke.

‘Then go down the corridor to the left,’ said John.

Tang, holding Wang’s hand, led him after her in obedience to these instructions, but she found the corridor interminable, without turn or end, and growing darker the further they went. But suddenly they heard the sound of people pursuing them at a run. They stopped and waited; and there, to their immense relief, was the Devil, closely followed by Pop and Sock.

‘Thank the Lord!’ cried Wang.

‘No need to thank Him,’ chuckled the Devil. ‘He’s out of it for good and all. Do, my dears, for the sake of every creature still alive, get this God-Monster of yours out of your heads once and for all! I tell you He doesn’t exist, as Jesus found out when they were crucifying him.’

‘Whither does this damned corridor lead?’ enquired Wang.

‘It leads to Hell,’ answered the Devil. ‘I mean eventually it does, as every other path out of Heaven. But I can take you a shorter way; and I’m glad to do it as I want to go there myself.’

‘Take us then!’ cried Wang. ‘And, O, I’m so thankful you came after us!’

‘Follow me then,’ said the Devil; and he stepped to the side of the corridor or passage which had become a good deal narrower since they started to follow it, and thumped with his fists against the wall. ‘It’s made of brass,’ he told them, when they heard reverberating echoes of a definite metallic nature.

He counted aloud each blow he delivered upon this resounding wall of brass. ‘One, two, three, four, five, six, seven,’ he cried. And sure enough at the utterance of the word ‘seven’ the brazen barrier opened as if he had touched the spring of the lid of a metal box.

‘Put your head out,’ he said to Wang. Wang obeyed him at once.

‘Why, I can see Orion’s Belt quite near! You have started us on the right track!

“Matthew, Mark, Luke and John!
Not yours the bed that I’ll lie on!”

If we all clamber out of this heavenly port-hole, have you the power, master Devil, to carry us all four down to Hell? We all long to go there, for my hatred of God is always increased when I think of His gloating over His enemies in the flames and whispering in their ears that now they must believe in Him since He’d got them where those who refused to believe in Him belong.

‘Shall I be able,’ enquired Tang, as she followed the other three into a dark air-vessel which the Devil had conjured up, ‘to see my favourite of all poets down there? I speak of the poet Cowper whom God especially loved to torment because He found him so nervous and timid and highly-strung!’

‘You won’t see Dante,’ said the Devil, ‘for he defied God in the end, and you won’t see Milton, for he would have liked to make Lucifer his torch-bearer. But you may see Cardinal Wolsey.’

CHAPTER V

As long as they were in existence Wang and Tang and Sock and Pop never forgot the impressions that Hell made on them when they finally reached it and climbed out of the air-vessel in which the Devil had brought them down. They found themselves on a pavement of black marble that stretched for an indefinable distance in every direction. There was no sign of any human or of any super-human creature there. Save for this black marble floor which stretched indefinitely in every direction, there was nothing to see, nothing to hear, nothing to feel.

‘What did you say?’ enquired Wang of the Devil.

‘I only said,’ was the carefully considered reply, ‘that there is a vast hollow dome above our heads; but it is far too enormous for us to see any sign of it.’

‘But are there no ghosts here?’ asked Wang in a peevish and fretful voice. He could see it was annoying to the Devil to be compelled to confess complete ignorance as to the nature of this invisible dome about their heads and he found it irritating that the Devil, who had brought them down there to his former home, could tell them nothing about it.

‘Ghosts like you four? O no! Not that I know of. You must remember that the souls of the dead whom the Christian Three-in One-God delighted in tormenting and most of all in making them believe that their torment would go on for ever and ever and ever and ever and ever, were quite different from your four ghosts. Why they were so different you ought to know better than I. But I can tell you this about them: they were much nearer, both in their inner feelings and in their outer appearance, to what living men and women are, than you four. You four, I admit, do carry beneath your shadowiness a faint appearance of the man or woman or girl or boy dressed in their customary dress such as you were before these solid entities perished for ever; but their feelings, their capacity for pleasure and pain exist no more in you. You four are purely and simply appearances, apparitions, phantoms. If your Three-in-One-God, that inventor of torment and delighter in torment, came back to life, and re-created the flames of his Hell to torture people's souls, He would not be able to do it with you four. You would pass through his flames with absolute impunity. You would be able to whisper to God's victims that God would Himself eventually perish, and that along with Him, Hell would pass forever away. You would not be able to tell them what would become of them when God and Hell vanished, but you would be able to tell them with finality that there could be no more Hell for them now that God the Hell-Maker was gone for good. My own opinion is that they would be re-incarnated and start another human life from its beginning as babes. Whether that's the truth I do not know and how they would take it I do not know; but that is my own private opinion.'

As may easily be imagined it was not long before Wang and Tang, leaving Pop and Sock to listen to the lively talk of the Devil as he told of his first association with God and with Hell, went strolling off by themselves over the marble floor of this forsaken palace of what had been regarded for so long as the final Court of Separation with regard to the mystery of good and evil.

'I've got a grand new idea for us,' said Tang, 'but it will want some discussion and I can't wait to hear what you'll say when I've told you.'

'Out with it,' said Wang, his whole face lighting up as it always did when his sister revealed to him one of her newest and most daring schemes.

‘Well,’ she said, ‘I have been thinking about this Christian God, invented by Saint Paul, and I tell you, Wang, that it was purely the diabolical cruelty of this God of ours whom Saint Paul must have already been inventing when he spoke with such gloating delight of the martyrdom of Saint Stephen, holding their clothes for his killers and telling them just where they could hurt him the most. Yes, it was Saint Paul who made all that fuss about God being love and lovingness when he must have been explaining to the pagans in one subtle argument after another how closely torment and love were connected together. When the ghost of Jesus met him on the way to Damascus and cried “Paul, Paul, why persecutest thou me?” he ought to have replied: “Because, Lord, I know that love and torment go together and I who love to torment also love to love just as our God does, as you found out on the Cross”.’

Wang gazed at his sister with a little less enthusiasm than he had shown at first. ‘I pray,’ he thought, ‘that she isn’t going to suggest that I am to act Saul or David or Samuel while she acts the Witch of Endor.’

‘Well, brother,’ she said. ‘Now I’ll tell you what I’ve thought of.’

Wang stood still on the marble pavement, and she swung round and faced him. The voices of Pop and Sock and the Devil still reached them but only very faintly. They had become voices that went gently up in waves of soft smoke swirling round the unseen hollows of that huge invisible Dome.

‘Why shouldn’t you and I,’ she said quietly, ‘play at being an absolutely new kind of Deity. God is dead. Hell is dead. The Devil has become a nice, friendly person; and you and I are free to do what we like. So let us, Wang my dear, O! do let us play at being an altogether new kind of Deity!’

‘O you darling girl!’ he cried. ‘You have indeed thought of something!’ And Wang hugged her to his heart and kissed her passionately on the forehead.

‘Well, this is what I’ve thought of. You and I might be a man-and-woman God. I mean we might be One Being with two personalities. We might always cling so close to each other that we’d be like a god with two heads and two faces and four arms but with only one trunk. Yes! only one body. For those who arrange their lives by the signs of the Zodiac, Gemini, the Twins, will be our sign, but we shall differ in a way from that in as much as we shall offer the appearance of one body with two heads. And we must invent a new name for ourselves. What name would you suggest, Wang?’

All he replied to that was to gaze enquiringly at her. She paused for a moment. Then she said, ‘It’s getting a bit dark down here! I don’t know whether this is evening or morning in Hell, but I think it would be a good moment to light the torch the Devil gave us.’

Wang had kept this torch in his hand and had been using it as a duster to switch away any dirt from his clothes, but he now put his hand into his shadow of a pocket and brought out a very real box of matches. The lighting of that torch they both of them remembered as long as they remembered anything. By its light they not only saw each other’s face with startling clarity but for the first time they now saw something of the terrific dome above their heads.

‘Don’t you think,’ the girl said, ‘we might call ourselves Twang? Twang would include both our names and it would also suggest the sound of the bow with which we could shoot a deadly arrow. How could we get a bow and some arrows, Wang? That is a serious point; for if we really are to be the great God Twang it will be extremely important that when we shoot an arrow it will go to the end of the earth.’

‘I know a shop in Regent Street where they might sell bows and arrows,’ cried Wang.

‘Let’s go there at once!’ cried Tang.

They decided, however, that it was their duty to announce their new personality, that of a Two-in-One Divinity, to their fellow ghosts Pop and Sock before they set off to London and Regent Street to buy a bow and arrows. But this turned out to be a much more agitating announcement to their friends than they had expected.

‘But we are all the same,’ cried Pop indignantly. ‘You two aren’t a shade superior to us. Why, in the name of the first of all ghosts, who must have been Adam, have Sock and I got to treat you as if you were God; I mean like the God who has now vanished from the scene?’

‘Yes,’ cried Sock, ‘I call it monstrous! What impudence, what impertinence, what bloody treachery for you two, just because you happen to have been brother and sister in your life-time, to take on yourselves to be a two-fold Deity in your ghost-life, and reduce us, who in our life-time were far above you in rank, to the position of inferiors, nay! I might even say of attendants — unless you have decided to desert us altogether — which I daresay you have decided to do!’

Tang looked anxiously at her brother-ghost. She noticed in a second that he was on the near edge of rushing upon Sock and hitting him furiously in the face with his torch. All the shrewdness of her woman’s nature surged at once into a rush of wisdom.

‘Let us all fly to London together,’ she said in a gentle though by no means imploring voice, ‘and go to a shop in Regent Street where Wang says they keep bows and arrows and other mediaeval weapons. If he buys a bow, I’d rather like to buy one of those old-fashioned spears that they used to use in tournaments and I daresay you’d like to buy a helmet with a plume or a shield with a wonderful heraldic coat of arms.’

Wang’s face did relax a bit; but O how thankful Tang was when suddenly she became aware that the Devil was among them. She knew in a moment that a quarrel had arisen among them; and it was in answer to his enquiring look that she hurriedly said to him: ‘We’ve been disputing about a crazy idea that came into my head just now that Wang and I should cling to one another till we looked like some Deity of the old days who had two heads, one masculine and one feminine. And then I said we’d call this Two-headed one Twang, only we must arm it with a bow and arrows and Wang said he knew a shop in London where they sold such things. So I suggested that all four of us should fly at once to this shop where no doubt spears and helmets and all sorts of old-fashioned weapons are to be bought. Please fly down, or up, or whichever way it is with us to London, master Devil. I’ve got quite a good deal of money in my purse — look into it, master Devil, and see; and if you’ll go with us master Devil I’ll buy you something too, any wonderful thing to wear on your head that you like to choose. And then perhaps you’ll come with us and visit Rome and Athens. I’ll buy you a disguise if you don’t want to be recognised, so that you may be taken for King Minos or even Pluto.’

‘I think I should like to come with you,’ responded the Devil in his most genial voice. ‘Will that be agreeable to you two gentlemen?’ And he turned with something almost wistful and pleading in his manner to Sock and Pop.

‘Of course,’ said Sock.

‘Certainly,’ said Pop, ‘but do keep an eye on our brother and sister! They’ve got some mad idea about pretending to be a Two-headed Deity with the name of Twang who has a terrific bow with arrows that make a world-shaking twang when they are shot from the bow.’

‘I’ll keep an eye on them all right,’ replied the Devil, ‘I’m far too fond of them to let anything bad happen to either of them; or to you two either.’

Both Sock and Pop were indeed in a very good mood, thanks to the wisdom of the Devil, when they all five, if the God Twang can be counted as two persons in One God, left for that shop in Regent Street.

‘Where I’d like to go now,’ cried Tang eagerly, ’is to Jerusalem! I’ve always wanted to see the temple of Solomon and I’d give half my soul, if I could keep the other half, to meet the ghost of Solomon!’

Sock and Pop looked at each other and gave a mutual groan.

‘You’ll be wanting to see Julius Caesar next!’ cried Pop.

‘Or Alexander the Great!’ cried Sock.

‘I have a sort of vague hope,’ gasped Tang hesitatingly, ‘that I might meet Cleopatra!’

At this there was a laugh in which even Wang joined.

‘Do you think you’d meet a woman like that,’ cried Pop, ‘in the Temple of Solomon!’

‘Well, in the adjoining palace perhaps,’ murmured Tang; ‘I don’t see why not. Solomon got on well with the Queen of Sheba; and I don’t see why he shouldn’t get on with Cleopatra. Antony did, you know, and I’ve always admired Cleopatra and imagined her turning the heads of all the wisest men of antiquity. Don’t you think Pericles would have adored her and Pythagoras would have felt that if she had let him embrace her he could have made her the mother of a dynasty of classic Arch-Druids?’

CHAPTER VI

It certainly was a moment of intense excitement to all of them, including the Devil, when they entered Solomon's temple or the grand edifice that had been erected on its site to carry on to posterity its unequalled traditions.

'How do you like your new helmet?' Tang asked the Devil, for they had all subscribed to buy for their friend a very ancient mediaeval head-piece with huge black stag-horns that certainly gave their Mephistopheles the look of a regular fairytale fiend.

'You can see how well it suits me,' replied the Devil, 'by the way all these people keep staring. Wasn't this great portico the very place where Jesus lashed out with his whip — I suppose the whip he'd used for the ass's colt on which he rode into the city — at these salesmen here?'

'You can bet your life,' cried Wang, 'that this is the exact place; and these old sellers with their trays and counters are a perfect replica of what so annoyed the saviour of the world.'

'Let's pretend now,' cried Wang to Tang, clasping her round the waist and holding her body as close to him as he could. 'Keep your head as close to mine, love, as you can but look in another direction.'

The Devil chuckled and, looking round at the sweet-sellers and toy-sellers and fruit-sellers and at the crowd jostling past them, he suddenly cried out in a solemn, majestic and extremely official voice: 'Make way for the Persian God, The Babylonian God, The Assyrian God, the Two-Headed Ethiopian God, the great God Twang! Male and Female is the great God Twang, and those lonely men who have no woman, and those lonely women who have no man, let them hear the word of the great God Twang who will tell them how to earn the right to be joined to a man or to be joined to a woman for their heavenly satisfaction as long as they live and after their death as long as their ghosts can walk about the streets!'

So powerfully and so officially did the Devil's voice ring out that there did happen quite a sensation both in the crowd of sellers and the crowd of buyers. Wang and Tang marched ahead clinging tightly to each other but looking in different ways. The Devil in his homed helmet followed and after them strode in quite as stately a manner Sock and Pop. Then all in a moment everything was changed, everything was broken up. Out of the palace, walking straight to their little procession of ghosts came a terrific ghost, a Royal ghost, the ghost in fact of none other than King Solomon himself.

'Clear out of this!' he called sternly, stentoriously, authoritatively. 'I tell you clear out of this! Here is only one God, one King, one temple, one throne, one altar! Clear out of this you rabble of foreign ghosts! Clear out, I tell you, or else, or else, or else!'

Led by the Devil in his stag-horn helmet, followed by Tang and Wang holding each other's hands and by Pop and Sock, flying at top speed side by side, all five of them fled through the porch, through the street, through the air, and up and out over the walls of Jerusalem. And then it was, when they were all out in the upper air that Tang said to them: 'Wang and I will hold on tight to our bow and arrows. I will hold the bow and Wang will hold the arrows. But neither of us is wise enough to decide at once whither we had best betake ourselves. Have either of you,' and she turned to Sock and Pop and the Devil, 'an inspiration whither it would be good for us to go?'

There was a moment's deep silence as they hovered, all five of them, above the walls of Jerusalem. Then with a sigh so heavy that it caused the very horns to sway to and fro on his head, the Devil announced to them his decision.

‘I would like,’ he said, ‘to go down to Hades, to the classical Hell, to Erebus, to Tartarus! I always have wanted to go there but I have never had the chance. There we may find Persephone who was carried off by Hades, the King of the underworld, unless her mother Demeter has managed to bring her back to earth. Our chief danger may be the terrible dog Cerberus who they say guards the entrance, but I am fairly skilled in the art of propitiating fierce dogs and I’ve kept in my pocket for thousands of years a particular kind of drug that throws such creatures into a trance, and that attracts them so much that they cannot resist devouring it. What do you say, my friends, to this idea? Of course, what we really want to help us penetrate Tartarus is somebody like Nostrodamus or Paracelsus who understands drugs and potions and who would be able to advise us how to deal with this confounded dog Cerberus; but it’s quite possible that my secret drug used for so many thousands of years will settle him. What do you say, Tang? You, being a woman are by nature wiser than the rest of us. Would you be interested in visiting Tartarus? If Persephone is still the Queen down there you might make great friends with her. She may have not longed to be independent of her mother Demeter and not at all wanted to be rescued from Hades! But the point is, you see, my dears, conditions and personalities may both have changed a lot in the five or six thousand years, or perhaps I should say the ten thousand years, since Homer and Hesiod disputed about all history and all poetry. Didn’t one of them say to the other, “What would you wish for most if you got whatever you wanted?” And didn’t the other answer, “I’d wish never to have been born at all; and if I had to be born, I’d wish that when I was dead I would never be born again”?’

Tang spoke up at once: ‘O do let’s go down to Tartarus! I’d love to meet Persephone or Persephoneia down there. I think it is very likely she didn’t go back to her mother Demeter. Anyway, if we didn’t meet her, we might meet a whole lot of exciting people. And I’d like to see one of those awful monsters. I’d like to see Typhoeus! I’d like to see Echidna, the mother of Cerberus!’

‘The great thing would be,’ said Wang, ‘if we could find anybody who had been down there recently and would know how to deal with Cerberus or any other monster, and how to propitiate the dark King, and how to get a word with Persephone. But where is such a person? Where can he or she be found?’

It was at that moment that Sock and Pop lifted their heads with mutual elation. They had been whispering together more eagerly than usual while the Devil was giving them all his rather lengthy oration. And now with a hint from Pop that he was to be the speaker Sock cried out: ‘I’ve read about it in Homer! Yes! I’ve read about it! And we have got now the very same messenger that they had in Homer’s time. Yes! We have got her now, very now!’

‘What are you talking about?’ asked the Devil.

‘What has come into your head, Sock?’ asked Tang.

‘There’s no Homeric being,’ said Wang, ‘except Gaia the earth and Helios the sun, and Selene the moon, or the planets Mars and Venus, that we can call upon today about any subject with which Homer’s concerned! What on earth are you two—’ and Wang looked contemptuously at Sock and Pop— ‘suggesting? Do you think people like postmen or telegraph officials can behave today like poor Patroklus and run messages to ask old gents like Nestor whether he’d got a doctor in his car?’

Sock and Pop chuckled for a second. Then Sock said gravely and earnestly. ‘Yes, you’ve all forgotten Iris the rainbow. If we could get her here in her human form but able to function in her elemental form, we’d have just the person we want! But how can we get her?’

Their conversation was suddenly interrupted by a lovely celestial-looking girl who burst in upon them in rainbow attire and, with the magical suddenness of rain and light through clouds and water, addressed them in a shrill ringing voice: ‘I heard you! I heard you! I heard you! I always think there’s somebody who wants a swift and intelligent messenger when I see a group of people gathered together like you are! And now I’m among you I see that I was quite right! O how thankful I am that you are ghosts! Ghosts are the only mortals I feel at home with. Your friend with horns here isn’t a ghost. I can see that. But he’s one of your party and like myself without having the supernatural motion of a ghost he’s got some supernatural power that enables him to rush through the air as fast as I can who am certainly not a ghost! Well, my friends, I’m a terrible eavesdropper when my interest’s aroused and I’ve heard enough to know that you want someone such as I am to go down to Tartarus and convey to King Hades that you are anxious to pay him a visit and show him how modern science has discovered so many things he has long wanted to know about: good and evil and weakness and power and consciousness and unconsciousness. I shall have to explain to him the difference between the ordinary souls of the dead among whom he has lived so long and persons like yourselves who are a completely different class of persons from the souls of the dead. Do just tell me, my dears, before I go off on your behalf, though I expect you’ll find me there when you get there, something else I could tell King Hades about you that you think might arrest his attention.’

‘O yes, Lady Iris!’ cried Tang excitedly, ‘I’ll tell you one very important thing. Some of us don’t know how we appear. We are not, you must tell him, all of us the ghosts of particular people in the way all souls are the souls of particular people. Some of us are born as we are, emerge as we are, out of things that are not persons at all! Listen Iris! Listen precious rainbow! Imagine the littered confusion of a floor where children have been playing at trains and houses and kitchen-gardens and croquet-lawns and Blue-Beards and Jacks-in-the-Box, and Mother Hubbards and Aladdin’s Towers! Well, imagine this litter of toys and images and play-things all piled up in a heap together on the floor; and then imagine yourself entering the room and gazing at this medley, yes! staring in shocked amazement at this motly pile. Wouldn’t it seem natural to you if, as you watched, a ghost slowly emerged, or perhaps a couple of ghosts? Would it not seem natural to you that out of that particular confusion, every smallest particle of which had sucked into itself the long, long thoughts of a little boy or girl there should steal forth, waveringly and wistfully, some sort of bewitched wind-on-the-water-wanderer, male or female as it might happen, whose origin was an infantile Erebus at the bottom of a babyish chaos?’

‘I’ll tell him! I’ll tell him! You’ve got the right messenger in me! I’ll wait with him till you come so that, if he doesn’t understand, I’ll make him understand! For I have understood perfectly!’

CHAPTER VII

‘SHE MUST BE deep within,’ Wang declared when their arrival at the gate of Erebus was confronted by the growls of Cerberus, whose savage appearance made them all five stand in dismay. The Devil gave his helmet a twist on his head so that one of its horns should point direct at the growling Cerberus towards whom he solemnly bowed. Before long, to their astonishment, Cerberus pushed his way between the two vast adamantine gates that turned Erebus into the prison-house of the Ultimate Abyss. The gates shut with a terrible reverberation behind him. None of the five visitors, not even the Devil with his iron horns, nor Wang with his great bow, nor Tang with her quiver of arrows dared to try to follow him.

Outside Erebus they remained, just as they had remained outside while Cerberus was there: but suddenly the great doors swung open and the long black tail of a terrible serpent presented itself before them. In intense fear and lively horror they all, including the Devil, drew back while the coal-black hideously-spotted tail wriggled out in ever-increasing swirling curves. Then to their blank astonishment the head of the thing emerged and lo! it was a beautiful girl’s head, with merry, laughing, mischievous blue eyes and a lovely tangle of fair golden hair!

‘Come in, my dears, come in! I am Echidna; and this stupid old quarrelsome dog Cerberus is my own child. If you could see my other child, the Hydra, you’d be much more alarmed. It’s funny, isn’t it, that I who am really a well-meaning and by no means bad-looking girl, should have been given by nature a serpent’s tail and should have had such unappealing children as Cerberus and the Hydra and such a grand-child as the Chimaera, but we have got to accept what life brings us, haven't we? And as I often say to King Hades, it would have been much worse for him if I'd been a bustling, hustling sort of mate. As it is I can go my way; and Hades or Pluto, as some of his subjects down here call him, can go his way. That makes a much happier marriage — doesn't it, doesn't it? — than the sort of marriage Olympian Zeus had with Metis who was so much cleverer than he was that to keep his position as ruler of all the Olympians he had to swallow her! And what was the result of that? Did that stop her from having dangerous children? Not a bit of it! While in his belly she was delivered of Pallas Athene who forced herself up, up, up, through his whole body till she broke her way out through the top of his paternal skull! And as if that wasn't enough she soon became the girl-friend of his wife Hera who was also his sister and he often as a result of this had to feel that by the way those two goddesses went about together his own prestige as King of the Gods was perceptibly reduced.'

But it was only after Echidna had vanished, calling her offspring Cerberus to follow her into the dark dwelling, that our four ghosts and their companion the Devil realised that they had now to face a far more terrific being than the mother of Cerberus and the Hydra and the grand-mother of the Chimaera.

This monster was none other than Typhoeus whose father was Erebus and who very nearly had proved more than a match for Zeus himself. Indeed it had been a narrow shave which of those two would win; and there were many prophets who held the view that Typhoeus was destined to rule the Universe. But Zeus overcame him by striking with lightning every one of his numerous heads; so that all that was left of him was his hissing, thundering, fire-breathing, rumbling and grumbling volcanic body. But so merged in both Erebus and Tartarus, those two half-animate and half-inanimate abysses of cosmic filtration, those two bottomless swamps of elemental concatenation, those two coagulating world-troughs of the possible and the impossible, had Typhoeus been, that it seemed to our four friends and also to their accomplice the Devil that there was nothing to be done but retreat altogether from the house of His Majesty the Plutonian Hades.

But no sooner had they made a hesitant gesture of retirement than a clear, articulate, vigorous, feminine voice rang out, and behold! there was Persephone herself! ‘Don’t be frightened, my dears!’ she said. ‘My mother, Demeter, hasn’t bidden you to come, has she? They sent word to me she was dead. But I’ve lost all faith in what people say who come from the outer world. You four look different from any people I’ve ever seen. You, of course,’ and she nodded familiarly to the Devil, ‘I’ve already met before, more than once. But what kind of persons are you four? Please tell me all about yourselves so that I can explain to King Hades; for he is a little disturbed at your arrival, which, as you can hear, has set our old Typhoeus off into one of his worst volcanic fits.’

‘No, my dear lady,’ Tang answered very gently and sweetly — and they could all clearly see that the tone of her voice made a very good impression — ‘we are what in our part of the outer world we call ghosts. That is to say we are not the souls of dead people nor yet are we people still alive in the ordinary human sense. We are half-dead and half-alive. We can behave in many ways like the souls of the dead; but we can also behave in many ways as if we’d never died. But we have died and shall never live again a natural human life. I’m glad you know the Devil because he’s been of late a very good friend to us. But he of course is a supernatural being like King Hades himself whom we beg and implore you to allow us to visit. O no! your mother Demeter, of whom we have often heard has never appeared to us.

You know better than we do what has happened to her, but speaking respectfully, dear lady, I myself would certainly say she was dead.'

'Come in, my children,' Persephone said gently. 'You shall rest in the portico-hall while I go to tell King Hades about you. No! You stop your growling and hissing, Typhoeus! Go down to Erebus and tell him and Tartarus also what you've heard this young lady say. Tell them both that I am going to take them in to see the King. But not until I've told him what they've told me.'

Typhoeus obeyed her and led the way into the dark house, into the interior of which he soon vanished. Persephone escorted them in, after he was gone, and left them comfortably seated in the portico-hall while she went to tell her tale to King Hades.

Wang and Tang and Pop and Sock looked round them with intense interest while the Devil, with a good deal of pride, assumed the role of director of the company and made a series of explanatory speeches in front of a number of very impressive statues that surrounded this waiting-chamber. Wang couldn't help remembering their similar pause in the waiting room of Heaven, where the four Gospel-men behaved so politely; and where the Devil could only hover round the back-door. But the statues in this waiting room of Hades were really wonderful to see. There was one of Erebus. There was one of Tartarus. There was one of Circe. There was one of Demeter. There was one of Cronos. There was one of Hera. There was one of Pallas Athene. There was one of Metis. And the best of them all was one of the wily Odysseus. Wang and Tang were amazed to see the statue of Odysseus. It seemed to possess in the heart of it, in the head of it, in the expression of it, and above all in something that it must have created in the atmosphere that surrounded it, the very essence of Homer's poetry, especially the poetry of the Iliad. 'In the Odyssey, Odysseus and Nausicaa are like,' Tang said to herself, 'the chief characters in some exciting modern novel; but all is different in the Iliad where there is no particularly romantic hero or heroine and where, if the feelings of sensitive readers are the ones to give the verdict, it is neither "the sweet war-man Hector" nor the swift-footed Achilles son of the Nereid Thetis, nor Agamemnon nor Menelaus nor even Diomed the son of Tydeus but rather Patroclus the beloved of Achilles and Briseis, Achilles' favourite girl, whose personality moves us most and whose death at Hector's hand affects us most. If Helen of Troy had known Patroclus as well as she knew Hector she would have had another real friend to understand her far better than that slippery rogue Paris, her Trojan mate, ever could.'

Persephone, the kind introducer of our five visitors to Hades, was so long in making that monarch understand who had come, so full was his head of much older and more celebrated intruders, that they could not resist, encouraged of course in their curiosity by the Devil, exploring the retreats of both Tartarus and Erebus. None of the five, no, not even Tang, far less Wang, had the least idea of what they had the temerity to explore and even the Devil had some misgivings. But on they plunged in their audacious enterprise, first to the edge of Tartarus and then to the brink of Erebus.

They soon found themselves standing on a ledge of hard sand, sand that had been hardened and it looked as if it was time that had done it, for fifty thousand years. The ledge was slowly, patiently, incessantly, eternally, washed by an incalculable volume of water that was almost, though not quite, black in colour, but had the mirror-like power of reflection such as when the ocean is very deep, seems to dominate by the dark weight of its curves and undulations not only the aquatic creatures who bide within its flood but the quality of the shells and coral-reefs and fossils and sea-weeds that have lingered and lasted in those dim recesses while continents of land have become oceans of water while pulsating sequences of sound have sunk into hollow valleys of silence and gurgitating volcanic crypts have descended into gulfs of impenetrable nonentity. Heavens and earth! But what a change it was to move from the brink of Tartarus to the margin of Erebus! The former was a mass of demoniacal elements but the latter was the mouth of that which underlies all that exists. Yes, Tartarus was manifold and multifarious in its everlasting recess; but Erebus was simply one bottomless gulf of black death's response to life, one unspeakable retort of the unutterable uniformity of the Ultimate Reality to every angle, every curve, every gasp, every gurgle, every gulp, of what, however loathsome and appalling it may be, is yet the element of life that prefers to swallow the abomination of desolation rather than die away in the nothingness of death.

Yes, all five of them, even the reckless Wang, even the feminine Tang, even the scatter-brained Devil, stood on the brink of Erebus in frozen terror. Their five hearts beat in unison. One for Wang, one for Tang, one for Sock, one for Pop, one for the Devil. Tang indeed said to herself: 'We aren't five any more. We are one. And our one goes up and down: Tick-Tock, Tick-Tock, Tick-Tock, Tick-Tock, Tick-Tock: like a clock.' It was the suction of Erebus that was terrible. Those five on the brink acquired a common consciousness. They no longer thought, felt, existed, in isolation. The inmost being of Erebus could only be expressed in one word — suction. Our five companions resembled five tall worms or five short grass-snakes whose feet or tail-tips first, and then the rest of them until they were up to their necks, were being sucked down into a bottomless gulf.

But fortunately for our five friends all this process was only going on in their minds. They were still on the brink. They were not being sucked down at all. But be that as it may, the mere look of Erebus as they stared at it was so awful that if they had gone on standing there and gazing down they might have been driven out of their minds. The Devil was moved to sympathy and though he was feeling pretty much the same himself it occurred to him that if he could start their intelligence working they might feel better. So he said: ‘You see, my dears, all this mass before us is after all only water, nothing but black water descending into a gulf. We feel as if this gulf sank down and down and down forever. But we must remember that that is impossible because we are still on the earth. King Aidoneus as many of the ancients called King Hades is not a being far away in space, or beyond space. He is a monarch as real and historical and natural as Julius Caesar or King Numa or Alexander the Great or our good English Saxon monarch King Alfred. He has no intention of abdicating and vanishing as our Christian God seems to have done. He is as solidly here as Persephone, the daughter of Demeter who will soon introduce us to him, is solidly here. We must not let our recognition that the vanishing of God has made Christian theology more difficult, extend to older faiths which are solidly foundationed in older traditions. This present-day pseudo-scientific pseudo-psychic experimentation is a new thing altogether, whether applied to the Christian faith or any other faith. What we must not forget’ — and at this point the Devil’s voice rang out with a clarity neither Tang or Wang had ever caught in it before— ’is that the whole Universe is being re-created afresh by every living thing that uses it’s imagination!’

‘Come along, children,’ cried Persephone, suddenly appearing among them with a lightness of approach that no goddess, no ghost, no demon, could possibly have rivalled. ‘Come along! King Hades is ready to see you.’

They all five followed respectfully and gravely down a long corridor. Some deep mystical instinct made them all clasp their hands tightly in front of them as they walked, not in pairs as hitherto, but in single file with the Devil bringing up — though all he ‘brought up’ was the homed helmet which he hugged against his stomach — the rear of their little troop.

When they entered in the presence chamber Persephone drew back a little; but she didn’t desert them. She watched the proceedings very carefully. Hades was not so much an imposing figure as an obscure and shadowy one. He might easily have been a ghost himself. He and the throne on which he sat seemed to be continually melting into each other. Sometimes a pallid, infinitely sad-featured man seemed relaxing himself by leaning backward upon a seat of air. Sometimes the throne seemed covered by a misty robe which sank like an exhausted cloud upon the throne’s back, upon the throne’s arms, upon the throne’s footstool; and yet all five who had been brought there by Persephone felt that the man seated upon the throne as well as the throne itself into which he kept melting were studying them one by one with exquisite minuteness and care and were reading their thoughts as their thoughts had never been read before.

‘These people, O my Lord and King,’ said Persephone, ‘are full of energy and spirit; and they all agree that now that their modern God has committed suicide or has fled into outer space something must be done to give new life, and if possible, modern scientific life to the old religions, though they belong to myths and traditions and fantastical stories that to intelligent modern people seem utterly crazy. I know you will forgive me, O Lord, my god Hades, as I make the best of their position, but life, as my mother used always to tell me, is subject to fits and starts that are wholly unexpected. But as my mother always said; only those who are prepared to face the unexpected can deal with the entanglements of the present moment.’

It was then that an extraordinary thing happened. King Hades, or Aidoneus, began to speak; and the effort of speaking purified his whole appearance. He became a clearly outlined judge in a clearly outlined seat of justice, and all that was obscure about him fell away.

CHAPTER VIII

‘It will need,’ said King Hades, ‘all your combined qualities, my good friends, to get this dilapidated realm of mine into order. I will help you; but as you can guess, nobody belonging to the ancient tradition, far less if he has been, like myself, fated to rule the threatened kingdom, can identify himself with the tremendous spirit of change deeply enough to carry it through. O yes, my dears, you have got your wild and reckless and daring Wang who can snatch at a fresh spring, or twist, or turn, or angle, or scale, or fin, or crank, or axle, or loop, or crook, or corner, and use it for his leapings and slidings, his pitchings and tossings! Then you have got your old out-of-a-job Devil-may-care who has so often stood up to your runaway God that he knows exactly where we God-Almighties carry our sanctity a bit too far. Then in Tang you’ve got what all the world wants most of all, an Egeria, a nymph in Antro, a Latona who can give birth to a goddess, a Thetis who can leave her father the Old Man of the Sea and bring comfort to her son, swift-footed Achilles, when he lies weeping upon the beach. And do not you two think, O my dears, Sock and Pop, that I am ignorant of your ability, a great deal of which, O most honoured guests, resembles my own; that is to say the power of withdrawing, retiring, escaping, avoiding, evading, dodging, any two pressing demands upon our immediate attention. By acting thus, and I recommend it to you all, as I well know your good ally the Devil, obstinate enemy of your late Deity, this runaway Being who has, as your poet says “melted into air, into thin air,” has always done, you will find yourselves able to convert this damnable immediate present with till its exacting demands into a shadowy premonition of unbelievably delicious future. And now, all of you,’ King Hades went on, ‘I have a suggestion to make. I have often thought to myself as I’ve stood on the brink of Tartarus and glanced from there at the edge of Erebus, how exciting it would be if these two ultimate terrors could be joined together; and how interesting it would be to see which of them dominated and absorbed and overpowered the other. Now what I propose is that all five of you, and this of course includes both our supernatural Devil, and our dear lady, should set yourselves to work for me, and under my leadership, and that together we shall find some way of joining Tartarus with Erebus and of making one supreme terror of the two of them. If we succeed in this undertaking we shall have done something by which the whole human race to the end of time will benefit. The awfulness of Tartarus will have been swallowed up in Erebus or the abysses of Erebus will have been broken into and dispersed north and south and east and west by the evacuation of water through numberless estuaries. Will you agree, my children, to serve me in this? If you will you shall receive as wages, each one of you, some of the gold I have collected for a hundred years. And if we succeed in our undertaking you shall, yes! each one of you, be endowed with a gift that I’ve never given to anyone before, the miraculous power of reading people’s thoughts.’

An uproarious shout of acceptance went up from all four; and as for the Devil, he danced in a circle round them all, making grotesque clutches at his bottom as if he were twisting his own tail and yelling with ecstasy: ‘We’ll mix ’em! We’ll mix ’em! We’ll mix ’em!’

It was a memorable day in Hades’ life when after he had lectured them all five, especially Wang and Tang and the Devil, on the water-way to be constructed on the massive stones which the ground between Erebus and Tartarus contained and from which it was necessary to remove all the stately and antiquated wood-work of which the structure of his palace was composed, he retreated once more into his private contemplation.

‘It’s interesting,’ Hades thought, ‘to go back in mind to early days. I suppose, according to the way most gods and most men express things, Tartarus and Erebus were my parents: though which of them played the part of mother and which of them played the part of father I haven’t the faintest idea. I only remember how they both flattered me all the while, and kept saying: “We leave you King of the World:

We leave you King of the World.” They little knew that whoever, whatever, whenever, however they left me, I should one day do my utmost to destroy them both forever.’

Hades felt no remorse, no sadness, no shame as he said this to himself. On the contrary, the next thing he confessed with a strange satisfaction to himself was this: ‘I hate everything and everyone that exists! And this includes myself. But I think I hate other people and other things more than I do myself. I am not quite sure about this. But whatever I am thinking about there is always this — I do recognise that very distinctly — some piece of me, bit of me, lump of me, atom of me which is the hater, not only of myself but of everybody and everything. Now the question I am asking myself is this. Could the hater go on hating everything if he had or she had or it had no smallest atom of itself at its disposal to start from, yes! to serve as a jumping-off place for the hating plunge?

‘Is that the most crucial question I ask myself? I don’t know; for there is another that is always poking its head out; namely “whom or what is it that I hate most of all people and things in the world?” It isn’t, as a person would naturally assume, some particular divine or human enemy, or some particular disease, or some particular memory. It is the expectation, or the possible prospect of going mad.’

Hades looked round at this point, wondering whether the three men, the one woman, and the Devil, who were all resting after their imaginary struggle with the stones and their mental struggle with what Hades had been saying to them, could, or could not, read his thoughts. It was the pressure upon him of this trifling possibility, as so often happens with all of us, that caused the direction of his thoughts to undergo a complete change.

Hades now began to wonder whether it would be possible for him to expand and extend his kingdom over a much wider range.

‘Why should I waste my life,’ he asked himself, ‘in working out ways to punish Tartarus and Erebus for bringing me into existence? Wouldn’t it be much more exciting to let those two horrors stay as they are and for me to burst out from this whole neighbourhood and mount up from the cellar of the universe to its ceiling? Why should I not take possession of other planets totally different from this old earth? Why should I not invade Mars or Venus?’

At this point Hades paused to think, while he watched the four real wraiths accompanied by the Devil begin their work.

‘Shall it be Mars or Venus?’ he asked himself. The idea of Mars was, however, so closely associated in his mind with the idea of war that it dispelled the notion of any royal victory there of a harmless and purely adventurous kind.

‘No,’ he told himself, ‘it must be Venus. I must take possession forever of the planet of love. And this Venus,’ his thoughts ran on, ‘will no doubt prove to be the dwelling of a beautiful goddess. And if I take her as my wife what will Persephone say?’

Here Hades couldn’t help pausing again in his thoughts; and it was at this moment by a kind of natural telepathy that Persephone, passing across the entrance-hall, stopped in front of the statue of her mother Demeter and turning her back upon Hades moved towards it and crouching down before it, kissed its knees.

‘O mother, mother!’ she cried aloud, remembering with a spasm of bitter remorse how her mother had died of grief at losing her, ‘if these people are real wraiths and were once alive, where are you know?’

Hades didn’t miss this cry. ‘O Erebus! O Tartarus!’ he said to himself, glancing at his four new slaves aided by this supernatural creature they called the Devil, who were still at work on the canal he had invented to drown Tartarus in Erebus and to flood Erebus with the labyrinthine confluences of Tartarus. ‘Why is it that I, Aidoneus, should be so punished for carrying off this girl who has been more like a daughter to me than a wife for years beyond count, that I am now filled by day and by night with a melancholy that is beyond all description? What have I done that I should be so punished? Men and gods alike have carried off girls ere now, and their mothers have not died of grief. Did not I need companionship as much as this girl’s mother? Did not I need a daughter as much as she? No daughter have I ever had except Persephone. No wife have I ever had except Persephone. No friend have I ever had but her. And yet, because her mother loved her out of all natural proportion, and died of grief when I took her, am I to be punished out of all natural proportion? And punished for what? Punished for not being content to live in what I heard someone the other day call Plutonian sadness, but what is generally simply called loneliness for the whole of my undying life. Other undying ones have recompenses and compensations. Has not Zeus got Hera? Has not Hera, however much she may hate her husband, got Pallas Athene? Why should I, Hades, or Aidoneus if you prefer that name, pine on in despair for ever and ever? And who is it who is thus punishing me? Or am I punishing myself for not destroying myself? I heard some voice the other day call me or call my kingdom by the name of Dis. That is a good expressive name! Dis, Dis, Dis! I like the sound of that word! Well, here am I, whether Hades, or Aidoneus, or Pluto or Dis and I have no one in the world who cares a jot or tittle for me, except perhaps a faint touch of pity now and then, at O such rare moments! for I know her well — from Persephoneia. Would I be so unhappy if I could think of something definite to aim at, some project, some purpose? But what purpose? That is the question now? What purpose?’

CHAPTER IX

AS HE REMAINED silent, lost in thought, there appeared above him, far away in the sky, Venus, the evening star: and in a moment a desperate final decision formed itself within him. He beheld that star with an extraordinary emotion. There was no other in sight. There was no sun. There was no moon. There was nothing else. In all the universe, in all the multiverse, if there were more than one universe, there was only Venus.

‘I shall go there,’ he said to himself, ‘I want Venus.’ And then his thoughts ran on. ‘But why do I want her? What do I want her for? I know well what it is to ravish a lovely girl. I have ravished Persephone a thousand times. But no child has been born to us. She is barren. And just as I am always in despair without knowing why, she is always crying out piteously to her mother Demeter, who has so long been dead. What is Venus? She is love. What am I? I am hate. What sort of offspring should we have if I ravished Venus? But can one immortal ravish another immortal? Of course he can! That is how most of the greatest gods were born. But Venus — there she is! Still in the sky above my head! How do I know that she will let me ravish her? Her divine power as a deity must surpass mine altogether. Why then do I want so much to make love to her as to dare to risk such a rebuff? I think the truth is this. I think my real desire is to free myself, disentangle myself, extricate myself, separate myself from everything I see, hear, or feel. I want to be like one of these real wraiths who are now working for me against Erebus and Tartarus. As a real wraith myself I want to escape altogether from everything that this universe or multiverse contains or represents. I want there to be space and the emptiness beyond space. I want there to be time and the everlasting present or eternal present beyond time. But I only want these things to be there so that I can escape from them all. I want to glide through them and glide round them and remain absolutely independent of them. And I don't want to be bothered by my own names or my own thoughts. I don't want to be Hades or Aidoneus or Pluto or Dis any more. I don't want to have any great lumbering thoughts, weighing me down like sacks of coal! I don't even want to be an ego, so that people call me an egoist and cry in wonder: "Lord! How self-centred he is!" And yet I don't want to be as negligible as a tiny fly or as a very minute moth. I want to be a breath, a waft of air, a wave of mist, a puff of smoke, an eddy of wind: so that though my personality is as light as a feather it can pass through any substance and encircle any substance. Above all I want to be independent of the weight of thought. I want my I to be entirely without a soul. I hate the idea of having to carry about inside me that portentous, presumptuous spiritualised professor of theology that mortals call the soul. When I think of my I or feel my I or become my pure unmitigated I, I want it to be on the extreme vanishing point of nothing. I want it to be so near nothing that it can behave as nothing, move as nothing, pass as nothing, appear as nothing; and yet possess, in a sharp, clear, stinging, piercing, biting, stabbing, spearing, shooting, darting, diving reality, the quintessence of my reaction to all that life brings. I want my I in fact to resemble the extreme point of a flame, not the flame of a gentle candle but the sharp point of one single upward darting flame of a burning fire.'

It would be very difficult to tell what the Devil felt, but it was clear that Wang and Tang and Pop and Sock derived great satisfaction when King Hades bade them leave Erebus and Tartarus to themselves and follow him up, up, up, up, to Venus, the evening star. King Hades made the ascent easy by twisting a long silky cord round their waists and holding it firmly in his right hand. Round the Devil’s waist at the rear he saw to it that the cord ended in a firm tight knot. Wang and Tang never forgot that ascent to the evening star. It had hardly begun when the half moon appeared on the west of their flight, making the whole expanse of the air luminous.

King Hades kept giving the silken cord a jerk of emotional excitement; but this didn’t bother any of them. In fact Wang said cheerfully to Tang: ‘It’s a good thing it isn’t round our necks!’ And the Devil whispered to Pop who was the last of the human wraiths in the line: ‘Travel by moonlight if you want to win!’

Wang and Tang had never seen anything like it.

‘Moonlight and proud Titania,’ Wang murmured to her, ‘only Aidoneus is a man!’

‘He’s not an ordinary man,’ Tang murmured back, ‘He’s an enchanter, like Prospero, only I hope we shan’t see Caliban heading towards us on a one-man plane with a determination to “get a new master!”’

King Hades flew so fast, though his legs and arms and shoulders and hips remained so still that if they hadn’t been able to see the planet they had come from and the planet towards which they were rushing, it would have been hard to prove they were moving at all. Indeed they were all standing on the magnetic soil of Venus before they realised that their voyage was over. What struck them all with most wonder was this magnetism of the soil. It was a very curious experience to stand upon it, for it firmly, quietly, steadily, obstinately, resolutely, irresistibly drew your feet and your ankles and your legs down, down, down, down. The Devil and Pop who were furthest from the pull of King Hades’ right hand, were already up to their knees in this magnetic soil with its terrible indraw when King Hades called out in a loud voice: ‘Spit, children, spit, little ones! Spit on the ground beneath you! And you will soon find it’ll stop pulling you down!’ They all obeyed him. And lo! this terrible indraw ceased; and the Devil and Pop found no difficulty, after they had spat as ordered, in extricating themselves from the soil.

Afterwards there was no more of the drag down; and it struck Tang as so odd that she boldly asked King Hades to explain it.

‘You see, my dear child,’ the Plutonian King replied, ‘the whole character of Venus Aphrodite has penetrated the substance of her star. Her being has gone into it. Her star is composed of all her feminine feelings. And so the soil of her star, partaking of her nature, acts like a fatal seduction, sucking people into it. But if such people spit upon it, it is as if they regarded her as a contemptible whore; and the thought of being so regarded takes the heart out of all her magnetic pull.’

While King Hades was expounding to his courtiers the secrets of the nature of the evening star, poor unfortunate Persephone got at last into her bewildered brain that she had been left entirely alone, alone forever, in this vestibule between Tartarus and Erebus. In a paroxysm of furious desperation the unhappy girl, deserted by everyone, dashed her beautiful head with insane violence against the sharp-edged pedestal of her mother’s statue. But what was her astonishment when after only a second of total blackness she found herself in an ecstasy of happiness such as she had not known since her childhood, being embraced by the real wraith of her mother! Yes! There they both were together at long last, indescribably happy, and in each other’s arms.

The conversation that followed between them had no audience but Erebus and Tartarus who were both still too absorbed in their abysmal and fathomless contests, as to which could drown the other, to take any notice of what was happening above their heads.

‘Did you take in, mother dear,’ Persephone was saying, ‘what it was that King Hades was up to in starting off like that with those four and with that Demon in their train? One of the four was a woman. Did you take that in?’

‘Of course I took it all in, Persephoneia darling! Of course I did. Well! King Hades was going off to visit the evening star. As you know, my sweet child, her name is Venus Aphrodite; and one of these ridiculous human travellers who drag their wives or their husbands down here when they get fed up with them, must have tried to put it into Aidoneus’ head that he would get a warm reception from her. Of course our old King isn’t quite such a fool as to take that seriously. Besides, I know these god-like men well enough to know that he’d have got far more pleasure in ravishing her when she didn’t want to be touched than he’d get from being loved by her. The truth is, my darling, he’d got tired of you! Yes, even of you! These devilish men are all alike in that, whether gods or mortals! Let them catch sight of a lovely girl and they want to carry her off. Let them carry her off and soon after they have had her they want to get rid of her!

‘What it shows is this, my sweet child: it shows that a certain type of man, whether mortal or immortal, is not really and truly a lover of the opposite sex. Really and truly he is a hater of the opposite sex, and what he enjoys is seizing upon them and ravishing them not because he loves them but because he enjoys the sensation of ravishing one of them. The more lovely his victim is the more he enjoys “having” her but it is the act of ravishing that he enjoys, not living with the victim of his lust.

‘Well, my darling child, now that you and I are real wraiths let us enjoy ourselves. As you doubtless know real wraiths can fly anywhere. Let us fly together then to the evening star and find out what is happening there. It will be amusing to see what our old King does when he finds that we, his victim and her mother, are among his courtiers. It will be amusing too, will it not, darling, to see what Venus Aphrodite makes of our arrival on the scene. She didn’t altogether like it — I can tell you that from my own experience! — when Homer made Helen of Troy at the end of the Iliad utter such extreme praise of that “sweet war-man” Hector. Homer must have decided, long before his poem ended, that that was how he was going to make it end.’

CHAPTER X

NOBODY WAS MORE surprised than King Hades when he saw his real wraith courtiers increased to six by the appearance of Persephone and her mother Demeter. The real wraiths consisted now of three men and three women. Tang was collared at once by Demeter and Persephone and was made to tell all she knew of the life-story and the death-story of the others. Her chief difficulty was in making clear to the newcomers who the Devil was, who now, released from the silky sash that had been tied round his waist, was, after his usual manner, hovering round them all and displaying with a mischievous gusto both his cloven hooves and his tail.

‘I don’t know,’ said Tang, ‘whether you two goddesses have ever heard of the Christian religion? If not let me tell you this about it. It was invented by a very clever scholar called Paul of Tarsus who used to encourage his friends to stone to death the followers of a mysterious healer and preacher called Jesus. But one day he was accosted by the real wraith of this Jesus who was born at Bethlehem near the Lake of Galilee. The Jewish high priest and all the rabbis of the books of Moses believed as they still do in their Jewish God Jehovah, who has nothing to do at all with this appalling Christian God who burns his enemies in flames that go on for ever and ever. The disciples of this Jesus the healer called him Jesus the Christ, or the Messiah, or the King of the Jews, but the Jewish high priest disliked him and so did most of the Jewish rabbis or teachers of the law of Moses. In the end the Roman ruler Pilate caused him to be crucified on a cross at the top of which were the words “This is the King of the Jews,” a sentence that Pilate resolutely refused to change. This Jesus had, all his life, ever since his parents Joseph and Mary brought him into the world believed that this awful God was his Father; but when he was on the cross and this imaginary Father-God never came to help him he cried aloud in a piteous voice, “Eloi!! Eloi! Lama Sabachthani?”

“My God!

My God! Why hast thou deserted me?” And he must have decided in his mind that this imaginary Father of his did not exist. But a certain Paul of Tarsus who had begun by encouraging people to kill by throwing stones at all those who believed in Jesus, when once he had met the real wraith of Jesus changed his view-point completely and began preaching everywhere and writing everywhere to every group of the followers of this great healer assuring them that this awful God whom until his crucifixion Jesus had always called his Father was a God of love, the essence of love, made of love, breathing love, emanating love, perspiring love, soaked through and through with love. This startling change in Paul’s outlook must have been produced in him by his encounter on the road to Damascus with the real wraith of Jesus who so impressed him by its power and its gentleness and made him feel so ashamed of the way he had held the clothes of those who were stoning a Christian that he now set to work to invent the Holy Trinity, a justification for which he found in certain words attributed to Jesus who is reported to have said that when he was dead God would send the Holy Ghost to comfort everybody and make everybody realise that God was love. Paul took good care not to teach anyone that Hell, invented by God to torture those who didn’t believe in Him, didn’t really exist; because in his clever theological way what he wanted people to believe was that this God he was inventing under the name of the Holy Trinity was a three-fold Being, at the same time the Father who threw unbelievers into eternal fire and the Son who redeemed believers by his dear love and the Holy Ghost who comforted believers and made them happy forever and ever in Heaven.

‘Jesus must have been without doubt the greatest magician and the greatest healer who ever lived. He could bring the dead to life and it was impossible to keep him dead and buried for very long. Up he would rise again and up into the sky he ascended at the end. Paul, after inventing Christianity went to Rome to convert the Emperor but when the Emperor was about to kill him he ran away till he met some Christian real wraith who cried out: “Where the Hell are you running off to?” This sent him back to Rome. Matthew, Mark and Luke and John,’ said Tang, ‘may have all been great recorders in their various ways; but it was Saint Paul who invented Christianity. I have myself,’ she added, ‘always liked Saint Peter the best of the lot. His weakness and nervousness at critical moments appeals to me as a woman; and I never hear a cock crow without remembering how Jesus said to him: “Before the cock crows twice thou shalt deny me thrice.” What we are apt to forget,’ Tang went on, ’is that the Christian religion has changed and altered and developed a great deal since the time of the Apostles; and it may be a surprise to you if I add that those to whom this development is due were or have been mostly women. And if you ask me,’ for it was clear to her that both the real wraiths of these powerful goddesses were arrested by this last statement, ‘what types of women have achieved this, I can only answer that from what my brother Wang has told me of the characters of the various women he has known, the first kind are whores and the second kind are aged spinsters. Do you remember when Jesus wrote in the dust? It was when he met Mary Magdalene; and do you remember who it was who taught King Numa of Rome how to conquer the world? It was that nymph who lived in a cave, called Egeria, the Nymph in Antro! Nor need I refer to Mary and Martha, the sisters of Lazarus, nor to that devoted little whore who saved the life of De Quincey. The mothers of many children have of course all they can do to take care of them after giving them birth; but there is a mysterious power possessed by old spinsters who have never been loved by a man and by scatter-brained little prostitutes who lived for years by selling their bodies to men, that no other human beings possess.'

Tang lifted her fairy-like little head and looked up at the two tall goddesses. And the King of Hades was astonished at the impression made upon them. It was clear to him that there was something that this little human girl knew that corresponded perfectly with the unearthly knowledge of these two famous goddesses.

'What will they do now?' the King asked himself. 'I wonder if I did right after all in leaving Erebus and Tartarus to drown themselves and coming up here? What will Venus Aphrodite say?'

He paused and everybody paused and a strange shiver of awe passed through them all: that which comes when a larger consciousness of the meaning of life throws its aura over a group of smaller consciousnesses. And it was at this moment that the implacable Aphrodite, as our poet calls her, actually made herself visible. She certainly outdid both Demeter and Persephone in her beauty; but it wasn't so much her beauty that obsessed King Hades with a feeling he had never had before in all his days. He felt belittled. He had never been proud or vain or conceited. To live at the mouths of Erebus and Tartarus was enough to stop anything of that kind. But what Venus Aphrodite made him feel was simply that he was so unimportant as to be tottering, stumbling, faltering, fumbling, on the edge of becoming nothing, yes! on the brink of dissolving into thin air. She didn't give him the faintest, no! not the very faintest desire to embrace her. What she gave him was a shock of overpowering terror. He felt that it would be impossible for him to live in the presence of beauty like this. He felt he must fly from her. He felt that if she looked at him he would turn into nothing and disappear forever.

But Venus Aphrodite, the evening star as seen from earth, took no more notice of King Hades than if he had been a fly and concentrated her attention upon Demeter and Persephone. 'I never thought,' she said, 'that Zeus, our sovereign-lord, and child-swallowing Cronos, his disinherited father, would ever permit great goddesses like you two to visit this star of my solitary reign. How strange were the ways of our grandmother Night when without sleeping with any male she gave birth to Clotho and Lachesis and Atropos the three fates, Clotho the spinner, Lachesis the disposer of lots, and Atropos, she who cannot be turned!'

Demeter greeted her at once, drawing Persephone, who was glancing nervously at King Hades, a little nearer to her.

'O beautiful Cyprian! O perfect Cytherean!' she cried. 'Well do I know the story of your birth. If Night the grandmother of us all had not inspired Cronos to accept that sickle of flint prepared by his mother Gaia and cut out the generation members of Ouranos the father of the Titans, where would we be today? Verily it was grandmother Night who, without being embraced by any man, gave us all the powers who dominate our life. Aye! It is grandmother Night to whom we owe all! And now, O greatest of goddesses save only Hera and Pallas Athene, please accept under your care my daughter Persephone and teach our good friend King Hades to treat her, during the months she lives with him in this underworld, as all goddesses feel they should be treated!'

Venus Aphrodite moved forward and King Hades moved backward. But she gave him such a bewitching smile that, do what he could to restrain himself, he could not resist taking her hand and kissing it; and after that all was well.

‘Yes,’ said Demeter, ‘we have agreed that if you will allow us to remain upon your star which the people where all these real wraiths come from call the evening star because that is the time when they see it most clearly, we shall be ready to help you in any scheme you may have for making your planet a space refuge, and our King Aidoneus or Hades will encourage us in such a task. In fact we might name any building we erect for you by his name and call it the King Hades Refuge; an institution that in fact may remain for hundreds of years and become a place to which all persons in any of the planets round our sun who are in mental distress may steer their airplanes and be comforted and supported when they land on your shore.’

It was clear to all present that this speech of Demeter’s made a great impression on the beautiful ruler of the evening star. She at once whispered something to King Hades who nodded quite affably and then she entered into conversation with Persephone who looked radiantly happy as she listened to what was really a very wise introduction to life upon the evening star. It was, as a matter of fact, an experience for Venus Aphrodite that she was never likely to have again to be introduced to two goddesses, for such of course, Demeter and Persephone really were, who had flung their immortality away for their love of each other and had now come to the evening star as real wraiths.

But Venus Aphrodite had an experience to follow this that was even stranger: for no sooner had she accepted the astonishment of beholding two immortals transformed into two ghosts than she was confronted by the Devil. What in this mad world was she to make of the being who, with a tail and with horns and with cloven hooves, now came bowing and scraping into her presence? She waved him away at first but when, after dancing a couple of dances round them all and coming back to her, she was compelled to ask advice; and she promptly and very wisely asked it of the real wraith of Persephone.

‘You see, O beautiful one,’ replied Persephone, ‘we on the planet earth are still suffering from this accursed Christian religion which has lasted for nearly two thousand years! O how passionately all intelligent men and women long for it to die out! All religions are pretty awful. We Greeks of the ancient time know this as well as anyone. But Christianity is the worst. Jesus himself, who is supposed to have founded this religion, gave up his belief in it on the cross when he was dying. You see the central idea of this appalling religion is that somewhere in the universe is a place called Hell where those who refuse to believe in the Being called God are burnt in fire for ever and ever. In spite, however, of their imagining this unspeakable God gloating over His enemies burning in flame for ever, the greatest advocate of this religion whose name was Paul of Tarsus always makes out in all the letters he wrote to his followers that God is the incarnation of love; the embodiment of love, the essence of love! “God,” in fact he goes so far as to say, “is love.” What are we to think then,’ Persephone went on, ‘of a religion whose greatest advocate tells its followers on the one hand that its God gloats over his enemies burning in a fire that lasts for ever, and on the other that its God is identical with love. Now in order to have,’ Persephone went on, noticing that Venus Aphrodite was staring at the Devil’s antics with wonder and horror, ‘an opposite to its God of eternal torture and eternal love, the chief founder of this religion, who was Paul of Tarsus, taught that before the God of torture and love made himself known on the planet earth he was defied and attacked in his own native home, which is the sky above our heads, by a being who is sometimes called Satan and sometimes called Lucifer. In the battle with this Lucifer or Satan, the love-and-torture God won hands-down; so that this Lucifer or Satan was flung into Hell so that God might have his full revenge on him in the manner God liked best, namely burning him in flames and perpetually whispering in his ear that he would suffer like this for ever and ever and ever and ever.

'You must understand, O beautiful one,' Persephone went on, while King Hades listened with wonder at the clarity of his kidnapped girl's account of this fantastic religion of life's extremes, 'that Lucifer or Satan was, even in defeat, a formidable opponent of this God of love and of torture; and it suddenly came into his mind that if he pretended to join with this God and to help him in his torturing he might propitiate him to such a tune that he would be allowed to escape the flames himself if he was always ready to push any victim back into them who was making a skilful escape. The loving torturer fell for this plot and master Satan-Lucifer soon found that he was being trusted by the Lord on High as a faithful servant. All this went on,' Persephone continued, keeping a close eye on the relation between the Devil and the beautiful Queen she was addressing, 'until a curious change took place in Lucifer-Satan's appearance. This must have been due to the hideous baseness and meanness of his occupation. For a thousand years he was employed in this manner, and behold! when that had passed he was no longer the tall, handsome, grand-looking creature he had been when he first entered upon this job. The baseness of playing an accomplice to a God of torture whom his chief advocate, in order to fool the dwellers on the earth, continued to present to the world as a God of love, had completely altered his appearance. A thousand years, you see, O beautiful Queen, of such abominable behaviour turned him into a different creature altogether. He acquired horns, he acquired a tail, he acquired cloven hooves. You see, beautiful one, a thousand years is a long time. Probably five hundred years ago Satan's tail was very short, his horns scarcely visible, and his feet possessed of at least a couple of toes a-piece. But now, O Queen of the evening star, you see what he is! And all the inhabitants of the earth take for granted that he has always been like that and I expect, though I will ask him if you like, he himself thinks he has always been as he is now.'

It was at this moment, as if to protect himself from any such interrogation, that the Devil hurried up to the side of King Hades and began speaking very earnestly to him. 'It has occurred to me, O King, that instead of trying in vain as we are now doing to propitiate Venus and jolly her along into making us the chief servants of her rule, it would be much better for us, and also for you, O King, if we flew to the planet Mars and instead of propitiating him at all we boldly invaded him, yes, made a fierce attack upon him and by sheer force conquered his planet. You doubtless know without my telling you, O great King, that it was the Romans who gave the name of Mars, their god of war, to this shining star. The ancient Greeks, as your Majesty knows, called it Ares, which was their name for this same heroic deity. But have you read, O mighty King, among the Homeric hymns, the one to Ares which ends with a passionate prayer that he will do the extreme opposite of what most of us expect from him. I expect you remember how this desperate war-hating prayer ends, how it ends, like this you know. "Restrain the keen fury of my heart which provokes me to tread the ways of bloodcurdling strife! Rather, blessed One, give my boldness to abide within the harmless laws of peace, avoiding strife and hatred and the violent demons of death."

'You see, O my Lord and King Hades, whoever it was who composed that hymn, what the deep and subtle implication is below it all? Namely that those who worship Ares the god of war are destined in the end to discover that deep down in the depths of his heart is something that corresponds with something of the same nature in the depths of their own hearts, that is to say, a recognition that what all the races of this universe need most of all is not victory over enemies but what the ancient Greeks called eirene, eiphnh, peace.’

CHAPTER XI

IT WAS CLEAR to the Devil that his words had made a deep impression on King Hades. But he was too wise to spoil the effect by going on too long in one strain. So leaving the subject of war and peace in the abstract he began now to concentrate on the immediate situation.

'Your Majesty must remember,' he said, lowering his voice so as not to be heard by anyone but the real wraiths of Persephone and Demeter who were standing quite close to him, 'that none of the shadowy courtiers of yours who now include these two famous goddesses who are with us here, are likely to be as interested as the living population of any of the planets associated with our sun and our moon, in our invasion of Mars if we do have the spirit to undertake it. I know enough about the inhabitants of the earth to know that if led into battle by you, O great King, your whole band of courtiers, ghosts though they all are, would have the power to make the ruler of Mars together with his fiercest Martians fly before them, yes! before us great King, in holy terror. On all planets, and I am sure this is true of Mars, ordinary living creatures are more afraid of ghosts than of the fiercest warriors.'

The Devil ceased. He had won and he knew it. King Hades now saw himself as the mighty monarch of a whole planet, and the planet after the earth and Venus, which is the most famous and influential of all the lot. Craftily selecting his special supporters on the ground that being English ghosts they were more familiar than the other pair with the conventional catchwords of patriotic battle, he invited Wang and Tang, since they had been near enough to hear the Devil's speech to King Hades, to announce their decision. This Wang did as follows: ‘Come, comrade wraiths,’ he cried, ‘let us, now that we are all followers of King Hades, join together in conquering for him and for ourselves a planet that will lend itself to our dominion when we have conquered it much more completely and much more satisfactorily, since it is a male planet, than this tricky and treacherous and tatterdemalion one run by a pretty lady! You agree with me, don’t you, my dear sister?’

‘Sure I do, brother!’ cried Tang, ‘and I have no doubt that comrades Sock and Pop, since like yourself and our gracious sovereign they are also male, will also agree.’

‘We do! We do!’ cried Sock and Pop simultaneously.

‘Well, that’s settled then!’ said the Devil with justifiable pride.

Whether Venus Aphrodite heard in actual words of this decision of her invaders it would be difficult to say. In her secret self Tang thought that these boastful males deserved some rebuff; but she little thought how soon it would come. At a sudden sign from Venus Aphrodite a whole battalion of beautiful young angels rushed out from some hidden palisade and began shooting arrows from delicately-drawn bows. These arrows could not of course stick in the flesh of our real wraiths as these had no flesh for them to stick into; but those they hit certainly experienced an extremely unpleasant shock when the arrows pierced through them.

‘No resistance, my friends!’ cried King Hades. ‘Hold hands and follow me!’

To their surprise they found the planet Mars prepared for their attack. Who had told Mars the King of their coming? It was Tang who solved this riddle. She had stored her mind when she was a child with the names and relationships of all the gods and goddesses of Olympus. Well did she now remember that long before Zeus, the King of the gods, married Hera he had married Themis who was the goddess of law and order and more than any other goddess was concerned with the good and evil of all men, of all places, of all things.

'It must have been the great goddess Themis, the first wife of Zeus the King of all the gods, who told them,' she shouted aloud as they all rushed forward, following after King Hades.

Thus it was not the wavings and brandishings and battle-cries of three women and three men that scared their enemies; it was the name of Themis. This name being as deeply suggestive of order as the name of Mars was suggestive of war had a terrific effect. The Martians began crying out to one another: 'Themis! Themis! Themis!' with the result that as they resisted their invaders they mistook the figure of Demeter who was advancing with her hand in her daughter's and who was obviously an elderly lady, for the goddess herself. So what they must have thought in their minds was that, since they were all would-be warriors longing for a battle, the goddess of order must have decided to teach them a lesson.

The effect of the introduction of the word Themis, a name which had become from very early days far more terrifying to the inhabitants of Mars than any invaders from Uranus or Mercury, or, in this case, from the earth, could possibly be, actually did have at this particular crisis a double effect; for not only did it scare the Martians but it made our six real wraiths, two of whom were ex-goddesses, also feel extremely uneasy. Was it possible, they wondered, that a group of Olympian enemies of the all-powerful Zeus could have decided that the best way of making his present wife Hera feel reduced in glory and esteem would be to emphasise the importance to human civilisation of Themis, the immortal goddess of law and order, and with this in mind to despatch Themis on a sort of police-woman's tour through all the planets?

As may well be imagined the six real wraiths who had joined their destiny to that of King Hades were extremely reluctant to admit defeat by the Martians. Both sides, the Martians who were ready to sweep them into space, and they themselves now that the fatal name Themis had been uttered, had come to a pause before joining in battle. And now, midway between them, the Devil, a being different from any creature either side had ever previously encountered, was not only indulging in fantastic antics with his horns and his tail but was making such an unusually compelling speech to both parties or to put it more bluntly to both the invaders and the invaded that they were both hypnotised into listening. 'What neither of you' — and he poked with his horns like a bull preparing to charge— 'understand,' he said, 'is just what all we living beings are seeking to get from life and consequently why it is that we earth-dwellers are invading you Mars-dwellers. I don't say that we all want the same thing; for men and women are very different in what they want. Men want to use their strength in doing something important. Women want to enjoy being themselves without any purpose but that of making themselves more beautiful and more appealing, and if they have babies to enjoy suckling them and if they have children to enjoy teaching them and playing with them. Women treat everything they possess in a maternal way. They spend their time mothering everything. They treat animals so; they treat flowers so. Men full of longing to do something important don’t bother about flowers at all unless they happen to be professional gardeners. Whereas to women flowers are like children — they love them as they love children. They adore every petal of them and are very troubled, really troubled at heart, if the flowers show signs of drooping or fading before their time.’

Both sides looked nervously at one another and then turned and stared with equal indecision at their opponents. It was clear that the Devil’s oration, especially his emphasis upon women’s passion for flowers and men’s indifference to them unless the particular men were gardeners, had made a considerable impression. The individual who ought to have been most concerned since he was the leader of the invaders, that is to say King Hades himself, took not the slightest notice of the Devil’s eloquence nor of its magnetic and hypnotic effect. This obliviousness was evidently something of a mystery to both sides; and something of a nuisance too; but it converted a natural pause, like that of two animals both of whom were crouching and waiting to spring, into a troublesome order suddenly flung out by a schoolmaster forbidding an exciting game of football just when the boys from two opposing schools were awaiting the kick-off.

It was Hades himself who broke the spell. Rising to his feet and addressing his little band of adherents, he suddenly pointed to a towering castle in the background of the plain upon which his followers had landed, and cried aloud: ‘Here cometh Mars himself, or Ares, as I prefer to call him! Turn and look at him all of you and you’ll see how important it is for us to retreat. Brave as you are, my friends, you can’t fight against a monster like that! Follow me, therefore, and bid that brute go back to his den!’

Not only did all of the six wraiths including the girl Tang, but all their opponents in that field of battle destined to be delivered that day from shedding so much as a single drop of blood, stare in speechless amazement at the figure that now came striding towards them. Tang, with a young girl's instinctive power of putting braggadocio masculinity in its place, cried out to the approaching figure which seemed entirely composed of helmet and shield and battle-axe and golden breast-plate; for the man inside all this paraphernalia seemed pathetically small and thin and weak and featureless in comparison with the weight of gold and bronze and silver and iron he was labouring beneath, 'Go back, go back, you Mars! Go back! Go back, you Ares! Go back to the armoury from which you came! We're not afraid of you, you walking and stalking museum of antiquity!'

CHAPTER XII

'IT IS TIME for us to leave this Ares-acting Mars,' cried King Hades. 'I am going to take you to a place known to me but unknown to any of you. And when we get there — so now hold hands all of you! — you will remember this swaggering tower of armour as if he were a comedy of buffoonery which you saw in some planetary theatre!

'I am taking you to Pachydermata,' Hades cried, 'whence my ancestors on my mother's side deduced their lineage; so farewell, you walking museum! May your subjects bow lower and lower and lower before you while I show my subjects what I've got for them in Pachydermata! Come on, my dears, clutch each other by the hand, and I'll take our friend the Devil by his horn! Off we go! Ta! Ta! master Brazen-top! May you meet no Queen of the Amazons to teach you where you belong!'

They all obeyed him. The Devil bowed his head to make his left-hand horn available. With his other hand King Hades took Tang's who at once gave her other to Wang while Pop and Sock followed suit, the two goddesses bringing up the rear. Thus this singular stream of eight beings, Hades, the Devil, Wang and Tang, Pop and Sock, and the two goddesses, slid down without sails or wings or diving belts or tridents to the old planet earth.

It was of tremendous interest to all the four real wraiths as well as to the Devil to see in what direction they were being led when they arrived within the earth's atmosphere. Demeter and Persephone, however, showed no interest at all. They were so happy at being together again after a separation as long-lasting as several hundred generations that they cared nothing as to whither they were being led. To the astonishment of all the rest, however, an astonishment that made something like a real shiver of alarm pass through Pop and Sock and Wang and Tang, for in all those four hearts, the secret hope had been closely hugged that King Hades would take them back to Greece, they now realised that their goal was the Pacific Ocean.

This was indeed a shock; and the shivering fit that followed increased and increased upon them all. When at last they reached the Ocean, they were too frightened to stare at it in the way ‘stout Cortez,’ according to Keats, did. They could only look wildly at one another. Calm as ever were the two goddesses; and when King Hades beckoned to them that he, the only member of this weird crew who was not already dead, intended to dive into the Ocean at a spot he carefully pointed out, they accepted his decision with a smile and an inclination of their heads and indicated that they had every intention of following him wherever he went and doing whatever he did.

‘Down to Pachydermata!’ cried King Hades as he dived, dragging the Devil with him. After them went Tang and Wang, and after them, Sock and Pop, while the two goddesses, exchanging a smile and a kiss, followed at the end of the line.

The Ocean was very deep where they dived and it took some while before they reached the bottom. Once there, everything seemed different to them all. King Hades led them on foot for about a quarter of a mile completely disregarding, as they all followed him, the sea-monsters and the enormous sharks and octopuses that kept circling round them as they walked; disregarding too the submarine coral-reefs and the huge thickets of a gigantic sea-weed which clung to their ankles as they moved. Tang thought to herself, ‘What would happen now if the sea-serpent which so many divers dread were to come circling and twisting and writhing and wriggling its way towards us? Would King Hades and the Devil scare it into flight or would it swallow us up one after the other?'

But all such thoughts departed when King Hades stopped in front of a large square enclosure of silver railings from the centre of which rose a half-open door that led as they could all see to a flight of steps.

'Follow me, my children, all of you,' said King Hades, pulling open a golden gate into this silver-barred enclosure and approaching the up-lifted door and the flight of steps.

He released the Devil's horn as he descended but glanced aside to make sure that the Devil was following him. After the Devil they all went down, the procession ending with Demeter and Persephone, who, with amused smiles at each other left the up-raised door just as it had been before any of them descended. The salt water was still about them, though it was not troubling them in any way; but Tang couldn't help wondering to herself how King Hades was able to breathe in this complete absence of air.

'It's all very well for us,' she told herself, 'for us who have long been dead, but how in the name of Poseidon, the god of the sea, can a man who is still alive go on like this?' Then she recalled his words about his mother's ancestors having come from this place. 'So perhaps,' she thought, 'he may have inherited, although a man, some of the capacity of a submarine creature.'

Tang's thoughts soon ceased to wander and became concentrated on the steps they now were all descending. She had never had any experience in the remotest degree like this. The steps themselves were of iron and their descent was very steep. But it wasn't their steepness; it was their lack of any deviation to right or left; it was their unmitigated straightness of descent that affected her. She had always had a horror of falling down to the bottom of a well; and this descent, straight, straight, straight down, till the downness gave her a feeling that in some way this was a hole into something more than the bottom of the Ocean; a hole into the bottom of the entire universe perhaps, out of which if you went down as far as you could go, you would emerge into, well! whatever it might be that lay beneath the whole universe! This was an exciting idea; but it was also a terrifying idea. What did underlie the entire universe and all it contained? Just empty space? Or was there something like a special word for a particular race of beings, totally different from the inhabitants of any world we have ever heard of, or can imagine existing? That appalling flight of steps was over at last; and having descended below the bottom of the Ocean they found themselves breathing air that must somehow have reached them from the other side of the globe.

'Behold the entrance to Pachydermata!' cried King Hades in a more powerful voice than any of them had ever heard him use before. Nor was the pride in his voice without justification. They all found themselves now standing in a group before a huge archway above which was carved upon a great stone of black adamant the words 'To Be or Not To Be'.

They all acted boldly. No longer holding one another's hands, led by Wang and Tang followed by Sock and Pop, with Hades striding before them and the Devil skipping after them, they passed under this great arch into the unknown land.

CHAPTER XIII

'WELL! THIS IS indeed an adventure,' thought Tang to herself, looking round to make sure Wang was safely with them. Yes! He was there; and so also, in addition to Sock and Pop was the Devil and the two goddesses.

'This is the land,' cried King Hades, turning to make sure they were all there, 'from which my mother came. She used to tell me about it and where it lay, but I found difficulty in believing her, so impossible did it seem to me that any inhabitable land could exist beneath this Ocean. I had heard rumours about Atlantis but I knew as a child enough to know that that land was under the Atlantic. But at last' — and the King heaved a deep sigh— 'I learnt the truth. My mother was the first child of Pasiphaë who afterwards, by the help of Daedalus the cleverest of all artificers, was able to find a labyrinthine hiding-place for her beloved monster, the Minotaur.'

Hades had only just drawn a long deep breath as he thought of his mother and longed in his heart to see her again, when running rapidly towards them over that varied and verdurous plain there came a small and active satyr.

'Rumours have reached us of your coming, O my King!' he cried, falling down at the feet of Hades and pressing his forehead into the sandy ground. 'And it was agreed among us that we would draw lots who should meet you and tell you the news; and the lot fell on me.' At this point the satyr lifted his head and looked up at Hades but still remained on his knees before him.

'The news is that, unknown to any god or any man, a monstrous offspring of the Minotaur of Crete and the terrible Titanic creature Typhoeus, one or the other of them being able to feminise itself for this purpose, but which of these monsters, O King, played the male or was the male, and which of them played the female or was the female nobody knows, has been discovered in a cave in this country. You know, O King, for we all are aware of your close link with us, that we have many very learned scholars and experts in the history of the monsters that have penetrated this undersea country since the beginning of the world. I am one of a group of ten satyrs who act as scouts for these wise men of whom there are, as you no doubt know, O King, about six, all of them oldish men, and all well acquainted with the many dangers of their difficult research. They have discovered the complete history of both the monsters concerned. The dragon Typhoeus was crippled by Zeus with thunderbolts and lightning and hurled down to your Kingdom, O great King, and the Minotaur whose whole being was due to the feminine lust of Pasiphaë was assisted by that supreme artificer Daedalus to seek refuge here after being nearly killed by Theseus, who had left it for dead in the labyrinth of Minos, Lord of Crete. These monsters must have met down here, O King, and afterwards withdrawn again to the upper regions leaving their progeny to look after itself. This was evidently done, if what our six wise men tell us is correct; for its cave, they say, is full of bones. But they also tell us, though none of us satyr-scouts have dared to go near that cave, that the monstrous offspring of the Minotaur and Typhoeus has grown larger and looks more terrifying than either of its parents. Most of us satyrs think that Typhoeus was its mother and the Minotaur its father, but I've got a different idea, O great King. I hold the view that monsters such as they are composed of both sexes, and that in their horrible embraces, first one and then the other played male and female and that this appalling progeny is like themselves half male and half female. At any rate our six wise men tell us that it has grown to be as large as if Typhoeus and the Minotaur were joined together.

They tell us, but mark you, O great King, I cannot speak with any assurance about this for I have not dared to go near that cave, and they say the monster satisfies its hunger at night and sleeps in the day. They say all the animals it meets at night are so terrified by it that they fall into a fainting-fit and all it has to do is to put out its tongue and lap them up, chew them, bones and all, a little while, between its jaws, and then swallow them! Big and little, all that it scares into this fainting-fit, down into its stomach they go. Think, O great King, what it must feel like to see this monster, the biggest monster the universe has ever known, if you met it by moonlight! Well! I have delivered my message; and now with your permission, O great Lord of the underworld, I will return to my companions.'

Having thus spoken the satyr rushed away at the same speed with which he had come; and King Hades, looking round at them all, especially at Tang and the two goddesses, for it was clear to Sock and Pop and the Devil that he regarded women as far wiser than men, made no comment on the satyr's speech but this:

'The best thing we can do, my friends, is to go at once, before night comes on, to the acropolis of Pachydermata. There are weapons suitable for you all stored up there and its tower is so high and its walls are so thick that the biggest monster in the world couldn't break in. If it even approached we could shoot at it with arrows poisoned by the roots of Paddockia, a poison that causes its victims to eat their own flesh.'

Made to feel braver by these words, all the wraiths, including Demeter and Persephone, followed King Hades across the plain. Nor was it long before they were aware of a row of mounds on the horizon at the sight of which King Hades quickened his pace and they all followed. Faster and faster they went, till the mounds were just before them, a long row of them, each as high as a tall tower. King Hades led them to the centre one which was taller than the rest; and here he stopped. They all regarded it with astonishment. It was apparently just a massive mound of enormous height entirely composed of green grass. But Hades now approached a square edifice at its base of about six feet square. This edifice he entered and proceeded to do something in its interior. Then he came out holding in his hand some sort of long, thin, silver chain.

All the wraiths who were watching him gathered close together and made a half-circle round him, Demeter and Persephone among them. A weird feeling must have taken possession of them that warned them that something unusual was going to happen.

‘Come nearer, all of you,’ commanded Hades, ‘and stand on the pavement by my side.’ They all did as they were told to do and then once more there was a baffling and bewildering pause. Then King Hades cried aloud: ‘Draw back, grass! Rise, tower of the acropolis of Pachydermata!’

When he had spoken there came a hush that seemed to penetrate not only everybody present, for being wraiths they were easily penetrable, but even the Devil, who was standing on one leg in the middle of them and hopping up and down. The hush that came on them all lasted so long that finally the Devil stopped hopping and changed the leg he was standing on. But he still stood on one leg.

The hush that fell gave them the feeling that the world itself was making some tremendous decision; the decision, it might even be, to break into two halves and allow each half to fall away through empty space! Then it was that King Hades pulled the silver wire he held in his hand; and before their eyes the event occurred. Behind them the grass rose in a curving mass like a colossal living carpet. It rose to the height of about twenty feet and as it did so it rolled back leaving the mound bare. Then this strange hush like the premeditated silence before some great monarch’s execution seemed converted into a shadowy mist that surrounded the mounting up of an impregnable tower whose emergence gave to all who beheld it a weird sensation of dizziness, as if instead of it rising up, they were sinking down.

There must have been some esoteric machinery within that little portico that had the power of revealing, if properly handled, this tower that had been present there for thousands of years but had been overgrown by grass. Tang whispered to her brother: ‘It isn’t really rising. What is happening is that all this grass has such a quantity of earth-mould under it that as it lifted off with all that weight of mould clinging to it, and the fortress is revealed it gives us the feeling that those walls are rising up. They’re not rising up,’ repeated Tang confidently. ‘They have been there all the time! Just look at them, Wang. Did you ever see anything like them? No wonder’ — she lowered her voice— ‘our King here has memories of them associated with his mother. His mother probably was always telling him about them when he was little. Children love to hear about battles and castles and forts and towers. Walls more than six feet thick would suggest every sort of fairy-story to their minds. O Wang, O Wang! Just look at those walls! That awful monster, the child of the Minotaur and Typhoeus, couldn’t with all his force, if he butted against them every night for a hundred years break those walls down!’

It was then that they beheld King Hades emerging from the main arch of the fortress and heard his voice calling upon them all to enter. They obeyed him joyfully, the Devil skipping in front of them and the ghosts of the two goddesses following them with dignity and grace. Once inside this ancient fortress they all became very quickly aware as to who it was who ruled within it. This was Hecate, the daughter of Perseus and Asteria. Hecate was the only one of all the gods and goddesses in the world who was an only child; and this endowed her with peculiar honours. She exercised authority in every region, upon sea, upon land, in earth, in air, in fire, in water. As Hesiod explains to us, Zeus himself from the start treated her with more honour and respect than any other being in the world, more than Hera his wife, more than Pallas Athene his daughter. And if any mortal upon earth, Hesiod hints, has any deep secret wish he longs to see satisfied, whatever its nature may be, the divinity to whom he or she were wise to pray was Hecate. No other god or goddess could answer them or help them as she could.

Neither Wang or Tang had ever known this before; but never in their whole existence, whether as living young people or as ghosts had they encountered anyone of either sex so appealing to them as Hecate was. And she had the same magic power over King Hades who seemed unable to take his eyes off her and kept following her as docilely as if she were the long-lost sister of his mother. She and Hades and the Devil being the only beings present who weren't ghosts, it was peculiarly interesting to Sock and Pop and Wang and Tang to see what Hecate's attitude was to the ghosts of the two goddesses. Talking about it later with her brother, Tang declared that Hecate was perceptibly uneasy in their presence.

'It must have been a shock to her,' Tang said, 'to see two goddesses of her own class as Olympian immortals reduced to the level of ordinary earthly phantoms.' No doubt Hades must have explained at once to her how Demeter died of grief when he carried of! her daughter and how Persephone deliberately committed suicide at her mother's shrine, but that tragic story obviously couldn't have reduced two world renowned goddesses to the level of Sock and Pop and Wang and Tang. There is no doubt that this encounter was bound to cause agitation if not shame to Hecate who must have seen endless human ghosts ere this without dreaming that it would be her fate to meet at last the ghosts of the two goddesses.

But Tang and her brother could see that the charm of Persephone and the dignity of her mother soon assuaged the first impact of this shock; and they noticed how in the subsequent conversations between the two goddesses and their hostess all seemed quite harmonious. Tang herself couldn't resist asking Hecate whether she had not felt terribly lonely as she spent all these thousands of years by herself in this desolate fortress below the Pacific Ocean.

'You must remember, dear child,' the goddess answered, 'that I've always been much more lonely than you. I'm the only Olympian in the world without brother or sister or son or daughter. From my childhood till now I've always had long hours by myself with nobody to talk to. The world of women and men and goddesses and animals and birds and fishes has had to pass me by for many thousands of years without arousing in me any very great interest.'

Tang gazed at the dark-haired being bending over her like a kindly nurse and had the presumption to ask her another question. 'What did interest you, O great goddess, in these crazy persons and mixed-up happenings that were always whirling past you?'

'I will tell you exactly, my dear child, what did,' Hecate replied with a smile that made Tang feel more at home than she'd felt for years. 'I've always liked telling myself stories. I used to do this when I was very little and I've done it ever since. I pretend, for instance, that I have a brother who is a giant and a sister who has wings and can fly. I used to pretend that my sister was always flying to Olympus to ask Zeus questions; but, though I have stopped doing that as I've got older, still when I'm alone, as I've been lately for a thousand years, for where my parents have gone, or why they deserted me, I have not the faintest idea, I often pretend that my giant bother and my sister with wings have made such friends with laughter-loving Aphrodite that she has appointed them guards of honour or her official agents and I go on pretending all sorts of exciting adventures for them both as they help this daughter of Ouranos and her wild and desperate devotees to satisfy their love for each other and their violent hatred of all that oppose them. Lately I've even gone so far — I wonder if that thought came to me from the neighbourhood of this monster — to imagine them being encouraged by Aphrodite to have a love-affair with each other! But I mustn't,' here she paused and smiled sweetly at Tang and Wang, 'encourage you two to have a love-affair; though your parents may be as far away as mine are!'

Wang and Tang glanced knowingly at each other as their minds flew back to various incidents in former days that answered only too well to what Hecate said, but they were spared any reply by the voice of the Devil:

'Why is it, O great goddess who knowest all, that long before the death of the being formerly known as God, there was a curious set of elderly women in the world who were so attracted to me as to crowd together in any pace I frequented and allow me to embrace them one after another till finally I would work them up into such a rapture of being raped that they would dance round me in an ecstasy. They abandoned themselves to this to such an extent that I used to select certain particular places, for regular meetings with them, to which they always came and were always obsessed by the same mad excitement. They were all elderly, mind you, not young like our girl-friend Tang here: and they seemed to derive some kind of magic power from it that enabled them to do any harm they wanted to anyone they had a hatred for. Witches — yes! that's what people called them and people seemed at once attracted to them and horrified by them. Will you tell me, O great goddess, what it was about me that so attracted elderly women in those days and why they have ceased to feel like that? You might also tell me, if your kindness can extend as far as that, what it was that after He had gone to the limit in inventing a fiery hell for his enemies where He could gloat over their suffering in the flames and be always whispering in their ears “You know this isn’t for only a million years! This is for ever and ever and ever, world without end, Amen,” this appalling being called God whom Paul of Tarsus told everybody was the incarnation of love, but whom Jesus knew when they were crucifying Him had been deceiving Him all his life, what it was, I am asking you, yes! what it really was that led this monster of a revengeful God full to the brim of this feeling that Saint Paul calls love but which clearly was the most vindictive hatred that the universe has ever known, what it was, I’m asking you, that led this “God of love” to disappear?’

Before Hecate could reply to the Devil’s questions King Hades intervened and called upon them all to enter the fortress. This they all did; and they ascended the eight massive steps that confronted them, Hecate leading Hades by the hand, and at every step turning round to encourage the four earthly ghosts and the two Olympian ghosts in their more difficult, because more bewildered ascent, Sock and Pop helping each other, and Wang and Tang helping each other, for each stone step was more than two feet high.

‘I should have thought,’ said Tang to Wang, ‘that since we’ve no material flesh and bones to heave up we could glide up more easily.’

‘It’s mental,’ replied the clever Wang. ‘You see we’re watching Hades and Hecate, both of whom have their flesh and bones; and that makes it hard to glide in our natural ghostly way. But look, my dear! I glided then all right, didn’t I?’ Tang looked and glided too; and so also, for they were watching them, did Sock and Pop. As for the two goddesses, they were already floating on each side of Hades as Hecate helped him to mount.

Once at the top they all found themselves in a grandly spacious hall which had at its further end an iron ladder evidently leading up to the roof. In this spacious hall they all rested, drawing deep breaths of relief.

‘But we’re in day-light!’ cried Sock excitedly. ‘Where does the light come from?’

The King of the underworld explained at once.

‘You see, children,’ he said, ‘we have got a fortress here that the monstrous child of Typhoeus and the Minotaur can never enter. What we’ve got to realise though,’ he went on, ’is that as long as that monster is still alive in his cave it is never safe for any of us to leave this fort. This day-light here,’ he went on— ‘and this really ought to cheer us up a bit — comes from the other side of our world. Don’t you see, my dears, that the deeper we go — and the bottom of this Ocean under which we now are goes very deep — the nearer we get to the other side of our globe which is now in full day-light!’

‘Do you happen to know, O great and generous Hecate,’ enquired Tang, ‘what has happened to the God of the Christians worshipped so frantically by so many disciples?’

‘Yes,’ replied Hecate gently. ‘I do happen to know. But it’s a very painful story and I don’t like talking about it.’

‘Tell them, Hecate! Tell them at once!’ commanded Hades in his most imperious tone. ‘What’s the use of my being called Pluto by so many, and of my being for two thousand years the King of the whole underworld if people come here without knowing that this treacherous torturer who betrayed his greatest disciple, Jesus, is dead as a door-nail?’

‘Well! If you’ll all sit down on those benches,’ acquiesced Hecate, ‘and let me bring you some bread and wine, I’ll tell the whole story.’

They all obeyed her, while Hades, beckoning Wang and Tang to go with him, followed her down a passage into which the day-light had already entered. They soon were all partaking of some delicious loaves of bread, which Hecate must have baked, and of some wonderful wine which must have been very old indeed, but which age had not spoilt.

‘It was not very long ago,’ Hecate told them. ‘God was as usual enjoying the anguish of His enemies in the flames of the Hell He had invented for them when a group of these sufferers led by a man called Voltaire leapt upon Him and dragged Him down. They dragged Him so deep and held Him down so long that it created a terrific stir, and in the end several of these rebels managed to turn a great flood of water upon those ancient flames and thus extinguished them altogether. The fires of Hell being thus extinguished the men who had nearly burned God to ashes in God’s own carefully designed furnace which God had boasted to everybody was made to last forever, now dragged Him out and laid Him down upon a bank of smooth sand. Here they surrounded Him and kept asking Him a string of more troublesome questions than any man had ever been asked before. Their leaders, after the ghost of Voltaire, were two very curious ghosts. One was the Marquis of Sade and one was Gilles de Retz. I was told the whole story by Count Masoch who has become a very special friend of mine.’ At this there was an excited interruption from Tang.

‘O,’ she cried, ‘I’ve read all about him. He’s one of those people who’ve got a passion for being ill-used. He’ll even let you whip him quite hard for an hour without doing anything to resist. If you stop he cries “Go on! Go on! Whip me! Whip me! Whip me!”’

Hecate smiled graciously at Tang.

‘Yes, you’ve got him all right. But you can see, can’t you why he suits me so well. I want to know everything that goes on in the world, all the worst things especially. And as nothing delights Count Masoch more than watching cruelty, and even, very often, being treated cruelly, as long, of course, as he's in no danger of being killed, it is to him I go to hear stories of what's happening in this present world. This treatment of God, for instance, under the direction of the Marquis of Sade and Gilles de Retz was to my friend Masoch the most exciting thing he had ever seen. "Was Hell," I asked him, "entirely extinguished by this rebellion against God?" He told me it was; and that henceforth when governesses and nurses try to scare children into behaving well by threatening them with Hell the rumour about the end of God and the end of Hell has passed among the maid-servants in so many houses to such a wide extent that there's always a voice raised in protest against this way of making children good.'

All the four human ghosts together with the two ghost-goddesses were now comfortably sitting on a wooden bench sipping the wine and eating the special bread Hecate had brought with it.

'What I would like to ask you, Lady,' said the Devil, with a polite bow, touching as he did so the points of both his horns which everybody noticed and grown longer as he listened to what Count Masoch had told Hecate, 'is whether the tradition that I am descended from a wide-ruling Ox, whose horns helped him to rule the entire world before God was born, has any reality in it. I tell you, O wise and gentle goddess, that I frequently have felt, especially since I have been serving King Hades or King Pluto, for he likes to be known by both these names, a very curious sensation in my horns, a sensation as if they had recently been released from carrying the weight of all the wicked things ever done in the world. By this I mean the sort of things imagined by the Marquis of Sade and done by Gilles de Retz. This may easily be, O wise goddess, a natural mistake; because whenever I've heard learned men of the kind whom God has got lodged in Hell because they are too learned to believe in Him, talk about me they always say that my quarrel with this inventor of eternal flames is a very ancient one, one that goes back to the days when as an almighty World-Ox I lived near this God in Heaven. The Jews invented a rebellious angel called Satan who in many ways seemed to have more resembled a serpent than an ox and the Greeks who invented Typhoeus the dragon and the woman-worshipped child-eating bull in the labyrinth of Crete, are both twisting the real truth of the tradition from which I come in quite erroneous directions. I have nothing in my ancestral horns resembling that creation of women's lust, the Minotaur. Listen to my own rhyme about myself:

> "My horns did over the whole world rule.
> They made every man look an ass and a fool.
> They made every girl lose her way to her school.
> They made every babe see a whale in each pool."'

'What would you do, my Lord Devil,' enquired Wang, after a mischievous glance at Tang, 'if on some night as you walked in the fields you saw the monster from the cave coming towards you?'

'Lead him a dance,' the Devil answered with a grin. 'I'd run towards him and when he bent down to gobble me up I'd slip under his belly and come out by his tail. And when he swung round to catch me I'd give his ugly snout such a jab with one of my horns that he'd jerk up his head as if I'd stabbed him with a dagger; and that would give me my chance and I would press my head down and force it forward till one horn went into the hole under his right aim and the other into the hole under his left arm. Then I would press both my feet into the ground to give me all the upward swing of my neck that I had the power to make, and in spite of his size, while my feet under his weight sank into the sand, I would hoist up his monstrous head, till the two points of my horns came out through his shoulders. And the least move he might try to make to bend down would cause him the Devil's own discomfort. Thus our two bodies would be locked closely together; and together they would remain for a brief moment. Then with a terrific jerk I would pull my horns out.'

'But please tell us, O great Hecate,' Tang begged her, rather to the annoyance, she could see, of the Devil, who had still plenty more he wanted to tell them about his horns, 'how long it was before God died after they had destroyed His Hell and got Him lying helpless upon the sand in the light of day?'

'Their difficulty in finishing Him off quickly was derived,' Hecate replied, 'from the fact that they were all ghosts; and although God had especially invented His Hell so as to cause ghosts the greatest anguish they could suffer, the absence within them of any bones or any flesh or any blood did, as God had been forced to recognise from the start, considerably mitigate what they would have had to go through if they had not had to die before He could get them down there. The grand revolution in Hell which had paralysed God hadn't turned him into a ghost, and God was, like King Hades and myself, and unlike Demeter and Persephone here, fully possessed of flesh and blood and bones. God was like a Greek god, like Cronos or Zeus or Apollo, or like our Demeter and Persephone before they became ghosts. The tragic thing,' Hecate continued, 'about His death was the appearance at his side of Saint Paul who was, as I tell everybody, the real inventor of the Trinity and of the whole Christian religion. Saint Paul was now himself a ghost but he knelt down by God's side and kissed all he could discern of his physical organs. "You are love," he kept whispering to Him. "I have made that clear to all the world. You are love and all we who love you love each other and love birds and fish and beasts and plants and rocks and stones and trees. Love flows forth from the very thought of you. As I have told the world a thousand times over, ‘God is love’ and the love of God fills the entire world with faith, hope, and charity. It is impossible for you, O God who art love, to pass away from us thy worshippers. We are you. You are us. You have filled the world with love like the sky with air and the ocean with water. You and love are one and we your worshippers are bound together with you. All is love and there is nothing left out. Whatever these devils have done to you, O Lord our God, it matters not. You are love and we in you and in love are with you in Heaven for ever.”

‘Thus did Saint Paul talk to Him and then hurried home to write about it. But a little fisher-boy came up to Him on the shore where they had laid Him: and God felt friendly to this boy and very soon began telling him the whole history of His life.

‘“You’ve heard of Jesus?” The boy nodded. “Well, at the last he cried, ‘It is finished.’ And that was after he had accused me of deserting him. But what did he think? I have never had the magical resilience that Jesus had. I am not an enchanter like him. And as for ‘the Comforter’ as he called it, this confounded white sea-gull has been pestering me ever since those devils laid me here! That man who has just gone, sonny, is Paul of Tarsus, Parisee of The Pharisees. He made them kill with stones Jesus’ disciple Stephen. And now he has made this flapping and flipping white bird come out of the sea and whirl about my head. Go away, Comforter! Go away Holy Ghost! Can’t I at least, if I’m accepted as God, be allowed to die in peace? Yes, sonny, I’ve had a strange life! I was a stable-boy in Bethlehem and heard all that fuss about Herod and John the Baptist and Salome and Joseph and Mary and Mary’s aunt, the black-faced gypsy, and Peter and Pilate, and Matthew, Mark, Luke and John. O how they all talked about God! At first I thought they meant our old Jewish Jehovah but I very soon found out that they didn’t. Then I wondered, since everybody was ‘appealing to Caesar’ and referring to Jupiter, and quoting Lucretius or Virgil or Horace, whether the only thing for me to do was to find some rich traveller who was going to Rome. And quite unexpectedly — none of these devils know that — I fell in love with a little Greek girl who told me all about Zeus and Cronos and Hera and Pallas Athene and Prometheus. This little girl died of a fever; and I was so unhappy and so lonely that I got a job as cabin-boy — I guess you know what they’re like, Sonny? — on board a ship going East. And then do you know, Sonny, what came into my head? Don’t ‘ee be shocked kiddy; but it came into my head that one day when I was grown up and had a beard I would pretend to be one of these Greek gods my little girl told me about.

‘“I won’t tire you out, sonny, with the tale of my life at sea and abroad. So many things happened to me that I can’t remember half of them now. But I had one experience, when I was about forty and when I did have a bushy beard though it wasn’t long or grey as it is now, about which I will tell you. I was in some Eastern country — I think it was Ethiopia though I wouldn’t swear to that — where they were believers in magic and had several magicians who used to practise it. I got talking to these magicians and I gathered from them that no man ever knew until he had tried several times whether he could practise magic or not. You are either born with it they told me or you are not. Well, sonny, I tried. And I found I was born with it; and not only so but born with it to an infinitely greater extent than any of them. Parallel with this discovery — caused I suppose by all my rough and disconcerting experiences — I found out that I had acquired a deep and permanent hatred of the human race. What I longed for more than anything else in the world was to have the power to cause human beings, men and women, old and young, excruciating pain. The Marquis of Sade who has only just stopped asking me questions while Gilles de Retz was enjoying prodding my kidneys and liver and bowels and what's left of my lungs and heart with a skewer, tried to make out that the pleasure I have had in burning people in Hell and hypnotising them with the idea that it would go on forever, is due to what he calls sadism. But O sonny! He is absolutely wrong! It is due to one thing only; namely hatred. I like burning people in Hell simply because I hate people. Nobody knows, nobody will ever know how I hate them. I am dying now, sonny, but don't 'ee be frightened. You like to listen to me and you'll be interested in watching how I die. You and I resemble each other in our interest in things. When I found out in Ethiopia — if it was Ethiopia — what magical power I had, power over all the elements, power over earth, water, air and fire, I felt just as you're feeling now as you listen to me telling my story. You would have had exactly the same thoughts about it all as I had; and now if you were me, an old fellow who has been pretending for a thousand years to be God simply because He hates, after his wretched experience of them, the whole human race and longs to make them suffer for being what they are, if, I say, you were me, sonny, I swear you'd do exactly as I do. But that's a silly thing to say! I meant to say that you, being in my position and hating humanity like I do would act very much as I do. But perhaps you wouldn't. Perhaps you'd just run away from the whole lot and live in a cave like this monster they're all talking about."'

As Hecate now began to tell them about this little friend whom God managed to make at the very end of his life, Tang couldn't help crying out: 'But hasn't Count Masoch told you anything about how this poor, poor, dying God endured all that talk of Saint Paul's ghost about love?'

Hecate instinctively looked round as if expecting Count Masoch to be somewhere about; but then she smiled gently. 'No,' she said, 'he didn't tell me any more; and when at last I met somebody from the part of the country whence that kid had come and asked about him, as far as I could gather from what the person said the little boy's whole nature had changed after that talk with God when God died. He had become very silent and very reserved. Instead of seeking the companionship of other boys, I was told, he would go about alone. But suddenly to everybody's surprise he made great friends with an old lady who lived by herself. She gave him a room in her house and he went on all her errands and every night in the winter by a big fire he had helped her to make she would read to him Grimm's Fairy Tales.'

'Did this boy,' Tang eagerly enquired, 'see the actual death of God?'

'Yes,' Hecate replied, 'he did. The person who told me about it said that at the end he knelt down at the back of God's skull and pushing away the cloak that was there he substituted for it his own little belly while he clung to God's forehead with his clasped hands and chanted a chant which he must have been repeating to himself in expectation of this moment for quite a while.

> "Think only of sleep, great God of my soul,
> No psalm will I sing; no bell will I toll
> But so close to my heart is the back of your head
> That I don't know if you or if I am the dead."

'A fisherman coming past found them in this position and for a moment he did think they were both dead but the boy spoke when he touched them and he soon lifted them both into his boat.'

CHAPTER XIV

Now that God was dead and the little boy was happy with his old lady, Hades with his four human ghosts and two goddess ghosts, pondered what he would do and where he would go. Once again did the all-wise, Zeus-favoured, brotherless and sisterless only child, the Goddess Hecate, solve the problem.

‘What you must do, King Hades,’ she told him, ’is the bravest and most startling thing ever done in the whole history of the universe. We all see around us, as we sit here at the bottom of the Pacific Ocean, the light of another day beginning to pierce through the rondure of our global earth. Well, great Hades, you and I, who are the only beings here with living bodies — I won’t say with thinking minds, for we both know how cleverly ghosts can think, especially ghosts who in their lifetime have been goddesses — are bound to know, and we do know only too well what it feels like to be souls or spirits or thinking minds boxed up in living bodies. Now, listen to me, King Hades, and you will soon see from what I am advising you to do how little I shall gain by it, in fact how much, how very much indeed, I shall lose by it, for if you follow my advice I shall lose you as a personal friend altogether. I shall be in touch with you. I shall be part of you. But that is a very different thing from being a friend and adviser as I have been so long and as I am now. When you hear what I advise you you will see what I am doing. I am sacrificing myself entirely on your behalf. It’s not exactly as if I advised you to eat me up.’ And here Hecate smiled at Hades just as she had done so often at Tang. ‘And it doesn’t amount to your leaving me forever, for we shall be together forever, but it does amount to my no longer being your own personal friend and adviser.'

Hades stood stark still and stared at her. Vainly, vainly, vainly he tried to imagine what she was going to suggest.

'Not suicide, surely?' he thought. 'Nor can it be that she wants me to marry her and make her the Queen of the underworld?' He gazed at Persephone as if seeking help from her. And then he turned his agitated eyes upon Demeter and seemed to be imploring her as the chief victim of his supreme wrong-doing to save him at this crucial moment. But neither of the goddess-ghosts answered his appeal.

'Well,' he said to Hecate, 'if I must do it, I must do it. I know your influence with the Olympians and you used to have influence too with these human ghosts. I confess I feel more nervous than I usually do in the presence of a woman. But you must tell me, Hecate, what you mean, and I must ponder on it.'

'What you don't realise, O Hades,' said Hecate firmly, 'and it may be that your nature is so constructed that it is impossible for you to realise it, is that a King of the underworld cannot remain without a kingdom any more than can any other King.'

'Never mind kingdoms!' cried Hades. 'Tell me straight away what it is you advise me to do.'

Hecate came up to him and they stood facing each other while she told him.

'We live,' she said, 'in a universe with a sun and a moon and vast galaxies of stars as well as our sun's planets. What exists beyond our universe we do not know and probably never shall know. Our earth has her towering ranges of high mountains and so probably has our sun and our moon. The mass of rock and mould and sand and clay and flint and granite and adamant which composes the material substance of our earth and of the sun and moon and all the stars and planets is overwhelming to think of. But since our own physical bodies with all their flesh and blood and bones from the crowns of our heads down to our toe-nails are made of matter it cannot surprise you if I maintain it to be possible for the whole material universe of which we are a part to have its one soul, one spirit, one faintly, dimly, obscurely conscious identity. Well then, O great King Hades why will not you, from being Lord of the underworld, become Lord, or rather the inmost soul of this whole material universe? Plunge, my dear Hades, plunge, dive, sink into the whole great mass of universal matter and become its living soul! Yes, my King! become its universal Pan, its dare-devil Dionysian innermost spirit of life!'

Sock and Pop and Wang and Tang had all been listening to Hecate's oration with baited breath. After the finale of her speech which sounded like a Declaration of Independence for some vast suppressed Cosmic Hippopotamus, the shrill childish voices of all four human ghosts and the clearly ringing celestial voices of the two goddess-ghosts burst out into protest 'Don't leave us! Don't leave us! Don't desert us! O Hades, great King of the underworld! If you sink into the mountains, if you lose yourself in the abysses of planet after planet and star after star, what will become of us your ghostly disciples? We have no rocks or crags or cliffs or gorges or toppling ridges to stride about over! Where shall we be with our shadowy hopes and our bodiless fears? This huge rocky mass of matter in sun, moon and stars, and the motes and atoms of space too, will be your Buffalo-like, your Rhinoceros-like, your Mammoth-like body while in the heart of it all like the murmurings and rumblings of a volcano your cries to be released from your cosmic, your geological, your corporeal frame, your howlings to be allowed to shake off your rocks and stones, your barriers and your bastions, your bumbershelves and your barricades, your palisades and your puddle-dumps, will very soon reveal to all students of reality and experts in escapism that it was not the natural world-heart of an earthy, airy, watery, fiery, rocky body of matter but just simply the mischievous antic-prancing and clownish kick-up dancings that some mocking intruder has beguiled you to undertake!'

'Don't you listen to them, Hades!' said Hecate, quietly. 'Not one of them has the faintest idea of what you will feel if you do what I am now suggesting. Take the plunge, my dear friend, take the plunge! Just give one steady glance at the whole vast mass of matter which our universe offers you, and take the plunge! Say to it, "I Hades, King of the underworld, am now becoming the soul of all the matter in the universe."'

Hades rose to his full height. He did look ready to do exactly what she said. But a pitiful cry rose up from Sock and Pop and Wang and Tang together with the sound of sobs from the two Olympian wraiths. Then Hecate turned to all of them.

'Will you take me with you?' she asked them, speaking quite calmly. 'Because I like being with you and I have come to understand you all and I think I can help you.'

The four human wraiths looked at her with intense earnestness, while the goddess-wraiths stopped weeping. Then it was that a sudden inspiration took possession of Tang.

'If, before you plunge into the heart of all the mountains in the world,' she cried solemnly, addressing Hades, but glancing at Hecate as she spoke, 'you were to know exactly where we all were, wouldn't it make this plunge into being the soul of all matter in existence easier?'

Hades looked straight at the young ghost-girl and nodded gravely.

'It certainly would,' he said, 'but how can I know where you will all be?'

‘It is just that,’ replied Tang, ‘that I’ve been thinking about Switzerland. Switzerland will always be the freest country in the world, won’t it? Well! In Switzerland, near the Alps there is a chapel dedicated to William Tell, the champion of freedom. If we all were to decide to make that chapel, yes! that chapel of William Tell, our home you would know where we were at any time and we would be able at any time to communicate with you our Lord and master now become the Soul of Matter.’

CHAPTER XV

'WELL SAID, MY sweet little ghost!' cried Hecate tenderly. 'Yes! That is where we will take up our abode from henceforth and forever! Or at least as long as you four human ghosts with your two Olympian ghosts keep in touch with our King Hades, as I myself always shall!

'So make your plunge, old friend, and all of you follow me to William Tell's chapel in the Swiss Alps. All the other mountains in the world will gradually grow aware of our being there. Plunge down, O Hades of my heart, into the majestic body of the Cosmos! We your disciples, with your friend Hecate to help, will keep in touch with you at William Tell's chapel. You will be with us, won't you, Devil?'

The Devil chuckled and bowed his horns and wagged his tail; and off they all flew to William Tell's chapel, while King Hades with a groan and a grunt and a grimace made his plunge and became the living soul of the whole material world.

CHAPTER 1

IGNESCO AND AQUATICUS looked at each other with the sort of smile that men always allow to flit across their face when they are momentarily conscious of their superiority to women in some small practical matter which they take very seriously but which, they know well, women take so lightly that they could hardly be said to consider it at all.

Then Ignesco said, ‘What we must specially bear in mind is that it isn’t just the making useless to them of this long extended crack or crevice or chasm in the mountain-side. It is making it useless in a particular way. We must turn it into something so profoundly melancholy, something so suggestive of utter, final, abysmal despair, that these two enemies of ours will be driven, by what they now see their refuge really is, to forsake it for ever and ever and ever and ever.’

“But how in the name of all this abomination of desolation,’ demanded Aquaticus, ‘shall we be able to make these two women see that the bravado which led them to defy us from this line of caves is more likely to end with our driving them to the verge of insanity than that this mad retreat of theirs should lead us into worshipping them as if they were a pair of terrifying goddesses.’

‘How, do you ask?’ roared Ignesco ferociously. ‘I’ll soon tell you how! The thing for me to do is to burn them out by igniting all the dead leaves and withered roots and inflammable peat and ancient tree-trunks that are to be found near these caves. Don’t you see, my good friend, it is clear they have a passage or corridor running along inside the mountain and connecting all their caves. So they couldn’t escape by slipping out of one and slipping back into another. What I suggest doing is lighting a fire that will burn all the way along whatever sort of passage they've got connecting their caves. Then of course you and I will be on the look-out outside, and the moment we see them emerging from any one of their caves we'll make a rush for them and finish them off!'

'And, of course,' replied Aquaticus, rubbing his hands with pleasure, and glancing sea-ward; for the shore was quite near and from where they stood talking they could see the curves of the pebbly beach with the ocean-waves breaking upon it in feathery flickerings of far-flung foam, 'and of course,' Aquaticus went on, 'if you haven't finished them off I'll bring up a good sea-wave to do the job.'

Little did they know, these two easy-going men, that their counter-parts, the women they were conspiring against, were listening to every word of this discussion. Aera, the elder and wiser of the two, was lying full-length in a comfortably concealed shelter, within a few yards of where the men were talking, but about a dozen yards under their feet.

Terra was leaning back languidly at Aera's side in a suspended swing of the most delicately twisted strands of silk and satin that quivered as lightly under her weight as if they were butterflies' wings. 'What about giving the two of them,' murmured Terra, 'a couple of days in Airy-Fairy? Wouldn't that bring down their impertinence a bit?'

'Airy-Fairy is a good place,' replied the other lady, 'for giving troublesome boys a lesson, but don't you think, my dear, it's rather too Squeasy-Wheezy for elderly fellows like this pair?'

'No!' exploded Terra. 'No! They may think because our corridor joins all our caves that if they fill that with fire or water we shall perish. But Airy-Fairy will show them we've got other resources!'

It was not very long after this conversation between Aera and Terra that Ignesco and Aquaticus decided to examine the shrubs and plants which grew at the foot of the mountain-cave which was nearest to the shore of the sea. Ignesco had explained to his friend, who was less of a botanist than he was, that, if certain particular growths could be found outside these caves and outside the corridor which the two men had already decided must extend all along the mountain behind the visible apertures, it was pretty certain that they would be found also growing inside the corridor and inside all the caverns along its entire front. ‘If once we got these things thoroughly on fire,’ Ignesco said, ‘and if you really could, as you hinted once that you might be able to do, call up a fierce wind from the sea, we could start such a blaze that no crack or corner would be free from it.’

‘But what’s this?’ suddenly yelled Aquaticus. ‘I’m sinking down! There’s some bloody hole here! Take care, for Heaven’s sake Igny old boy! Take care!’

But both men did sink down, and indeed they sank down so fast and so far that it was with quite a violent shock and jerk that they reached the floor. They picked themselves up however without being strained or stunned or hurt in any way.

‘By the horns of the Devil,’ cried Aquaticus, ‘these wenches have won the first round of our battle already! They’ve got us in some bloody prison of theirs! How, by the Hammer of Thor, are we going to get out of this?’ They walked up and down and round and round. Yes! they certainly were caught. The chamber they were in resembled the inside of an enormous Bell. And above their heads there actually was a bell-ball hanging down that obviously if pulled by a brazen cord they saw attached to it would make, as it struck the metal walls of the chamber they were in, a resounding clamour, that they knew at once would be carried far and wide.

Meanwhile both Terra and Aera having left their comfortable resting-place were enjoying the spectacle of their enemies' condition. They had long ago invented this Prison which they called 'Airy-Fairy', and they had seen to it that there was a hollow peep-show pipe descending from the cave above and reaching into the top of this hollow bell-cell in such a manner that those imprisoned there could not possibly be conscious of its presence. The two ladies above had to whisper to each other as they bent over the upper orifice of this tube but the loud voices of the two men, as they walked round and round their prison and banged on its brazen walls and stamped on its adamantine floor, were as audible as a thunder-storm. Are we justified in complaining of it as an unfortunate thing that all the human impressions we have of the world around us are so individual? No, I think we are not. Why have we discovered Mirrors if not to get more than passing glimpses of what our own figures and faces have in them that is worthy of interest? What each one of us must do is enjoy to the utmost limit of our power the spectacle of the world around us as it is in its entirety; and if our own face appears in a mirror or our own figure in its shadow upon wall or door or ground we must accept both these things as an essential part of the whole spectacle.

As Aera whispered to Terra at the mouth of the tube leading down to Airy Fairy she grew more amazed than ever and more enchanted than ever by the incredibly sweet depths of her friend's black eyes. 'We talk,' Aera said, 'about the beauty of black eyes; but there's more than just beauty in these eyes of yours, Terra, my darling. The black eyes of a girl like you contain a path, a passage, a porch, into some secret essence of life that is simply infinite, some vein in the nature of the universe that goes on and on and on, until we feel that nothing can end it! The blackness of such eyes as yours, my precious, is part of the mystery of the darkness which surrounds us every night of our lives, the darkness without which we could not sleep nor could our weary spirit rest. Our life depends upon day and night as much as it depends upon good and evil and upon love and hate. The deeper, O my precious one, I look into your eyes, the more I know that life would never be what it is if it weren't for its opposite. And, do you know, sweetest, I'd even go so far as to say that there is in our love for what we love most, always, always, always, always, a strange, actual, living element of the same ingredient that we make use of when we hate. And shall I tell you what this essence is that we use both in love and hate? Think for a moment, my precious, think, think, think, think, and you'll catch my meaning. It's the animal-instinct, the bird-instinct, the insect-instinct, perhaps even the reptile-instinct and the fish-instinct, to — to — to — to do what? To gobble up, to eat up, and to swallow down! Yes, it is when we devour our best loved food that love and hate are united in the same physical delight. As I watch your face, my darling, while I talk to you now, it is revealed to me that kissing is an instinctive substitute for devouring.'

'O you are so right, my dear!' cried Terra, 'for I too, as I touch your fair curls which are as tender and white as the early dawn, know well that I want to blend myself with that dawn, to dive into that magical pallor which precedes any touch of our sun's warmth, to swim in that dawn-light, to dissolve in that dawn-light, to drown in that dawn-light, and to drink, drink, drink of that divine white light till I am carried away in ravishment of it till I have possessed myself of its last, last, last drop!'

Without the faintest intimation that they were being watched and listened to both the men felt a tiny bit humiliated by their imprisonment.

'Well, Aqua, old man, these confounded wenches have got the better of us at the start,' growled Ignesco. 'But we'll wallop them! We'll beat them up! We'll do for them! What they don't realize is that we're not just a pair of sea-beach tramps, or Hydrogen-Bomb loafers on strike, or side-line blokes from a cinema-gang wanting a bit of fun. What it's up to us to do is to make use of our own weapons which are things far more formidable than cunningly devised bell-hanger cells! What do they think they are, these devil-may-care flitterflies from Graymalkin's camp-fire or Paddock's back-yard? What we must bring to bear on them are the great elements of fire and water that you and I have learnt to control.'

'By Gog and by Saint Goggery, you've got it, Igny, old friend!' cried Aquaticus. 'Do these little Sylphids, these squeasy Sirens, these wheezy witches, these Naiads of Nothing, these Nereids of Naught, these Nymphetts of Never-Land, these Ariels of Lapity-Lip, these Cressids of Crinkle-mass, these Lovelies of Lingerlong, these Mimsy Maids of Mummery, these Tickle-Tits of Tallow-Tells, these Randy-Cats of Hollow Bells, actually think they can withstand storm-trainers and furnace-flingers like you and me?'

As they addressed each other the two men leaned their backs against opposite sides of the interior of their bell-prison. 'What they don't understand,' vociferated Ignesco, 'is the conquering nature of Fire. They think of fire either as hot coals in a cosy grate where we can sit reading a novel or as a well assorted kitchen-range at which every kind of good meal can be cooked. But what they should remember is that Fire is a living spirit, an individual power, a unique force, a being with an absolute mastery that is all its own, a Being that may very likely carry within itself the memory of a cosmic epoch when no other element existed, when in fact what Fire fed upon was something within itself, something that it could not devour just because it was itself, something that was the essence of its devouring power. Anyone who watches Fire at work will see at once what I mean. Each particular flame is like a growing entity of inscrutable size. At first it grows larger as it leaps upward. Then it suddenly grows smaller. But the smaller it grows the more piercing it grows. Every point of it finally comes to have the quality of a deadly arrow shot by itself at itself and for the sake of itself. It does not mount up to pierce the air. It mounts up because the air is nothing to it. It mounts up because the sky is nothing to it. It mounts up because the distance between earth and sky is nothing to it. As it mounts it narrows. As it narrows it becomes more penetrating. And as it penetrates, lo! the thing which it passes through has vanished and it alone remains. Fire becomes a sharp point. Each point has the whole being, the whole nature, the whole identity of the Fire from which it leaps forth. It can bend to the right. It can bend to the left. It can make an arched curve and dive down. The colour of Fire varies from primrose-yellow to rose-red. Yes! its colours are red and yellow; every shade of red, every flicker of yellow! And yet it has the power, so intensely living is its inmost essence, its burning soul, to take on, at special moments in its dartings and leapings, the passing flash of a wonderful blue! The soul of Fire is insane, terrifically insane. No flicker of mental intelligence governs its antics — no! not antics, for Fire is a terribly serious creature —, its flaming activities —.' Then it was that Aquaticus broke in. 'You are perfectly right about Fire, old friend, but nothing in the red or the yellow of Fire can compare with the blue of the Sea! "The Sea," as the Poet says, "sweeps on, and cries its old cry still, rolling along in dreams from hill to hill." Yes! you have to remember that as the Poet says, "You flee the persecution of her glory." When once anything or anyone is at the mercy of the Sea its only hope is complete yielding. It must flow with the tide; roll with the tide; rush with the tide; sink with the tide; drown with the tide. The waves of the Sea, the storm-rush of the Sea, the overpowering weight of the Sea envelops all, immerses all, encloses all, swallows up all, annihilates all.

All is taken into it. All becomes part of it — what was is no more — what is is no more — what will be is no more. All is now simply and solely water.'

'Not all, old friend,' threw in Ignesco, 'remember Fire. Yes! Whatever rôle or rule water may have, it cannot, it will not, it shall not, rage as it may, overcome Fire! "Before you were," Fire says to Water, "I am". And its words are true. "It was".' Then it was that Aquaticus got angry. 'Nonsense,' he cried. 'Everything that exists in our world comes out of the Sea. We have therefore a perfect right to conclude that all that exists in the Universe comes from Water. That mysterious "virtue" that Jesus once spoke of, when a certain woman clung to him for help, and he told his disciples that "something" had gone out of him was a reference to the unspeakable, indescribable, incontroversible, interminable, irrevocable, inexplicable, inexhaustible power that WATER alone, among all the things that we can feel and smell and see and hear, possesses in this life! Well, old friend,' Aquaticus concluded, 'I have decided what we must do to get out of here. This is not,' and Aquaticus stamped with his foot, 'bell-metal under our feet. It is the solid black rock of the mountain-side. Well, then; all we have to do, and we are strong enough for that if we do it together, is to walk out on to the mountain-side carrying this confounded prison of ours upon our heads. It'll need a terrific effort and we don't know what these girls may not try to do when they see us! But once out of here, with this bloody Bell on our heads, and in a position to send the thing roly-poly gammon-and-spinach down the slope, we'll be able to tackle these wenches on their own ground. Eh, brother stop-gap; eh, brother fire-work, eh, Igny-pigny, make the sparks fly?' Ignesco gazed at him for a moment in amazement. He had never expected anything so carefully considered, so wisely projected from his impetuous friend. But without another word exchanged between them they both rose to their full height, side by side, and taking it stoically, inexorably, and tremendously, they moved slowly, heaving the thing with every muscle they possessed, and although they sank a little into the earth they did manage to emerge on the mountain-side with the Bell on their heads. Then with a still greater effort they heaved it up and struggled out of it, leaving it to roll down the slope at its own volition.

The Bell didn't roll very far. There happened to be a rocky ridge about a hundred feet below and there it lodged and stuck fast.

'Come on! Let's go for them!' cried Ignesco, brandishing a short thick axe which he always kept stuck in a belt at his waist. Aquaticus drew his massive sword from its sheath and waved it savagely above his head; and both of them rushed to the nearest cave where a flickering smoke from the fire they had lit was floating upwards in broken and fragmentary feathers of vapour. When they reached the cave, however, they found no trace of any real fire. What they had lit was practically extinct, leaving nothing but these wayward flutterings of scattered smoke. It was terribly hot all the same when they entered the corridor at the back of the cave and began to follow its obscure course. As may well be believed both Terra and Aera were already by this time nearly a mile away. They were holding each other's hand and talking excitedly— 'Could we,' Aera was saying, 'find that little chamber again where last winter we hid our bows and arrows? It was this side of the cave I know; and they were carefully arranged because we found them so useful — don't you remember, sweetheart? — in shooting those sea-eagles! How well you cooked, Terra darling, that big one I shot through the heart! Do you remember how you made the sauce to go with it from those little fish I found in that pool in the reeds and from those lovely plants that grew around it? If those bows and arrows aren't spoilt by anything or stolen by anyone, and we could slip out with them behind these men, I swear I think we could finish them off! One single well-aimed arrow can kill a man as easily as it can kill an eagle or a badger! Come on, my dear, let’s see if they’re still safe there.’

CHAPTER 2

THEY FOUND THEIR bows and arrows and they slipped out through an aperture known only to themselves; and Providence, or perhaps it would be better to say Destiny, favoured their design. There in front of them were the backs of their two enemies, not far away, watching the last waverings of smoke from the fire they had started. Terra was the one to draw her bow and point her arrow; and Aera found it more natural to watch Terra in the act of shooting than to watch the effect of her shot. But the effect was startling to all concerned. The arrow hit Aquaticus through the shoulder and brought him crashing down to earth. Swinging round, Ignesco bent over his friend and pulled the arrow out of his shoulder and turned him over on his back. They smiled at each other but the wounded man was too badly hit to rise. Then another arrow came whizzing upon them which very narrowly missed Ignesco's face. At this the wounded man whispered to his friend to leave him as he was and pursue the two girls. This Ignesco did at once, and at top speed, brandishing his axe.

The sight of Ignesco with his axe rushing straight at them was too much for both the girls and they fled in terror. They were so frightened that, instead of taking refuge in the second of their caves as they drew near to it, they began clambering desperately up the face of the mountain. This business of climbing over rough and rugged rocks not only proved an extremely agitating move, but it also had the unlucky effect of separating the two girls. Aera was not only a much better climber than Terra, she was also a much faster runner, so that when their pursuer with his terrifying axe still in his hand had arrived close to Terra, Aera was completely out of sight.

Aera had one extraordinary sensation after another when she found herself alone, alone and running she had not the faintest idea where! Anyone who met her then would have been amazed at her appearance. Not only did her floating hair appear so fair that it looked almost white, but her whole body looked so transparent that she might easily have been taken for some small cloud that had by an accident of the weather assumed the shape of a fragile girl. The final sensation she had was the queerest of all. She felt she was on the point of meeting her true love. Aera had never been in love; but all her life long, since she was a little girl of seven or eight, she had told herself stories about her true love, who was always the one person whom she alone could guard, protect, and understand as he deserved to be protected and understood. Thinking of her true love now, she came drifting, sliding, gliding down-hill instead of up-hill. And suddenly, lo and behold! there he was, lying on his back on the grass! She bent over him. She knelt down by him. She lowered her head to his. She kissed him on the forehead.

‘Was it you who shot me?’ the man said. Aera sank down by his side. ‘No, no; it was Terra,’ she told him. ‘Your friend is running after her with an axe, but he won’t catch her, you may be sure of that! There’s nobody in the world can catch Terra when once she’s really off! Where did that arrow hit you? Does it hurt?’

‘In the shoulder,’ answered Aquaticus smiling. ‘He pulled it out and threw it away before he went after you.’

‘He’ll never catch Terra,’ the girl said. ‘He hasn’t a chance. Nobody can catch her when once she’s on the run. But listen, Mister! Let me lift you up a bit. You’ll feel better if I take your head on my lap.’ Aquaticus let her do exactly what she said. ‘O that feels heavenly! You are a wise, kind girl. It does hurt you know. I guess it’s bound to. I wonder if it’s stopped bleeding.’ She slipped her fingers under his shirt and when she drew them back she saw they were red with blood. ‘Not quite,’ she said gently. ‘I think I’ll take off your things where it hit you, and bind it up with a strip of my under-skirt. I’ve got some scissors here and some ointment too. I always carry that in my bag in case I scratch myself.’

While all this was going on down below, Ignesco with his axe was getting nearer and nearer to Terra. Suddenly she slipped on the side of a steep rock and came rolling down till she lodged in the entrance to a fox’s hole almost at his feet. He flung down his axe and bent over her. ‘You’re not hurt?’ he asked her. ‘You’ve not broken anything?’ ‘I don’t — think — so — no! — I don’t think so,’ she murmured brokenly. ‘But I feel as if I might have.’

Ignesco ran his two hands very gently up each of her arms. Then he did the same with each of her legs, moving his hands with special tenderness over both her knees. ‘No!’ he said, ‘I don’t think you’ve broken anything. Sit up a little, if you can, and lean against me, if it’s not too uncomfortable for you.’ She obeyed him, and he pulled her gently against him. ‘Your spine feels all right, I hope, and doesn’t hurt down at the bottom.’ Saying this he touched gently with his finger-tips the spot he indicated, gently stroking both her buttocks when he had done so. ‘No, my dear, I think you’re right,’ he said, ‘but I expect you’re a bit upset by the shock. You don’t feel sick, do you?’ ‘I could vomit just a weeny bit,’ she said, ‘if you’d let me go for a second.’ She crawled away from him for a little distance and did boldly and freely let herself be sick. Then she scrambled to her feet and kissed her hand to him. ‘I’m strong as a reindeer now,’ she cried. He went up to her. ‘Don’t go off again my dear. It’s so wonderful to have you. You know, it’s a funny thing, Terra — you see I know your name which is Latin for the old earth under all our feet — but the truth is I’ve never in all my days, and I’ll be thirty-five this October, ever had a girl-friend. My Dad was a sea-captain and my Mummy had eight children, four boys and four girls, but for some queer reason — O I've so often wondered what the reason was! — I've always been afraid of girls. Not exactly shy of them for I'm not that sort of man, but purely and simply scared of them. What I expect them to do to me I don't know! Perhaps some great-great-great-great grandfather of mine was caught by the Amazons when they ruled over Troy, made to rape half-a-dozen of them so that their race wouldn't die out, and then put to death. I've always had a queer shivering fit when I think of that Mound over the grave of the Queen of the Amazons outside the walls of Troy.

'Here, my Sweet, don't run away I beg you, I implore you! I'll get down on my knees and cling to your skirts if you try to leave me! I have a feeling I've never had in my life before. I want to belong to you! I want to be your slave, your possession, your inmost, secretest belonging! I want to be to you what a stick is to a blind man and a pair of knitting-needles to an old, old, old woman! It isn't that I want to possess you. No! It's that I want you to possess me! I want to be to you like an arm-chair, like a cup-board, like a carpet on the floor, like a bed you can lie down upon! Yes, like a table on which you can lay a white cloth and prepare cups and saucers and plates! I want you and me to be one not two! Let's have our arms and legs! O yes! and our heads and faces! But let's be ONE, you and I, Terra, my Precious girl! I tell you I never felt like this before, never, never, in all my thirty-five years upon earth! I'm mad, my dear, to belong to you, I tell you! To be yours. I want you to wheel and wave for me, to while and pine for me, to dance to my ditty with steps light and flitty, to cling to me tight till the day follows night, to invent a charade when the bull's in the yard, and to play Tommy Tiddle when I've guessed the great Riddle.'

The result of this rhythmical excitement in the nerves of Ignesco had its appropriate effect upon the nerves of Terra and before many minutes had passed they were both seated on a fallen log holding each other's hand and murmuring the old familiar confidences and confessions that men and women have whispered to each other on honeymoon nights since the human race came out of the sea.

The aura of the words used among the rocks by Ignesco and Terra travelled on the wind from the Sea till it met the aura of the words used by Aquaticus and Aera on the grassy slope of the mountain. Nor was this meeting of two auras free from contention. 'You are betraying us to abysses of earth-mould,' cried one aura. 'You are betraying us to fathoms of ocean-water,' cried the other aura.

CHAPTER 3

'May I ask if this is Mount Nameless or Mount Nobody Knows?' This question was put to Aera, as she sat talking to the wounded Aquaticus, by a rather scared and obviously very timid tramp. Aera replied at once, 'Better ask this gentleman; for I've never heard it called either of those things. I've been brought up to call it "The Mountain" as if it was the only one in the world.'

'I am sure, sir,' said the newcomer softly 'that I heard people talking in the bar of the Red Dragon at Powiggle about a couple of Ladies who had settled in a cave up here; and as I am writing a book about this coast I thought —.'

'You'd better take care, my good man,' cried Aera, 'hadn't he, Aqua? I happen to be one of these Ladies myself, and we have already had to punish severely persons who've come to meddle with us and our caves.' The timid intruder, whether tramp or scientist, turned anxiously to Aquaticus. 'Have you had a fall, sir?' he enquired. 'I see blood on your clothes.' Aera quickly answered for him. 'Yes, he has had a fall and hurt his shoulder. Perhaps you would like to help me carry him to our cave? My friend Miss Terra and I were vaguely hoping we might meet somebody like you but we never thought it really possible. We were both born near Powiggle but we've neither of us been interested in the history of property round here though we know people who swear their ancestors used to own this Mountain. My friend Mr. Aquaticus can tell you more about it than I can.'

Very gravely and seriously the wounded man, praying in his heart that they wouldn't stumble upon the bloodied arrow as they carried him, begged the visitor not to lift him up by his arm-pits but by his spine. ‘It isn’t far to their cave from here. Only about fifty yards I would say — aren’t I right, Aera?’ Aera admitted he was right and, after ducking down under the body the other was carrying and bearing quite a lot of the weight on her bent back, it wasn’t long before they reached the cave where Ignesco had started the fire. A few odds and ends of sticks were still smoking a little and a faint odour of burnt wood and scorched roots undulated round the cave’s entrance; but when they got their burden into the interior of the cave which its owners had used so long as a restful sitting-room that everything was quiet and peaceful and reassuring, the visitor felt he had indeed found something that was worthy of a whole chapter in his book, which, as he sat down in an armchair by the sofa where they had laid Aquaticus, he now decided he would name ‘The Coast of Wonderland’ and he boldly and bluntly enquired of his hostess if she and Aquaticus lived together here. Aera laughed. ‘O dear no!’ she told him. ‘What you heard at the Red Dragon was perfectly correct. This gentleman and a friend of his, whom I hope you will meet here before you leave us, were as anxious as you were to explore our caves, for this one, you must understand, is only one of a line of several of them, all opening out from a corridor stretching along the mountain-side.’ At this point Aquaticus couldn’t help exclaiming, ‘I do so wonder what has happened to our friends.’ Aera neither frowned nor scolded him. ‘You see,’ she said, addressing Aquaticus. ‘this gentleman’s friend Ignesco went off not long ago with my friend Terra; and I hope they haven’t been too rash in their climbing this dangerous mountain of ours; for there are terribly risky places before you get to the top.’

‘Before either of us answer that,’ interposed Aquaticus, ‘I beg you to allow me to ask you yourself a very simple question, indeed the simplest question that any mortal can ask another — What, my dear sir, is your name?'

'O that,' the man replied quietly, 'is very easy to tell you. My surname is Kums, and my Christian name, or to put it simpler, my First name is Wat. So now, my dear kind host, do tell me what can be seen from the top of your Mountain?'

'What would you answer to that question of Mr. Kums, Aera?' enquired Aquaticus. 'I would say: nothing but sea and sky if you look North or West, and nothing but cornfields and hay-fields and a rather level plain, if you look South or East. South will be all round about here, where you have come from.'

'You've made it all very clear to me,' replied Mr. Kums gratefully. And then he added gently and almost pleadingly, 'O yes! and I beg you to pronounce my name so that it rhymes with crumbs; and don't call me Cooms, as some of the folk do I've met on the Coast. My first name Wat rhymes of course with "hot" so don't, I implore you, ever make it rhyme with "Cat," as some have done before I reached your Mountain.'

While he was speaking a quick whisper passed between Aquaticus and Aera; and, when he had finished, Aera said: 'We hope you will stay with us this one night Mr. Kums. When my friend Aquaticus feels fit for bed I'll let him sleep on this sofa. But we've got a little bedroom next door which is quite ready now. It opens into a lavatory so you'll be quite comfortable; and if you'd like a cup of tea before you undress I'll bring it to you. I expect you can sleep all right without pyjamas or a night-shirt. We'll all have breakfast together tomorrow morning.'

Mr. Kums enjoyed the cup of excellent tea brought him by Aera to the small bedroom; and, after retiring to the lavatory next door, he removed his coat and waistcoat and trousers and folded them very carefully on a chair by his bed before laying his head on the pillow and stretching out his legs under the sheets and blankets.

‘Well, here I am!’ he said to himself, ‘and more comfortable than I deserve to be too! I ought to have made sure that this girl had got the consent of the other girl about keeping me for the night before I let her fix me up here; but how could I as the other was away; and she said she was difficult to catch, and may have run anywhere! Well, here I am, and the sooner I go to sleep the better. What a quaint life mine is,’ he said to himself as he arranged the couple of pillows Aera had given him under his head. ‘But sleep is sleep whatever life may be.’ And he gave his pillows another pull to get them well beneath his chin.

Mr. Kums woke up quite early and pulled his watch out of his waistcoat pocket which was lying on the chair by his bedside. His watch said it was six o’clock.

‘Well! I’ll lie where I am for a while and think. They won’t be bringing me tea or calling me to breakfast for some time yet; and there are plenty of things I’ve got to get clear in my head before making any move or deciding upon anything.’ There was no living thing in Mr. Kums’ little bedroom except one small fly on the door leading to the lavatory.

‘Come here, Master Fly!’ Mr. Kums called to him. ‘Here sit on the back of my knuckles. I won’t move them or let you come to any harm. But I’d like to have a talk with you! Now don’t be alarmed. I’m one of the unusual ones, the sort of man Jesus was and the sort of man he would have continued to be till he was quite old if between the Romans and the Jews they hadn’t killed him.’ The fly settled on the back of Mr. Kums’ hand just as he had begged it to do. ‘Don’t be afraid of exchanging thoughts with me,’ the man went on. ‘You and I can understand each other perfectly, though I think in man-language and you think in fly-language.’

‘How is it, why is it,’ enquired the fly, ‘that men like you and Jesus were born into this world?’

‘I have not the faintest idea how it happened,’ replied the man. ‘You must understand, my friend, that I’m quite different in many ways from Jesus, as I am from such persons as Sappho and Cagliostro and Nostradamus and Galileo.’

‘How would you describe yourself?’ enquired the fly, ‘if you had to write a history of yourself for future generations of flies and men?’

‘Well, the first thing I should say about myself,’ replied Mr. Kums, ’is that I have a mania for getting people and animals, especially the more formidable people and more formidable animals, into my power. Then, when they are in my power, I have a mania for making them do outrageous and unheard-of things.’

‘What sort of things?’ enquired the fly.

‘Well, the other day I saw the head of the Sea-Serpent protruding from the sea and I made it come up to me as I stood on a little cliff, and I made it take me on its back so that I could ride along the edge of the bay from Worthy to Lully; and when we got to Lully I made it stand on the Tip of its tail and let me mount to the Top of its head so that I could wave to a ship on the horizon.’

‘What did the ship do when it saw you?’ enquired the fly.

‘It steered straight inland toward me,’ Mr. Kums replied. ‘It was a steam-ship, so it didn’t depend on sails or on the wind. But I knew well what it would do when it came near. It would fire its cannon at us. So I threw the thought into the mind of the Captain to give orders that an artillery officer who happened to be on board should be the one to fire the cannon rather than any of the naval officers, and while this passenger from the army was taking steps to do what the Captain wanted I ordered the Sea-Serpent to dive back at once into the deep sea, and as it did so I also threw myself into the sea and swam to the shore.'

'So neither of you was hurt?' exclaimed the fly excitedly. 'What a good thing! But do tell me, I beseech you, another story.'

That'll be only too easy, my dear fly,' said Mr. Kums. 'For my whole life, ever since I was a child, has consisted of stories. Of course the greatest event of my life was when I left my father and mother and I did this when I was only five.'

'Impossible!' cried the fly in horrified astonishment. 'Why I haven't left my parents yet! Nor their parents either! We house-flies are very domestic in our ways. Our family life is to us the whole matter. It is for, by, from and because of the family, that we live at all!'

'Yes, my friend,' went on Mr. Kums, 'it happened when I was five. My favourite books were Alice in Wonderland and Alice through the Looking Glass but after those two books the book I loved most in the world was Grimm's Fairy Stories. And I still love that book as much as I did then. It was reading Grimm's Fairy Stories that made me decide to leave my parents. They were as nice as any parents could possibly be, and they were both very kind to me, but unfortunately I had a half-sister whose father had been dead a long time. She was always sweet to me but her very existence made me miserable. I was pitifully, wretchedly, wistfully, desperately jealous of her. She was a little older than I am and a lot cleverer and whenever I did anything to show off the power that was in me she would do something so spirited and amusing that it drew everybody's attention away from me. This went on till I could stand it no longer. So one day I bought a toy sword in a shop in the town and waited in the station till the train for London came in. Then without a ticket I clambered into a crowded third class carriage. Nobody took any notice of me, and those who did, took it for granted that I would soon be followed by my parents. But after we were fairly off and I had found a seat on a grimy, brumbly, gabbling old lady's lap, it was realized that I was alone, and they all began talking about me. But, long before the first train-stop, this interest had subsided and a couple of argumentative old gents, one at the north corner and one at the south corner of the carriage, had started such a lengthy debate about Canada that the lady on whose lap I sat fell fast asleep. When the first stop arrived and the Ticket-Collector came in there was so much confusion that I had no difficulty in slipping out of the train and running along the platform till I found an easy and quite unofficial exit under a fence by the edge of a field. Across this field and across three others I scampered, till I entered a neat little lane which eventually led to the gates of a big House. I entered this big House by the back way and very quickly accosted an elderly Housekeeper who made friends with me at once; but with a shrewd wisdom I hid my origin from her under the pretext that I came from an orphanage whose name I had sworn to conceal for the rest of my life. My parents were so simple-minded that it never occurred to them to put my disappearance into the local Newspapers and there was no talk about me in the big House, as the mere mention of an orphanage seemed to create a discreet silence.'

'What queer people,' cried the fly, 'you human beings are! It would be impossible for any of us to leave the place where we are brought up and where our parents and our grandparents were brought up!'

'Well, my friend,' said Mr. Wat Kums, 'I'm afraid I must say good-bye. I hope indeed that the next person these girls or these men put into this little room will be more bound up with their family than I am, and therefore less of a freak to you, and less of a crazy creature to your domestic philosophy than I am. But you see I want to clear off before anybody comes to see how

I’m getting on or to bring me anything to eat or drink. So good-bye for now!’

He had left the bed before the fly had had time to touch his hand; and he was out of the room before anyone approached it and out of the cave before anyone came near it. Then he decided that before anything else of importance happened in the world he would become a king. ‘But of what country?’ was the question he kept asking himself as he walked along the cliffs towards Land’s End in Cornwall.

‘I must decide that definitely,’ he told himself, ‘before I go any further.’ He sat down on a grassy mound and pondered deeply. As he sat there a Raven came up to him and gravely perched on a curiously inscribed rock by his side. There were no other rocks on that grassy mound but for some mysterious reason the presence of this Raven disturbed him.

‘May I ask you a question?’ he said to the Raven.

‘No,’ replied the Raven. ‘I’ve never answered a question in my life. ‘Well then,’ replied the other, ‘I wish you’d ask me a question.’

‘I will do so at once,’ said the Raven. ‘Who are you? And what are you thinking about so hard?’

‘Do I look as if I were thinking hard?’

‘You certainly do.’

‘Well,’ said the other, ‘I will tell you. I was thinking over what country I’d like to be King.’

‘I could give you some advice about that,’ said the Raven. ‘What authority have you, that you could advise me on so important a point?’

‘Stop asking me questions,’ said the Raven. ‘I’ve already told you I never answer questions. But I could give you some very good advice; and it is this. You must decide to be King of the oldest country in the world.’

‘What is the oldest country?’ asked the other. ‘I’ve told you already,’ replied the Raven, ‘that I never answer questions. This is my advice. Make up your mind to be King of the oldest country in the world. Concentrate your whole nature on that. Turn your whole will towards that. Devote yourself entirely to that. Say to yourself again and again: King of the oldest country; King of the oldest country; King of the oldest country; and it will happen so — you will become King of the oldest country. Now you must answer my question,’ concluded the Raven. ‘Who are you? And what is your name?’

‘I am a Magician,’ the other answered, ‘and my name is Wat Kums. I have the power of making anyone do anything I want him or her to do. I have the power of throwing a thought, a thought shaped like a pear at one end and pointed at the other end, into the inmost consciousness of anyone I wish to compel to do anything. The thought that I throw makes it absolutely imperative for the person I throw it at to do what I command. The person, whether man or woman, has no alternative. When once the thought which I have thrown into his or her consciousness has sunk into him or her all that the person can do is to obey me, absolutely and implicitly and without question.’

CHAPTER 4

WAT KUMS GAZED very intently at the rock on the top of the Mound on which the Raven had perched. Yes, there was an inscription on it, an inscription with words. The inscription when Wat Kums looked closely at it was a picture of a Raven above the door of a small room; and beneath the picture was the word 'Nevermore'. 'Why!' cried Mr. Kums excitedly, 'I know the poem that comes from. It is Edgar Poe's "Quoth the Raven nevermore". And I can see other things too in the background on this rock; objects that make me say the words "Vast formless things that move the scenery to and fro and flap from out their condor wings invisible woe". Do you know who it was who taught me when I was a boy to repeat "Ulalume". None other than the great Thomas Hardy, who wrote "Tess". He once saw her alive. Did you know that, Master Raven?'

'Good God no!' croaked the Raven. 'I find it hard to believe!'

'Yes, he did,' said the other. 'But he himself was so frightened that he ran away. It was long after he had invented her that he saw her in real life.'

It now became clear to Mr. Kums that the Raven on the Rock did not believe a word of this story about Hardy and Tess. This infuriated him so much that without saying goodbye or even taking off his hat he leapt to his feet and rushed off, faster even than Hardy could have run when he saw his creation come to life.

He ran desperately across field after field. Then he found himself leaning on a gate with a broad road. He climbed over the gate and walked along the road. He soon came to a very old Milestone on which he read the words: To Aug twenty miles. To Bang ten miles. To Zang one mile. He looked round.

Yes! The road he was following did divide itself into three; and of these three, the one to Zang, only a mile away, looked the most inviting. It turned out to be a tiny little village of a few thatched cottages surrounding a very small rather dilapidated though not ruined parish church. Mr. Kums found the door of this church open and he boldly walked in and sat down in a pew opposite the pulpit. He had only been sitting there for about five minutes when a rather ghostly figure mounted the pulpit and bent down above him.

‘Don’t be alarmed, good sir,’ said this figure. ‘I know I am only a rather tired, though well-intentioned spirit, but an angel told me that there was some danger that these ridiculous scientists might bring the world to an end before the proper predestined time; so I have taken upon myself the task, instead of resting quietly in my grave till the Last Trump, of wandering about the West Country preaching to every wayfarer I meet. My name is Aldhelm but everybody nowadays calls me Alban and whenever I meet any tramp near St. Alban’s Head I cannot overcome a deep pride in the depths of my heart at being regarded as a Saint.’

When Saint Alban’s Spirit had finished his discourse Mr. Kums boldly asked him what he would consider the oldest country in the world.

‘Let me think,’ said Saint Alban. ‘Well, I think I would have to choose between India and Mongolia and Mexico.’

‘The reason why I asked you is that some bird or animal has recently predicted to me through some angelic inspiration that I must direct all my will-power to becoming the King of the oldest country in the world; and I am very anxious to know what is the oldest country in the world, so that I can direct my footsteps there, and aim at becoming its King.’

‘Well, my dear sir,’ said the Spirit of Saint Aldhelm or Alban, ‘for myself I should suggest that you aim at being King of India. India must certainly be as old as Mexico or Mongolia if not older. My own favourite race in the world, the race I prefer to English, Welsh, German, Jews, French, Italians, Spaniards, Portuguese, Russians, Chinese, Red-Indians, Hungarians, Bulgarians, Rumanians, Greeks or Romans, is — can you guess? The Gypsies! Yes, the Gypsies! They got their name from Egypt but they came originally, with their Romany language, from India. I like their ways, their manners, their habits, their speech, best of all the races upon this planet Earth.'

'I rejoice to hear your words, O spirit of a great Saint!' cried Mr. Kums with real honest delight; for he too had had many years a mania for the Gypsies. 'But now if you'll excuse me I must hurry off, for I've suddenly remembered an important engagement I have got to keep. Good-bye O wise spirit of a noble Saint!' And with the sort of salute a man-at-arms makes to the Lord he serves he hurried out of the church.

And then a pure inspiration came into his head and he hurried back to the little bedroom in the side of the mountain cave lent to him for the night by Aera and her enemy-friend with the wounded shoulder. He found them both there; Aquaticus still on the sofa and Aera looking after him like a devoted nurse. Aera was obviously really pleased to see him and she told him her great news at once which was not less than the gratifying fact that her friend Terra and Terra's friend-enemy Ignesco who were as much reconciled to each other as were she and Aquaticus, had settled down for the night together in their next Cave-Parlour and that Terra's injury from her fall among the rocks was much less serious than had been feared at first.

'I shall have something important to tell you all four tomorrow, my friends,' Wat Kums announced with a bold chuckle; and it was clear to both Aera and Aquaticus that something, at least very important to him, had taken possession of his mind. And indeed it had! The inspiration that had come to him was really a singularly happy one. ‘But I must not breathe a word of it,’ he told himself, ‘until tomorrow.’

When they were all four assembled on the following morning, Terra with her injury nearly gone and Aquaticus with his injury nearly gone, Mr. Kums announced his grand news.

‘My dear friends,’ he said, ‘while we have been representing to the world the news that earth and air are black and white and fire and water are red and blue we have entirely forgotten — yes, we have entirely forgotten the Clouds! So I now announce to you that I intend to take you to Nubilium the capital of Cloud-land.’

‘Where is Nubilium?’ enquired Terra eagerly.

‘She is midway,’ replied Mr. Wat Kums, ‘between the Earth and the Sky.’

‘I feel afraid of her!’ cried Aera. ‘I feel she might be the death of us all!’

‘She might,’ boldly replied Mr. Wat Kums, ‘but on the other hand she might be a wonderful new life for us all.’

‘She must be a very dangerous city,’ declared Aquaticus, ‘for, unlike the Sea she cannot have any salt in her; and without salt, as nobody knows better than I, water is terribly dangerous.’

‘Isn’t it true,’ burst out Ignesco, ‘that it is from Cloud-land, when thunder is about, that lightning comes?’

Mr. Wat Kums answered this question clearly and decisively. ‘The beauty and virtue of Nubilium,’ he pronounced, ’is that she contains everything. She contains the fire people call lightning. She contains the water people call the Ocean. She contains the Oxygen they call the air. She contains the darkness of the inside of a mountain when it is ready to be a volcano. All that her life requires is contained in Nubilium, the City of Clouds. How many of us perish from great heat, from too great cold, from too much water, from too much dryness! Come on, come on, cast loose, cast free! Fast as you can come, come every one of you!’ They obeyed him; Ignesco holding Terra’s hand, Aquaticus holding Aera’s hand. Wat Kums had evidently got a good plane at his disposal, a plane that obeyed him, and it was a very swift one and one so competently handled that all five were soon mounting up in full awareness towards the sky. Wat Kums directed the steering of the plane that bore them and it wasn’t long before they were surrounded by thick clouds.

‘It is clear to me,’ he thought to himself, ‘that with a plane as well run as this one is and so amenable to my orders that when it circles round in the midst of these thick clouds it makes no attempt to leave them, I shall be the ruling power in the State of Nubilium; and as the presiding authority in this small realm I shall soon find myself appealed to, from Europe, Asia, Africa, America, and Australia, to accept new inmates, yes, new subjects, who will find under my jurisdiction in Nubilium the sort of life they have been longing for since they were born.’

Thinking thus Mr. Kums gave orders to the experienced technicians who ran the plane to cause it to float in absolutely motionless repose, a thing rarely achieved in air-flight, without yielding to the pressure of the wind or changing the precise tilt of its balance when any of these vaporous clouds dissolved in rain.

‘The question I’ve now got to decide,’ thought Mr. Kums, ’is just how I am to get hold of a few people clever enough to act as ambassadors from the Realm of Nubilium, or, to put it more plainly, to act as emissaries from me and to return with what offers they can get.’

With this in his mind Mr. Kums went to have a brief talk with his pilots.

Once more, however, between Terra and Ignesco on one hand and Aera and Aquaticus on the other, he felt that his idea of treating Nubilium as a country under his control needed more thought than he had yet given it, since at present Nubilium was composed of nothing but air and vapour and there was no ground to stand on and no earth to grow anything in.

It was while he was facing the very worst of the situation before him that Mr. Kums had a second inspiration. He had long known that there were certain tiny specks of light between Mars and Jupiter which indicated the presence of various asteroids or minute satellites which were too small to have acquired names of their own but which must be composed of earth-mould and rock of some sort or another. ‘Well,’ he asked himself, ‘could I not use my magic power on a certain number of these thick clouds and compel them to accompany us to one of these little asteroids? And then could I not endow the little asteroid with such a strong magnetic pull as would hold these thick clouds in its embrace forever, and thus create a satellite-asteroid which I could name by the name Nubilium and in the earth of which certain plants could grow?’

CHAPTER 5

‘How shall we celebrate?’ said Mr. Kums to his four friends when they had landed upon the Asteroid Nubilium and he had seen to it that his loyal pilots, who were really the chief power of their flight to this spot, were enjoying an excellent meal. ‘Do tell me, my friends, how shall we celebrate our arrival here?’ Aquaticus, whose shoulder was now healed, and Terra, who had recovered from her fall, were both silent; but Aera and Ignesco spoke up. ‘I should think,’ said Ignesco, ‘that the best kind of celebration would be the most personal we could imagine: the sort of celebration, I mean, that would make all possible use of the names of our two ladies, Terra and Aera.’ But Aera said, ‘O no, Ignesco, that would never do. Terra and I would never agree to that. I suggest very strongly that we plan the nature of our celebration in connection with the wonderful speed our pilots have brought us here and the wonderful skill with which Mr. Kums has steered us here, not to speak of the imagination with which we thought of bringing these thick clouds with us and of naming our Asteroid Nubilium. What I suggest is, and I know that Terra will agree with me,’ here Aera’s voice became as confident as it was shrill, ’is that we four passengers form a square round Mr. Kums. Yes! round Mr. Kums, and chant a little ditty which I have just invented.’

Led by the joyous voice of Terra, Ignesco and Aquaticus joined in the ditty which Aera now chanted as they formed themselves into a square round Mr. Kums who felt a trifle, though not more than a trifle, embarrassed.

‘Who rules Nubilium’s coast?
The Dove, The Holy Ghost!
Thrice blessed Asteroid
Your Hearth is never void.
With bread and wine and peace
You bring us all release
From every grief and fear,
From every groan and tear.
Nubilium brings to man and wife
The end of every toil and strife,
To every girl and every boy
Their dream come true without alloy.’

It was after this rhapsody had died down and after all was silence again that Mr. Kums said, ‘What’s the use of my being a Magician and Enchanter when I’ve got to listen to ecstatic hymns in praise of my inventions and without one single reference to me? How the devil shall I bring myself into this little game of aeroplane charades? Ah! I’ve thought of it! That’s the trick! I would like, my dear friends, while our pilots are enjoying their good feast to add an amusingly personal note to this memorable celebration.’

Terra and Aera and Ignesco and Aquaticus welcomed this announcement with enthusiasm.

‘What I want to point out to you all,’ Mr. Wat Kums went on, ’is that the real innermost reverberation of my name is nothing less than the great Mystery of Time itself made audible so as to be perceptible to the limited intelligence of the simplest human being.

‘To make this clear, let me tell you, my friends, that I carry about with me a loudly ticking clock, a clock which to me plays the part of the voice of a pre-historic god, whom I must have worshipped in some previous incarnation long before I was born on the Planet Earth. This clock I found myself when in my youth while I was travelling with my great-grandparents on that famous steam-ship called the Great Eastern when it was laying the first telegraph-wire at the bottom of the Atlantic. I dived and swam to the bed of that ocean and there I found this clock which must have been drifting about down there for some time; for it hadn't come from any passenger or any official on board our Great Eastern. So when I came on deck with it nobody quarrelled with my conviction that I had a right to keep it as my own, as a legitimate treasure-trove. It was not by any magic of mine that this wonderful clock possessed the terrific "tick-tock" which it made as it ticked. From where it had come, from whom it had come I have never discovered. Among its experiences down there it must have been injured a little; for the portions of it upon which its makers must have inscribed their names had been broken off and neither with this nor without it were there any records of its origin. This delighted me; and made it possible for me to feel that the clock I had brought to the surface, and possessed myself of, was really and actually, in some strange way, a primordial Oracle of the Mystery of Time.

'The thing about it which pleased me the most, and of which I very rarely speak to any living soul, is the fact, as you shall presently hear, that when it ticks it repeats my own name.'

Terra and Aera, along with Ignesco and Aquaticus, were extremely excited by what Mr. Kums had been saying, and they waited with heart-beating eagerness after what was evidently a preliminary rehearsal for the benefit of his pilots who had by this time finished their banquet, until he brought forward a large clock.

This he brought into the midst of them and asked for a chair so that he could be seated with the clock hugged against his heart. Ignesco brought the chair for him; and they all felt he had chosen it with great wisdom for though it was a very low and very comfortable chair it had no arms; so that its sitter could handle whatever he had in his arms with the utmost ease.

‘Now,’ he cried, when they were all round him and listening intently, ‘hear the Oracle of Time!’

And sure enough, directly the clock began ticking, they all smiled at each other, for it certainly did repeat, over and over and over again, the name of its owner along with his first name, ‘Wat, Wat Kums! Wat Kums! Wat Kums! Wat Kums!’

‘What,’ cried its Master, ’is Destiny bringing to us all?’ And the inspired clock answered from its Master’s knee, ‘What comes! What comes! What comes! What comes!’

CHAPTER 6

For a good many years Mr. Wat Kums, the Magician, ruled as King over the Asteroid he had named Nubilium. But at length this starry island in the sky was visited by a Being who in his explorations of diverse Universes — though we can hardly imagine his visiting diverse Dimensions as well — was interested in discovering this small airy kingdom. The visitor I am speaking of was a Monster, the largest, most powerful, most formidable Monster the world has ever seen. His name was Typhoeus and his Mother was the Earth and his Father was the unfathomable Gulf at the bottom of our World called Tartarus. There had been an epoch in his youth when the Monster Typhoeus had very nearly overcome all the Olympian Gods and Goddesses and conquered the whole of Heaven and Earth; but Zeus the Son of Cronos defeated him with his lightning and thunderbolts.

‘How strange it is,’ Typhoeus thought now as he explored Nubilium, ‘to feel yourself the most formidable creature in the whole world. For millions of years there has been no one like me: and here am I; and it is very, very possible that, whatever I do with my strength, I shall do something that will change the whole structure of this world into which I have been born. What would I like to change it into? Ah! That is the important question! Isn’t it funny that, possessed of all the terrific power I have, I am so limited in my intelligence that I cannot construct in my mind the sort of universe I would like to erect on the ruins of this one when I have broken this one into little bits as when an infant I broke up the loaves which my mother the Earth gave me and which Tartarus my father would always swallow whole when I refused to tear them into bits. What do I dislike in this world as it is now?

Well, I dislike the way we big creatures have to go hunting about for some kind of smaller creatures that we would like to eat. Why doesn't something in life itself provide us with the smaller animals we want to eat? Why should animals eat each other at all? And why should men and women eat animals? These are the questions for which I want an answer; and yet I can't find any! No, not one. How much nicer a world it would be if we didn't have to eat each other! I have lately been wondering whether it wouldn't be possible for me to compel all animals to eat lumps of earth-mould and to chew pieces of rock instead of eating each other. Of course, you will say, sheep and cattle eat grass, not each other. But I would answer to that: how do we know that grass likes to be eaten? Hasn't grass got any feeling? If by my strength I managed to dominate every living creature and make every creature obey me, could I, I wonder, compel them all to stop eating each other and concentrate on making it possible for us all to live by swallowing earth-mould and chewing rock? How wonderful to be able to establish such strict laws about what people should eat that when they saw you coming along the road they would shout to each other, "Take care! He's coming! Cover that dead fox up! Hide that dead badger under those leaves! Put the dead squirrel under the bracken! Take the hook out of that trout's mouth and throw the trout back into the river!" And then how wonderful to hear someone cry: "Here he comes! Here he comes! Bring old granny Jones down here for him to see how strong and handsome she is!" And tell him how she's lived on nothing but swamp-peat-bread and sandstone-pastry for the last ten years!

'Yes! Perhaps I am beginning already to grow stronger than I was when Zeus defeated me with his damned thunderbolts. Perhaps I am a coward not to assert myself now, now, very now, with all the strength I have!'

Thinking thus Typhoeus moved forwards to where Terra and Ignesco and Aera and Aquaticus were talking to their children. Terra and Ignesco had two little boys and Aera and Aquaticus had two little girls. So there were four tiny toddlers roaming about Nubilium when Typhoeus appeared on the scene. Only too well did he know what these four Tiny Ones would feel if they saw him. Nor did he particularly want to gobble them up. His ambition was what occupied his mind; and the first step towards making a real move in that direction was to establish himself in some place from which he could take an awe-inspiring dive, down from the starry heaven above, upon the peaks of Mount Olympus and Mount Ida and Mount Gargarus. It would be necessary to make the Olympians realize that he came down from above upon them, not up from below upon them; as the important thing was to fill them with awe before the battle began by making them see him descend upon Earth's mountains from the starry heights of Heaven. To make them witness his descent it would be essential to employ some auxiliary agent who would lift up his voice down there and call upon them to look up as he was descending upon them. It can be well imagined that the Ruler of Nubilium, Mr. Wat Kums, now for more than three years a sort of King of a small domain, was by no means oblivious of the arrival on our scene of the Monster Typhoeus. The Monster was at pains to keep out of sight of the children, which he did in the most cunning way, by rolling in the earth-mould of this Asteroid, till, whenever he moved from place to place, it was like the upheaval of the ground, and whenever he remained in one place he simply resembled a little earthy ridge free of any vegetation.

It was in this latter disguise, as an earthy ridge, that Mr. Wat Kums approached him, and, to the Monster's amazement, began calling him by his name.

‘I am surprised to see you here, Typhoeus. I knew you were up and about for I have friends among many travellers through space who have encountered you. But I know you have as your ultimate wish a desire to conquer the Olympian Gods; and it rather puzzles me to find you here in this far-off Asteroid. Have you any particular reason for being here in connection with your war with the Gods?’

‘What in the name of my Father Tartarus are you talking to me about?’ cried Typhoeus out of his muddy disguise in consternation. ‘And may I ask who, in the name of my Mother Earth are you, who take upon yourself such confounded impertinence?’

‘Mr. Wat Kums is my name,’ replied the Magician quietly. ‘Like yourself I have been a traveller from my childhood. I possess various interests and also various powers which I need not mention now. One power of mine, however, I will use now if you will permit me. I will reply to the question you have just put to yourself, as to how the Olympian Divinities could be frightened by your suddenly descending upon them out of the clouds.’

‘What in the name of Tartarus are you talking about?’ growled the Monster, beginning to grow angry.

‘I will tell you at once,’ replied Mr. Kums quietly. ‘You are very badly informed, most worthy Typhoeus, as to what is happening to Gods and Goddesses and Mortal Men upon the Earth, who is, let me assure you, my Mother as well as yours. Being what you are, much stronger in body than in mind, you do not realize how extremely old you are. In fact you do not realize that you are nearly two thousand years old. This being so, coupled with your complete inability to take in how entirely ignorant you are as to what is happening to Gods and Goddesses and Men and Women as the waves of Time wash over us and the winds of Time carry us away, you will no doubt be startled to learn that a Being as formidable and powerful as you are has to deal today with a totally different kind of world from the one you were familiar with a couple of thousand years ago. Let me begin by telling you that this Zeus who fought with you and the other Titans has long ago disappeared altogether. So has Hera his wife. So has Pallas Athene his daughter. So has Poseidon and your Father Tartarus and Persephone and her mother Demeter! I tell you, Typhoeus, our present race of Philosophers may not be as wise as Plato or Socrates or Aristotle or Epictetus or Epicurus or Pythagoras, but they have invented instruments of destruction far more effective than any of the old weapons. Our modern philosophers are infinitely better skilled in the creation of weapons than any of our sages when you were young. I tell you, Typhoeus, they can make lightning and thunder rush forth from little boxes they can carry about with them! The trouble with you is that your very strength and your extraordinary longevity in remaining alive in this universe for a thousand if not two thousand years has made you indifferent to the knowledge we get from books; yes, from books about the history of our race and about new ways of making the laws of Nature save us and help us.'

Typhoeus was silent under his tricky earth-mould disguise: and Mr. Kums began to think that he had really impressed the Monster by what he had said. So with not very commendable pride he went on, gazing into our Monster's eyes as if to hypnotize him. Mr. Kums had never really hypnotized anybody in the whole of his life. His power over people had nothing to do with mesmerizing them by looking into their eyes. It dominated them in quite a different manner. Mr. Kums would have been the last person in the world to know what part of their personality it seized upon and took possession of. It remained as much a complete mystery to him as it had been when he was a boy among other boys and practised it at school without the least idea of how he did it.

Mr. Kums now said to himself: ‘I like smoking; I like sitting by an electric heater. I like looking round me at the room I am in; at the pictures on the wall, at the books in the bookshelves, at the angle of ceiling and wall, at the lock of the door and the door-handle, especially if the door is a little open. I like it when my mind wanders from one dead friend or relative to another dead friend or relative. But when I begin to ponder on just what it is in me that does this thinking or this enjoying, I find myself rather puzzled. I say to myself, “It’s my mind,” but that seems a queerly unsatisfactory answer; for it isn’t my mind that enjoys smoking my pipe. It isn’t my mind that enjoys drinking my cup of coffee. I am rather inclined to think that every single thing I enjoy is just as if it were something that I was swallowing! Yes! I feel as if my real self, my real I, were gathered about my mouth and were satisfying itself by using my hands, my fingers, my knees, my elbows, my arms to feed my mouth.

‘I expect the truth of it all is,’ Mr. Kums’ thoughts ran on, ‘that the I in all of us has got its centre, or what you might call its engine, in our head, while our body with all its parts, obeys our head, follows the minutest instructions of our head, and supplies our head including eyes, mouth, nose, ears, with all that these organs of apprehension require, drawn from our body’s sense of touch and of feeling, whether within it or from without it.’

‘You must remember,’ Mr. Kums now remarked in a clear though quiet voice, ‘that a creature like you, Typhoeus, enormously powerful as you are and no doubt by long practise able to satisfy the demands of your body by eating animals and birds and fishes and reptiles and I daresay human beings too now and again, a creature, I say, like you, who has seen so many hundreds of centuries pass by without any really drastic change in what you might call the nature of things, cannot grasp the fact that at any moment there may come some absolutely startling change in the world you have come to know so much better than any man or eagle or whale or elephant or horse or cow or donkey or lion or tiger or wolf or fox or serpent or rat or cat or dog or sheep, some change worked by Science. Yes, my good Typhoeus, you may lick your jaws as you like and of course you can swallow me down if you want to for I cannot defend myself against you; but the fact remains that this new Science which men have invented has already changed everything and very likely it may soon invent something that will change the two great oceans of our world, the Atlantic and the Pacific, and change the whole nature of the earth upon which we live, yes! Typhoeus, change the effect upon our Planet of the Sun and the Moon and all the Stars.' It was then, as Mr. Kums ended his long oration to the earth-mould-muddied monster, that the Monster made a singular little movement. He moved closer to Mr. Kums and licked his hand. As you might imagine, something of a cold shiver ran through the latter's body. But as he looked into the Monster's eyes a queer sensation of tenderness flowed through him. It was clear to him now that the Monster had licked his hand as a gesture of pure friendliness. Mr. Kums felt his heart touched to its deepest depth. To have his hand actually licked by a Monster who had inhabited this universe with innumerable living creatures dominated by the race of mortal men for so many thousands of years was certainly an event of extreme importance in his simple bachelor life, a life that had been and still was, only disturbed by one thing, his knowledge that he possessed, although he had not tested it or even examined it to the limit, some very remarkable magical power. Here they were then: himself possessing a mysterious magical power over which he had only a very vague control, and this monster capable of swallowing him along with every other human or animal creation within its reach, and yet instead of making any attempt to do so, here he was licking his hand.

Yes! He could see just a glimmer of shining silver above one outstretched sharp-peaked horn of the hill above their heads.

‘Well,’ thought Mr. Kums, ‘why don’t the Monster and I, since we’d start in moonlight outside the clouds of Nubilium, fly off into space and mount up and up and up and up together till we are entirely outside this whole bloody universe of ours?’

Thus thinking, as Homer would say, Mr. Kums boldly conveyed to Typhoeus, between whom and himself, ever since the Monster had licked him, there had developed something like a real friendship, the idea that had just entered his head. ‘The moonlight would give us a start,’ he said, ‘but we’d soon be outside its radiation as we’d be forever outside the radiation of the sun. There would still be the far-away shining of the stars, all of them much larger than this poor little Nubilium of ours. But we should soon be able to steer our way beyond the furthest of those bright glimmerers; so far beyond them indeed that it wouldn’t be long before we would be in complete darkness, without a single star in sight. Shall we set off like this, my friend? I could ride under that big curved fin on your back which is more of a protection now in its new growth than when that silly old Zeus destroyed it.’

CHAPTER 7

TYPHOEUS INDICATED HIS consent by once more licking Mr. Kums' hand and in a moment or two they were off.

'What a new life for me,' thought the Monster as he started to fly, 'to be obeying this little chit of a human creature and carrying him into space! But for what was I born, child of Earth who has brought into the world everything, good and bad, beautiful and hideous, brave and cowardly, terrible in strength and terrified in weakness, and with a Father like Tartarus, that gulf, that chasm, that abyss which descends into regions of desolation unvisited by man or God. O Mother Gaia! O Father Tartarus! Which of you was it, or was it the two of you together, who put into the head of this weak, stupid, timid, frightened, half-mad little guy to ride on my back? This is the fool who fished up from the depths of the ocean a lost clock that for many years down there had repeated his name, both his tribal name Kums and his personal name Wat. Who else in this mad universe in which we are all caught ever heard his own name repeated day and night by a clock? And what did he feel, this whibble-quibble of a nobody, when his clock stopped muttering "What Kums", "Wat Kums", "Wat Kums", "Wat Kums", "Wat Kums" and in silence begged to be wound up? Did Mr. Kums have to light the candle at his bedside and take one winding-screw out of the shroud that kept it warm and go to the chimney-piece?

'For I don't think I can imagine this timid little Sage saying, "You must wait, dear Tick-Tock, till morning when I get up." Well! I expect all of us have curious questions which we ask ourselves when we are alone. So I daresay this small person whom I am now literally carrying under my wing is now asking himself, “Why didn’t I ask this man-carrier if I might look at my watch before we started and in order to do so whether I might light a match?” What I am asking myself as we now fly by moon-light before leaving sun and moon and stars far behind is whether he would like me to tell him the tale of how I got my smattering of the English language? But I expect he wouldn’t be interested. As we fly further and further I expect he’ll grow less and less and less interested in any tale I tell him. He’ll say to himself, “Why in the name of all the fairytales in the world does this Monster want to tell me how he started to learn English?”.’

It did not take the Monster long to fly into the utter darkness of infinite space, carrying Mr. Wat Kums under his wing. The further they went the darker it became. When the moonlight vanished there were still, here and there, a faint glimmerings of stars. Then they also disappeared and there was nothing. It gave Mr. Wat Kums an extremely strange feeling this total absence of every vestige of light. Lying on his bed with a box of matches and a candle by his side and his precious clock on the mantelpiece he had always felt prepared for the approach of darkness. But now it was entirely different. He was in the belly of darkness. Darkness had swallowed him up. Darkness was not only round him and above him and beneath him. Darkness was inside him. He and darkness were one. He was darkness. And yet as Typhoeus carried him on and on and on, what has already been said didn’t entirely interpret his feeling. He was a speck of conscious darkness in the midst of unconscious darkness. He wasn’t light in darkness, quite the contrary. He was darkness in darkness. But he was a different kind of darkness from the darkness around him. The darkness round him was just simply darkness. It was the scenery, or, if you like, the obliteration of scenery, through which he was passing. But the darkness within him and of him, the darkness which was he, was a darkness that was travelling like a traveller through darkness, a traveller who if he appeared in a sunlit or a moonlit spot would appear as a thick cloud of darkness and would obliterate the light that was there. There was between the two of them as they went up a very interesting link. Mr. Kums didn't say to himself: 'I am a man moving in darkness under the wing of the Monster Typhoeus.' And Typhoeus didn't say to himself: 'I am Typhoeus who was defeated by Zeus but who now could defeat Zeus or the Christian Trinity or any other Divine Power.' What they said to each other, although not in words, was: 'Here we are, we two, friends without hope, without fear, two blots of conscious darkness amid an unconscious mass of similar darkness. So on we go, friends and companions, expecting Nothing, fearing Nothing, feeling Nothing, and being Nothing.' And the further the two of them left everything behind the nearer to each other they felt. It was indeed to each of them the happiest experience of their lives. It didn't matter to either of them that their fellow-traveller was a totally different creature from his companion. It didn't matter to either of them that it wasn't a case of sex for they were both male; nor was it in the faintest way a case of what in these days is described as being a 'Homo'. Everything of that kind was out of it altogether since one was a slim, short, feeble little mass and the other was a monstrous dragon. It was not love they felt for each other. It was comradeship. Each knew by instinct where the other's power lay. Typhoeus knew by instinct that Wat Kums was an enchanter or a magician and Mr. Kums knew by instinct that Typhoeus was a far more powerful Titan than when Zeus hurled him down with thunderbolts. On into Space they went and as they went the wild delight of their sense of Nothingness grew and grew upon them.

'How wonderful,' their united thought told them, 'it is to have around us absolutely nothing! What a comfort not to have the voices, the encounters, the intimacies, the walls and ceiling, the arches and stairways, the corridors and towers, the doors leading to balconies, the bookcases full of folios and quartos, the chimney-pieces and armchairs, the curtains and the window-panes! To escape from all this and ascend into unending night, to leave everything behind and swathe yourself, wreathe yourself, twine yourself, twist yourself, with the thrice blessed folds of everlasting night, to bury yourself in nothingness to lose yourself in nothingness, to strip yourself in nothingness like a diadem of jewels sinking into the sea, like a quiver of arrow-heads winking into mist, like a garland of shadows losing itself in vapour, like a galaxy of shuddering shapes losing itself in fantasies of flickering foam! O comrade, my precious dragon, O companion, my precious enchanter, let us fling ourselves into everlasting night!'

It may be hard to believe that the thoughts of Mr. Wat Kums and the thoughts of the famous Dragon or ex-Titan Typhoeus were quite as similar as has been thus assumed but if any listener to the story of this flight has ever been leading a horse or a dog or an ox or a cow from a brilliantly lit Circus or Fair into an unusually dark night, where not a star is visible, he will know something of the feelings of both the flying dragon and his human rider. Their dominant thought, or shall we say their ruling emotion, was a craving to pierce this deadly darkness as an arrow could pierce a weight of massive dead flesh and dart on and refuse to turn to left or right or to change its direction or fluctuate in its course for a single second though it had no other consciousness save that one unceasing pressure behind it and within it to rush on, on, on, on, on, it knew not whither, through everything in its way. The extraordinary thing about this flight of Typhoeus with Wat Kums on his back was the wild and insane delight they both were feeling in what seemed to them like the swallowing of darkness, the devouring of darkness, the digesting of darkness, the incarnation of their souls in darkness, the conversion of their souls to darkness, the assumption of their souls into the heart of darkness.

Mr. Kums suddenly found himself composing a fantastic rhyme. What there was about this Nothingness through which Typhoeus was taking him that led him to do such a ridiculous thing, Mr. Kums had no idea. But it did lead him to do it and he did it. His rhyme went thus:

‘I learnt long ago as a boy
That on ship-board you shouted ahoy!
So I shouted it loud
Though not one of that crowd
Did I specially want to annoy.
But the Master cried who in God’s name
Is putting our verses to shame
With this hullabaloo as if one of our crew
From Bedlam to sail with us came.
Bring that boy to my quarter-deck quick
And fetch me my land-lubber stick
But no! Let it go! Let it go!
When the shots from the enemy fall
We may find to our wonder
In the midst of the thunder
This boy is the bravest of all!’

‘What are you mumbling to yourself?’ enquired Typhoeus, moving faster than ever through the darkness.

‘I’ll tell you,’ replied Mr. Kums amiably— ‘only a childish ditty.’

‘Repeat it to me,’ murmured Typhoeus.

This Mr. Kums had no difficulty in doing; for he had repeated it to himself more than once. ‘Very good,’ responded the flying Monster. ‘I like these nursery-rhyme ditties best of all your modern poetry.’

Higher and higher they went, or was it further and further to their right-hand or to their left-hand? Mr. Kums did not know; and the ex-Titan Typhoeus, having neither a right arm nor a left arm, would have had to use a quite different expression to correspond with what his rider called left and right, had no idea either. But in any case and in whatever direction they were going, on and on they went, at a terrific pace, into absolute darkness, into absolute Nothingness, without Sun or Moon or Stars, without hope or fear; but at least aware that they were friends.

CHAPTER 8

IT WAS A funny thing that neither Mr. Wat Kums nor the Titan who carried him felt any single flicker of their consciousness reverting to Nubilium. Neither Terra and Ignesco nor Aera and Aquaticus were childless. But not a thought did either Kums or Typhoeus give to these children or to their parents. Perhaps when anyone knows himself to be the most powerful Monster in the world and a Monster who has already lived well over thousands of years and also when anyone knows himself to be the most powerful Magician in the world, these tender thoughts about people and places and these yet tenderer thoughts about children pass away altogether; so that neither Monster nor Magician care to think, want to think, or find themselves thinking about anything outside their immediate sensations.

‘Where are we now?’ said Kums to Typhoeus.

‘What is this air?’ said Typhoeus to Kums.

Well might any two travellers have asked this of each other; for what they now suddenly became aware of was the fact that they were no longer in darkness. Nor were they in light. They were surrounded on all sides by something that was neither darkness nor light.

‘What is all this?’ said Kums to Typhoeus.

‘Where have we got to?’ said Typhoeus to Kums.

Without knowing how it came into his head to say it Kums then said to Typhoeus, ‘This place we are in becomes in a second whatever we may decide it shall be.’

‘You’ve hit it,’ said Typhoeus. ‘A moment ago I told myself we were in the middle of an ocean of water; and it was water.’

‘And I told myself we were on the slope of a huge mountain,’ said Kums. ‘And it was a mountain. The truth must be,’ Kums went on, ‘that we’ve flown into the midst of the stuff whereof all worlds, all universes, all creatures are made. And so we have only to use our imagination, and lo! the thing is done! We have created a world.’

‘On my life I believe you’re right my friend,’ said Typhoeus. ‘O how I wish we knew whether this region is North, South, East or West of that little Asteroid of yours you call Nubilium. But on my life you’re right. I feel it from my head to my tail. We’ve got ourselves clean into the regions where the stuff abides out of which all the creators have created their worlds, the stuff I take it out of which each of us, you a man with your magic power, and I a dragon, thousands of years old, were ourselves created. But who created us? That’s what I’d like to know. Who would you say?’

Wat Kums paused for a moment. Then very gravely he said, ‘I know who didn’t! I refer to the God of that greatest of all men who ever lived, Jesus of Bethlehem in Nazareth: for on the Cross he turned away from that God in whom he had, till then, believed, but who then, he felt, had entirely deserted him.’

‘Yes, I expect you’re right there,’ said Typhoeus. ‘He is always associated now with his Mother Mary, isn’t he? The one they always call “Our Lady”? But, as you say, I can’t imagine that that God, the one who invented an everlasting Hell for his enemies and deserted his best friend, created you and me. Who did then?’

‘Let us stay where we are, my friend,’ said Wat Kums, ‘and make use of this extraordinary Twilight round us. Don’t fly any further just at present. Stretch out to your full length, my precious comrade, and relax, and I will do the same. Let’s take, you and I, all the advantage we can of this extraordinary atmosphere. It is indeed what people call creative. Don’t you feel it to be so? I keep telling myself the wildest stories! I start one; then I break that off, and start another. There is something in the air here that forces you to tell yourself stories; stories about the beginning of universes and the end of universes, about the birth of worlds and the death of worlds! You ask me who created us. Well, my friend, I'll tell you frankly what I think — I don't think any God or any Goddess created us. It seems to me — and I feel it more and more strongly as I breathe this air — that we created ourselves.

'Now that we are resting in this mysterious atmosphere wherein all that we have become and acquired and have discovered seems blotted out and absorbed in something else, in something that however much we try to lie back upon it and relax within it and immerse our beings in its being, remains, in some unaccountable manner, alien to us, different from us, contrary in its inmost nature to what we are. This must be the reason why we both feel so incredibly thankful that we are we; I mean that I am not alone but have got you with me; and I know perfectly well, without asking you, that you feel indescribably thankful that you are carrying me with you. Well, now, my precious friend,' continued Wat Kums, 'let me tell you what I feel about this unique situation. In the first place it is clear that all life must divide itself into two if it is to avoid ceasing to be life and turning into death. That is how life starts. The man rapes the woman and the woman bears children. In the beginning of life incredibly small entities had to become two out of their original oneness before they could go on and on and survive.'

'Yes, O yes, my friend!' murmured Typhoeus, 'you are right about the importance of Two. What would I feel at this moment if I were here alone? Everything there is has its opposite, and all that exists depends for its existence upon its opposite. Life depends upon Death. Love depends upon

Hate. Hunger depends upon Food. Thirst depends upon Water. Action depends upon Sleep. Man depends upon Woman. Boys depend upon Girls. Sound depends upon Silence. Wisdom depends upon Folly. Light depends upon Darkness. If we had travelled on, you and me, through Space I suppose we could have gone on, if we could have kept alive, for ever and ever. For empty Space must be infinite in its expanse. Was it by chance we plunged into this region, I wonder? Or is it possible that around every Universe that exists there is a wide border of this twilight, a border that has to be crossed by all travellers who desire that their journey shall never cease?'

"Well, my friend,' said Mr. Kums, 'you have put it all better than I could have done. It is, just as you've explained it, a matter of opposites or pairs or everything in the one-and-one that makes two. How wonderful to feel that we have had the luck to plunge into this region where we have all around us and completely at our disposal this very Breath of creation, yes, my dear other one, that's what we're in now; and in the air round us is this ichor, this semen of concatenation and coagulation, this cataract of possibility out of which we can lay the cornerstone, four-square, of the kind of new world we want the most.'

They both became silent. Then quite suddenly Mr. Kums felt a decision take possession of him such as he had never felt before. It was an authoritative decision, a decision impossible to reject, a decision that Mr. Kums could no more disobey than he could stop being himself and turn into somebody else. 'We must leave this place,' he said to Typhoeus. 'You must go on carrying me through empty space.'

'I obey,' replied the flying Dragon. 'I've been for several minutes expecting this command.'

Thus speaking he set off, and Mr. Kums, crouching down under his wing, thanked with inexplicable gratitude whatever unknown cause it was that had made him make this decision. Darkness soon surrounded them again and on and on and on and on into this darkness Typhoeus carried his friend. 'How can you tell,' Mr. Kums enquired after a few minutes, 'that you are going in a straight line through Space?'

'By my nature,' replied Typhoeus at once. 'I suppose ever since Tartarus begot me and the Earth gave me birth, I have flown in a straight line, my mouth and my eyes leading and my tail following. It was my difference from the other Titans in this — for the word Titan means one who strains and the last thing I do is to strain — that must have so infuriated Zeus. From my birth on I have easily, instinctively, naturally, followed my eyes and mouth. And there is no doubt,' Typhoeus went on, 'that it has been my straight flying that has always got me so far. You ask how I know I am going straight. Well, my answer to that is — it's always been my nature to go straight.'

They certainly did go on, through the darkness of space, as if, so Wat Kums thought to himself, they had resolved to leave all worlds behind them forever. This, for some reason he could not quite understand gave Wat Kums a deep and exquisite pleasure. 'I wonder,' he said to himself, 'if it is simply some form of pride, some secret self-satisfaction, at being able to give such a daring order to such a formidable friend.' He decided as they went on further and further that it was something different from any kind of pride. He decided it was a pure physical sensation of bodily delight just as if he were devouring the darkness of space as he passed through it.

'How strange it is,' he said to Typhoeus, 'that pure empty Space is so enormous that we have no words for it but endless, unlimited, boundless, infinite, while all the worlds it contains, not only our Sun, Moon and Stars, but doubtless many other universes like ours, are so measurable that we find great interest and little difficulty in measuring them and obtaining their length, breadth, depth and height.’

‘You’ve hit it, my friend,’ said Typhoeus cheerfully. ‘But it will be of extreme interest to us both if by boldly and rapidly advancing through this dark infinity the same good luck that enabled us to barge into that weird region of many colours, many inventions, many experiments, many terrific advances, many abysmal retreats, many wild suggestions, many terrifying proposals, that region that gave us both such thoughts as we have never had before, if, I say, by boldly plunging on and on through infinite space as we are doing now we suddenly find ourselves confronted by a completely new Universe such as we have never dreamed could exist, a Universe completely different from the one we know only too well, a Universe or World if you like that may differ entirely from what we have known hitherto, you in your brief human life, and I in my prolonged Titanic life.’ It was then that Typhoeus suddenly stopped. ‘Do you know,’ he gasped abruptly, ‘I believe we are on the edge of an unknown world, now, even now! I can feel it in every bone and muscle I have. Yes! Yes! Here it comes!’

CHAPTER 9

MR. KUMS NEITHER sighed nor groaned. 'For a person such as I am,' he murmured, 'it's not bad news that we're touching another world! What power I've got is a certain magic power within me, a power I've no chance of using in empty space. Why! there's a tiny little air-ship greeting us! Let me stand up and wave back.' He quickly did what he wanted, gripping the wing of his Titanic friend as tightly as possible so as not to fall.

The little air-ship had only two persons on it and it soon came quite close to the Titan's side.

'What country is this?' cried Mr. Wat Kums. 'You must understand,' he went on, 'that this benevolent Dragon who is carrying me is my best friend, and that together we are exploring infinite Space so that we may discover new worlds. Typhoeus is my friend's name and he is more than a thousand years old. We like being together, and we believe, as I expect you do, that to achieve anything, the number two is the important number. To achieve anything we must go about in pairs.'

'You ask what country this is,' replied one of the two men; 'and we are both proud to be able to tell you. May we first enquire what your own name is? We shall never forget the name Typhoeus now that we've seen you two together.'

'My name,' our friend replied, 'is Kums and my first name is Wat. Kums rhymes with "crumbs" and Wat rhymes with "not". And if you get the sound correctly it doesn't matter if you don't know what those two words mean.'

‘To prove to you the truth of your own words,’ said the speaker, ‘we two, my name is Ob and my companion’s is Wob, will sing together our country’s national anthem.’

Both Typhoeus and Kums listened to them intently as they sang:

‘We are the Lollops who live in Loll
And our Monarch is Tallylog-Lollipog-Loll.
Far above Luna, far above Sol
Lives Tallylog-Lollipog Lord of Loll.’

‘Could you permit us, my kind Lollops, to visit your wonderful country,’ enquired Wat Kums when the music of the singing had died away.

The two men exchanged a few rapid words. Then the one who had first addressed them replied enthusiastically. ‘Certainly, Wat Kums, certainly Typhoeus. All you’ve got to do is to follow us closely and quietly, and we’ll take you down into the heart of Loll.’

‘Shall we do this?’ asked Kums of Typhoeus.

‘By all means,’ replied the Titan. ‘They have seen what I am, so they’ll know how to handle us.’

Slowly the tiny air-ship with the two men advanced over the sandy surface of what looked like an interminable desert, dry as dust and absolutely devoid of any growing or living thing. Typhoeus carrying Kums followed them closely, almost touching their little conveyance with the tip of his snout. Suddenly to both our friends’ surprise the ground opened before them and an abysmal gulf with small ladder-steps all the way round it opened before them. Typhoeus, from his thousand odd years’ experience of dwellings of this kind, especially from his remembrance of the House of Hades above both Tartarus and Erebus, headed down boldly after them while Wat Kums clung tight to his friend’s wing.

They found themselves in an enormous dome-like hall and they were helped to stop between two long rows of benches where the Titan could breath freely and rest at ease on his belly while Kums could slip down from his friend's back and stand straight up on the floor. The hall was lit by lamps with a fight such as neither the Titan nor his human friend had ever seen before. It had a colour, and since all the lamps were fit with it its effect was startling, that kept varying between blue and yellow and red and purple. Mr. Kums couldn't help enquiring at once of their two guides what this fight was that all the lamps in this great hall were burning. 'It's Lidicity,' he was told. 'It is exactly the same fight that, when we shut our eyes tightly, floats about under our fids. Lidicity has its own peculiar green and red and blue — it is a peculiarly dark blue — and a lovely primrose yellow. Down here electricity wouldn't do at all. Oil light wouldn't serve; candle-light, fire-light, torchlight, none of them would be any good. Lidicity alone is the light for down here. Lidicity was invented by our great King Tallylog-Lollipog, his own self. He invented it purely on the strength of those special colours he always saw when he pressed or anyone else pressed his eyelids tightly down. He took many years inventing it. All the other forms of light were used while he was at work on it except electricity because for electric light owing to some event in his childhood, the details of which were always kept secret, he had an obsessive almost a maniacal horror.' Both Typhoeus and Kums listened to all this with absorbed interest. Indeed Wat Kums found himself constantly shutting his own eyes tight so as to catch some of those colours, especially the peculiar shade of green. 'His Majesty must be,' he told their two guides with authentic zeal, 'a real genius in chemistry to have invented Lidicity.'

'He is! He is! He is!' both the two guides cried; and Kums wondered whether he would feel this respect for Tallylog-Lollipog when they met.

They had not long to wait. Their two guides, whose persons so far had been so wrapped up in curiously coloured shawls as protection against the wind that neither Kums nor Typhoeus had seen more than two pairs of eyes or heard more than the voice of one mouth, were now revealed in their actual appearance to their astounded visitors, as Typhoeus was encouraged to stretch himself out to his full length and Wat Kums was encouraged to walk about and look around. Beyond the fact that they had eyes and mouths they were not human at all. Their heads were snow-white without a trace of hair. Their arms came from their hips and were very long; and they too were snow-white without a hair upon them. Their legs which were also white were very short, and they had practically no feet at all, no toes or ankles and certainly no cloven hooves. All they had were round yellowish knobs such as could support them quite well when they stood erect but were often assisted by the tips of their fingers when they walked.

No, Mr. Wat Kums on his feet and Typhoeus stretched out on his long fish-like belly had not long to wait.

There now entered a cortège of Lollopians chanting their chant, while at the back bowing gracefully above his two feet and over the tips of his ten fingers which all touched the ground, came the Monarch.

‘Tallylog! Lollipog! Lord of Loll!’ chanted his cortège; while King Tallylog-Lollipog himself as he advanced towards them struck Mr. Kums as resembling what in the country he came from used to be called a Daddy Long-Legs. The cortège around him soon spread itself out with a skill that struck Mr. Kums as one of the most delicate examples of courtly behaviour that he had ever seen.

‘You will be surprised,’ said the King, ‘to hear me speak English. But I can soon tell you why I do so. A long time ago when an ancestor of mine called Tallimog-Oppimog was reigning a famous English adventurer called

Captain Cook took possession of Loll. He took a great fancy to my ancestor who was then very young and stayed with him several months. His discoveries of countries much larger than ours and much nearer Britain made his name so famous that his stay in Loll remained neglected and unknown. No English historian has recorded it. It has, however, been handed down among us for at least a couple of hundred years and until my great-grandfather's time everybody took for granted that Cook's discovery of Loll was recorded in all historical records. But my great-grandfather found out, though he never revealed how he found it out and I have often imagined it was by the help of the ghost of Captain Cook that this great explorer stayed a long while with us before he completed his adventures in places much nearer his starting-point. Indeed we possess in our archives a small English dictionary with Cook's signature on the fly-leaf which nobody could make me believe lacks authenticity. You see my dear friends,' the King of Loll continued, 'what makes it all so interesting is the fact that in the margin of this little English dictionary at the opposite end of the book from where Cook's signature is there are several carefully drawn pictures of us as we are, indicating, even exaggerating a little, the chief differences between our bodies and yours.'

After a little further conversation the Lord of Loll took his seat upon his throne and both Typhoeus and Wat Kums were given a very satisfactory repast for which both of them were extremely thankful.

'I take it,' said the King when the meal was over, 'that neither of you know how near you are here to the land of Hippo-homo where Centaurs have lived since the ancient Greek days. It crossed my mind when you first came that you took us for them! But I now see I was mistaken. Captain Cook, from what my ancestors handed down about him, was not interested in the ancient Greek days nor in ancient Roman days. But the word Centaur comes in his little dictionary with a picture of a horse with a man’s head and arms but with a horse’s body and tail and four legs.’

At this reference to ancient Greek days Typhoeus made a characteristic grimace, as if recalling the thunderbolts of Zeus, and Wat Kums shut his eyes tight for a second so as to enjoy in private the ‘Lidicity’ of the colours that surrounded them in this great Dome, then opening his eyes wide he asked the King, ‘Could your Majesty spare your air-ship with the two guides who brought us here, to take us to this land of Hippo-homo if it is, as your Majesty says, quite near?’

The King looked round, met the approving glances of the two guides, and smiled at Mr. Kums. ‘Certainly,’ he replied, ‘you shall start in ten hours from this very moment. You can arrange with your two friends how soon you would like them to call for you, because I don’t want you to start back to your home without a little more conversation. But I shan’t mind, remember, my dear friends, however long you may feel you would like to stay in Hippo-homo. Just tell your two guides and they will come for you.’

CHAPTER 10

BOTH WAT KUMS and Typhoeus had so deeply received into their acutest power of observation the unusual shape and appearance of the dwellers in the Land of Loll with their hairless heads on the top of necks so long that they served them in place of shoulders and chests and stomachs, and their arms protruding from their hips above their short legs and little feet like woolly knobs, that it took them quite a while ere they could grow used to living with the Centaurs. The curious thing about their life was its complete absence of order and discipline and routine and rule and its lack of every tinge or trace of authority. When they first arrived Kum's chief trouble was to distinguish one Centaur from another. They all lived on grass and on grain but how this grain was ground and whether the wheat and oats and barley were sown in ordinary earth-mould after digging up the grass neither Kums nor Typhoeus could ascertain. They saw no sign of any mill for grinding the corn nor did they see any larder or kitchen or scullery: but Hippo-homo possessed a large and varied landscape with hills and valleys and flat plains and rolling uplands and though they could see no buildings of any kind except colossal sheds under extensive roofs and rafters with chimneys out of which smoke came, they could imagine all sorts of culinary proceedings going on within these big sheds.

All the Centaurs had names; but Kums and Typhoeus soon noticed that these names oddly resembled each other, all of them having the syllable or as its centre. For instance the two Centaurs with whom the visitors made special friends were Thorp and Worp; and there were two others they got to know personally, though less intimately than those two, whose names were Rorp and Gorp. All four of these Centaurs used to bring oatmeal brown bread for Kums and Typhoeus to eat and as much water as they wanted to drink. Typhoeus displayed a scandalous disregard of orders and promises when the messengers from Loll arrived. One of these was called Rupty and the other Tupty; and Typhoeus boldly whispered to Rupty that he now felt strongly enough. ‘My strength increases,’ he told him, ‘every hour’ to take both the two guides together with Thorp and Worp who could crouch down as horses can when they so desire, and with Mr. Kums too, if this latter would agree to starting off once more through empty Space to see what new country, unknown to anyone in the old Zodiacal galaxy, they might be able to discover.

‘The Lord of Loll,’ the Titan whispered, ‘wants to see us again. But I don’t want to see him again nor does, really in his soul, my Mr. Kums either. So why not with you Rupty and Tupty, and with the two Centaurs Thorp and Worp as well as with Mr. Kums on my back, shouldn’t I set out once more to find new worlds in the darkness of space? I enjoy these crazy journeys and so I know does Mr. Kums. And I am sure that you two, Rupty and Tupty, will be much happier discovering new worlds with Mr. Kums and me and with these two Centaurs than just messing about round the musty throne of the Master of Loll.’

So powerful was the adventure zest of this ancestral Titan that the spirit of the thing did enter the souls of both Tupty and Rupty as well as the souls of Thorp and Worp who now clambered up upon him and lay down like happy animals in a favourite pasture while their human arms and hands rested on each other’s shoulders and their eyes wandered with intense interest to the face of Mr. Kums as he lay back under the Titan’s wing.

‘Well! Off we go!’ Typhoeus cried, and with a sweep upwards as reckless and daring as any dive ever made to the bottom of the deepest sea, he left

Hippo-homo behind and shot forward into the black night.

They hadn’t long to wait; and it was lucky they hadn’t, for the two Centaurs were showing signs of such sleepiness that Mr. Kums began to feel nervous that they might slide down from the Titan’s back and sink into the fathomless gulf below.

It was Rupty and Tupty who broke the silence. They were thinking of only one thing, namely how rude they had all been in not returning to the Land of Loll as they had promised to do. ‘Promises can’t always be kept,’ said Tupty and Rupty.

‘They can’t be broken,’ said Rupty to Tupty, ‘without disastrous results.’

‘Is there any chance,’ said Thorp to Worp ‘that we might hit upon some world in this deadly darkness where the people are all cannibals and will devour us the moment we appear?’

‘You must remember,’ said Worp to Thorp, ‘we’re not all so devoid of fighting qualities as not to be able to give Tit for Tat, if we don’t swallow them.’ Thus on and on and on and on into the darkness of Space they went.

‘We have broken our promise to the Lord of Loll.’ That was the thought they all had except Typhoeus, for when a Being has lived as long as this great Titan, such as Being grows as indifferent to promises whether kept or broken as to burdens whether carried or cast off. But on and on into darkness they went, on and on and on and on and on.

At last they did come to a new land. All they saw when Typhoeus landed upon it was a vast plain covered with an infinite variety of small shrubs, all of them bearing different kinds of vegetables and different kinds of fruit. There was no one to greet them at the point where they landed out of the air, and Typhoeus began moving about rapidly amid all this foliage, tasting and enjoying one sort of food after another. So, as can well be imagined, did all his riders, both from Loll and from Hippo-homo, for they were all hungry, tasting first one kind of edible and then another. Mr. Wat Kums did just the same till he had satisfied his hunger. ‘I think,’ he said to his friend the Titan, ‘that the vegetables are nicer than the fruit, but how strange it is to find vegetables growing on stalks above the ground!’ At last they all saw simultaneously, and they all stopped and stared at them as they approached, a couple of giants. They were not very tall giants, not more than seven or eight feet high, and they had quite kindly human faces, but the thing that was peculiar about them was that they didn’t utter a sound. Instead of speaking they gesticulated at one another. It was naturally Wat Kums who addressed them first, for he was a man as they were, though compared with them a tiny dwarf. But the trouble was that they only answered him with lively gestures and vigorous signs. They kept looking at Typhoeus with wonder and awe, and they often approached the two Centaurs and bending over them gesticulated desperately with their fingers trying to make their human heads understand what their signs meant. After a while one of the giants knelt down in front of Wat Kums. With an inspiration of extraordinary wisdom this latter drew from his pocket a big map which he spread out in front of the kneeling giant. He pointed at a little picture in the corner of this map of the planet Earth and its Suns and Moon and the other planets. Then he pointed to a big picture of Great Britain and showed him where London was and all the other big cities and where the different counties were and where the big Cathedrals were. Then, for as he went on he suddenly felt his inspiration widen and he showed him a picture he had recently made of his new Geographical Discoveries in Space, namely Loll and Hippo-homo; and in the hope that somehow, although it was impossible to see how, the name of their home might be dropped by the gesticulating giant, he drew in the corner of his picture a wide empty square with a vast question-mark.

He was successful. The kneeling giant after gesticulating for a minute or two above the Space-Map spread out before him, wrote in big capital letters, where Mr. Kums had left the place for it the one single word 'O R B'. So that was it! The world of gesticulation in place of words was called 'Orb' After that all went very happily for the visitors to Orb. Mr. Kums walked up to the ear of Mr. Titan and told him the great news. They were in the land of Orb where you gesticulated instead of uttering words.

'For Heaven's sake then,' murmured the Titan 'let's get out of here as quickly as my strength and your magic can carry us! I like words, I have always liked words; though I cannot utter many of them myself. But I cannot bear this gibble-gabble of signs. I think it is unworthy of man or beast, fish or reptile, bird or insect. Away, away, away, away, out of here! Off let us go! Straight up or sideways! I don't care what direction! To the left or the right, or straight, straight, straight, straight up! No! I don't care where we go as long as we get out of here. Out of this damned world of Orb!'

Wat Kums squatted down on the Titan's back; and so, quite as quickly, did the two Centaurs and the two Guides from Loll; and off the great monster carried them all! Mr. Kums felt pretty sure that with his Titanic instinct to get as far as possible from Olympus, the Monster would carry them straight to the right or left and thus away as far as possible into empty Space where he hoped there might be no world of any sort at all.

'How shall we get anything to eat?' was the question they were all asking each other as that day and that night passed and they were still whirling further and further into empty Space on the back of the Titan. They had brought with them quite a lot of bread and cheese; and when another day and another night had passed they had not only finished all their food but they had also finished all their water. Mr. Kums and the two guides from

Loll with their long necks and their hip-arms and their toe-less little feet were extremely uneasy. So were the two Centaurs from Hippo-homo, with whom, because of their human voices and faces, Mr. Kums continued to exchange comments on the general situation. They all were aware, however, in their uneasy minds of one strand of relief and comfort, namely that there was nobody from that Orb, if such were really its name, who gesticulated in place of speaking. But on and on into Space flew the monster-Titan, carrying with him two Loll-men, two Centaurs, and one human being. All his riders, as the great Titan vigorously and rigorously advanced through the dark nothingness, fell at length into dead silence. Mr. Kums and the two Loll-guides looked at each other with something like absolute hopelessness, while the human heads of the two Centaurs nodded gravely at each other over their sprawling horses' bodies as much as to say, 'Well, we've risked this little adventure to no purpose; so we must be calm and stoical whatever happens.'

But suddenly everything changed. Typhoeus lessened his speed to a gentle hovering and a languid circling. They all knew that he had felt there was a land of some sort below them, and had resolved to descend upon it with all the discretion he could possibly use.

He managed it to a nicety. In a moment or two he was resting on his belly in a lovely field of grass and flowers. The land had obviously a sun of its own for a warm light descended upon them from somewhere above; and it was clear at once that the dwellers in this heavenly country, whether they were used to airships or not, knew exactly how to behave to strangers.

CHAPTER 11

OUR TRAVELLERS INSTINCTIVELY formed themselves into a little halfcircle as they slipped off their Titan's back. Mr. Wat Kums assumed the role of their speaker as spontaneously as the others gathered behind him and as the Monster Titan winked at him with his piercing eye.

A solitary man with rapid steps and smiling face approached them.

'What land is this?' Wat Kums enquired of him, bowing politely.

'This is Utopia,' replied the man with equal politeness, 'and if you care to know how it came into existence I will tell you without false modesty or braggadocio. I, moi qui vous parle, invented it. Yes! it was my life's dream and the nameless power in Nature that makes our dreams come true made mine come true, as you see. What was the dream of my life was projected from the heart of Nature into far-off Space; and by the will of both men and gods I was despatched hither to act as the ruler of this Land. If you ask me who despatched me here and who appointed me ruler of my own dream-created invention, I can only answer by the word Destiny. It was my Destiny to create this unknown world and it was my Destiny to rule over it when I had created it. But please, my friends, don't any of you think that I am worthy of the immortal persons who have chosen, after their departure from the world of reality, to enjoy their divine rest from labour in the life-dreams of my far less deserving days upon the disturbed and troubled planet Earth, the mother of us all.'

'But how, O wise creator of this far-off world,' enquired Mr. Kums, 'did you name this land?'

‘I named it Utopia,’ replied the man humbly, ‘and my own name in the England of my day was Thomas More.’

‘And who are its inhabitants?’ enquired Mr. Kums.

‘They are the great writers and thinkers, many of whom lived before me and many of whom lived after me, who felt so sympathetic with my imaginary world that they’ve made it, for me at least, an absolutely real world. Come, Masters all,’ cried Sir Thomas More, ‘come and entertain with our best drink and food and talk these new-comers from our ancient home; and don’t forget to give their Titanic charioteer through Space his complete and proper share of all the delicacies you give them.’

There was a rush to obey him and very soon Typhoeus was draining jug after jug of the most delicious cider and devouring loaf after loaf of the most richly mixed and the most delicately baked brown bread.

Then to Mr. Wat Kums’ inexpressible delight Shakespeare himself came up to them. Kums knew him at once from all the pictures of him he had seen and he shook hands with him reverently and affectionately. He felt as if he were grasping in one single handful all the most dramatic moments of his whole life. But with the kind of smile that all his friends must have known so well, Shakespeare withdrew; and as he withdrew Mr. Wat Kums could see he was beckoning to the most ancestrally costumed and traditionally equipped figure among them all to come forward and be presented. Mr. Kums could see Sir Thomas More with chivalrous respect take the arm of this figure and lead him forward; and as soon as he approached him Mr. Kums knew well who it was, an English Poet of an age much earlier than Shakespeare’s. Yes! It was Chaucer! And then lo and behold! Mr. Kums was quoting Chaucer, what he had learnt at school from his Prologue to the Canterbury Tales:

> ‘When that Aprill with his shouers soote
> The droghte of March hath perced to the roote,
> And bathed every veyne in swich licour
> Of which vertu engendred is the flour!
> When Zephirus eek with his sweete breeth
> Inspired hath in every holt and heeth
> The tendre croppes, and the yonge sonne
> Hath in the Ram his halve cours ronne,
> And smale foweles maken melodye
> That slepen al the nyght with open ye
> (So priketh hem Nature in hir corages):
> Thanne longen folk to goon on pilgrimages.’

Yes, even while he was quoting Chaucer to Chaucer, lo! none other than the great poet Spenser was led to greet him by some courtier of the Fairy Queen herself.

Before taking the hand of Spenser Mr. Wat Kums couldn’t help noticing that he alone of these three great Spirits dwelling in the dream-world created by Sir Thomas More took any notice of Typhoeus. Yes, before even allowing himself to touch the outstretched hand of Mr. Kums, he enquired about the personality of the great Titanic Monster. But then, while Mr. Wat Kums had only just begun to tell the exciting story of his magical creation of Nubilium and of his leaving it on the back of Typhoeus, and while, in his warm gratitude to Spenser for his interest, he was still clutching the hand of that great poet, here was Sir Thomas More coming forward leading another great poet. ‘I never expected,’ he said, ‘that my dream world Utopia would last on like this for more than a couple of hundred years. But it has! It has! And here I am, an old, old, old, old Ghost-Creator introducing upon our stage the greatest poet of the Nineteenth Century, Alfred Tennyson.

‘So all day long the noise of battle rolled
Among the Mountains by the inter sea
Until King Arthur’s warriors man by man
Had fallen in Lyonesse about their Lord King Arthur,
Him the bold Sir Bedivere
Uplifted; bore him to the Chapel nigh the field
A broken Chancel with a broken Cross.
On one side lay the ocean, and on one
Lay a great water; and the Moon was full.’

‘There is a vale in Ida lovelier
Than all the valleys of the Ionian hills
On either hand the lawns and meadow ridges
Midway down hang rich in bloom;
And far below them roars
The long brook falling thro the cloven ravine
In cataract after cataract to the sea.
Behind the valley topmost Gargarus
Stands up and takes the morning, while in front
The gorges opening wide apart reveals
Ilium and Ilium’s columned Citadel
The crown of Troas.’

Poor old Sir Thomas More, ghostly as he might call himself, was able to embrace centuries in the charm of his graceful manner and the rectitude of his honest purpose.

‘Shakespeare and Spenser are two,’ he now told Mr. Kums, ‘and Chaucer from the Past and Tennyson from the Future are likewise two. There is a strange harmony between the swinging rhythm of Chaucer with his humorous sallies and the liquid rhythm of Tennyson with his romantic soarings. The poetic balance kept so beautifully by both Shakespeare and Spenser it totally disregarded in Chaucer's humorous plunges and Tennyson's wistful wailing. So is it in the life I have known among ugly bullies and sly brutes and among beautiful whores and bewitching sirens. Thus we see how life makes things work in pairs and brings it about that for every couple there is an antipodal couple, and for every passionate preacher an eloquent Antagonist upholding the opposite truth. The Life-Force which as Rabelais said has its centre everywhere and its circumference nowhere, has seen to it from the start that these inevitable oppositions become inescapable obsessions; for by some mysterious law of nature from these clashes alone does progress proceed. You may not,' and as he spoke Sir Thomas More glanced anxiously from Chaucer to Tennyson, 'be able to inaugurate or to follow all the intricacies of the rationalization involved, but the logic of the sequence of life is always discoverable however long it may take the children of life to find it.'

There was a deep silence in Utopia at this point; and then, quite suddenly, to the amazement of Shakespeare and Spenser and to the indignation of Chaucer and Tennyson, the Titanic Monster Typhoeus lifted up his head. Mr. Wat Kums had never seen him do this before; but, being quaintly devoid of nerves the only thing that really affected him in the presence of this event was the sight of a figure that he had always regarded as permanently level and straight in its elongated crocodile-shaped body lifting up its head as if it had a flexible neck and doing so in a manner that implied the possession of the power of not only looking both left and right but of twisting its head round so that it could discern who was riding upon its back or even see who or what was following it.

Mr. Kums at once called out in a ringing voice, ‘All right, old friend, I’ll do just what you say!’ And in a hardly less agitated voice he called to his fellow-travellers to take their places on the Monster’s back. They must have been as astonished as Kums was when they saw that terrific Titanic head turn round and those eyes with such a strange wild expression in them staring out of the depths of that cosmogonic skull for they took their seats on the Monster’s back with extreme alacrity, and as soon as they were safely lodged there the Titan twisted back his head to its normal position and darted away from Utopia into unillumined night.

This departure turned out to be different from all the others. Was this perhaps because Sir Thomas More’s Utopia being a dream come true projected the whole lot of these space-voyagers into what was the porch, the portal, the doorway, the entrance gate to something so different from all previous experience that none of them, including the Titan who carried them, felt quite normal or natural in their nerves. It was indeed the Titan himself who at last had the daring to summon Mr. Kums in a low whisper to move up nearer to his ear so that they could discuss this unpredictable state of things which was no mere quandary or dilemma but was like an approach to the edge of a precipice descending into infinity.

While Typhoeus and Wat Kums whispered together the two guides from Loll and the two Centaurs from Hippo-homo exchanged remarks of their own on this unexpected situation.

‘What I don’t understand,’ said one of the Lollians to the other, ’is why Typhoeus has stopped. You can feel he has, can’t you? And there is our Leader Mr. Kums evidently talking to him about it! But why the devil haven’t those two brought us into their conclave? We shall suffer as much as they will if anything has gone wrong. We’re all space-travellers together, aren’t we? Any serious trouble then ought to be discussed by us all surely, oughtn’t it?’

‘I don’t think our friends are as considerate as they might be,’ said the other Lollian. ‘What do you Centaurs feel about it all?’ The two Centaurs looked at each other rather nervously, while their horses’ feet grovelled and scraped against the Titan’s back. ‘I think at any rate,’ said one of them, ‘that it’s better to wait in space as we’re doing now than to listen to those giants gesticulating and gesturing and making scrabblements with their fingers on the air without saying a word! “Orb” did they call their bloody world? I’d prefer to call it “Scorble” or “Forble” or “Warble” or “Bauble”.’ Meanwhile Mr. Kums was saying to Typhoeus, ‘I think the best thing we can do is not to go up or down or left or right but just straight on upon the way we were going when we felt what we now feel. I think I can tell you what it is. You understand as well as I do that everything in life is double. Yes! Is made of two things. One of these things is Matter and one is Mind. Our own bodies are matter. Everything about us that we can see or touch or hear or feel, everything that our senses tell us of, is Matter. Then along with this there is Mind. There is mind in our body, mind in every stone or rock, or grain or sand or speck of dust about us, mind in the whole mass of air or space that surrounds the sun and moon and all the stars. The whole universe is in fact a mass of matter within which is a vast ocean of mind. Well then, O comrade Typhoeus, what has happened to us now is simply to find ourselves confronted by this vast conglomeration of bodiless mind which is nothing less than the mind of the entire universe. I would suggest that what we must do is accept this fact and ourselves merge our mind in the all-pervading entire universe.’

'I DON'T MEAN,' Mr. Kums went on, 'that our individual minds will be lost in the mind of the universe. I mean that they will be just as much our own private separate minds as our bodies; but my point is that they will be minds instead of bodies. In other words we shall change from being a self in the form of a body to being a self in the form of a mind. And we shall naturally,' he went on while Typhoeus listened intently, 'be surrounded by other minds; not only the minds of men, women, and children, but the minds of animals and birds and fishes and reptiles. But these minds will not impinge on us or overlap us as bodies do with bodies. They will be completely self-enclosed; only they will naturally exchange thoughts with us when they wish to do so, as we shall exchange thoughts with them when we wish to do so. What gives us,' Mr. Kums concluded, 'this weird feeling in our nerves is that we feel scared of losing our bodies. We naturally wonder what will become of our bodies and of the colossal mass of the bodies of men and animals and birds and fish and reptiles and of the body of the sun and the moon and of the bodies of the stars. It is a terrifying thought to think of all the great mountains and all the deep oceans of our earthly home melting away and vanishing in space; and we ask ourselves — will they melt away, simply because we mortal men have now become nothing but thinking minds existing side by side? All this is very difficult to picture. It is this difficulty in picturing it and imagining it that is just now giving us this great nervous shock. Is the universe in future going to become two great neighbouring masses, one of dead bodies — for bodies devoid of all thought and will and intention are surely as good as dead — and the other living bodiless minds?'

'But isn't it possible,' whispered the Titan Typhoeus, 'that these lively bodies of ours only exist in our minds? Why haven't those of us who are butterflies and moths and daddy-long legs and wasps and bees, and those of us who are worms and serpents and toads and frogs and those of us who are elephants and whales and rhinos and hippos and lions and tigers and eels and minnows and black beetles and horse-flies just simply imagined the outward shapes of the creatures they each wanted to be, and, if they were butterflies, the colours they wanted to have? Why, in fact, can't we think of our world as self-created?'

'It's beginning! It's beginning!' cried one Lollian to the other. 'It's begun! It's begun!' cried one Centaur to the other.

'Well, off we go!' cried Mr. Kums, crouching down behind the Titan's ear; and off with a vengeance they did indeed go.

The Titan kept his head wonderfully. Never to left nor to right, neither up nor down, but straight forward he plunged; and in a moment it had all happened.

'Our friends have left us,' thought Mr. Kums, 'but you and I are old enough comrades by now not to leave each other. Isn't that so, Typhoeus?'

'It is so, Wat Kums,' replied Typhoeus, 'but I expect this new state of being is going to feel a bit weird at first. What in the name of Hades can I do without this old body of mine that Zeus weakened with his thunderbolts? Surely some of us are more closely linked to our bodies than others, and to have to face life with nothing but a wandering mind, surely sometimes to some of us that must be a rather unhappy experience?'

Mr. Kums felt a longing in his mind to sigh heavily— 'can't we so much as sigh?' he asked the Titan sadly. 'Of course we can't,' replied that realistic

Monster at once. ‘How could we sigh without a throat and lungs from which such music has to come? But sighs aren’t everything; and bitter tears aren’t everything. What we’ve got to do is to think through our troubles, think round our troubles, think down to the deepest bottom of our troubles. When we come really to think about it scarcely any of our troubles have a physical origin. We attribute them to something physical, but really it’s almost always some mental trouble, some misunderstanding between ourselves and others, some awareness of a folly, of a stupidity, of a jealousy, of a remorse, of a cowardice, of a spitefulness, of a viciousness, or a vanity, we have shown and of which we are ashamed to think of other people noticing it.’

‘How strange it is,’ said Mr. Kums, ‘that though we have shaken off our bodies the memory of them, the feeling of them, lives on.’

‘No! No! That is not strange at all!’ cried the Titan. ‘It was we ourselves who created our bodies! Yes! the smallest insect among us did so! The fly did so. The flea did so. The bed-bug did so. And the elephant and the whale and the Sea-Serpent; they all did so, just as I did and just as you did. We naturally think in terms of the bodies we created for ourselves: but now at this abysmal crisis in the world’s history we have to do something quite different. We have, all the lot of us, to adapt our minds to an utterly and completely different existence. Each individual among us must adapt itself to be the sort of mind that it really and truly, inside its body, has always been. If you are a man or a boy your mind is the mind of a man or a boy. If you were a woman or a girl your mind is a woman’s or a girl’s mind. In any case from this moment on everything is different. You are an individual. You are yourself. You know yourself in and out; and you cannot help doing so, even if you are the most foolish, most stupid, most idiotic, most simple, most childish mind of any insect, animal, bird, fish, reptile, or human being, ever born.’

‘But where, O my Titanic comrade,’ protested Wat Kums, ‘does that necessity for a double, an opposite, an angel if you’re a devil, a fashion model if you’re a witch, a master if you’re a slave or a dog, a Divinity if you’re a mouse or a rat, a railway-engine if you’re a perambulator, a Castle in Scotland if you’re a dweller in a slum-back-yard in London, where, I ask you, is the Miser if you’re a Missionary, the sea-eagle if you’re a willow-wren, the Euripides if you’re an Aristophanes, the Cow with a Crumpled-horn if you’re a cat-hunting dog, a Harry Hotspur if you’re an Owen Glendower, come into this new situation?’

‘I can tell you. I can tell you. I can tell you,’ Mr. Wat Kums,’ cried the Titan. ‘The opposite is the whole mass of conscious mind hovering round the mountains of the Moon, round the midriff of the Sun, the untraversed hilltops of the abounding stars! We, that is to say you and I and all the other individual minds that are now set free by this world-shaking shock are privileged to assert ourselves to the limit. Nothing can hinder us from being ourselves to the utmost limit; but it is impossible for us not to feel restricted by the multitudinous assemblage of all the other selves in this huge universe who are equally free from restriction. That is the tragedy, ever present, of all ordinary life. We all long to assert ourselves to the limit. But who is it, who is he or she in the entire universe, who is not bounded, buttressed, battered, boarded by the multitude of other selves, wanting just the same, who surround us on every side? If we were, each one of us, completely alone in this vast unopposing dome of limitless space, we would probably be confronted within ourselves by the most confounding and constraining of all obstacles, the deep self-contradictions of our own nature. But as it is we have no need to dig down as deep as that. Our mind is not yet a ghost. We are not dead. We are not wraiths of the past. We are minds, souls, spirits, egoistic personalities living in the present, full of energy and vigorous life and as ready to wrestle with one another as we are ready to challenge the brooding souls of all these moons and suns as well as the impenetrable fastnesses of the Towering uplands of our own planetary earth. Don't you see,' the Titan went on, speaking more and more drastically, 'a point has been reached today that is a terrific terminus in the history of all the lives that our universe has produced. We've got to stop and think, every single one of us, from the fleas in our beards and the bugs in our beds and the moths in our clothes, to the elephants and the whales and the hippos and the rhinos and the walruses and the seals and the badgers and the foxes and the lions and tigers and leopards and panthers. Yes! we've got to think in the terms of all the consciousnesses of all the living things in the whole universe! Let the Golden Eagle swoop down! Let the Sea-Serpents rise up! Neither enormous birds nor enormous serpents have any longer any physical weight. Let them do what they will! Let us all do what we will! We are all bodiless now. We are all nothing but wandering self-consciousness, selves that are aware of what is happening but are unable to assert ourselves in any way at all.'

'But yet,' murmured Wat Kums, 'there is something about this ghastly and catastrophic finale to all our dreams of what we have imagined the world would evolve into that is distressing to these liberated minds of ours. O Typhoeus, my friend, I have a feeling that neither you nor I have altogether interpreted the present cosmogonic crises aright. I feel as if there is something we've forgotten, something we have left out in our thoughts about it. No! my friend, don't let our talk stop you from moving on. You had begun to do so. Don't 'ee stop, I beg you. Straight on! Neither to the left nor the right or up or down. Listen, old friend! It has just come into my head that in the shock of the loss of our bodies and in the struggle to keep our independence undominated by any of the powerful thinkers whose personalities tend to enchant and obsess us, the whole crowd of us who have only ordinary intelligence might gather like a great wave and sweep over the whole space, carrying all the selves and every individual me along with it till it swallows all worlds that have ever existed and all worlds that are beginning to exist and hurls itself into infinity. And what,' went on Wat Kums excitedly, 'will happen then? What will happen to all of us selves, to you and me and him and her and all our children and all our babies and all our grandfathers and grand-mothers and aunts and uncles and nurses and nurse-maids and housemaids and kitchen maids and tramps and beggars? What will it feel like for us when we are travelling through Infinity? Shall we discover new worlds, totally and completely different from any we have ever seen or imagined or dreamt of? Or shall we just perish on the back of our Titan whom Zeus all those years ago tried to kill, but couldn't with his damned thunderbolts? Will you, O heroic Typhoeus, go on your course alone through Infinity till you die of hunger? Then I suppose you will sink down forever and ever, unless by chance one of these confounded worlds we have been so glad to leave — like that damned "Orb" where they used signs instead of words! — catches you as you sink and becomes your burial place. Long ere that happens I suppose we who are now riding on your back will have fallen off, starved to death, and will either be descending headlong forever, or will be caught by some wretched little star and be worshipped as dead gods by its inhabitants, or gobbled up as savoury morsels, if these same natives, as is quite likely, happen to be cannibals. The truth is,' Mr. Wat Kums went on, 'that what all living things have always suffered, simply from being living things, and what we shall all suffer as long as our life lasts, is so damnable that I am tempted to say we just praise providence in pure hypocritical sanctimoniousness mingled with the cringing cunning of lick-spittle sycophants instead of cursing the devilish cruelty of its inhuman rule and living from day to day as godless free-lances. What we forget,' he continued, 'is that not to have existed at all, whether our existence would have been that of an insect or an animal or a fish or a bird or a reptile or a human being, is a far better fate than to perish like Caesar crying out "et tu Brute!" or like Charles the Second apologising to his courtiers for being "such an unconscionable time in dying".'

At that point Typhoeus murmured, 'But don't you feel that whatever these men may have said with their last breath they would have confessed, if they had been, or if any other famous men had been, coaxed into speaking quite honestly what they felt about life in general, that they were very thankful that they had been born and had known what the good and evil of life was before the hour of their death came? For if in the next five minutes, my dear friend, I felt that I had been hit by some special kind of dark lightning that can kill without making a sign of its presence, do you think I would feel that I might just as well have never lived at all? Of course not. I should recall, as your earthlings always say that drowning people do, the whole course of my life and I should think to myself that I certainly had had some very interesting experiences such as I wouldn't have missed having had for a million ducats! What is it in us all, I ask you, my dear friend, that makes us refuse these drugs that cause insensibility and imperviousness? Isn't it because however much I shrink from suffering any kind of discomfort I shrink much more from becoming an unfeeling log. Living things are born to feel, my dear, and if they suspect you of trying to destroy their power of feeling you had better beware. They will go for you with a rash! An insect will, a serpent will, a wolf will, a shark will, a sparrow or an eagle will. What is the outrage on you is the attempt to take from you the essence of what Nature has given you. Nature made you a living creature with the power of feeling. If any creature thinks you are trying to destroy its power of feeling it will fight desperately as if you were threatening to take its life and it will be entirely justified in doing so. Far the wickedest and most abominable practise made use of in these modern days is vivisection. When this is practised every living man, woman and child has the right to fight it to the limit. It is linked with the horrible attempt in these modern days to make Science the ruler of the world. Jesus was born when Tiberius, that Hairy Goat of cruelties unspeakable, was Emperor of Rome. The iniquities he used to practise at Capri were the worst things ever done upon this earth; worse than the cruelties performed by Gilles de Retz or "Bluebeard" and far worse than those that the Marquis of Sade used to dabble in. Jesus was the greatest man who ever lived and Tiberius was the worst man who ever lived; and the fact that they lived at the same time is another convincing proof of that great principle we both believe in, that the deepest things in life work in pairs, in couples, in ineffable and abysmal opposites.'

It was then that Wat Kums, still clinging to the lobe of the Titan's ear as the huge creature slowly moved forward, went through one of those experiences that when they happen to us we never forget till we die.

This experience was simply and solely his actual realization of what the word Infinity really meant.

Mr. Kums had often talked about Infinity. He had often let it take what he felt was its due place in man's acceptance of the Universe into which he had been born; but never before had he realized the startling and awe-inspiring nature of what this terrific word really meant. It began with the effect of distance. How lightly he thought do we measure the immensity of distance. But when we apply our mind to the effort of really taking in what we mean when we use the word infinite for the distance upon distance upon distance upon distance which we are forced to assume without any limit when we try to envisage such a thing as unending space our frail and limited human intelligence gets a nasty shock. What I have to do, thought Mr. Kums, is simply to use my imagination and force myself to contemplate the world as something which, while it contains innumerable stars and suns and moons, is surrounded on all sides by an empty space which in whatever direction you explore it never comes to an end. Well, let us, thought Mr. Kums, face this unavoidable and inescapable fact. Is there not something terrifying about it as well as inescapable? But how can I avoid it? What we've got to do, I suppose, is to visualize a completely empty universe entirely made up of space extending indefinitely in every direction, so that if you possessed the power of exploring it, whether to the north or the south or the east or the west, you would simply find that in none of these directions it ever came to an end. Now doesn't this conception of things, thought Mr. Kums to himself, make all philosophy ridiculous and all Bibles absurd? What is the reality of our life? The reality of our life is an attempt to enjoy ourselves by watching and analyzing and philosophizing about the history of our race, from the days when Zeus drove the Titans to live with Hades in the world below, until the present day when scientists are struggling to dominate us all. But what can philosophy say, and what can science say, thought Mr. Kums in his heart, when we realize that we are like a little cloud of tiny insects fluttering above a floating mass of garbage while all the while the vast reality of life consists in nothing but a never-ending enormity of space stretching without end or beginning into infinity. This is the reality of life, a mass of nothing stretching out without end or beginning. Endless nothing is the reality of life and nothing without end is all we find now and all we shall be able to find forever. But suddenly, as he leant forward against the lobe of the great Titan's ear, it came into the head of Mr. Wat Kums that if this Nothingness extended forever in every direction while our Sun and Moon and Planets and Stars were, the whole lot of them, in comparison, a mere group of little blobs of Matter in a tiny isolated tract of fertility, the Meaning of Life must either exist in this Nothingness itself or if not so there must still be awaiting discovery, wrapped up in this pathetically little blob of solid matter, some innermost intimate secret for the sake of which, in the service of which, to the purpose of which, and for the uttermost fulfilment of which, all this infinite mass of Nothingness alone exists. The secret of the whole universe — so now rushed the thought of Wat Kums — must lie in this tiny tract of Matter. Yes! in this Earth and Sun and Moon and Stars and Planets and satellites and asteroids in as much as it is influenced and affected and surrounded by all this immeasurable mass of infinite Nothingness. The thought that came rushing like a whirlwind upon Wat Kums now was that nothing but an infinity of nothing had the power to force inwards the essential reality of the Universe of Matter until it is so supremely conscious of itself that its inner life becomes an Elysian Field of separate identities. Yes! thought Wat Kums, that is the point of the whole thing, the creation of separate living identities and living personalities that will remain themselves in their differences and in their independent selves forever and ever.

'It has come over me before and it comes over me now,' said Mr. Wat Kums to himself, 'that the essence of life lies in individuality, but this can only be reached in its entirety by a pressure from outside that is overwhelmingly powerful, in fact that is infinite in its power.'

CHAPTER 13

'HAVE YOU REACHED any conclusion in your Thought?' whispered the Titan Typhoeus, driving firmly and steadily forward in his straight path; 'I fancied I felt you make the sort of motion just then that we all make when we arrive at some important decision.'

'Yes,' replied Mr. Kums, 'I have.'

'Do tell me,' murmured the Titan, 'what conclusion you've reached.'

It was then that the two Centaurs and the two Lollian Guides lifted up their voices, all four of them together, 'Tell us! Tell us! Tell us! Tell us!'

Mr. Wat Kums felt a wave of real pride, stronger than he had ever felt in his whole life before — and it was justifiable pride; for he had hit the nail on the head as few philosophic observers of his calibre succeed in doing.

'Well, my friends,' he said quietly, 'I have come to the conclusion — and you'll all agree with me in this — that what we want most is to assert ourselves. Now this assertion is generally a different thing in women from what it is in men, but not always, for a certain few of us are what they call hermaphrodites, which means that we have within us the feelings of both sexes. But as a rule men want to assert themselves by doing something while women want to assert themselves by being something. But my point is that some kind of self-assertion is the goal of us all and so if you consider what a mixed crowd of living things we are, this longing in us all is hard to satisfy. But here once more' — and Mr. Kums began to speak with something almost like authority, 'enters not only the difference of sex but the difference of various types of living things. We are not only men, women and children; we are human beings and animals and reptiles and birds and fishes and insects. This being so our self-assertion is bound to assume very different forms. Now what I believe is that the immeasurable and boundless mass of empty space which stretches to infinity in all directions exercises upon our little universe of matter a very special and remarkable effect. It intensifies the individualism of all the members of our little group of living creatures to a frantic extent. It has indeed,' and the authority with which Mr. Kums spoke increased still more, 'occurred to me that the enormous pressure of this mass of empty space stretching to infinity, as it reaches the Centre of energy and will in all of us, seizes upon this centre of energy and does two things to it at the same time. It intensifies its powers inwardly and deeply; but it also draws it into itself to such an extent that we human beings along with animals and reptiles and birds and fishes and insects actually find ourselves sharing the infinite life of infinite space; with the result that infinity carries with it forever whatever is happening or may happen to us all in our small world, the essence of each of us, the inmost self of every single man, woman and child, of every animal, reptile, bird, fish and insect. This must have been done by infinite space, moving forever into an infinity without an end, since the beginning of time: and we must remember that these everlasting inmost selves of ours have been increasing ever since what we call life began and we living creatures came into existence. There are very likely plenty of ghosts also who are carried along by empty space into infinity; but the beings I am speaking of are not ghosts of the dead. They are living identities. They are as much alive as when their neighbours could see their bodies. They have no visible bodies any more, but their living selves can feel the bodies they once had as definitely as when they had them. But their bodies are in no more danger of being killed and they are not ghosts of bodies that have been killed. They are infinite selves that were in those bodies and conscious of those bodies and they will be so for ever.'

'You were inspired just then, Master Kums,' murmured Typhoeus quietly. 'You are a Prophet, a Prophet!' cried the two Centaurs. 'You are a Wizard!' cried the two Lollians with one voice.

There was no doubt that Wat Kums made more impression on his hearers by what he had just said than he had ever made on any other hearers by any words of his in the whole course of his rather wordy life.

But Wat Kums was not quite satisfied in his own mind by his oracular utterance. 'Does this idea of the infinity of our self-love truly represent all our innermost longings?' he asked himself. 'I have often got so tired of life that I have thanked Nature with the whole of my mind and heart that when I come to die it will be the end; and I shall have no after-life of any kind at all. Of course,' so he argued with himself, 'I was thinking of the sort of after-life that we Christians have borrowed from the Greeks and from the Jews; from Homer and from the Bible; and I daresay if we were absolutely honest with ourselves we wouldn't have been quite so content with such a pretty-pretty after-life with the Deity acting as a sort of Conductor of the orchestra and the pleasures of Heaven being enhanced by their contrast with the tortures of Hell.'

'As far as I can follow your argument,' said Typhoeus gently, but quite loud enough to be heard both by the two Centaurs as well as by the two Lollians crouching on his back, 'what you feel is that this vast volume of empty Space stretching away in every direction into Infinity, through which we are now pursuing our way, has the power of increasing to an extent we never dreamed to be possible the intensity of our self-assertion, or our — I won't say selfishness for it is a little different from that — our selfness, let us say, our consciousness of being what we are, till it reaches a point beyond which it is impossible for it to go. According to this view the selfhood of each of us, which includes in it the shape and attributes of our former body, can never vanish away. Your view, my dear Mr. Wat Kums, is not the same as the view of those who believe in another life. Your view is that our present life never ceases, not that something called our "soul" goes on living when our body is dead. Your view is that our body never completely dies. The outward and material aspect of it passes away but the feeling of our body, the idea of our body, the impression of our body as our mind is aware of it never passes away. It is eternal. It is a portion of Infinity. It is part of infinite Space.'

It was then that one of the Lollians asked a question. 'But, O indomitable Titan, if all the creatures, from the biggest giant to the smallest insect, of all the worlds in existence, live on in their imperishable consciousnesses forever and ever in infinite space, and if, as you and Mr. Kums suggest, they have always done so, will not this infinite space of yours be overcrowded with living consciousnesses?'

One of the Centaurs replied to this before either the Titan or Mr. Kums could collect their thoughts to reply.

'How the devil, you double-dyed infant from Loll, could infinite space be overcrowded? Of course it couldn't! I guess you don't know, you lollerlap baby, what the word infinite means! Of course if space goes on forever it can't possibly get overcrowded! These men and beasts and birds you are thinking of, and whales and sharks too, have only to overlap a little, as they'll no doubt be perfectly ready to do, and they'll be able to follow a space that's unending for ever and ever, amen! Well! I must not go on abusing you or Zeus may try to kill me, as he tried to kill our Titan, who, like a true Titan, is straining every muscle to follow infinite space.'

Typhoeus held his peace and went on. Mr. Kums held his peace and crouched down. Both Lollians and both Centaurs fell into dead silence. It was then that a completely unexpected event occurred. Typhoeus suddenly ceased to move on; and they all saw, coming towards them through the half-light which was evidently all that was to light them during their journey through infinite space, a tall gigantic figure walking through the air as if he were wading through water. His right arm was raised high above his head and in his hand was a hollow stalk out of the top of which streamed a far flickering flame of fire. The only one of them who knew at once who this gigantic person was Mr. Wat Kums who cried aloud in frantic reverence and awe: 'Prometheus hail! Prometheus hail! O Prometheus, give us fire to lighten our darkness as we travel through Space!'

'Fear not, Titan!' replied Prometheus. 'Fear not, little ones on his back! Zeus is far too old to be able to hurt any one of you. He sleeps on the summit of Olympus watched over by Hera his wife and guarded from his enemies by his daughter Pallas Athene, whose mother he swallowed lest she should prove wiser in war-weapons than he. In his belly she gave birth to Pallas, who forced her way up through his body till she could break free of him by crashing through the top of his head.'

It was then that the Titan Typhoeus lifted up his voice. 'It is a deep comfort to me to meet you here, O greatest of all enemies of our tyrant-gods. It is up to me to carry these two from the Kingdom of Loll and the two Centaurs from the Kingdom of Hippo-homo as far as we can go through the centre of Infinite Space; but I confess to you, O everlasting enemy of the accursed Tyrant-gods, that I have many misgivings about what I am doing.'

'How do these doubts arise in you, O adventurous one, and what form do they take?' enquired Prometheus, resting one arm beside the very lobe of the ear to which Mr. Kums was clinging. ‘They take the form,’ replied the Titan, while Prometheus, who evidently wasn’t interested as much as was Mr. Kums in what was being said, used his other arm to make a motion as if he were swimming, ‘of wondering what Jesus would feel about all this if he were here; for what I think is, leaving out the question altogether as to which of the Apostles it was, probably St. Paul, who linked Jesus up so very closely with God that he became the Second Person of a Trinity whose Third Person was the Holy Ghost, what I think is that Jesus was really not very happy about being converted into this Second Person of a threefold Deity. I feel that to Jesus, and no doubt to his Mother too, there was something painful about being moved from the position of those who worship into the position of those who are worshipped. Worship enobles the worshipper but it has a deadening effect upon the worshipped. It turns him or her into stone. There they do bide, all the great Gods and all the great saints, on walls, on pedestals, in corners, on arches, in niches, in shelves, on pinnacles, on turrets, dead and still, while their worshippers come and go full of life and spirit.’

It was at this point that Mr. Kums became aware that Prometheus kept raising his hand, the hand of the arm that was resting on the Titan’s back to his own mass of very thick hair, and as his eyes followed this movement Mr. Kums became aware that reposing happily with an extremely mischievous expression in the midst of the Promethean hair was none other than the Devil himself! Yes, there sat the Devil on the head of Prometheus in evidently an extremely exultant mood. But Mr. Kums had been so carried away by what Typhoeus had just said about Gods and Goddesses and their worshippers that it seemed to him only a natural thing that on the top of the head out of which such disparagement of Divinity at the expense of Humanity had just issued forth should sit grinning, the Being that Christians had invented to be the opposite of their invented God. But what Mr. Kums had not expected and what bewildered him as much as it bewildered his four fellow-travellers, and as much as it bewildered the great Titan himself who was carrying them, was the sudden appearance out of the twilight in front of them of Jesus himself. He towered above them and it seemed to them as if all the space in front of them had in some strange way gathered itself together to envelop him and to envelop them also as he took them, along with it, into himself. But both Mr. Wat Kums and Typhoeus heard the words he spoke and they were words that became the whole of their life and the whole of their subsequent death, miraculously intermingled:

'I tried all the days of my life to be good and kind and to use my power to make myself and others happy, and as I lived while I lived, so I live now that I am dead, only it is henceforth in others rather than in myself that my life goes on. Yes, I am dead, and one day all you six souls will be dead like me, and one day all the world will be as dead as I am now dead; but none of this matters, none of it, none of it, none of it, as long as, till we die, we remain good and kind.'

CHAPTER I

I WAS BORN outside this whole bloody Universe; yes, outside all the Universes that were, are or will be. I used to call my parents Umandmum; for they were one person and yet they were two persons. How between them they gave birth to me and brought me up it would be impossible for me to say. How they came into existence I have no idea; but I was born of them in the aboriginal Emptiness or vacuity that still exists outside what earth-born people call Space. Space, according to earth-born scientists, is crowded with atoms, each one of which is a tiny world of its own, full of infinitesimal entities that go whirling about obeying or disobeying attractions and repulsions that only earth-born scientists understand. But in the boundless Emptiness outside Space and outside our Universe, and outside all other Universes, there are none of these atomic entities: there is just simply nothing at all. If an inhabitant of the planet Earth were to see me pass through their dwellings I should be taken for what they call a ghost; that is to say if the one who saw me wasn't a baby. If it were a baby the baby and I would stare at each other with reciprocal interest, with an interest, as I have come to know well, capable of developing into something like a lasting friendship.

Yes, I come from outside all the motions and commotions that make up, although it may be as fine as the finest air, what earth-dwellers call Matter as opposed to what they call Mind. I never let myself forget that my real home is outside this material Space with its lively atoms. I am always reminding myself that where I come from the aboriginal Emptiness is as different from Matter as it is from Mind. It was in this Emptiness that the

Two-in-One Being called Umandmum or, for short, Ummum, brought me up to my maturity, in other words to my complete individuality. Both Um and Mum were always addressing me with the words ‘you and me’; so it became inevitable that, when I left their side in the aboriginal Emptiness and entered the Space which surrounds all the Starry Universes, I should hunt for some world where it would be possible to find a ‘you’ to whom I would be not only a real ‘me’ but an actual person with peculiarities to be considered.

Umandmum taught me not only to fly without wings but how to consider from immense astronomical distances the probable characteristics of each particular star upon which I concentrated my attention; and after flying from galaxy to galaxy with all my intelligence alert I finally decided that the planet Earth was what I wanted, chiefly because of its perilous nearness to the moon; and you can believe I was not long in learning from the forlorn aerial echoes that had haunted the air there for millions of years what appalling disasters that nearness had already evoked. Coming as I did from absolute Emptiness it was natural that I should be excited not only by the whirling hordes of mites that compose the atomic substance of the air round the Earth but also by the nature of the Earth itself. It was by roaming about the surface of the Earth that I soon found that everything there had a name. And thus I realized for the first time in my life that I had no name. ‘What shall I call myself?’ I asked myself as I walked round the streets of London. It was only after I reached a pleasant row of houses near Paddington and got a lodging there for the night that I answered this delicate question. I decided to call myself ‘Um’, though I was, I confess, a little disturbed in this decision when upon scolding a lad for beating his dog with a stick he turned on me with the question: ‘Who the hell are you?’ and I replied with all the dignity I could muster up ‘I am “UM”’, and he at once retorted, ‘You’d better go and um it and mum it and rum it and burn it that in your own country!' But the dog gave me such a grateful glance that as I went on I hummed the boy's jingle happily to myself. As a matter of fact it was only my anxiety to know something about the thoughts and feelings of the people who made up the London crowds that led me to follow these roads and streets and pavements and squares. I had long ago found out that I had the power, completely unknown to any man upon earth, of passing clean through any obstacle. I could pass through walls in thickest stone and through houses of the most obstinate material. What people saw of me in the street was just an ordinary young man in ordinary clothes with a cloth cap on his head; but inside a house I must often have looked like a ghost. The truth of the matter was that it was in my power to be an ordinary human being with a tangible body such as everybody has beneath my clothes and with a fairly handsome face and with well trimmed curly brown hair; but it was also in my power at a moment's notice to transform this frame of mine, clothes and body and all, into an intangible ghost. And when I became this ghost nothing could stand in my way. I could pass like a shadow through anything; and I could leave the ground and ascend to the top of the highest buildings without a motion of either arms or legs. It was entirely at my own will to be touchable or untouchable; and this privilege suited my inherent nature.

One of the most important moments of my life on earth came when after leaving my Paddington lodging for a whole day I came in my ghostly semblance to a substantial house in Hampstead and passing through a wall near the kitchen where I heard women talking I entered at last a well furnished bedroom where a child lay on its back in a small cot quite alone. It must have been getting on for eleven o'clock at night. The child's parents were evidently out at a party and the housemaid, in the absence of her mistress, was having a long private conversation with the cook in the kitchen. It was as I passed through a wall adjoining the kitchen and paused to listen for a moment to the two women's talk that I learnt that the name of the little girl in the crib was Theophil. I opened the door of the room, walked in boldly in my most boyish and careless manner, and going straight up to the cot asked the child where her mother was. 'She's out with Daddy,' the little girl replied quietly. 'Phil can't sleep any more. Phil had bad dream.'

'What did you dream about, my dear?'

'Bogey in Mummy's bed,' she answered. I saw that my presence pacified her. 'Is that Mummy's bed?' I asked, pointing to the big four-poster that filled half the room. 'Yes,' said the little girl. 'I'm glad you came. I don't want to dream any more.'

'Are you a boy or a girl?' I asked her shamelessly. The little creature answered me at once. 'I'm a girl. Mummy was a girl once and she always says boys are interested in what they do and girls in what they are.'

'Why,' I asked her, 'don't people talk to a man like me when I go about?' She pondered for a moment, staring at me as if I had been a butterfly. Then she said: 'Because they don't want to.'

'Did you want to?' I asked. 'Yes,' she said. 'I felt you were there and I wanted to see what you looked like.'

'I hope you didn't think I was God,' I said. 'No,' Theophil replied: 'Daddy doesn't believe in God, and Mummy says I must decide about him when I grow big.'

'Do you think you'll decide to believe in him?'

'Not,' she replied, 'now I've seen you. I like you better than God.'

'Why?'

‘Because you don’t throw people who don’t believe in you into a fire that never goes out.’ I confess that I was pleased and proud to think that to my first friend on earth I was preferable to God. ‘You and I understand each other,’ I said. ‘But goodbye for now.’

‘Goodbye for now,’ replied Theophil gently turning her eyes to a scarf at the foot of her cot. I longed to kiss at least her little hand before I went to the door. But I was so scared of being caught by her parents that I hurried away. And the moment I was out of the room I turned into my ghost-self and passing through every wall that intervened and across every space and over roof-tops and chimney-tops and tree-tops and down streets, like a young man running for his life as well as like a ghost seeking for its grave, I at last reached Paddington station, near which I had found a lodging when I first arrived. ‘You don’t mind my appearing so late, Mrs Smith?’ I pleaded remorsefully, when the short, sturdy landlady came down to answer my ring. ‘O no, Ummy-boy!’ the little lady answered: ‘only you must call me Cloddie, you know. Yes, I’ve kept your room safe for you. In fact the Lord told me to keep it for you.’

‘What made your Mother call you Clotilde?’ I couldn’t help asking before she left my room. ‘I know your mother was Mrs Tallboy, and I know that before she married she was Lizzie Lilicombe. But had she any relation called Clotilde?’

‘O yes, Ummy-boy. There was my aunt Clotilde — but I mustn’t stop to tell you all about her now. What time do you want me to bring you your cup of tea? At eight, sonny, and breakfast at nine?’

‘Yes, Cloddie,’ I murmured, ‘just as you say. Professor Porpustle will have gone by nine, won’t he? I’ll sleep better if I know I shan’t have to meet him!’

‘O yes. He’ll be gone, sure as Tuesday’s Tuesday! There won’t be nobody but you and me; and we’ll have it in the kitchen. Sleep well, laddie!’

The lady’s steps ascending the stairs to her bedroom, which was on the floor above, gave me a delicious sense of peace. My whole body reacted to it and in less than three minutes I had folded my clothes and laid them on a chair and put out the gas, and with nothing on but my vest and pants, settled down to sleep in heavenly contentment.

As poor mortals, of which I was now one, are so made that while by taking thought we can anticipate and avoid all manner of petty disturbances, there is one thing we cannot do, and that is to decide before we embrace the heavenly angel of sleep what dreams we are going to have! Is it not a strange thing when you come to think of it, that after arranging all the difficulties of our lives to a nicety before closing our eyes, once we are asleep we are like people in a gallery of unknown landscapes and interiors through which, under an impulse as compelling as the necessity of life itself, we have to move and play our part? Whether it was soon after falling asleep or just before being awakened by my landlady I don’t know, but I know I dreamed that the Bogey in the four-poster bed of little Theophil’s mother turned out to be Professor Porpustle himself, with whom I had had that night an unending series of complicated arguments.

CHAPTER II

Although Professor Porpustle had never heard of little Theophil or of her parents he had a daughter of his own called Thisbe who was a day-girl at a well-known school in London. Thisbe was just fifteen when I first met her and her beauty took me by storm at once. She was not quite as darkhaired as the Professor who had not yet a single white hair though he must have been nearly seventy, but her hair, which was such a dark brown that under certain conditions it looked black, was so long that when she combed it carefully it nearly touched the ground. Yes, I was absolutely bowled out at the first glimpse of Thisbe Ranger who, though she had been officially adopted by the Professor, was an orphan and refused to give up her father's name.

Nobody could read Thisbe's thoughts, least of all the Professor, who would have been utterly taken aback if he had, and so, by all the invisible powers, would I have been; for I seriously imagined she had fallen as deeply in love with me as I had with her.

My parents may have been Ummum, the Two in One, and I may have been born beyond Outer Space in pure Emptiness, but I've got to confess that the briefest experience of London's population has compelled me to realize that I am pathetically and comically like an average youth of the urban centres of this Planet Earth; for here am I, just because I've fallen in love with a beautiful girl not ten years younger than I am, taking for granted that she had fallen in love with me! The chances are that she has not done anything of the kind, and is simply nice to me because she recognises that I have fallen for her. But after a day or two of brief celestial encounters with Thisbe Ranger, I made as I walked up and down Praed Street a stupendous resolution. I would enter the mind of Thisbe Ranger! Yes, I would actually merge myself, immerse myself, sink myself, dissolve myself, drown myself, lose myself in Thisbe! In plain words I would become Thisbe. This would mean that the wishing, willing, wanting, wandering, wondering soul inside this lovely young feminine body would be me. In fact, I should cease to be me and would now become you; that is to say I, Um, being now Thisbe Ranger, would look at me, Um, as the infatuated young man with whom I had to deal.

Of course my chief difficulty, now that I was Thisbe Ranger, was how to deal with the few people who already knew me as Um, such as Mrs Smith, my landlady, and this awful Professor Porpustle, Thisbe's official Dad, not to speak of little three-year-old Theophil, together with her Parents and their Cook and Housekeeper, all of whom lived in that house in Hampstead. Another difficulty, now that I had to see myself as you, was the difficulty of learning just how a beautiful girl who was desperately loved by an ordinary young man who didn't attract her at all, nor had even been selected by her parents as a suitable husband, felt towards this undesirable suitor. I decided, as I walked up and down Praed Street, that I must acquire the power of seeing myself not exactly as commonplace but as uninteresting.

A day or two had passed in this teasing struggle to adjust myself to regarding myself as a tedious fool when, having debouched, for no particular reason, whether with the soul of Thisbe Ranger or with the soul of Um, into Gloucester Terrace, I met, outside a nice, quiet-looking house, a young lady of about, if I may speak of myself for a moment as Um, my own age. She was anything but pretty or handsome. She had an aquiline nose curved like the nose of certain birds. She had a very low forehead, very thick lips, and practically no chin at all. Nor did she have, so it seemed to me at our first encounter, any neck. Her head struck me as having been fastened by strong nails into the centre of her broad shoulders. But strangely enough, the moment we looked at each other we were friends. We knew each other through and through. I mean she knew Um and Um knew her.

‘Why do you keep walking up and down round here?’ she asked me. I answered at once with the exact truth: ‘Because I am struggling in my mind to solve the problem of self and not-self.’

‘And you can think better out-of-doors than in-doors?’

I nodded, and added: ‘Are you going shopping, lady? If you are, do let me go with you and help carry the things.’

‘All right,’ she said, closing the door of the house and showing me her capacious empty bag. ‘This holds a lot and I’ll make good use of your help.’

It did hold a lot and as we returned down the street, I kept moving it from hand to hand. ‘I tell you what I must get for myself,’ I told her, ‘and that’s a walking stick with a good handle.’

‘Well! Let’s look for one,’ she said. ‘There!” and she pointed across the road. ‘Landussy sells walking sticks!’

‘Careful, Mister!’ she cried, pulling me back as a car passed in front of us. ‘By the way, what’s your name, if that’s not a rude question! Mine is Jane Fixem. I live alone in a very nice flat on the second floor. There’s an elderly couple on the ground floor and an old gentleman of over eighty on the top floor. We all pay a little towards the help we all get from a wonderful retired Italian chef who lives with his wife in the basement. We are all lucky, especially I am and the old gentleman in the attic, to have the help of such a competent cook for so little. The only return I make to Providence for this good luck is to carry up the old gentleman’s lunch and dinner to the top floor and bring down his dirty plates. He can manage his breakfast and his tea for himself for we’ve all got lavatories and water taps on every floor. The old man’s name is a queer one, Katterventicle, and he’s a Colonel: yes, Colonel Katterventicle. How he got such a name and where he was born none of us dare to ask. He talks like an army man. But, as I say, we all respect him too much to ask impertinent questions. I always tell our Italian chef not to go up to his room because — well, you know how it is. These Colonels from abroad don’t always know how to treat us city folk as we ought to be treated, and half of us, of course, are not strictly English.

All this description of her fellow-dwellers was given to me as we leant against the window of Landussy, Hair-cutter and Hairdresser according to the latest fashions. Then I saw the walking sticks to which my friend Miss Fixem had referred.

I hurried in. Only a few of them had the sort of big handle I had in my mind; but there was one that exactly suited me. I snatched it up and rushed to the counter, heedless of the fact that there were at least five customers there, buying soaps and sponges and hair-brushes and foreign cigarettes. ‘How much?’ I cried. One of the two young men at the counter took the stick from me with a grave frown and I could hear him muttering to one of the buyers something that sounded like, ‘Buy a stick, have a stick, feel a stick!’

Leaving the shop with my purchase I displayed its beautifully curled handle like a horn of an Albanian goat to Miss Fixem. ‘Just what I’ve been wanting ever since I came down to Earth,’ I murmured exultantly. Miss Fixem looked at me with rather a troubled expression. It was evidently crossing her mind that this new friend of hers might have escaped from an Asylum. To put an end to this view of things I said, smiling sensibly. ‘Well, Lady, let’s go now, now that I am so pleased with my bit of business, to some of your shops. I hope you’ll be as satisfied’ — and I brandished my new acquisition by its curly handle— ‘with what you find as I am with this!

You know,' I went on, following her lead along the pavement, but not hesitating to leave her side for she was walking as close as she could to the shop windows, and circle round any ladies we overtook, planting the end of my stick with a triumphant prod into the edge of the road and even using its help to enable me to give the paving curb now and again an almost processional salute, 'You know, Miss Fixem, I'm going to call this stick henceforward by your name. Yes! I'm going to call it "Jane". When I've been longer in this country I may change a lot of my ways, but I shall never stop calling this stick "Jane".' My pleasure in this use of her name seemed to give Miss Fixem so much satisfaction that the look of anxiety and distrust passed away and she asked me quietly why I had spoken of 'coming down on the earth'.

I answered her calmly and carefully, if not quite accurately. 'Because, dear lady, my parents lived and perhaps still live on the other side of a tremendously high mountain in the direction of that American district they call Alaska. So that to me everything in Europe and Britain — for I've never been to Switzerland or to Spain, makes me feel as if I'd come down from the sky.'

I could see that my new friend believed all this implicitly and gave up with relief the agitating thought that I was an escaped lunatic; indeed she chattered away in the most spontaneous manner for the rest of our outing and when, leaning on 'Jane' and carrying her bag bursting with the things that solitary spinsters need for their daily round, I escorted her back to her door, she even went so far as to ask me whether I wouldn't come in for a cup of tea. 'Not today,' I said, 'but I shan't forget where you live and I'll come and see you and visit you another day.'

'What day?' said Jane Fixem. 'I can't tell you right away,' I answered, 'because I've got some people coming. But you'll see me in a day or two;

you can be sure of that. Good luck till then!' And off I went, lifting 'Jane' along with my cap.

Next morning, which was a Thursday morning, and I'd already decided that Thursday, although I hadn't learnt anything yet about the great god Thor, was one of my luckiest week-days, I made up my mind that I would visit Hyde Park. I found no difficulty in getting there, and never shall I forget what happened to me after I had walked up and down for quite a while on a smooth gravel path between rows of trees and among easy-going nurses with babies in perambulators and elderly couples seated on comfortable seats and even what looked to me like ardent and hard-working novelists, correcting with concentrated attention and sharply pointed pencils their last night's imaginative labour. I suddenly realized that just as it was in my power to pass through walls and houses like a ghost, so it was in my power to pass through human bodies into the consciousness those bodies concealed. My education by my two-in-one parents in the Outer Emptiness may have given me the power — only, fool that I am, I had only just thought of practising that power — of leaping over the supernatural gulf between what these earth-folk call then-minds and what they call their bodies. No sooner had I thought of this than, by all the gods that be, I was actually practising it!

There were two middle-aged people, a man about fifty and a woman about forty, seated side by side. They had been talking, but at the moment they were each absorbed in some train of thought that debarred them from noticing me or any other person who strolled past them. I noticed that there was a seat opposite them on the other side of the broad gravel path, but I loitered about, till a man, who had been seated there alone, got up and strolled off. Then, taking his place, I sat down and was not diverted from my more than metaphysical plunge by the arrival of a boy about thirteen who had evidently bought a paper-backed book and wanted just to turn its pages before hurrying for home. Then I plunged! It was like leaping through a window of water that reached an unfathomably long way down and an immeasurably long way up — a window whose glass was of transparent water. The man of fifty, as I saw him on the other side of this Liquid window was engaged in untying the strings of a young woman's apron; and the woman, as I saw her on the other side, was evidently telling this same girl that on no account must she come upstairs before breakfast until the master was in his bath. It was then that, having begun my real superlife, I resolved to rush desperately on, helter-skelter, devil-may-care, catch-as-you-can, and let come what would come, could come, might come! So, feeling sure that there was no one like me in the whole multiverse, I burst through all restrictions, defied all laws and rules and customs and habits and conventions and methods and orders and directions and calculations and chronologies and genealogies and cosmographies, and throwing away both god-dreams and devil-dreams I accepted the challenge of all existing worlds and all possible worlds; and born of Ummum in Nothing I became the Um of Everything.

'Never,' I thought to myself, 'shall I cease, can I cease, will I cease, from pulling up the skirts of every female and pulling down the trousers of every male — I mean of course in my own private consciousness — nor from increasing the seeing, hearing and feeling of every child, nor from intensifying the awareness of every littlest baby! This is one way I am going to take life from now on until I die.' With this determination tingling through every vein I left that avenue of trees and quiet benches and walked rapidly in the direction of Whitehall. As I walked I concentrated on getting all my plans for the future clear and definite. I am not, I told myself, and never will be, what is called a Pantheist. I am a Polytheist, to the limit. That is to say I throw aside, along with the One God illusion and the One Devil Illusion, every possible idea of survival after death or of the immortality of the soul. Every living creature, including bipeds, like human beings and monkeys, and including quadrupeds and birds and fishes and reptiles and frogs and toads and worms and tadpoles and all the insects that exist, have their own consciousness and their own individuality, their own selfhood, their own private life; but the moment they are dead this consciousness entirely ceases and they are nothing but a dead person, a dead horse or donkey or ox or cow or sheep or goat or pig or goose or swan or duck or swallow or seagull or dog or cat or owl or eagle. I decided that a louse or fly or flea or cockroach, or the most beautiful of butterflies, when it is dead is no longer any different from us men and us women or from elephants and rhinoceroses and whales and sea-serpents. We are all alive for a short or for a long time, and then dead forever. We must destroy in our minds the false idea offered by this pretentious ‘pantheism’ that the soul or spirit of one tremendous and immortal Being is shared by every man and beast and fish and bird and reptile and insect. The idea is totally untrue, in fact a lie. Every living thing, from a wood-louse to the greatest of the rulers of men perishes utterly when his or her or its bodily life ceases.

I fully and entirely realize that thus I also am doomed to become utterly lifeless when my body dies.

Of course for those of us whose thoughts are printed in books or inscribed for musical instruments, or painted as pictures or carved as statues there is the future of the thoughts and feelings and purposes that influence posterity. There must doubtless be in each generation many men and women who are remembered in this way for their creative work and argued about and discussed for long after they are dead; but however much of themselves they have put into their work, being now utterly unconscious they are wholly ignorant of what effect they have produced on the minds and on the tastes of their descendants.

None of these considerations, however, since I am myself neither a writer nor an artist, enter into my life. In fact I refuse to consider anything just now except my immediate intention, which is to enjoy an existence totally different from any existence which any creature has ever enjoyed before or probably will ever enjoy again.

CHAPTER III

IT WAS THREE o'clock in the middle of the night when I met him first. I was enjoying beyond description my sleep in the terrace. I woke up several times it is true: but I felt so incredibly warm and comfortable, so pleased with myself and everything round me, that each time I deliberately stayed awake for a couple of minutes so as the more to enjoy the exquisite feeling of going to sleep again. I hadn't turned the gas out because I'd been reading when I first went to sleep; and though I put the book down on my bedside table — it was Hardy's 'Return of the Native' — I felt too happy to get out of bed to darken the room.

Thus it was that when he came in, closing the door quietly behind him and advancing boldly to my side, I was in such a drowsy mood that all I murmured was: 'Am I in your room, Mister?' I became a little more alive-o as he looked round the room and said calmly, 'Oh no, I only wanted to ask you not to go till I've met you at breakfast. It's about nine, isn't it?'

'Yes, about nine,' I replied. 'No, I won't go till we've had a talk. May I ask your name?'

'Mo,' the man replied, 'as plain and simple as your own! Sleep well, Mr Um,' and he went out as unassumingly as he had entered.

I had, as can be easily imagined, quite a long talk with my landlady about Mr Mo when she brought me my cup of tea at eight. We both agreed that we found him a very obscure and rather disconcerting person; though in her opinion he was a good deal more so than in mine. But of course she had seen much more of him than I had, and with her mind clear too; whereas mine had been hazy-dazy with sleep. I took care to be in the kitchen for breakfast a good deal before nine for I wanted to make sure that our hostess didn't break her usual custom of setting our morning meal on the kitchen table rather than in the dining-room; and we had another lively dispute about Mo there. She still maintained he was an honest chap. She went even far enough to declare that he may have been one of those eccentric clergymen who desired to enjoy life in the city for a bit, but preferred to do so in laymen's attire and to leave their clerical collar behind them. At last he did come, and oh how right I felt I had been about his being a queer one!

Yes, my meeting with Mr Mo was very disturbing to me. He kept pulling me aside and asking me about my parents and where they came from. At one point — though I may have been mistaken — it seemed to me that he mentioned the name Endor, a name that of course later in my life when I had read the Bible would have conjured up a famous Witch; but it seemed to me by the way he talked of his origin that it had been as unusual, if not more unusual, than my own. I did make out one thing clearly, for he was very definite about it, namely that he wished me to bring all the friends I possessed in London, men, women and children, to a little private circus he was giving in an open space in Hampstead. He produced a notebook and took down my list of names. I was to bring them tomorrow afternoon, which would be Thursday or Thor's Day, and this made me think of those lines of Longfellow, which some child must have recently told me he or she had learnt, about Thor's weapon, 'Miolnir the Mighty which giants and sorcerers could not withstand'.

Slowly that Wednesday, Woden's Day, went by, and O how thankful I was when the landlady told me that Mr Mo had found another lodging nearer the open space in Hampstead where he was preparing his little private Circus.

That night it took me more time than usual to go to sleep. Was this man who called himself Mr Mo just as I called myself Mr Um also born in that aboriginal Emptiness as completely outside Space as it was outside the Sun, the Moon and all the stars? If he had come from that Emptiness it must have been from a completely different part of it or my two-in-one parents would have warned me against him. There was no need for me to ask myself before I slept what he would think of Thisbe or what he would think of little Theophil. He would simply want to eat them up alive as slowly and viciously as was possible. I gathered all this from one single glance I caught once in his eyes. I had no idea that when I selected the Planet Earth to visit and the British city of London as my background that I should be confronted by such horror. But I have now been long enough in this city to realize fully what men and women mean when they talk of differences between good and evil. My parents in the Emptiness had advised me to do this and to avoid doing that; but they had never revealed to me the existence of such depths of diabolical wickedness as I caught sight of in that one single glance from Mo. It was not directed particularly at me, that glance, any more than if the deepest crater of the most explosive Mountain in the world had begun pouring out a stream of lava from an abyss that went down to the very centre of the earth when I happened to be looking on. No, that look of Mo was not directed at me any more than it would be perhaps ever directed at Theophil or at Thisbe. It was just there. It had been inside Mo and now it had come out. Had that name been given to his ancestors in some far away corner of the Nothingness out of which Everything sprang because those ancestors had reminded some Rabbi of the demon to whose names and personality the Hebraic Old Testament had called the World's attention?

But I had given my word to this Fiend that I would bring everyone I knew in London to his private fair in Hampstead Heath. So, as everybody is always saying in London, ‘that’s that’. I must take them tomorrow, Thursday, afternoon, and all I can do now is to pray to the god Thor to come with Miolnir his club to keep this devil and his Circus under control.

What a question a promise to a Fiend arouses in any conscience that desires to remain loyal and faithful to all promises! But to escape from it, to evade it, to dodge it, seems somehow to my complicated moral sense like doing something that in its weakness and cowardice was more like obeying the devil than thrusting him away; yes, before I slept I decided that to break a promise to a fiend was more like obeying the devil than sending him back to hell. So the first thing I did as I had breakfast in Mrs Smith’s kitchen was to ask her whether she could persuade Professor Porpustle and his daughter Thisbe Ranger to accompany me that afternoon to Mr Mo’s private little Circus, as I think I heard him call it, in Hampstead. She said she was sure she could because Thisbe was free from school that afternoon and the Professor had expressed to her only yesterday his feeling that he ought to give Thisbe more treats than he did, and she had told him she enjoyed Circuses and Pantomimes.

This being settled, and after I had called her Cloddie very affectionately and she had called me Ummy in her nicest manner, I left her house and rushed over to the dwelling of Mr and Mrs Lockitite. This couple I had never met before and it was pure luck that I found them in. I had a frank and easy talk with Lullaby Skim, the housemaid; and it was clear to me from the way she looked me up and down as we both leant against the door-posts with the open door between us that she was quite taken up with me and could easily be persuaded to become my girl-friend. ‘Do you think, Miss Skim,’ I asked her, with all the modesty and charm I possessed, ‘that Mr and Mrs Lockitite will let me take you all — yes, Charlotte Wiggle and you, as well as Little Phil and themselves, to a private Circus? It is close by. It is run by an acquaintance of mine. It is only a little private thing, you understand, but the fellow who is running it is dying for some kind of an audience and I'm bringing quite a party. I'll be coming to fetch you all with other friends of mine, if Mr and Mrs agree, in about an hour from now."

The girl pondered, twisting the door handle round and round in her fingers. 'The mistress may not like the house being left quite empty,' she murmured. Then she brightened up. 'But Linda next door, whose folk are off to Brighton for the day, would I know be glad to pop in for a couple of hours. So come in and see the Missus, Mister, and tell her all you've told me.'

Julia Lockitite and her husband John showed complete willingness to come with their whole household, since they felt vaguely in their minds that their neighbours would be mightily impressed and would tell one another that somebody in the family must already have become a famous actor or clown or dancer and that there would be mention of it, and perhaps of them too if they joined the party, in the Papers tomorrow.

I left the house feeling well-pleased with myself, especially as I left it with the delicious sensation of a lovely kiss from little Theophil. Off to Gloucester Terrace I next rushed. Here was Jane Fixem, who herself took me up to Katterventicle's flat where I found no difficulty in propitiating the bachelor Colonel and extracting from him a promise that without question he would come. The Runnerini couple were not quite so easy to seduce. A retired Italian chef from Naples, especially when he has had the luck to marry a Receptionist from Verona, is so experienced in the most delicate follies of mortal men and women that there's no end to his indulgence towards them and no limit to his power of catering for their whims and caprices. But when it comes to the situation being reversed and when somebody is begging them to become clients in their turn an odd sort of embarrassment supervenes. But though from the Outer Emptiness to the most intimate Inwardness of human feelings is a big bridge it is not impassable, and I passed it that morning.

What a moment it was that Thursday afternoon when I arrived with all my audience at Mo's little Circus! The one and only preparation he had made for his performance was a very long bench, upon which we could all sit down. Was Mo suddenly going to arrive with all the paraphernalia of a real Circus? Well, here we all were, seated on this long bench, waiting patiently. Here were Theophil and Thisbe. Here were Mr and Mrs Lockitite. Here were Charlotte Wiggle and Lullaby Skim. Here was Mrs Smith, whom I called Cloddie. Here was Professor Porpustle. Here was Jane Fixem. Here was Colonel Katterventicle. And here, with Thisbe aged fifteen and Theophil aged three, one on my right and one on my left, was I myself. 'O Thisbe!' I thought, 'I love you more than I love myself. Can't I make you feel my thoughts, Thisbe?' And 'O little Phil,' I thought, 'that kiss you gave me stays with me as though it were a touch of ambrosia! 'I'm sure I was right,' I thought, 'to keep my promise, even though it was to the devil!' But then it suddenly crossed my mind that perhaps I was lying to myself all the time and what I really wanted was simply the excitement of seeing what Mo would do.

CHAPTER IV

WELL, MO CAME at last and he was entirely alone. He brought nothing; no wheels, no engines, no swings, no ladders, no ropes, no performing animals. It became evident at once that Mr Mo was going to act the part of all these; and so he speedily did.

With absolute amazement we all watched him. He seemed to be, as we gazed at him, up in the air before us and he acted with perfect naturalness and aplomb all the familiar Circus tricks as well as those of Punch and Judy. He was Punch. He was Judy. He even effected with the daintiest affectation and by a laughable twist of his body a transformation into Toby. Then quite suddenly and unexpectedly he came down from the air and strolled along in front of our trousers and skirts as we squatted in that bunched up row. What will he do, I wondered, when he reaches me, seated between Thisbe and little Phil? And well may I have wondered! To my astonishment Thisbe held out her right hand to him and seized his hand and for an appreciable moment he stood before us, his hand and her hand clasped. Then he bent down and whispered something to her. I could only catch the two words ‘Will you?’ but Thisbe nodded vigorously. And then, after waving goodbye to the whole row of us he clambered up the slope behind us and disappeared.

The moment Mo was gone we all got up; and a wild hullaballoo of voices rose. I clung tight to Thisbe’s hand and hesitated not to ask her: ‘Did you promise to meet him somewhere?’

‘That’s my business, not yours,’ she replied. ‘Because you made us all come to see him, that doesn’t mean that we can’t speak to him without your meddling.’ I dropped her hand at once, and without another word, she hurried off to find the Professor, her official Father. Oh! how I did thank the heavenly powers then that at least I had tight hold of little Theophil’s hand. But soon her mother came up to us. ‘Well, child,’ said Mrs Lockitite, ‘we mustn’t take up any more of Mr Um’s time. I expect he has all sorts of people to see before he goes home, for they tell me Mr Mo wants his help in taking names for subscriptions for a proper monthly Circus in this district.’ The bulk of this speech was addressed to me rather than to little Theophil; but strangely enough it was the child who answered, and she did so in a clear resolute voice. ‘Us don’t know yet, Mummy,’ she said, ‘whether Mr Um wants to make a circus that goes on and on and on and on. Perhaps he will advise his friend to make a Fair instead of a Circus, a Fair where we can buy toys and dolls and lollipops and Bill-Bruins and Rattles and Tick-tocks.’

‘What are you saying, Phil?’ answered Mrs Lockitite impatiently. ‘We’ve got to get home now, and so I expect has Mr Um, wherever his lodging may be! London’s a big place, isn’t it, Mr Um? But I do thank you, and so does my husband, for bringing us here. We’ve enjoyed it, I can tell you, quite as much as our child has. Come along, Phil!’ The child obeyed and I let go of her hand, but not before I had raised it to my lips and murmured ‘Goodbye for now, my dear, but we’ll meet again.’

I gripped my newly bought walking stick by its curly handle and looked about for Miss Fixem. There she was, only a few yards away, ready and waiting; so we walked back to her house in Gloucester Terrace, talking earnestly and seriously of the feelings which Mo’s performance had roused in both of us; and, as it happened, our reactions to it all were not very different. This didn’t surprise me, for though she was a fussy and particular old maid and I was a fussy and particular young man, there was something about the nature of our fussiness that was quaintly similar. In fact before I left at the end of the evening and she bade me goodnight and went up the stairs I seized her wrist for a moment in such a way as to make the candle she carried drop a speck of grease and thanked her for helping me to buy ‘Jane’. ‘I hope I’ll have it all my life. I’ve never had a proper walking-stick before!’

‘Don’t lie awake,’ was her reply. ‘And don’t forget to put out the gas.’

Once back in my lodgings near Paddington Station I had only a very brief talk with Cloddie Smith and I didn’t forget to put out the gas. But sleep didn’t lull me to rest until a cloud of thoughts had passed away into that mysterious land where such thoughts fly. But what delayed the blissful moment of sleep was not any memory of Mo’s performance, nor was it, oddly enough, any surge of indignation over Thisbe’s behaviour. It was entirely personal and had to do with what I would have called, if anyone had asked me, ‘my private metaphysic’. I tried in that short space of time to find an articulate and definite answer to my own secret question to myself — Um to Um in the depths of Um’s own being — as to what my real hidden purpose in life was. I decided that just now what I aimed at in the inmost life-purpose of my existence was to pass through as many sense experiences as I possibly could without stopping to enjoy or to partake intimately of, any single one of them. By sense experiences I meant, I told myself, all the sights and sounds and so forth which I derived from the things and people through whose midst I passed unobserved when I was in my ghost-mood. In other words, what I aimed at in life was not to enjoy it but to do two things with it, namely to take it in and to escape from it. I didn’t want to escape from anything, whether a person or an object, without realizing it in all its aspects, qualities and dimensions. But I did not want to be caught by the charm and attraction of any particular person or thing so as to be held back or have my progress through life delayed or suspended. I want to examine each person or object as completely as possible but when I have caught and understood the essence of its nature I don't want to be retained by it for a second longer. In other words, I want to partake fully of its inmost nature but I want it, whether animate or inanimate, to know as little as possible about me and influence me as little as possible. What I want to do is to escape wholly and entirely from every contact with either a complicated character or an elaborate substance through which it may pass. I want to go through the heart of it all, while I retain my own heart completely intact and my own nature entirely unobserved. In other words I want to know as much as I can about life while I am as little affected by life as I would be by milestones on a monotonous road.

Having thus summed up to myself my own method of living, or at least my ideal method of living, I did my best before I went to sleep to analyse Mo's attitude to people and things. This, as you can believe, I found much easier to do than in my own case. It is, alas, always easier to describe the whole nature of someone else than of yourself; though it is much easier to give expression to any particular prejudice, for or against somebody or something, that you may have, than to follow or to understand the particular prejudices of other people. But what, before I slept, and it made me feel sleepy to work this out, I came to decide about Mo was that all he wanted to do was to enjoy as much as possible his licking, tasting, sucking, chewing, smelling, gobbling, drinking up the blood and substance of things and people before he moved on at all. In fact, I decided, so little did he want to move on, that after lapping them up his ideal desire was to be able to crouch down above his helpless victims while he proudly, brutally, ridiculously, absurdly, lecherously, obscenely, displayed for their horror, disgust or appreciation, every aspect of himself that lent itself to such a revelation.

I woke up in the middle of that night after the most extraordinary dream I had ever had. I had found, soon after selecting the Earth as the most interesting of all the planets and London as the most interesting of Earth's cities, that what I liked best of the Earthlings' productions were their printed books, especially the books of poetry. I had not known Thisbe for more than an hour when she began talking about Poets and Poetry. I begged her to tell me what her favourite poems were; and if I remember right they were Milton's Lycidas, Keats' Nightingale, Longfellow's Hiawatha, and Tennyson's Morte D'Arthur. She ended by reciting to me a poem by Poe and this so impressed me that I borrowed a volume of his poems from her and learnt one of them by heart. And what was the result of that? The result was this mad dream! For I dreamt I was Poe, come back from the dead, and not only so but come back with a certainty that his poem, my poem, 'Lo. 'Tis a Gala Night' was the favourite poem of both God and the Devil. I must have been reciting this poem aloud about three o'clock in the night with its echoes all about me in the air, echoes that kept going out of the window and coming back again. 'At bidding of vast formless things that move the scenery to and fro and flap from out their Condor Wings invisible woe!' As the author of 'The Gala Night' and also as the author of 'Ulalume', my dream convinced me that it was my duty to hunt Mo down, find where he slept, lie by his side, and when he was asleep thrust my hand under his ribs, snatch out his heart and swallow it. It was the act of swallowing Mo's heart that woke me up in a spasm of horror. I hope I didn't scream loud enough to wake Mrs Smith sleeping in the room above me. Perhaps I didn't scream at all. Perhaps my horror at myself for what I had done went so deep that it cut the root of whatever in men and women it is that ejects that sound through the scream-valve. But whether I made a sound or not I know very well what

I felt at that moment. I felt as if the whole purpose, method, way, choice, principle, essence, quintessence, soul, spirit of my life had been perverted.

O the relief with which I settled down again in my bed, when I realized that it had been a dream! What on earth would Thisbe have thought if she'd seen me at that moment when I dreamed I was swallowing the heart of Mo? I must have looked like some fourteenth century picture of some Fiend in Hell devouring some notorious Heretic amid the flames. But whoever I looked like, and whatever I felt, I must have settled down to sleep and have slept soundly; for when Mrs Smith came with my early cup of tea at eight I was fast asleep; and when I asked her about Thisbe she said that she would probably be having breakfast with us; for, for some reason she hadn't revealed, she was not going to school this Friday, and when I asked if the Professor would also be with us she replied at once, 'Oh no! He'll have to be in his office.'

CHAPTER V

I WAS VERY careful during breakfast, which Mrs Smith, who was more than ever 'Cloddie' to me during our meal, had prepared in the kitchen, not to ask Thisbe any question about Mo or about any assignment she may have made to meet him. But of course it was impossible to avoid talking about Mo's Circus and about the astounding way he had represented the whole thing without making use of any paraphernalia at all.

As to this we were, all three, Mrs Smith and Thisbe and myself, entirely in agreement. Whether Mo would have been pleased and proud at what we said I have no idea. This shows how completely ignorant of Mo's real nature I was, in spite of dreaming that I'd swallowed his heart! — and in spite of all my queer determination to associate him as closely as I could with the Devil and myself with God. What it really resembled, this whole business of Mo and me, was a childish game in which I pretended to be God and Mo pretended to be the Devil. In reality, I doubt if anyone could be less like God than me, or less like the Devil than Mo. But even that is a doubtful assumption because our whole conception of both God and the Devil is derived from the Bible, which is a purely Jewish story. What would Plato say about God? What would Aristotle say about the Devil? What would Socrates say about us?

It was Miss Fixem who first told me about Phantom House and how it came into the possession of Lord and Lady Boomerang. This couple came, Miss Fixem told me, from Australia but they really were, for they were cousins before they married, the only descendants in the world of the ancient pre-mediaeval family who had owned Phantom House since the days described in the ‘Mabinogion’. Miss Fixem had at an early period in her life been governess to Eugenia Boomerang, the Lord and Lady’s only child. Eugenia had fallen in love with one of the many ghosts that haunted Phantom House, the ghost of a young man called Joe Cannibal. This ghost used to meet Eugenia at night on one of the staircases just as the hall-clock struck two; and in the end the poor child died of unsatisfied love. It was soon after I had had that awful dream about swallowing Mo’s heart that I decided that the best thing I could do to forestall his wicked designs upon these wretched human creatures, who seemed as helpless as doves before either of us, would be to follow Mo wherever he went. It was this decision that eventually led me into Phantom House. I was not long in discovering that Mo had struck up a friendship with the beautiful Leonora, Lady Boomerang, and was constantly in her company. It was with the purpose of spying on these two in what I regarded as the spirit of an avenging angel that I used to follow them into Phantom House. It was only by slow degrees that Mo captivated Lady Leonora and alienated her from her husband. At the start of his little game he used to meet her outside Phantom House but by degrees as their intimacy increased he would enter. Lady Leonora’s servants were the extreme opposite of ghostly. Her cook, who was called Poppity Pipstick and her house-maid, whose name was Tickly Duck were extremely solid and plump little persons; nor to my surprise did the ghastly antiquity of the place nor all the ghostly presences that frequented it, bother them in the least. In fact any stranger who entered Phantom House by its back door and went straight into the Scullery and Kitchen would have been staggered by the difference of the whole atmosphere when they emerged into the front part of the building and entered either the drawing-room or the dining-room. I had one great advantage over Mo, the power of not only becoming as intangible as any ghost but also the power of passing through any building or any wall without using my hands or my feet. Mo could do neither of these things; but on the other hand, when it became a matter of influencing any person on this Earth or in this weird City he had the enormous advantage over me of looking older and wiser and with much more knowledge of the world than I, with my simple boyish air, could ever assume. We must have come, was the thought that was forever crossing my mind, from the opposite poles of the Ultimate Emptiness. I still kept thinking of Thisbe; and one morning when Mrs Smith told me where her Boy-Friend was and even went so far as to encourage me in this daring adventure, for she must have thought I would make a very suitable Boy-Friend for the Professor's daughter, I boldly set forth to cross her path. Yes, there she was, only a little way in front of me. She was walking very fast, and it was not long before I saw why. She was overtaking my enemy Mo! Whether Mo knew she was following him I have no idea. But on the whole I rather think he did not know. At any rate he acted like a man taken completely unawares when she caught him up. But after a minute or two their pace, as they went on together in the way he had been going, struck me as pregnant with that atmospheric tension which tends to hang about excited young couples walking side by side. Was it possible, I asked myself, as I moved on behind them, still fancying myself in the rôle of a righteous emissary of the Lord pursuing a Scout-Master of Satan, that Thisbe could love such a man? 'His Lordship,' Mo was telling Thisbe, 'has got into his head the absurd idea that my friendship with his wife is not an innocent one. Now knowing me as well as you do, Miss Ranger, I can trust you to be able to reassure him entirely on that point. You see he doesn't know a living soul who knows me. To him I am an intruder "out of the blue", you might say, and he doesn't realize at all what I really am, I mean what you and all my real friends know me to be, that is a devoted and single-hearted Crusader in the great cause of individual international freedom. Any outsider, as you know my dear, and nobody knows it better than you, who are my closest friend in this confused life of ours and who can understand so well the deep necessity of what I advocate, might mistakenly think that I was purely and simply trying to seduce Lady Boomerang. But you, my dear child, know that seduction of a distinguished lady for merely amorous reasons is the last thing I should aim at.'

Mo and Thisbe went into the House of Phantoms together by the front door but I took good care to go round by the back. Poppity Pipstick and Tickly Duck received me in the Kitchen as if I'd been an old friend. I soon found out that they were both extremely suspicious of Mo; and they both declared that they were absolutely certain that he had on several occasions lately been making love to Lady Leonora. 'They do it in the Green-House, you know,' said Tickly. 'No, I think they do it in the Summer-House,' said Poppity. 'But you've never seen them doing it, have you?' protested Tickly. 'No, I can't quite say I have,' conceded Poppity, 'but neither have you seen them actually doing it in the Green-House.'

'No, not exactly seen him touch her, but our Lady is as clever at hiding what Mo's fingers are up to as she is at keeping her drawers from slipping down.'

'The chief thing about it all,' concluded Poppity, 'is that his Lordship is only waiting till he can catch Mr Mo with his fingers near our Lady's slip to give him the thrashing he deserves. He's a quiet man, his Lordship is, but he knows what to do with a rogue when he catches a rogue.'

When I finally presented myself to Lord Boomerang he certainly looked me up and down with the searching glance of a Police Officer before he asked me if I remembered his elder brother Count Balderdash, and when I told him I was too young to go back to his time but that I did remember

Lord Blunderbus very well and used to help him drive rats out of the Fernery, he gave me quite a friendly smile. ‘You must come to tea with us one day,’ he said. ‘My wife will be glad to meet you — why here she is. Come now and meet her!’

‘Leonora dear! This is Mr—’

‘Um’ I ejaculated as politely as I could. ‘This is Mr Um,’ went on his Lordship. ‘He is visiting our country from—’

‘From North Alaska’ I hurriedly interjected. ‘Yes, my dear,’ his Lordship continued: ‘Mr Um from North Alaska; and he will have a great deal to tell us that I know will be of especial interest to you.’

Lady Leonora broke away from Mo, who was introducing her to Thisbe, and came forward; and a lively conversation speedily ensued between all five of us. In the end Thisbe came up to me and asked me to take her home. As we walked towards her house she confessed to me that even the short time she had been in that place had made her feel timid of being alone. ‘It’s a terrifying place,’ she added gravely. ‘People call it “Phantom House” in an easy, jocular kind of way, but you have to have been in those rooms, and you have to have walked up that staircase, to know enough about it to make you make up your mind never to enter the place unless you have to for some very important reason. How those two plump little servants can stand it Heaven knows. To say it’s “haunted” is to put it mildly. I tell, you, Mr Um, it’s worse than haunted. It’s — what’s that word? — oh yes! It’s possessed, it’s absolutely impregnated with ghostly presences! Not only one: the devil alone could tell how many!’

We walked on quietly after this outburst, and then Thisbe said very slowly and gravely, ‘Do you know, Mr Um, I’ve got an idea in my head that I would like to tell you. I’ll say at once that it was not suggested to me by Mr Mo. Mind you, I get on very well with him and I think I understand him, though I expect you, who know him better than I do, feel quite differently about him. But never mind what our opinion of him is. This is my idea. I want you to suggest to him, just as you did about his Circus (for I believe it was you who put that into his head) suggest to him that he should take us all for a journey to the Moon in an enormous Barge, or, let me say, in a sort of floating or flying Island, an Island with about a six foot depth of earth-mould and large enough to carry upon its surface a dozen or so of fairly substantial dwellings.

I know you well enough, Mr Um, to know that this is not the sort of undertaking or the kind of adventure that you would care to embark upon yourself or lead your large group of London acquaintances to share with you; but I have learnt enough of your nature already to know that as an imaginative inspirer of daring adventure arranged and governed by a friend of yours, you would be indispensable and unequalled. I have not said a word of this to anyone, because I know what people are and how risky it is to talk of such fanciful schemes to anyone whose character you are not sure of, nor confident of, nor have complete faith in. But you see, Mr Um, I have this confidence in you. I've not known you long, but long enough' — here she smiled very sweetly and looked straight at me— 'to have entire faith in you in a matter of this kind.'

CHAPTER VI

It goes without saying that I walked very slowly with Thisbe to her home for I was extremely excited by her idea and I longed to discuss it with Mo; but before doing so I was anxious to lay all my natural hesitations and difficulties concerning it clearly and definitely before her in the hope that she would overcome them. Recalling every minute of our walk later I could not help congratulating myself on the restraint I used in regard to my love for this exquisite creature whose hand was on my arm as we walked. I just simply and solely gave myself up to considering every single aspect of her imaginative scheme. Where I most of all wanted to strengthen and fortify my adherence to her idea was in regard to our persuasion of all these quaint and eccentric people, some of them, Mr and Mrs Lockitite and Mr and Mrs Runnerini, for example, already by no means unaware of the crazy fits and starts of modern society, to agree to join this wild and daring adventure.

‘I think they’ll agree all right,’ said Thisbe gravely, ‘when once we’ve got Mr Mo to take the lead. He’s got an amazing gift of making people follow him when once he’s started on anything. My private fear is that he may shrink from anything as unusual as fixing up a piece of land six or seven feet deep and about twenty feet square, with half a dozen houses on it, and making it sail to the Moon. If he does funk it, that, I am afraid, will be the end of my Project for ever and a day.’

I promised Thisbe I would do all I possibly could to persuade Mo to undertake this terrific thing; but I confessed to her that I felt considerable doubt as to whether I should succeed. All the same, there undoubtedly did lurk at the back of my mind one of those queer intimations to which I am sometimes subject, that this extraordinary event would, in spite of all its fantastic daring and its appalling risk, really and truly come to pass. ‘I wonder,’ I said to her, ‘where and when would be the best place and time to tell Mo all about it and lay before him all my arguments in favour of risking it?’

‘Well, my friend,’ Thisbe replied — and oh it gave me such pleasure to hear the grateful tone in which she spoke— ‘I should say that one evening rather than the morning would be the best time, and Lady Leonora’s kitchen would be the best place. Will you really do it for me?’

‘I most certainly will,’ I answered from the depths of my heart, ‘I’ll do it tomorrow; for I expect Mo will be staying there all day and I made friends with those girls in the kitchen.’

For the rest of that walk we both were absolutely silent. It was just as if Thisbe and I had suddenly become what my parents were before I was born; that is to say a real and actual two-in-one.

‘You don’t feel sea-sick any more?’ said Charlotte Wiggle to Lullaby Skim, looking at her companion with something like a veteran nurse’s condescension towards a new nursemaid.

‘No! I really don’t! I’m getting used to it. What was that?’

‘O that,’ said Miss Wiggle pontifically, ‘was only a falling star.’

‘What is a falling star?’ asked Miss Skim. ‘O I guess they call it all kinds of long names; but I do know what my old Dad used to call them things. He used to call them Meeters. He must have thought in his funny way that they were like boy-stars taking headers through space to meet girl-stars.’

It was just as I had heard this that Poppity Pipstick holding Tickly Duck by the hand came up to my side. I could see they had something to say to me, but were shy about saying it; and I could also see that what they wanted to say had been originated by Tickly Duck, but that Poppity Pipstick was the braver and the more presumptuous of the two. ‘Tickly wants to know,’ said Poppity, ‘if you could tell us about what time tomorrow we shall arrive at the Moon. She wants to be sure to get up early enough to do her hair and put on her best skirt lest the Porters at the Moon-Station should be rude to her.’

‘I’m afraid, my dears,’ I said, as gravely as I could, ‘that there’s no chance of our getting to the Moon for at least a fortnight. None of us knows, not even Lord Boomerang or Mr Mo, how long our journey will take. You see there are dreadful winds in the earth’s atmosphere that may delay us and when we get nearer, the Moon has many very singular ways that none of our Teachers and Professors are quite sure of. It might send someone or something to meet us and we might think the person or this thing came from one of the Sun-Spots.’

‘Does the Sun get feverish and ill?’ enquired Tickly Duck, ‘so that it has pimples like children do?’

‘No,’ I replied with calm gravity, ‘it’s much worse than that. The sun-spots are like volcanoes. They burst out from the depths of the Sun and nobody knows what causes them or what one day they might do. I think myself that one day, after the sun-spots have got worse and worse for a hundred years, the Sun will burst into pieces; and then the Moon and the Earth and all the Planets will be shattered to bits.’

Poor little Tickly Duck clasped Miss Pipstick round the waist. ‘Won’t any of them,’ she murmured in a pathetically wistful voice, ‘be able to fly away and be safe?’ A wave of tenderness swept through me. ‘Perhaps Venus, the Evening Star, might escape,’ I said. ‘And possibly Mars, the God of War; but no one anywhere in the whole Universe or in the whole Multiverse, really knows. The end of the world is as mysterious as the beginning of the world. The Professors and the Scientists and the Philosophers have to pretend they know more than they really do. If you knew any one of them as well as his wife knows him you would know how little he really knows.'

'Doesn't Colonel Katterventicle know?' asked Miss Pipstick. 'You can ask him if you like!' I said smiling. 'He'd be pleased to be asked; and no doubt he would tell you something.' Charlotte Wiggle and Lullaby Skim now came flippity-flapperty to my side. They evidently thought I was revealing a little more than was proper to reveal to maidens who had never been to Oxford or to the Sorbonne. 'Are you telling us,' asked Miss Skim, 'on what day and at what hour you think we shall reach the Moon?'

'He says he doesn't know!' cried Miss Pipstick and Miss Duck in one voice. 'He says nobody knows! He says that the Sun-spots may break the Sun into bits and blow up the Universe.' Before I had time to utter a sound Lord Boomerang strode into the midst of us. 'May one ignoramus join your audience, Mr Um? Or are you confining your oratorium to ladies?'

'How would you answer, my Lord, if anyone asked you whether an increase of Sun-spots might burst the Sun into bits?'

'I would tell him, Mr Um, that the sooner this silly world of chattering wenches and pontificating Dons was burst into pieces the better for all of us! Mr Mo has just hinted to me that the end of the world will be like the beginning, with Eve feeding us with plumpudding and the Devil telling us the way to the cellar!' Mo's intimacy with Lord Boomerang and Lady Leonora made me feel so jealous that I turned away and walked to the further end, for I can't call it a prow or a stern, of our queer Flying Suburb to see if I couldn't find our friend Thisbe, to whom after all this whole crazy adventure was due. Yes, I soon found her, and she was in the act of carrying little Theophil, who was crying and clinging to the railings of their house, from which her mother, Mrs Lockitite, had in vain tried to detach her. The child knew me at once and when Thisbe with a sympathetic smile had thrust her into my arms she stopped crying: I went down the unsteady steps, carrying little Phil and holding Thisbe's hand, that led to the underground or beneath-deck portion of our flying island. I had already noticed that the expanse of solid earth on which we were mounting into the sky had been very carefully cleared of the bulk of weight and mass of its buildings. It was quite possible to trace the outlines of all the houses that had been there; but Thisbe's wild plan of carrying the whole lot of them into the air had been completely altered, no doubt by Mo and the workmen he had employed. The ground-floor walls, the terrace-steps, the garden railings were left; but that was all. We weren't carrying into space any upper stories or any roofs or any chimneys. But my jealousy of Mo's power of carrying out every possible aspect and every sensible portion of Thisbe's desperate scheme was embittered still more when with my child-friend in my arms and my girl-friend's hand in my hand I went down below. Here I discovered that the cellars of all the adjacent houses had been most carefully and cunningly merged together, while the cellars of the houses that were not quite adjacent had been most artfully connected by underground passages. In fact the whole interior of this solid block of earth-life in a suburb of the most complicated city in the world was a masterpiece of human ingenuity. Here was a library of books; here was a hall for games; here was a Cafe Royal with food for everybody and chairs and tables where anybody could sit and talk as long as it suited them. Here were excellent lavatories for both sexes. Here also was an absolutely new idea for air-travel; namely an excellent shop where you could buy anything; a shop that had counters of all the things that people wanted most when they came into town from the country. The crafty Mo had found a Mr Gory Jabawok to run this shop and he had given him a week to fill it and a legal right, when they came back from the Moon, to retain what he made by his sales. Mr G. J. was a personal friend of Mr Runnerini as well as a former servant of Colonel Katterventicle, both of whom had adherents in many parts of the world so that the big multiple store in the interior of this Flying Suburb was dedicated to satisfy a number of contradictory tastes. Mo had not only made a grand hit in his shop idea, but his greatest exploit, achieved under my own ardent though ignorant encouragement, was to be found in the Engine-Room of our travelling Suburb, where in fact all the official engineers of this unique enterprise directed the space-journey designed by a girl of fifteen.

'You won't have much use for your precious walking-stick here, will you?' said Jane Fixem to me as we shared a pot of tea and a plate of thin bread-and-butter at one of the tables in our underground cafe. 'O I don't know,' I replied. 'You never know in Space-Travel! Mr Gory Jabawok has already told me that he thinks it very likely we may barge into a completely invisible satellite of the Sun upon which it may prove imperative that we should land. Have you got a nice cabin, Miss Fixem?' She looked at me almost indignantly. 'Of course I have, my good friend. I'm sharing one with Miss Gloriana and Miss Linda. Do you imagine I should have come on this ridiculous cruise unless I had ascertained all about my cabin in advance?' Anxious to propitiate her I hurriedly explained that I was a complete fool in these practical matters. 'In fact,' I confessed to her, 'I had no idea that there would be cabins for any of us. I haven't asked Mr Mo yet where mine is.' Miss Jane Fixem rose from her seat at my side. 'What a double-dyed fool I was,' I thought, 'to suppose that in finding this woman so friendly at the first go-off I had made a friend for life!' I continued this line of thought as I watched her move away. 'What would my parents feel,' I asked myself, 'if they saw me now in the hold of this fantastic monster?' This thought produced in me a queer kind of nostalgia for the Emptiness from which I had come. I bent down over the little wooden table at which I was sitting and, on my soul, in recalling this moment later, I am not at all certain that I did not shed a tear.

At any rate, although I did not follow Jane Fixent up to the deck or to the comfortable lounge that Mo had had them make down here, I did not hesitate to approach Thisbe, when I saw she had disposed of little Theophil and left her, sound asleep I trust, and to ask her before she did anything else, for she was naturally very active in the correction of any plans of hers that had not been quite fulfilled, to answer a question that had been troubling me ever since I came on board. ‘How can it be,’ I asked her, and I longed to call her ‘Thisbe darling’ for I felt more in love with her than ever, ‘that all the rocks and stones and sand and earth-mould that compose the great flat keel of this monstrous space-barge of yours do not gradually disintegrate and sink back and drift down, leaving only the upper shell of this unique craft?’

‘O but, my dear!’ she cried, ‘you will soon see why if you come with me to this port-hole or window!’ I obeyed in the highest spirits, and as can well be believed longed to put my arms round her and hug her to my heart as she took me to the nearest aperture at the bottom of this incredible space-barge. ‘You see,’ she said, ‘how with that round it not a speck of our ship can sink or drift away!’

‘You are indeed right my — Thisbe’ I made myself say; and indeed she was right. There, stretching across the round orifice to which she led me was a steel netting with only very tiny holes in it through which nothing but the most powdery sand could pass. But through the netting I could plainly see at this moment, for both Sun and Moon had vanished, gleaming in the far-off distance the lights of the London we were forsaking. There was nothing in this sight to draw a tear from me, for I had not lived long enough on the Earth or anything like long enough in London to give me the feeling that I was leaving home; and yet I admit I did feel, down in that part of us where those queer feelings spring, a longing to burst into a flood of tears. ‘Am I becoming a cry-baby,’ I said to myself, ‘in this terrestrial atmosphere? Surely,’ I thought, ‘I can’t have been long enough in this world-corner of sighs and groans and tears to have altogether lost my Emptiness composure?’ Thisbe had slipped off by this time leaving me alone by this glass-covered, steel-netted aperture and I noticed there was no way of opening it. That indeed was a wise precaution, considering what might have been blown in and what might have been thrown out; but when I thought of Um-and-Mum’s two expressive heads engaged in lively wonderings as to what had befallen their only progeny and even perhaps expressing to each other their surprise that I’d made no attempt to communicate with them, I couldn’t help feeling, as earth-folk say when they feel like crying, ‘a bit funny’. But of course what attempt could I make to communicate with them? O they would surely understand that much. Think of my catching a sea-gull or a curlew and tying round its neck a little note directed to Um-and-Mum of the Uttermost Emptiness! Yes, and suppose that bird flew to the portion of the Emptiness whence Mo had come! What then?

I was on the stairs ascending to the Deck when whom should I meet but my kind friend Mrs Smith. ‘Ah, Ummy-boy!’ she cried; and I felt so friendly towards her that I could not resist embracing her; and as I kissed her I murmured ‘Cloddie! Cloddie! Cloddie!’ over and over again. As I did so I couldn’t help thinking what a fool I was. ‘An absolute idiot is what you are, Ummy boy!’ I said to myself, because I suddenly remembered so clearly that when I first saw Jane Fixem I decided that she and I were born to be friends. And now there was she, rising up in disgust from my side because she had boasted to me about her practical wisdom over cabins and I had boasted to her about my absolute carelessness over cabins! Whereas with Mrs Smith all I had been concerned about was the name Clotilde and yet what must I do the moment I met her but hug her to my heart! I was caught indeed in the very act of doing this by none other than Professor Porpustle; but this official parent of my precious orphan Thisbe behaved as though it were one of the usual monotonous sights of our dull life upon this earth and treated us both as if we were a couple of children playing ‘Blind Man’s Buff’.

‘The mistake so often made,’ said Professor Porpustle, addressing us both, ‘in this irrational and disorganised world, is that people keep forgetting that there is only one thing in life of any really great interest at all, and that is the problem as to what will happen after the world disappears. To take an interest in such trifles as winning or losing games, whether games with footballs or games with cards, or in making horses run races or jump over railings, or in these absurd wars between nations when the tribes of our species are ready to destroy one another for the sake of what is called patriotism, that is to say for the sake of treating your own particular tribe with its own particular way of living and speaking, as if it were a distinguished family, all of whose customs and habits must be superior to those of all other families: and all this going on while the one supreme matter of interest among these crazy hubbubs and in the midst of all this nonsensical heroism, ought to be for us all, white men, black men, yellow men, red men, educated men and uneducated men, what is going to happen when the world comes to an end.’

I was reduced to complete silence by the Professor’s eloquence and Platonic reasoning; but, so I was profoundly thankful to observe, my gallant Mrs Smith was not.

‘But why, Professor,’ she boldly enquired, ’is it more important to wonder what will happen after the buildings up and breakings down by the men of this world are over and we are lost in the abyss, than to try to discover if there’s not something in each and every one of us that cannot be destroyed whatever happens to the material world around us? Isn’t there something in each of us, Professor, something that watches both our own material outside and the material outside of the world that is about to disappear? Why shouldn’t this something, Professor, this something in us that watches these outward things and considers the fate of these outward things, be something that has the inherent power to survive when all these outward things, including the outward universe, have entirely vanished?’ O I could have hugged my Cloddie again when I heard these words proceeding from her simple commonplace little face! But Professor Porpustle’s only retort was to take me by the arm and drag me away, up the long steps, till he had got me alone on the deck and free from the dangerous influence of a woman so completely devoid of the least tinge of philosophy and science that she actually believed that the emotional see-saw feelings of our silly wavering hearts had more truth in them than Euclid or the terrific Zodiacal discoveries made by Algebra.

‘Look,’ cried Professor Porpustle, waving his aims towards Orion’s Belt. ‘Don’t you realize that when all those contemptible twinkles are forever extinguished in the final darkness and there is no longer Sun or Moon or Stars or Earth or Ocean or Space full of gyrating atoms, the only important question for those of us who have had the intelligence to transfer our being from matter to mind, from the rack-a-daisy competitions of men and women and cats and mice to the vast unutterable What Next, the final strokes of our own Universe’s Big Ben is the question, ‘What is to follow?’

Did Professor Porpustle actually think that he'd found in me, in my tweed coat and in my cloth cap and with the sort of bag that would-be undergraduates carry, when they leave their trunks at the station and make their way to discover 'digs', if possible with an Aunt-Jemimaish sort of confidential landlady, a perfect pupil? He certainly didn't expect to be confronted, as we now were confronted, while he was still waving his hands to the sparkles of light in the firmament, by the barrack-room voice and the military presence, of Colonel Katterventicle.

'So you're teaching our young friend a little astronomy, eh Professor, before we settle down for our first night on this unusual expedition?'

Then, while Professor Porpustle made an awkward attempt to sum up what he had just been saying in language adapted to army discipline, the Colonel, giving not the slightest attention to what the man was saying, went on expressing his own thoughts.

'It was not before the last real battle in the last real war that I did what I'd never done before: that is I explored the town of Geneva. Have either of you fellows ever been to Geneva? It's a very interesting town, you know, a very interesting town: and do you know, though you may not believe it, I found myself singularly at home there. I was surprised at that myself, for I was born, as you probably may have heard, in the north of Scotland.'

At this point the Professor, who must have met ere this other world-famous generals born in the north of Scotland, made a bold bolt for it; for like other powerful speakers the one thing that nothing would induce him to do was to listen patiently to another powerful speaker. So while, with my eyes on the little bald spot on the summit of the Porpustular Tower of Wisdom, as it descended the stairs, I sat down on a barrel of oil and remarked humbly, 'It's one of the chief regrets of my life, sir, that I've never been to Scotland.'

‘It’s of Geneva I’m talking, young man,’ said the Colonel sternly. ‘Geneva is one of the most remarkable towns — indeed I might almost call it a city — I have ever visited. And do you know what I found there?’

‘Do tell me, sir,’ I modestly murmured. ‘I found,’ he went on, ‘that the name of many, many, many owners of shops — they have their names, of course, over the windows fronting on the street, were my own mother’s maiden name before she married my father? Was not that a remarkable thing?’ While he was speaking I was presuming to assume in my attentive respect that his mother’s parents must therefore have been French Swiss.

‘Do tell me, sir,’ I boldly enquired, ‘what that name was?’ There was a pause; a pause that indicated, as I shrewdly divined, that to ask the Colonel to tell me, simply, naturally and frankly, what his mother’s name was before she became Madame Katterventicle was a request not altogether seemly.

‘My mother’s name, young man,’ replied the Colonel as solemnly as if I had asked him in what country Bethlehem was situated, ‘was Lasseronica. She was born in Toulouse. She was extremely young when she married my father.’

I tried in vain to picture the word ‘Lasseronica’ above shop-windows full of cakes and sweets and toys and dolls; but finally I blurted out, ‘Geneva must indeed be a beautiful place with such names above its shops. Were they married in Geneva?’

I shall never forget the expression in the Colonel’s eyes as he replied, ‘What’s it to me where they were married? I was born in Scotland.’

‘Pardon me, Sir,’ was all I could say and I made as if I had to keep an appointment at the other end of the deck and bolted.

I did keep an appointment, although I had no idea of its existence, at the other end of the deck; for there was Thisbe waiting for me; having put little Theophil safely to bed for the night. ‘Did you guess,’ I asked her, ‘that I’d do a bolt from the Colonel?' She smiled, with what might have been a nod or might have been a shake of the head. Then she laid a couple of very cold fingers on my wrist. 'Listen, Um, I've got a very serious subject for your consideration.'

'For heaven's sake, my precious,' I cried, 'what is it?'

We were alone at the bow of our singular craft, and above us I could see the half-moon, whether in its first or its second 'quarter I didn't know. 'It's something I forgot altogether,' she said gravely; 'and I don't believe Mo has thought of it at all.'

'And so you've come back to your old Um for help? Well, I sure will help you, my darling, if I possibly can.'

'We've forgotten,' she repeated very slowly, gravely clutching with her free hand one of the enormous tree trunks which Mo's workmen had fastened together so as to make a sort of titanic bow-sprit. I clutched the other, and holding tightly to the cold little fingers that had touched my wrist, I repeated again: 'Forgotten what?'

'To name our vessel,' she said.

CHAPTER VII

IT WAS THISBE who collected us all together. By ‘all’ I mean of course the passengers. For the engineers, whom Mo had employed to manage the engine room, naturally kept to themselves and ate and played and gambled and gamboled in their own spacious play-room, when they weren’t pacing the deck in intervals of their work. Yes, Thisbe called us all together on the foredeck to decide this most important point ere we mounted further into space. What was to be the name of our vessel? It was, as I expected, Lady Leonora who was the first speaker. She said the name must be of one syllable and easy to speak because it was on the other side of the Moon we were going to land and we might be met by people who would find it difficult to pronounce English. She suggested the name ‘Gwork’. We all agreed as to the sound of that word, and the only disputing began when Mrs Lockitite suggested ‘Rork’ as preferable, and Colonel Katterventicle expressed his strong opinion that ‘Hawk’ as a bird of prey familiar to us all would be more natural; and Poppity Pipstick, faithfully supported by Tickly Duck, cried out in favour of ‘Stork’.

It was Mo who finally made the wise suggestion that his new friend Lord Boomerang should dominate this important baptism of our Space-Ship.

And accordingly we were all summoned on deck, not excluding even little Theophil, whom her mother, Mrs Lockitite, carried up in her arms still half asleep. Mo’s engineers were prohibited from voting by Lord Boomerang who declared they were only technologists, whereas this selection was clearly a matter for readers of books to decide. Those of these ousted ones who could be spared from steering our vessel in large appropriate swoops upwards towards the Moon appeared on deck to amuse themselves at our lively proceedings and I confess that for my own part I was more interested to talk to them than to decide what name to give to the vessel they were steering with such remarkable ability. The end of the selection of a name was not without interest and you can bet the engineers who were watching the result with a good deal of amusement were delighted. The votes were very carefully counted by Lord Boomerang and the result was exactly equal between Lady Leonara's Gwork and Poppity Pipstick's Stork. Then it suddenly occurred to Mrs Lockitite that her little daughter Theophil hadn't voted. 'Do you like our ship to be called Gwork or Stork, baby?' demanded Lord Boomerang in a thundering voice. Theophil lifted her head. 'Cork,' she cried: and that decided it. 'It is my duty to announce,' thundered Lord Boomerang, 'that since the votes were even for Gwork and Stork, it is clearly the will of the Powers Above that we name our vessel according to this child's word. Our ship's name is therefore, "Cork".'

It now only remained for the particular workman, hired by Mo for the engineering work but who happened to be a real adept at painting, to go from end to end and from side to side of our cumbrous vessel painting her name, for the most grotesque of air-ships must be regarded like all the rest as a feminine creature, on every stationary object, whether of wood or of metal, that offered sufficient surface for his purpose. Remembering the official way to name ships, the painter, after a private little talk with Mr and Mrs Lockitite, placed the letters T.P.P. standing for 'Theophil Parva Puella', in front of the word 'Cork') so that every stationary object on board now carried the name, 'T.P.P. Cork' in grand capital letters.

What clearly tickled the fancy of Lord Boomerang most, as T.P.P. Cork rose upwards in great sweeping curves, was the impression we made on the other air-ships we encountered. Lord Boomerang wasn't long in discovering that among Mo's engineers who were running our ship was one who was both a drummer and a trumpeter; and who had brought each of these things, his trumpet and his drum, along with his tools. 'Why shouldn't we,' said Lord Boomerang the moment he found this out, 'give the next flying ship we meet a little salute? They must be puzzled to hell by our size and shape and it would finely increase their bewilderment if as they passed us we saluted them with drum and trumpet.'

Mo heard this with delight and came forward at once, his eyes shining. 'Yes! Yes! Yes! My Lord,' he cried in a high pitched voice. 'That's just what we must do. They'll think that we're some crazy half of a lost star that dropped away from its other half and is just on the drift, its inhabitants, if there are any inhabitants, probably asleep in their beds, without the faintest idea of what's happening to them! That's what they'll think, you can bet your life! And then we'll drum it and trumpet it till we make them change their mind — till we make them think that they've met a world that's celebrating its creation!'

'Its creation by whom?' enquired Mr Lockitite. 'By the Devil, of course,' cried Mo, in a perfect ecstasy of satisfaction.

We did indeed drum it and trumpet it soon and I can only hope it led to no tragic result. But it certainly looked to me as if that might be the issue of all this ballyhooling in the dark air of a starless night. For where had the stars gone? There wasn't one in sight and only a few minutes ago I had noticed the Evening Star. Was it because when I saw her I mentally named her Venus instead of Aphrodite, her Greek name. Did she object strongly, as a lovely Greek lady, to being Latinized in this way as if she were a beautiful slave from Ethiopia; and did she to punish me leave the sky and take all the others out of the sky along with her? A foreign air-ship did come towards us and as it happened passed close in front of us. Mo, who was dancing with exultation and trembling with excitement, shrilled into the air the agreed-upon signal, which were the words ‘warp and woof’, yelled in a special way from the pit of our stomachs. ‘Bum, bum, bum, bum’ went the drum and ‘to-hoot, to-hoot, to-hoot’ went the trumpet. And I could clearly see the slender little air-ship that had quite passed our prow give a galvanic twist sideways as if instead of heading for Earth it had swung round and was doing its best in this lop-sided position to shoot off in a parallel direction, neither going up nor down but acting as if in a last and desperate struggle to survive its crew had decided to play the part of a satellite, not falling on the Earth but circling round it. I couldn’t help clutching at Mr Lockitite, who was a short, muscular, broad-shouldered, silent man with a square jaw and a square forehead, and suggesting that we should all shout at the top of our voices and call upon the crew of this airplane to bring it to a pause resting upon our deck because it really wasn’t a deck at all. What it was a strip of land whose houses had been removed but whose massive little plot of gardens and orchards and lawns remained intact. But Mr Lockitite shook his square head with such definite disapproval, though it was apparent to me that a faintly humorous smile flickered across his face, that I knew I was talking foolishly.

I watched with great interest the airplane’s lights as it went off and I decided that its crew was steering it very much according to the advice that in his solitary ponderings Mr Lockitite would have given. For it was departing from us neither upwards nor downwards but as rapidly sideways as could be managed by a vessel of its size and structure. I followed its lights with more sympathy, perhaps, than our far more complicated adventure justified; but to do so I had to walk from end to end of our deck, avoiding as I did so all kinds of curious obstacles. Some of these obstacles were very human ones. For instance at one point I was accosted by the wistful voice of Lullaby Skim, who begged to make her companion, Charlotte Wiggle, stop dragging her about when she was so longing to go to bed. 'But what a silly childish thing,' protested Miss Wiggle, in an aggrieved indignant voice, 'to want to go to bed on our first night on board the Cork! She doesn't realize and she never will realize unless I make her, that it's when we're on board a ship like this for the first time that things happen to us that we'd like to remember all our life, things that will never strike us again as they do when we're freshly started on such a trip and hear and see and feel such things for the first time. Do tell her, I beg you Mr Um, that it's childish of her to want to go to bed and to go to sleep when impressions are reaching her such as she can never have again; for of course when we get used to things and take them for granted the original wonder of them is gone and can never be brought back again.'

Since I had come aboard the Cork I had never felt angry with anyone. I had felt contempt; I had felt vexation; I had felt disagreement; I had felt dislike; I had felt aversion; but so far I had never felt anger. But now I did. 'Take her down at once Miss Wiggle!!' I cried indignantly. 'All that you say is true for those of us who are strong and sturdy enough, as you and I are, to take in and absorb these first impressions. But what you are doing to Miss Skim is cruel. And you must remember this. When anyone is treating us cruelly what we think of later when we recall what we have looked at around us when we have been thus treated will not be the things themselves or any associates called up by them. It will simply be the feeling of the suffering we have gone through. Take your friend downstairs at once and let her go to bed!’

CHAPTER VIII

THE CORK MUST have got halfway to the Moon when in the middle of the night with the glittering stars all round us and the calm hushed circle of the Full Moon above us, as I was walking up and down our deck, with all the other passengers asleep below, I chanced to meet Mo, who evidently, like myself, was unwilling this beautiful night to go to bed.

‘Hullo, Um!’ he exclaimed, ‘Hullo, Mo!’ I exclaimed; and facing each other, each clutching with our left hand one of the upright posts which at this hour seemed to be waiting to give some lonely mortal a friendly support, for they were not as tall as masts nor as twisted as hurdles, we both stopped and stared at each other.

‘I feel,’ I said after a pause, ‘as if you and I had been playing a children’s game for an eternity and had only, at this moment, reached its consummation.’

‘You are anticipating things too fast,’ retorted Mo. ‘The real consummation of our game will be when we reach the Moon.’

‘I certainly shall be interested,’ I said, ‘to see what the other side of the Moon is really like. We’ve been staring at our side of it for millions of years.’

‘No,’ said Mo, calmly, ‘not nearly as long as that. At least three Moons have fallen on us, and the last one to fall created the Flood. How it got back up there is the question that ought to interest us.’

‘You know, Mo,’ I said, ‘I sometimes feel as if I were pretending to be God and you were pretending to be the Devil.’ I caught an extraordinary leer upon Mo’s face, a leer which was accentuated by the glittering starlight through which we were travelling, ‘Perhaps,’ he chuckled, ‘you are God and I am the Devil.’

‘I don’t believe in either of them,’ I remarked rather foolishly. ‘You don’t have to believe in what you see,’ replied Mo. ‘All this, I suppose,’ I remarked hesitatingly, ’is due to the fact that the Moon doesn’t turn on her own axis or what do you call it.’

‘Never mind how the Moon behaves,’ chuckled Mo. ‘What will interest you will be to see what the other side of the Moon is like. I know what it is like, and I can tell you you’ll be amazed when you see it.’

‘How and when did you see it?’ I enquired humbly. ‘How? When?’ exclaimed Mo proudly. ‘Do you think I remember such trifling details as in what month or in what year or in what kind of airship I visited the other side of the Moon? There are few places in this preposterously absurd Universe that I haven’t visited.’

‘Are there any other universes, then?’

‘Of course there are! How can you be so stupid. There are more universes than a fool like you could count! There are more universes than there are straws in the biggest haystack you have ever seen in your life.’

‘There are no haystacks where I come from,’ I answered proudly, thinking in my heart that now I should be able to discover whether, as I have always supposed, Mo came from the same emptiness beyond space from which I came. ‘Don’t you yet realize,’ cried Mo, ‘you double-dyed fool, that the people of this planet Earth — I mean the men, women and children of it, such as you and I have been associating with in London, are no more than enlarged atoms or rather no more than those much smaller identities who circle and divide and collect and separate and make intricate patterns inside atoms, entities and identities that have been given all manner of arresting names, some in Latin and some in Greek, but all with the idea of compelling the human race to recognize Science as its true Master, and as the Dictator of the only universe it knows. Don't you realize that these contemptible little spots and spitalicks who think of themselves as the People of London are in the eyes of Science no more than scrabbles of rain-marks on a window-pane?'

I began to catch the mood of Mo. He was anxious, on his side of this curious game of cosmological Tarot-Cards to disparage humanity to such a point that the questions as to what we shall find on the other side of the Moon become far more important questions than any question about the dignity of the human race, to which, wherever we came from, both he and I must certainly, from our appearance, be assumed to belong.

'Well, Mo', said I, speaking quietly and, at least that is how I tried hard to speak, firmly and decisively too, 'my own feeling is that the People of London, not "en masse" mind you, but individually, as you and I have come to know them, are of infinitely greater interest and importance than anything we can discover on the other side of the Moon; and, I would like to add, of greater interest, considered simply and naturally and historically, than anything these confounded Scientists can possibly discover about the Moon or about the Earth or about us or themselves.'

This plain declaration of mine evidently caused real fury to blaze up in Mo. There was a light near us as we talked, so that I was able to see clearly the spasm of rage that convulsed his face.

'What I shall do to you, you conceited young idiot, when I've got the right men to handle you, you can think about when you are in bed tonight; and you can take my word for it it will actually happen. I will have you skinned alive inch by inch and every inch of your flesh that is exposed I will have burnt by a red-hot iron as deep as to the bone; and not only so, but I will myself bend down over you and chew and swallow your fizzling and sizzling flesh, and as I do so I shall watch your expression with my eyes fixed on your eyes, and I shall take measures that it will be quite impossible for you to shut your eyes as you watch the delight in mine at the taste of your sizzling flesh. You needn't think that you will die under this process, for I shall see to it as my skinner skins you and as my burner burns you, that your body is turned about this way and that way so as to avoid approaching the particular parts of you the skinning and the scorching of which would mean death. For instance, the longest time will be taken up, as you can imagine, with your buttocks, for these will lend themselves beautifully to the most prolonged treatment. Only your head will of course have to be screwed round a little unless we can manage it with a system of mirrors, but your eyes will have to meet mine all the time if I am to get the full exquisiteness of the process.'

Mo paused for a moment. 'Of course,' he went on, 'we shall have to postpone this delicate operation till we've established ourselves on the other side of the Moon; indeed, until we have explored this unknown country completely, for you can rest assured of one thing, that you won't live to have the pleasure of telling your London friends what the other side of the Moon is like; nor will they ever know anything of what happened to you before you said goodbye to us all.'

When Mo had exhausted his flow of venom he leant against his particular deck-lamp-post, allowing me to lean against mine. This I did; and in his ecstatic exhaustion after having imagined he had really been causing me the pain he described he assumed that my whole consciousness was absorbed in bearing all this imaginary pain. But he was entirely mistaken. Even in my childhood with my parents I had instinctively taught myself to separate in the depths of my mind what I was doing or what was being done to me from what I really felt about the whole business. I don't mean that I didn’t imaginatively suffer; nor do I mean that I didn’t realize how exquisitely Mo enjoyed my suffering; I mean that beneath this emotional exchange of awareness between what the inflictor of the suffering experienced and what the one upon whom it was inflicted experienced there was a region in my consciousness where something was watching with absolute detachment all that was being experienced on both sides. This something was not saying to itself: ‘What incredible cruelty Mo’s nature contains!’ Nor was it saying to itself: ‘How on earth can this fool of an Um put up with this without having the sort of violent fit that would put an end to it for good and all?’ It was analyzing with frantic intensity the whole mystery of pain. It was wondering what the world would be like if the phenomenon of pain had never appeared in it at all; if what the only thing the victim of such infliction could say to itself was: ‘I wonder when this business will kill me; and I wonder, when it does kill me, whether my consciousness will be extinct forever and I shall be as completely gone as the vanishing of a puff of smoke, or whether I shall only be driven by the death of this life to take refuge in another life without losing my identity or my memory of what I have had to put up with in this life before leaving it.’

It was with this vision of things within me that I allowed my eyes to remain fixed upon Mo’s as we each leaned against our respective deck-posts of light.

Whether Mo had relinquished his torture dream or not I do not know, but all at once he sprang up straight and pointed to the sky. I rose too, and in a second saw what he had seen. There, clear above us as our own strange ship Cork swirled and swooped upwards, was a vast and very black cloud; and just above this cloud, covering it very nearly from end to end, was the gleaming silver arch, only just barely visible, of the Moon. In one moment I knew what the people of London meant when they talked about being ‘moon-kissed’. What is this feeling that the Moon has the power of exciting in us. Does It, or does She, mesmerize and hypnotize us in some way? As I looked at that vast, incandescent silvery arch circling that black cloud I knew through every nerve and vein and cell and fibre and gland in my whole frame that the vast unseen body of which that silver bow was only the upper and outer curve was a living Being like myself, only a being possessed of an upgathered store of mysterious magnetism against which it is impossible to contend. With this magnetism the Moon has the power to bewitch us to the point of madness and sometimes even of death. Whether she is conscious of doing it I cannot tell. But it certainly seems that she naturally would be. Those of us who are affected in this way by her power feel, I believe — at least I do whom she effects fatally — that we are united to her in a manner resembling the way men and women are united in sex. We call this love. But as we all know only too well it does not confine itself to the emotion we feel towards each other. It frequently compels us to follow some mysterious quest that is not by any means always a loving one.

CHAPTER IX

WHETHER MO HAD the faintest notion of all that had been passing through my mind from the beginning to the end of his tale of torture, and still further what had been my subsequent train of thought when all that business was done with, I fancy I shall never know till I am dead and buried. Whether I shall know it after I'm dead in some new embodiment I greatly doubt. I have never been a believer in pre-and reincarnations. I am no dogmatist and I regard my feelings about it as purely a matter of taste; yes, of simple and natural preference, as I might prefer going to bed before ten to sitting up till mid-night. My feeling is simply that I've had a good taste of what they call life; and though I've enjoyed quite a lot of it and have had what we call a happy life, I don't find when I think over it quietly that I'm what you might call a passionate life-lover. I agree that life gives us plenty of enjoyable sensations and that it rouses in us some very exciting ambitions, such as a longing to be a great King or Prophet or a great Magician. But with it all I confess I don't really feel any desire to live after I am once dead in any form or under any condition.

'Well!' I said to Mo when I saw no sign of the dark cloud with one silver bow curved above it offering any immediate change of appearance, 'I guess I'll be getting off to bed.' Mo just nodded. 'I'll be doing the same presently,' he said. 'Only I want to wait till I can see a little more of the Moon.'

I didn't smile at him nor nod at him, nor he at me, as we separated; and I thought to myself as my head sank into its pillow: 'the truth is that both Mo and I are to a large extent pretending. I am pretending to be God and Mo is pretending to be the Devil.’ But before I slept I told myself that whether Mo is like the Devil or not he undoubtedly derived intense pleasure from inflicting pain, and whether I was like God or not I undoubtedly derived great pleasure in thinking of myself as a good and quiet youth who possessed great power of persuading people to do what he wanted them to do. ‘Mo possesses the same power,’ I said to myself. ‘But who can tell what Mo really and truly is aiming at?’

‘What am I aiming at,’ I asked myself. ‘Simply,’ I thought, ‘at making people happy by helping them to get what they want.’ At this, after carefully smoothing away a tiny little rough crease in my pillow that was teasing my left ear, I gave myself up to sleep. And if you were to ask me to say exactly what it felt like doing what they call ‘falling asleep’ I could only answer that it felt as if my whole body and soul had turned into a round soft ball of white clay that was resting upon a stool of velvety moss impregnated with an indescribable vapour, a vapour that gave the impression that though the moss of which the stool was composed was firm and indestructible, the stool upon which all that was I rested was defended from everything that existed in the entire universe by a gulf that nothing can cross.

It can easily be imagined how hurriedly I got up the moment I was awake. I shall never forget that first feeling when, standing by my bed in the early light that I had learned to call ‘wolf-light’ I gazed at the two apertures in our wall of my little room. All the light in the room came from the upper aperture and even that light went out every now and then when a cloud swept across the Cork’s deck. The lower aperture was even more closely covered by wire-netting than the upper one, through which the dawn-light was coming; but what made this lower one interesting to me as I looked intently at it was the fact that when lighted up by the dawn-light from the upper one I could see big and little creatures pass across it; and once I thought I actually saw, staring in at me through the wire-netting, the formidable eye of an Octopus or what some folk call a ‘Devil-Fish’. Impatient to see how near we had got to the Moon I snatched up my clothes, hurriedly pulled them on, opened my door as quietly as I could, shut it very carefully and bolted up the stairs to the deck. ‘Oh King of the gods,’ I prayed in my heart to Zeus, ‘grant that I shall see our landing on the Moon and get back safe to tell them all about it in London!’

Yes, yes, yes! There, just in front of our prow was what, if we had been coming from Calais to Dover, I should have called a harbour beneath tall cliffs. It was clear to me in a second that our engineers in the hold of the Cork were steering our unusual vessel with astonishing competence. Yes! Here we were entering the harbour, and already grounding, for the planks of our own keel moved at a deeper level than the iron of most ships, on the sand of its entrance. The surprising thing to me was that there was no living creature in sight; nor was there any pier or any structure whether of wood or of stone for passengers to embark or disembark. All was as it had been when, having recovered the Moon from her terrible disasters, so fatal to the luckless planet Earth upon whom she collapsed, Nature left her in her natural orbit. I walked along our Cork’s deck to the two posts or short masts with lamps where Mo had pretended to torture me and I had pretended to be supernaturally brave. I saw no sign of Mo now, so I took for granted he was directing affairs from one of our taller masts, for the Cork had three of these near her elevated helm; and on the tallest of these I now observed a flag flying. This excited my curiosity and hurrying back to the helm I looked up with interest at this tall mast. Yes, there was the little platform, nearly at the top of the mast, where Mo no doubt was directing everything and giving orders to everybody. But our flag was indeed an interesting sight, and it grew more and more so as the rising sun’s rays fell full upon it.

It carried the name Cork in big capital letters and I hoped that little Theophil would soon see it and recognize it as her own chosen name. It also carried the single Latin word ‘Impavidum’ and I was so pleased that not even the presumptuous Mo had dared to substitute any other word for that grand salute to integrity made by the simplest and yet the most untranslatable of all great poets.

‘Well, Master Mo,’ I said to myself, ‘I give you the prize for our flag. That you’re an infernally cruel devil I am the one to know, if only by what might be called psycho-telepathic torture; but that you have good taste when it comes to ships and flags and urban suburbs hoisted into the air I, your spiritual rival, I who like pretending to be God while you like pretending to be the Devil, am compelled by honesty to admit.’

CHAPTER X

I FOLLOWED HIS Lordship and Lady Leonora while they arranged the establishment of a meticulously organized camp for everybody on a spacious field of grass, greener than I'd dreamt it was possible for grass to be, anywhere but on Earth. I think it was Lady Leonora and not his Lordship nor Master Mo who decided that it was best to arrange the Camp into circles, each surrounded by high railings and entered by a door whose key was in the hands of the particular lady who governed that particular circle.

Thus, ruled by Mrs Lockitite, was the circle inhabited by her husband and by Charlotte Wiggle and Lullaby Skim, and by little Theophil. Then there was the circle ruled by Thisbe and inhabited by Lord and Lady Boomerang and Professor Porpustle and by Poppity Pipstick and Tickly Duck. Then there was the circle ruled by Mrs Cloddie Smith and inhabited by Mr and Mrs Runnerini and Colonel Katterventicle. Then there was a circle ruled by Jane Fixem, a circle whose peculiarity was that anyone who quarrelled with the Lady who ruled any of the other circles might, if he or she got permission from Mo, take refuge under Jane Fixem.

My own position among these allotted circles was a peculiar one, and one that worked itself out with fatal precision and speed, no doubt by reason of my peculiar relationship with Mo, who under Thisbe's direction was the Boss of the whole business. What it amounted to was very plain and simple. I was a sort of perambulating inspector. My job was to go about from circle to circle on this wonderful green meadow and find out if there was any particular person in any particular circle who would like to move away and who would be pleased to be put under the authority of Jane Fixem.

Thus we all acted reasonably and precisely while our great vessel the Cork, well grounded on the sands outside, waited for what would happen next.

What happened next as far as I was concerned was not very surprising. I was suddenly aware of Mo standing by my side and looking enquiringly at me. The faint shiver that the look in his eyes always gave me disappeared as quickly as it came. ‘I want to direct it all from above it all,’ he said. And he gave the remark a rather plaintive interrogation, as though he were appealing to a knowledge which at the moment he completely lacked.

I replied at once: ‘Why don’t you call upon Nature to lend you a cloud; and then persuade your favourite Demon to give it enough substance to bear your weight?’ Mo gazed upwards. ‘There’s a good cloud!’ he cried. ‘I’ll do as you say. Only you must give it the substance.’

He leapt from the ground and as soon as he reached the cloud, which certainly was floating very conveniently, on a sudden impulse, the power of which I have never been able to explain, I shouted: ‘Make it able to carry him, great God! Make it able to hold him up!’ Whether it was Jehovah who worked the miracle I don’t know; but, lo and behold, the cloud did hold him up, and there he was, lolling about on it in diabolic satisfaction while we gazed up at him in awe. It was then that I was seized with such distaste for the whole business, that waving farewell to Jane Fixem and still clutching tight in my hand the stick I had christened ‘Jane’ I ran at top speed out of that green field and made my way inland, following the direction towards which the prow of the Cork pointed, in fact the direction in which, if the crew had been able to move it, it would have advanced with all its massive weight over the land, just as if the land had been the sea.

I soon found myself, as I ran, ascending a slight slope; not exactly a hill, but an upland resembling those undulations covered with heather and bracken and groves of trees such as are found on Exmoor and Dartmoor. I hadn’t gone very far, however, when I was compelled to stop, pleasantly compelled, for I encountered a very remarkable person. This person look me up and down before he spoke; and I looked him up and down before I spoke. I knew before either of us uttered a word that this man had the same unusual power that I myself possessed, of passing through solid things such as walls and houses and rocks, and also through unsolid things, like air and water and fire, just as a ghost might pass. I don’t know what he thought as he looked at me, though I did notice a faintly quizzical look cross his face for a second but it did not remain there. What remained there was what must have been on my own face, namely a steady and quiet but intense interest.

‘Are you a ghost like me?’ he said. And then he added dreamily, but with an almost tender solicitude: ‘You mustn’t mind it too much, Sonny. I know it’s queer at first, but we soon get used to it.’

I looked at him very gravely. ‘But I’m not a real ghost yet,’ I said. ‘I’ve not died yet. It’s only that I come from so far away that I strike people as being unearthly.’

‘Where do you come from?’ he asked; and it was then, as I looked at him more searchingly than before, that I knew that I knew him, knew him by his pictures and statues. He was Shakespeare! The extraordinary thing was that I wasn’t in the smallest degree frightened. In fact the fear I had begun to experience when I was alone upon that undulating stretch of upland disappeared altogether. ‘I wish I knew your Plays better than I do!’ I cried. ‘Oh yes, and your Sonnets too! I have heard of them. I have seen notices of Hamlet and Macbeth and King Lear and Romeo and Juliet and the

Midsummer Night's Dream in the London Theatres; but I had so many other things to think of! I couldn't hear them. I — I — I,' I stammered. 'I have a girl-friend. Yes, I have a Juliet, an Imogen, a Rosalind, an Ophelia, all of my very own. Her name isn't Miranda. Her name is Thisbe. She's a very lovely girl, and a very, very, very clever girl. O I could tell you about her for hours and hours. You would understand. I can see you would!'

'Pardon me, young master,' the ghost of Shakespeare said with a fatherly smile. 'But I would understand still better if you'd only tell me where you lived before you came to London and who your parents were?'

'It will be,' I began, with a good deal of hesitation, 'diff — diff — rather difficult to tell you. But my parents were Two-in-One. One half was a woman and I called her "Mum". The other half was a man and I called him "Um". My own name, by which each of them always addressed me, was "Um".'

'What country, what coast, what continent, what island, did you come from?' enquired the ghost of Shakespeare, displaying real interest in his tone.

'It was,' I boldly told him, 'outside all countries. It was outside the whole world. It was outside the Sun and Moon and all the Stars. It was outside Space itself! It was in that vast Emptiness that existed before our universe came into existence.' The ghost of Shakespeare stood very still and stared at me very gravely.

'We are really, then,' he said, '"such stuff as dreams are made of', I have often thought so; and as I look at you here before me I see that I was right. Do you ever wonder, my dear son, what we shall see when we awake from this dream?'

I looked deep into the eyes of the ghost before me and a very strange feeling came over me.

Yes, the ghost of Shakespeare was right. All we, living on this Earth, and the Earth herself, together with the Sun, the Moon and all the Planets, and the Milky Way with its multitudinous, innumerable Stars, will one day vanish utterly and all together. And what shall we feel then? And where shall we be then?

The ghost of Shakespeare smiled gently at me and pointed with an outstretched arm at a man's figure disappearing behind a clump of willow-trees. 'Run after him, Sonny,' he said. 'He's in need of an understanding companion.'

I obeyed him as if he'd been my father. The mysterious power that emanated from him reminded me of what I used to feel when my father and mother, those Two-in-One, told me what it was best for me to do. I ran rapidly after the figure I'd seen disappearing behind those willow-trees. Yes! There he was! He'd settled himself down for a rest upon a mossy bank, and when I reached him, breathless with running, he made me lie down by his side. 'It's like a Theatre here,' he said. It didn't exactly strike me as like a Theatre, this bank where we reclined, but I was greatly struck by the lonely and lordly expression on the face of my companion.

'I feel sure,' he said calmly, but with a wild, desolate, desperate, despairing expression that seemed to have been graven on his features as they might have been on the face of someone who had, while unchanged in years, witnessed the tragedies of a thousand generations of our poor human race.

'The orchestra breathes,' he began as I looked at him with growing awe.

'Breathes what?' I murmured. 'The music of the spheres,' he replied; and then he went on in a clear, resonant voice, but a voice that seemed like the voice of some uncontrollable poet who had been carried off in a trance and chained in Bedlam:

‘Mimes in the form of God on high
Mutter and mumble low And hither and thither fly;
Blind puppets they that come and go
At bidding of vast formless things
That move the scenery to and fro
And flap from out their Condor wings Invisible woe.’

‘When will all this awfulness happen?’ I asked, stretching myself out on our mossy bank and looking at him. ‘In the lonesome latter years,’ he replied calmly.

‘It will be appalling,’ I murmured.

‘No! No!’ he cried, laughing. ‘It will be a gala night!’ There was something about the look he gave me as he said this that made me think of Mo; and I was just scrambling up from our mossy bed when the ghost of Poe, gazing wildly into space, began again:

‘And Psyche uplifting her finger
Said, “Sadly that Star I mistrust
Its pallor I strangely mistrust.
O hasten! O let us not linger
O fly! Let us fly! For we must.”’

I felt I couldn’t stand it any longer; and I moved uneasily jerking myself from side to side. I felt that it would be rude to the ghost of Poe to raise up on my feet and look down on him there, lying on his back with his hands clutching the green grass on either side of him. But I felt I simply could not endure the weird tension of the man’s whole personality a moment longer. Something in me — I could not tell you exactly what — rebelled against this intense psychic strain. I had no idea how to escape. An electric shudder of pity kept quivering through every nerve in my body. To my startled surprise I suddenly found myself on my hands and knees. What was I doing? In my reaction against this wrung-upon human harpsichord of quivering vibration I longed to take refuge in the earthy sensibility of a four-legged animal.

'Where are you taking me?' I asked the ghost of Poe in something almost like an indignant growl. He replied at once with the same floating, flowing, unearthly undulating voice, like an irresistible wave of the sea ascending a beach banked up with pebbles and mother-of-pearl shells: 'To the vault of the lost Ulalume!' he chanted.

'Is she your lost one?' I muttered: 'or is the name prophetic of someone I shall lose? I have already, let me tell you, found my true love here and her name doesn't rhyme with Ulalume. Let Ulalume lie at peace in her vault. I have no wish to disturb her. But listen, Edgar Poe! Did you hear that bird?'

'What bird?' asked the wild poet. 'No I didn't hear — oh yes, I do hear it now! What bird is it?'

'It's a Nightingale. Let's listen a little! I like the way it sings. Oh, but I think—' I now rose to my feet and offered my hand to the prostrate poet. He took it and rose to his feet, so that now we were standing erect side by side. He pressed close up to me. He was much quicker in apprehension than I have ever been or ever will be; and it was clear to me that he knew that something was going to happen. Out of no conscious will of my own I found myself repeating: 'Tis the vault of our lost Ulalume,' and though I knew she wasn't my Thisbe I couldn't get the rhythm of Ulalume out of my head.

'There's somebody coming,' cried Poe in a quavering voice. And then in a second, before I could stop him, he had broken away from me and was racing like a madman down the hill. Someone was coming! Calm, firm, quiet, confident, collected, the steps came nearer and nearer; and from that willow-grove above me still sounded the voice of the bird.

There he was! Not for a single second did I doubt his identity. It was the ghost of Keats. Only a little older than I am he looked straight at me with a friendly smile as if we had been a pair of over-grown school-boys meeting at College.

‘I am saluting that bird,’ he said quietly. ‘A sort of incantation like a chant comes into my head as I hear it. If you will allow me I will repeat it to you; because repeating it will help me to remember it till I can get back to the cemetery in Rome where my grave is. It was the ghost of Shelley who told me about this gathering of poets on the Moon. He would have come with me but they buried his heart in some modern resort by the sea. He told me he didn’t want to be separated from his heart too long. I expect you’re one of our modern poets yourself. But if you have a good memory, and if you will tell me where you live and where your bedroom is, I’ll come and visit you in your sleep and you can tell me if I’ve got any word of my chant wrong.’

‘Please go on,’ I said. ‘I know who you are by your face. You’re John Keats who was buried in Rome.’

‘Think of your knowing my face after so many years! But I’ve heard that you modern poets have got memory-machines that you carry about with you, machines that can reproduce the faces of the dead. By the way, do tell me your name.’

‘My name is Um,’ I said. But I could see from his expression that he thought I was just murmuring ‘Um — um — um — um — um’ in some nervous reluctance to reveal my name. ‘He probably thinks,’ I said to myself, ‘that I’m some Scotch Reviewer who will tell him to go back to his gallipots.’ But as he went on reciting the famous and beautiful poem, only equalled in my mind by Milton's 'Lycidas', I felt that he must know I was one of his most devoted admirers.

'Thou wast not born for death, immortal bird!
No hungry generations tread thee down.
The voice I hear this passing night was heard
In ancient days by emperor and clown;
Perhaps the self-same song that found a path
Through the sad heart of Ruth when sick for home
She stood in tears amid the alien corn;
The same that oftime hath
Charmed magic casements, opening on the foam
Of perilous seas in faery-lands forlorn.'

'Well, good sir,' said Keats, as he let the echo of that word 'forlorn' toll us both back to ourselves, 'I must leave you now, for there is a little worm in our cemetery in Rome that the son of Goethe, who is buried there, and I have made into a sort of pet. I don't think Goethe would approve of our little game, and I know Caius, near whose tomb we play, would strongly disapprove of it. But we've grown quite fond of the tiny creature and he's got quite fond of us. He must be a very old worm by now. Do you know, Mister, how long a petted worm, a cherished worm, a tended worm, a highly esteemed worm, when made a lot of between two coffins not very far down, is able to live?'

'I-am-afraid-I don't—' I said hesitatingly; wondering in my heart how these two ghosts could make slits in their coffins big enough to admit their pet worm.

When the ghost of Keats left me I began naturally to ask myself what other poets I would like to see in this Lunar Elysian Field before I left it to make sure I should not find myself left behind on the other side of the Moon when the Cork and all her passengers and crew departed for the Earth. I had begun to think of Milton and Dante and of Omar the author of the Rubaiyat and of Homer the author of the Iliad when it suddenly occurred to me that for grandeur and cruelty and horror and majesty and terror the most poetical Being ever invented was the God of the Christians. 'How,' I asked myself, 'shall I challenge the Inventor of the Christian God to appear before me?' As I thought of this I perceived a tall and massive rock in the distance; and scrambling not without some difficulty to its summit I looked about me in eager intensity hoping to catch sight of something in the shape of a sign or token or symbol or suggestion that would help me to discover the Inventor of God. How wonderful life is! I had not been long standing on the top of that stone before I saw approaching me nine extraordinary-looking Beings. They were in fact nine little monsters, each one of them representing one of our nine numbers. They were all skipping and jumping and turning head over heels and holding hands and spinning in circles and riding pick-a-back. One was tiddly-wiggling round Two, Two was higgledy-piggling round Three, Three was taggling-waggling round Four, and while Five and Six were bowing and scraping to each other, Seven, astride on the shoulders of Eight, was dangling a string with a dead rat on the end of it in front of Nine, who was jumping up and down like an excited dog trying to get hold of it.

I soon realized that these Nine holy and sacred and mysterious and mystical and mythical Numbers had selected me, a Figure upon a Rock, as their audience or their congregation or their parliament or their Jack down from the Bean-Stalk or their Rock-a-bye-Baby down from the Tree-top. I at once began to wonder how all this would end; for I noticed that in all these puppets, as they danced round and round my rock and me, there was a strange air, in spite of their rapid movements, of silent expectation, as if in every fantastical little head was the idea that, before it was over, I, the Figure on the Rock, would do something drastic, something like gathering them all in my arms and carrying them to Heaven. ‘How on earth can I,’ I thought to myself, ‘disabuse them of this mad idea?’ Then it occurred to me that since it all depended on me, and since I was the only figure, the lonely figure, the inscrutable figure, the unique figure in the presence of all these grotesque little tiddly-winks, and since they had decided in their pygmy noddles that I must be the Being called God of whom they had heard since they were mites, it was, as they say, up to me to act the part of that Being. Well! How should I do that? The obvious, orthodox, catastrophic, kaleidoscopic, telepathic, paleolithic way I could act the part of God would be announcing my Holy Will. But then another thought came into my head. What was the next most natural thing for God to do after he had announced his Will? Surely to summon the Devil to appear before him and be judged! But how the hell could I bring Mo, who certainly if I was playing God must be the one to play the Devil, to this particular rock and order him to pose before this fantastic little crowd as Moloch or Satan or Beelzebub or Lucifer? Perhaps it would be better just simply to announce my Will and leave Mo out of it? But how could I announce in any Jehovah-like manner what I felt about good and evil when evil lacked any authoritative voice to defend itself against my accusations? The complexity of this problem so puzzled me that I had to lie down on the Rock to think it over, and as the result of doing this it is hardly strange that in spite of the Nine Performers of the Play of Human Life gathering so close to the Rock that we could almost touch each other, I fell fast asleep.

CHAPTER XI

THE FIRST THING I knew when I woke up was that I was no longer alone on the Rock. Three and Four and Nine were standing beside me. All the others had moved a little away and were chanting a funny sort of song as they danced in a circle round a post at the foot of which stood One, solemnly beating time to their chant with both hands.

I was clever enough to keep my eyes tightly closed when I woke up; so that although I could feel the presence of Three and Four and Nine they had no notion that I was awake. The chant which Number One, a very curious-looking creature when I saw him later, with an eye in the middle of his forehead, a big mouth, no nose at all and enormous ears, was so carefully conducting, was a singular chant.

It was a quite natural instinct in me, too simple to be called cunning, that led me to keep my eyes tightly shut when I first woke up. I wanted to know a little at least about the weird folk who surrounded me before I took any special line of action. A faint flicker of these closed eyelids of mine was enough to make me understand that Master Number Four was seated four-square, by my side. His eyes also were closed, but not as tightly as mine, and his whole air was that of good-humoured patience mingled with just a little perhaps of weary indifference. ‘You must keep your eyes shut and just listen,’ his square figure seemed to be saying to me, while my own motionless prostration replied, so I felt, in similar language.

What I was listening to just then was a lively argument between Number Three and Number Nine. When I let my eye-lids quiver at the corners enough to get a glimpse of what these two gentlemen were like I was appalled by the particular brand of ugliness I saw in Master Three. Most of his face was dedicated to eyes and ears. These were absolutely enormous; but it was the man's mouth that gave his physiognomy its decisive character; and this character was simply horrible.

I found it was impossible to keep my eyes closed after giving one glance at that mouth of his. It suggested — how shall I put it? — a sort of abysmal suction. It looked as if, when once Three's rampaging eyes and flapping ears had done their business and had got their luckless prey squeezed against their lord's bulging lips and palpitating cheeks, the whole creature and the whole atmosphere round the creature became an orgy of swallowing. It was horrible. It was terrifying. It was not ordinary swallowing. It was suction so prolonged that the unfortunate object being swallowed seemed to be transformed into an interminable worm while the stomach into which it was sucked elongated itself to receive it. The moment came when I simply couldn't stand the presence of all this, whether visible or invisible, any longer. Never in my upbringing in that divine Emptiness outside all the swirling atoms of Space and beyond all the enlarging galaxies of an ever-increasing Multiverse or Matter had I known that such horrors could exist as the antics of these ridiculous Beings who named themselves One, Two, Three, Four, Five, Six, Seven, Eight, Nine. I didn't decide anything in my mind. Instinctively, impetuously, recklessly, desperately I scrambled to my feet, clambered down from the rock, made a wide circle round the creatures singing and dancing in the field, and fled for my life. It was amazing to me how extensive this vast level expanse of green grass was. It seemed endless. It seemed to lead nowhere. As I ran I thought to myself how little I had ever tried to imagine what it would be like on that mysterious 'Other Side of the Moon' of which few of us earth-bound folk ever think as we look up at our warm Sun's rival or mistress as in his absence She shines down on us. I certainly never for a moment imagined that there could be a great plain of green grass up there without a sign of hills or rivers. I hadn't expected anything like the extraordinary twilight through which I ran. Why, if the Sun had sunk for the night and I was on the Moon and not under the Moon was there no moon-light?

Then, all in a moment, there rose before me an enormous Castle. I had not seen it before. It had not been on any horizon. But there it was! And as I reached its gate I saw to my absolute astonishment that I was not unexpected. A group of people as ordinary-looking as myself came running to greet me. 'Oh thank goodness! There you are!' cried one. 'Lilith be praised! You've come at least!' cried another. 'You are indeed a good runner!' cried a third. They all hustled me in, through a great archway, and up four great steps, into a spacious waiting-room or cloak-room or ante-room, and here they surrounded me while I sat down on a bench and clasping the handle of my stick 'Jane' with both my hands I tapped a little tune upon the marble floor. The tune I tapped was 'Drink to me only with thine eyes', and I thought of Thisbe, so desperately that I could hardly bear it.

A moment later, however, a young man, about my own height and I would guess about my own age, came boldly up to me and sat down by my side. He and I were now alone on that bench which gave him a natural advantage over the others to draw me into conversation.

'I expect you don't quite realize,' he said, 'who we are that come crowding into this Castle. We are the souls of people from Earth who are at this moment fast asleep in our beds in various mental homes in London. Yes, most of us, including myself, are at this moment fast asleep in Lunatic Asylums and Mad-Houses. It is the magnetic power of the Queen of this Castle that brings us here. And this is indeed natural and right, because it was the Moon’s magnetic power that originally disturbed our minds. In the old days when they used to chain and beat mad people — just think of the cruelty of that! — nobody ever referred to the Moon. Then by degrees — I wish I could tell you the exact date — the curious expression “Moon-kissed” came into use. I am tempted to think’ — here the young man bent his head towards me and spoke in a low voice— ‘that the expression “Moon-kissed” combined with the use of the word “Lunatic”, for everyone knows that Luna is Latin for the Moon, has done a lot of harm to the proper curing of our troubled minds. What they ought to do, what all Doctors ought to do, is to find out from each of us afflicted ones what we ourselves can remember of the origin of our complaint. For, as you know, in many cases the trouble goes back to childhood. In fact in some cases it goes back to babyhood. Some of us were born insane. But what I feel is that if only the Moon had been kept out of it altogether and our cure had been left to doctors of the old-fashioned kind who had known our family from the beginning and had realized the particular twists and turns in the minds of our parents that would be liable to increase or diminish any insane tendency in their — O! She’s coming! She’s coming! She’s coming!’ At this cry all the young people round me, and there were girls as well as boys in the crowd, fell on their knees, the boy who had been instructing me among them, and clasping their hands in prayer lifted them above their heads. I didn’t follow their example, but I acted in my own manner just as reverently. In fact I went down on all fours and tapped the paving stones with my forehead. But when the Queen was really before me I couldn’t help lifting up my head and gazing at her. She was the Moon herself! Yes, she was Luna! She was a loveliness so unique that, sane as you might be, and self-contained as you might be, you could only with your head rising up from your neck, like a four-legged animal in the presence of an archangel, stare the soul out of your body.

CHAPTER XII

THE GODDESS WHO now appeared was simply the Moon transformed into a Woman. Her arms and legs, her breasts and belly, were simply extensions of the Moon; and the floods of hair that swung and swayed and scattered and soared and foamed and flickered and floated about her head were wavering waterfalls of moonlight.

She led us up a flight of nine steps into an enormous hall and then she herself departed. The arch under which she went looked as if it led to a corridor that sloped up and down with an undulation that resembled the ebb and flow of a tide on a beach. But what an experience it was to encounter all her crazy courtiers after her departure! I saw my boy instructor among them and I hurried up to him. 'Do introduce me,' I begged, 'to some of the weirdest and oddest of all these souls — well, not of the damned but of the de-humanized.'

My friend answered at once by leading me to a female figure who was standing alone in dead silence with her face to the wall. 'She always stands like that,' he said. 'Yes, for horns and hours. She thinks if she waits long enough a door will open in that wall and lead her into her father's prison. He was imprisoned for making incestuous love to her which in his trial he claimed was her desire and not his. But the Judge disregarded all he said and condemned him to a year's imprisonment.'

'How do they get her to eat and sleep?' I asked.

'O very easily,' he said. 'She does everything they tell her to do as long as when she has done it they let her go back to that wall.'

'Does she always stand in the same place?'

‘Exactly. She knows it, they say, by the squashed body of a beetle or spider or bug or daddy-long-legs in that particular place. But she sleeps and eats quite properly.’

‘Is her father still in prison?’

‘O no! He’s been out for years; but he was scared to come and visit her here. And now he’s dead. He died in Italy a month ago.’

‘What is that man over there doing to his head?’

‘O, he thinks he’s the Devil and has got horns. He’s always trying to stick bits of wood into his skull. Our Doctor found him once with a hammer and a big nail but he gave him as a punishment for that such a long day in bed that he has left nails and hammers alone. But his last trick was to tear down a pair of stag-horns from our Reverend Rector’s study. But he couldn’t find any way of fastening them to the top of his head. So I expect what he is doing is trying to stick a couple of bits of wood on the top of his skull by the use of some sort of glue.’

‘But my dear friend,’ I said boldly to my young instructor, ‘how did it come about that you yourself were given a place in this crowd of maniacs?’

The youth came close up to me after hearing this question and whispered his answer. ‘You see I alone know that in a certain number of years, long anyway before I’m dead, it will be my destiny to be transformed into a sea-gull. Of course I don’t know how the change will come about, whether I shall feel a tickling all over me before my feathers come out, and whether the sprouting of wings from my shoulders will hurt like hell and even perhaps cause blood to flow. No! I have no idea how it will happen. But happen before I am thirty I know that it will.’

‘How and when’, I whispered, ‘did you first become conscious of the destiny awaiting you?’

‘O that’s easy to tell,’ replied the youth. ‘I used, like most boys, to love throwing stones. One day when I was walking along the edge of the cliffs between Weymouth and Lulworth I saw two sea-gulls beginning to make the particular movements which I knew were a sign that they were already bringing food for some little sea-gulls hidden far back in a deep slit between two massively flat slate-shaped stones. I threw a stone and hit one of them and hurt it. Its mate — I never knew which of them was the male and which the female — helped it to lie down very gently on the lower one of the two stones at the entrance to where their little ones lay snug and warm. I looked down at it from above wondering if there was anything I could do for it. And suddenly I became aware that it was talking to me in broken English. “You can do nothing for me,” it said, answering my thoughts. “But when you come to die you will die in my form, and that will be before you are thirty.” This information,’ my friend went on, ‘upset me so much that I set off at a run back towards Weymouth; nor did I stop until the cliffs ended at the Coastguard Cottages and the beginning of Lodmore.’

‘Did nothing,’ I asked him, still keeping my voice as slow as I could, though I was beginning to get very excited at what I was hearing, ‘ever suggest to you that one day you would be drawn up by some kind of magic to the Other Side of the Moon?’

The lad made a very curious gesture; the sort of gesture an animal might make if commanded by an enchanter to change its skin into the skin of a different animal. ‘Don’t you see, my good sir — by the way you must tell me presently where you yourself come from! — that none of us lunatics or moon-kissed ones decided to come here. Nor are we really and truly here at all. We are, as Shakespeare says, “such stuff as dreams are made of”. In fact, when we wake up we shall find ourselves in our beds in our native cities upon the Earth. Do, for Heaven’s sake, my good sir, get into your head that you are the only one here in your normal body! I know that you can touch us and that we can touch you and talk to you as I am doing now; but do please remember that we are only dreaming about you, whereas to you, who are not dreaming, we seem real people, not the shadowy phantoms that we actually are.'

'I can't believe,' I murmured, 'that you and I aren't equally real. It frightens me to think that we're as different as that.'

'What you don't understand,' said my friend resolutely, 'is the power of the Moon.'

Just as if she had come to prove the Truth of his words there was the Moon before us again!

She was entirely her own momentous magic. She wasn't just a goddess or a queen who inhabited a Satellite of the Earth or of the Sun. She was herself the whole of this extraordinary light. And oh! the difference between her light and the light of the Sun! The light of the Sun sometimes overpowers us by its heavenly heat, but it is always adding new life to our life, new spirit to our spirit, new happiness to our happiness. Yes, it is always pouring its incredible strength unto us, always healing us with the essence of all terrestrial life, always sharing its own celestial exultation with us and its own unspeakable power of living wholly, utterly, absolutely, abysmally in every single moment of time. It is as if the Sun by separate supreme acts of its godlike Being endowed each part of each one of us with its own outrushing energy, so that our hands, our feet, our back, our front, the brain in our head, the passion in our heart, all get the feeling that they have the power to stretch out to the uttermost ends of the universe. But oh! how different it is with the Moon. The Moon does not want to give us anything. It wants, or She wants, to fill us with longings for the impossible, for the unattainable, for desperate adventures in regions too remote ever to have been visited before. She wants to make us feel irrepressible yearnings to actually stand in the very heart of the blazing Sun, to actually sleep at rest in some undiscovered ultimate valley amid her own inaccessible mountains. She wants to make us suffer a loathing for all the familiar ways of the people we know best, for all the teasing and silly opinions of our nearest and dearest. She wants to make us hate the road from our house to our town, to detest the path from our drive-gate to our front door, to feel a sick disgust at the way our Dad munches his bread and cheese or our Mummy sips her tea.

As I saw the Moon appear again when I was discussing her captive souls with my young stone-thrower it seemed to me as though I were watching her suck up in a whirling sequence of moon-lit air-waves all the heartaches of a generation of tantalized and frustrated youngsters. Moonlight upon tree-trunks, moonlight upon tree-tops, moonlight upon far-drifting, wide-scattering, down-flowing, faith-fooling, hope-mocking Estuaries of Illusion, that is what I saw, moaning water that was for ever losing its way in a never-fulfilled craving to reach the sea.

Vaguely was I trying to transform this moment of spiritual defeat into some sort of natural, patient, unswerving, obstinate resolve to fling the turgid temptings of the Moon to the devil and just be myself and fear nobody and suppress all fits and starts. ‘Oh!’ I sighed to myself. ‘If I could only have a word with Um and Mum in the blessed Emptiness outside of Space and Time!’ For once in my fantastic life this wish of mine, the most natural wish any troubled creature could have, the wish to get in touch with its mother, was gratified. Mum’s voice reached me from the outside Emptiness. ‘Don’t get too agitated, old son,’ her voice said. ‘Your father and I are watching what’s happening.’ So those two knew what I was going through! ‘O mother,’ I cried without words, ‘so you are still there! And you both know all about me!’

Then I decided, calmly, definitely, firmly, what I would do. Whether mother and father put it into my head or not I don’t know. Perhaps they did. They often used to teach me in that way. Anyhow I decided that I would go straight back to where my fellow-travellers were and face Mo. I would tell him that I intended to oust him from his command of the ‘Cork’, as little Theophil had named our monstrous vessel, and take command of it myself. The staggering boldness of this decision nearly stunned me; but I told myself that I would have a brief talk with Thisbe first; but whether she agreed or not, I would fight Mo till one or other of us was finally done for; and, if I won, I would make the engineer take us all back to London.

I said goodbye to my friend and got his address from him, which it was a relief to me to find was not in what nowadays is called a ‘Mental Home’, but was an actual house, not very far from where little Theophil’s parents lived. Then I went to have my talk with Thisbe. As I went I realized what the love of a girl can be to a man. Her body becomes like the whole world to him. In fact he resents the use of the word ‘love’ to describe his feelings. At least that is what I felt as I hurried across those interminable green fields to reach our singular camp. I felt angry with the word ‘love’. I associated it with St Paul who re-invented the Trinity which Jesus had destroyed when on the Cross he cried his fatal ‘Eloi! Eloi! Lama Sabachthani?’

‘My God! My God! Why hast thou forsaken me?’ and when I am sure he said to himself, ‘There is no God. I have prayed to him all my life as my Father, but now I know that he does not exist.’

‘Is it?’ I said to myself, ‘just the thought of my parents looking after me, or is it some magical strength that they deliberately have conveyed to me from their heavenly Emptiness beyond all this atomic space that makes me feel as I do? If this extraordinary power that I feel at this moment where Thisbe is concerned, a power to take her to the uttermost limit of space, yes and out beyond to where my parents are, a real actual power? I feel as if it is. But is it possible that it really can be?

And then it came over me that I had never, never since I left my father and mother, never since I found little Theophil and then rushing on through wall after wall and house after house came upon Thisbe, excited the full power that was in me. All I did was to collect all the people I knew and make them listen to Mo's performance. And what about my private behaviour with Mo? I had imagined him skinning me alive and eating my raw flesh with diabolic satisfaction; but did he imagine that alone? All I did with him, in any case, was to be as submissive to his wicked will as I could, with the idea no doubt at the back of my mind to lead him on to wickedness piled upon wickedness and cruelty added to cruelty. But then, as I walked back over those green fields, I did remember with a certain ironical amusement at myself that during all that imaginary torture I was not entirely free from a guilty and unpardonable sharing with Mo the sadistic emotion in which he was revelling at my expense. Was the mere contact with Mo, then, enough to make me share his wickedness? Did such an inexhaustible stream of sadistic cruelty stream out from Mo into the surrounding air that it doubled, trebled, quadrupled every faintest tinge of such feeling that lurked in all those who approached him? Was Lady Boomerang herself perhaps affected by it?

Yes, there was Thisbe waiting for me! Had she guessed, had she divined, what was happening in my mind? What strange things go on between a man and the girl he's in love with, or for whom, I would prefer to say, he has a mania. They know each other through and through, but in such different ways — O in such completely different ways. As differently as a Painter would know anyone compared with the knowing of a Musician! Or we could say as differently as a Chemist compared with an Ironmonger. I saw Venus the Evening Star the night after we landed. She was among the uppermost branches, or rather twigs, of a gigantic Sycamore, and I couldn't help wondering in the odd way I have whether this contact must have happened again and again as the tree grew up, and whether there had come to be a mysterious magnetic link between this far-away star and the uppermost twigs of this tree. And if so, was it with stars and trees as it is with women and men; namely that the tree felt towards the star feelings wholly different from those that the star felt towards the tree?

When I reached the camp, and rushing through it seized Thisbe and embraced her, the strange, wild, mad thought seized me that before taking her anywhere, for I knew that the power was in me to take her anywhere, the more I knew (and with all my clasping of Thisbe I never for a moment lost my hold upon 'Jane' my stick) the more I knew that I didn't want to fly straight to my parents in the land of Divine Emptiness outside Space — what I wanted to do was to fly with Thisbe to that portion of the Emptiness whence my enemy Mo had appeared.

O if only I could find Mo's parents, wouldn't I 'lam them' what wrong they had done to the Universe by producing such a Devil as Mo! I had the feeling as I held the girl tight to my heart that to take her to my mother would in some mysterious way separate us; while to take her on a sort of world-wide crusade against that incarnate Devil Mo would bring back to me the feeling I had when in London I read the Bible for the first time and told myself that I would have loved to be 'the Lord of Hosts' who helped Moses to save the Israelites from Pharaoh.

It must have been a weird experience for Thisbe to discover that her quiet-looking boy-friend had the power to fly with her through Space; and indeed I felt a tiny bit surprised at it myself but not very much, and not for very long. My precious Um-Mum, my Two-in-One father and mother, had taught me a great deal that I never realized, while they were doing it, that they were teaching me. And certainly one of the most important of these things was the power of being able to pass through anything, not only through walls and houses and rocks and ramparts but also through the air and across the sea.

‘Where are you taking me, my friend?’ Thisbe murmured at last when we had left both the Sun and the Moon behind. ‘I’m taking you,’ I answered, to the land I’ve told you about where my Mother and Father live; but not straight to them, for I want to see if I can find the parents of Mo.’

‘To fight with them, I suppose,’ whispered the discerning Thisbe. ‘It’s a pity,’ I said quietly, as we passed Orion’s Belt and moved swiftly towards the Milky Way, ‘that I didn’t dare to say goodbye to little Theophil. She’ll wonder where we both have gone.’

‘She won’t give it a thought,’ Thisbe replied. ‘Babies of that age don’t notice what people are doing unless they see them doing it.’

‘O you’re so wrong there,’ I whispered back, my voice as low as if I had been fearful that little Theophil might hear me. ‘Theophil will divine with the premonition that children of that age possess,’ pronounced Thisbe in a firm and, as I thought rather satisfied voice, ‘that you didn’t want to disturb her peace of mind by making her realize the enormous stellar journey you were taking.’

‘What she would have wanted to do,’ I said, ‘would be to have come with us! But what would poor Mrs Lockitite have felt if I had taken away her only offspring?’

‘I agree,’ said Thisbe, in a resigned but rather sad voice. ‘I guess we’ve got to consider mothers a bit. But you’re not considering your mother very much, are you, since you’re carrying me to the opposite end of the region where she lives?’

I became silent. The sound of such words, whose echo seemed to be following us as we rushed through Space, troubled me not a little. Was it an instinctive male superstition in me which was making me feel that before carrying my girl to visit my mother it was essential that I should achieve some undertaking worthy of the meeting of these two? It very likely was just that; but on I soared, bearing her to the end of Space.

CHAPTER XIII

IT WAS AN extraordinary experience for me and a still more startling one for my lovely Thisbe when after leaving the Sun and the Moon and the Milky Way behind we came to the border of Space. Looking back we could just see the glitter of stars, faint, faint, faint, in the remote distance; while looking forward we could see nothing, absolutely nothing. There was no sky, no sea, no land, no clouds, no mists, no vapours. And yet it was by no means dark. That would be, as I knew well, the difficult thing to describe to my London friends if ever I saw them again. But as most of my London friends were themselves experiencing a strange adventure, in being, with their houses and gardens and many feet of suburban soil, grounded on the shore of the Other Side of the Moon and now, very now, occupied in making a camp for themselves on that magic-breathing orb, while the bloodcurdling Mo, the Master and Captain of the 'Cork' as little Theophil had christened it, looked down upon all from his elevated post on the highest mast, none of them were likely to be surprised by any wonder.

I must have forgotten one thing about my home in the aboriginal Emptiness, namely the fact that it has neither the darkness of Earth's night nor the brightness of Earth's day. It has a curious atmospheric twilight that never changes or alters for a moment. There is no light of day. There is no darkness of night. The prevailing twilight is not as dark as our twilight, whether before sunrise or after sunset. It is lighter than either of those are. I had no idea that the region furthest away from where my parents lived and gave birth to me was exactly similar in this respect to ours, but so I now found it. I confess I experienced not only excitement but several spasms of sheer terror as I flew with Thisbe in my arms out of Space and into this enormity of emptiness. It is true I was distinctly conscious of faint but unmistakable waftures of endearment and encouragement from Um-and-Mum; but this sympathy on the air never for a moment enabled me to forget the horror to which I was advancing, namely to encounter face to face the parents of the Devil Mo! What would they — I mustn't say 'what on earth would they' — be like, these parents of Mo? I had not long to wait to find out. We had only just discovered that it was unnecessary for me to fly any more, if my rush through Space could be called flying, and that we could now walk side by side in the aboriginal emptiness although there was nothing to walk upon. All this was so natural to me, as I took Thisbe's hand and as we walked together, that I was a little surprised at first at the girl's hesitating step, but feeling, as I say, my parents' encouragement wafted to me from the other end of Nothingness, I was soon able to communicate my ease of mind to the girl with whom I walked. But, as I have already hinted, it was not long before the great shock came. There, suddenly, right in front of us, was a group of the most unholy figures I have ever seen. The three central ones — but there were many more — resembled my parents in the way they were connected with each other. Thisbe's hand tightened in mine and I gripped hers as tightly as I could without hurting it, and we just stood and stared. So also, very soon, did the figures in front of us, but not at once, for they were too absorbed in what they were doing to notice us quite as quickly as we had noticed them. But what a sight they were! There were three of them; but I could detect, just as with Um-and-Mum, that they were physically united; yes! they were parts of one another, like Siamese twins. It was lucky we saw them some few minutes before they saw us, for we were able to take them in, in a way that would have been impossible otherwise. And there was certainly something to see.

Before us were three monstrous creatures joined together into one appalling Being. The biggest of these creatures was evidently a male. He had an oval head and face and both these were covered with thick short grey hairs. He had one eye and one mouth, but no nose at all; and his ears were enormous and had curves like those of a shell-fish. Head, face and ears were white, and the short, thick, grey hairs that covered them looked as if they could pierce the skin of any living thing against which the creature butted. This creature had an organ of generation which kept fumbling towards a reciprocal orifice in the body of a female creature whose head and face, although totally devoid of hair, were as white as his own and possessed mouth, eye and ears of a similar appearance. The third of the creatures into which this appalling monster was divided was much smaller than the other two, but he resembled them in everything except that he was much more active. He was perpetually guiding the organ of generation of the male creature towards its proper destination; and he was also busily occupied in assisting the bowels of both male and female by certain caressing motions applied outwardly to their respective flanks to deliver themselves of excrement which took the form of small lively little Beings who as soon as they appeared began skipping about and displaying a terrific zest for life. It was these little Beings, composed of the excrement of both the male and female creatures but acting like little men and women absorbed in dancing a complicated dance, who proved to be the first topic of the inevitably hostile exchange that took place between us.

‘Not a step nearer, you two, or I’ll charge at you and butt you to death! Don’t you see that our darling little Titterly-tidlings are dancing their “cry-and-run” dance? Where have you come from, you two, and what do you want here? If our son Moloch were here he’d soon eat you up! But my wife Gobba, and I King Glomp, have to be careful what we eat. What goes in and what comes out is the great question with us. You two, I can see, are ambassadors from some other world, some Space-world I expect, for you've both got that restless, unhappy, unsatisfied, unfulfilled, uncompleted Space-look. Perhaps you've come here hoping to be eaten up? Have you? Have you? But it will be necessary to trample you to death first. For Gobba and I will have to spice you and slice you and sludge you and nudge you and wudge you and cudge you very delicately before we two, King Glomp and Queen Gobba, can decide how far we can go. O if only our son Moloch were here! He would be much less fussy, wouldn't he, Gobba? Wouldn't he, Lob-lottery? Wouldn't he, you darling little Titterly-tidlings?'

Thisbe and I couldn't help exchanging a quick glance when we heard the name of the busy inaugurator of human-shaped excrement, and of the lively little persons thus evoked; and I felt I had to say something. 'How long, your Majesty,' I enquired, 'will these little Titterly-Tidlings live?'

This question must have angered King Glomp considerably for he made a motion as if to bend his bristly head and rush at us, but the all-seeing Lob-lottery stopped him with a hand on his shoulder. So far I have only spoken of the upper portion of Glomp's body with its three heads and six arms and three white faces, but to complete the spectacle that one day I pray I'll live to describe to Um-and-Mum when I go to present Thisbe to them, I must speak of his stomach and legs. These were as hairy as his head and they were as white as his three faces, if I may regard his wife Gobba and their lively triad Lob-lottery, both such independent creatures, as living parts of him, but they were like the legs of a man, not of a bull or a gorilla, and his feet were exactly like the feet of a man, only much larger. They were in fact so large as to be out of all proportion to his height, but not of course to his size, as we have to consider Queen Gobba and Help-mate Lob-lottery. What made it so very difficult to rush at King Glomp with 'Jane' my big-handled stick, was the presence of those little Titterly-tidlings who, though their bodies were composed of the monster's excrement, had such darling little faces and such lovely little bare arms and bare legs, that whatever you might feel about their origin it was impossible not to feel gentle to them as they were now and unwilling to give them the shock of seeing their Lord attacked.

'I expect we'd better depart,' murmured Thisbe. 'I suppose we must,' I replied, trying to focus my attention on the Titterly-tidlings and trying to avoid looking at Glomp or Gobba or Lob-lottery.

It was then that I had the most decisive experience of my life. It was then that I heard, without any doubt or any question as to its authenticity, the voice of Um-and-Mum. It wasn't just a wafted sound or a vibratory motion of the air. It was their voice or their voices just as their help, advice, instruction, affection used to surround me when I lived with them. Then I realized that being as I was now in the Ultimate Emptiness, beyond all Space and all its lives and atoms, the presence of Um-and-Mum as near as the folk in London are near to the folk in their next-door dwelling, was quite natural. 'What is it, father?' I said. 'What is it, mother?' I said. And what do you think they told me? They told me that Mo had taken the whole convoy of passengers that he and his inspired engineers had brought to the other side of the Moon and had steered them back to the Earth and to London from whence they had come. But they added that they wished to warn me — sad though it was to them to tell this since I had not brought my girl-friend to see them — that Mo was now perpetually petting and cuddling little Theophil and they feared that he would have so beguiled her mind on the journey that when he got her back to London he would proceed to ravish her and probably to strangle her. 'Even at this distance,' they concluded, 'we can read his thoughts, because he was born in Emptiness, and if you want to save that child you must stop thinking about seeing us till much later when you will, we both hope, have finished off this horrible Mo for good and all.’

CHAPTER XIV

I FAITHFULLY RELATED to Thisbe as we turned our backs on King Glomp and Queen Gobba and their help-mate Lob-lottery and those lovely little Titterly-tidlings made out of excrement, all that my parents had told me. After a brief lowvoiced colloquy between us it was decided that we must give up attempting to see my parents on this trip and fly as fast as possible to the other side of the Moon to make sure that nobody had been left behind; and if there was nobody there, make our way as fast as possible to London to save Theophil from the clutches of Mo.

There was nobody left on the other side of the Moon and I didn't even catch sight of the new friend I had made there, at which I felt relieved, for I hoped when I next saw him it would be upon Earth. So then we flew on; although I had Thisbe in my arms I managed to fly so fast that we actually reached London before the 'Cork' arrived. It was then that I clasped 'Jane' by her horny handle which must have been like the curved horns of a baby-stag and set out with Thisbe ta my side, for the air-port where this astonishing vessel would — I can hardly say 'land' but be grounded at the outskirts of the usual landing place.

I was so much in love with Thisbe and I had reached such a point of identity with her that I felt as if we had lived together for a thousand years. It was quite a different emotion from any of the ordinary surges and urges and purges of sexual passion. She felt everything through my feelings for people and things and I felt everything through her feelings for people and things. In fact I've often thought, although I can't remember any actual case of its happening so, that in my dreams when I am sleeping alone I must sometimes imagine that I am the young man Um and sometimes imagine that I am the young girl Thisbe.

In my mind as we now walked slowly along the edge of the waterfront throbbed the question of how we could permanently rescue little Theophil from Mo. ‘Only by death,’ I kept saying to myself. ‘Only by killing the fellow.’

And the thought came to me as I pondered on the question as to how I would kill him, that it would be silly to do it with a sword or a gun, as I should then be arrested by London policemen, put into prison and probably be condemned to be hanged.

‘I think the best thing to do,’ I said to Thisbe, ‘would be to persuade Mo, in some way or another, to enter a row-boat with us, and then when once we’d got some distance from shore, to upset the boat and drown the devil! I’m taking for granted, my dear, that you can swim. Am I right there?’

‘Oh yes!’ she replied. ‘I can swim all right. I learnt when I was eight or nine in the Isle of Wight. But if we get too far from the shore we may all drown.’

‘Well, my dear,’ was my comment on that remark, ‘you and I might do worse than to die saving Theophil from Mo.’

Thisbe pressed my arm and said no more. We were however by this time getting near the place where the ‘Cork’ would ground her keel and her passengers disembark; and I said to Thisbe, ‘What about hiring a boat now before the “Cork” arrives, so that we can have it ready? It must be about noon by now. We might hire it for the afternoon.’ Thisbe pointed at a couple of fishermen who were emptying a small boat of their latest catch. I went straight up to them and asked them whether they would lend me their boat for a couple of hours as I wanted to take someone who was arriving in rather a queer vessel a little distance from the proper landing stage for a row. ‘I’ll bring it back in a couple of hours — three at the most —,’ I told them, ‘and I’ll pay in advance if you like.’

They exchanged a glance at this last remark. And after a moment’s colloquy they named the sum, which I immediately handed over to them, and Thisbe and I stepped into the boat which was very dirty and smelt very strongly of sea-weed and dead fish. There were two pairs of oars, but I made Thisbe sit at the helm and steer, while I seized one pair and placed the others carefully under the two seats. It was not long before we were out in deep water, a good distance from the ordinary landing stage, and as close as we thought it wise to be, to some planks and posts along the water’s edge, near the place where we expected the ‘Cork’ to descend.

For once in my life I had judged correctly. We had hardly waited there for a quarter of an hour when we saw the monstrous vessel descending.

Its appearance in the air, before it was nearly down, had already attracted quite a crowd; some of whom were talking excitedly to one another, gesticulating with their hands, nodding and shaking their heads, while others were staring upwards and pointing upwards. Thisbe let her hands, still holding the helm, subside into a less agitated grip, while I pulled in my pair of oars till they were crossed in front of my chest. Then we two lifted our heads and looked up.

Down came the ‘Cork’ -, and we could clearly see the figure of Mo walking up and down the top deck and every now and then leaning over the rail and looking down, and then quickly straightening his back, lifting his head, and shouting his orders.

Then, while we were both of us standing erect near each other, in the centre of the boat, the ‘Cork’ had grounded; and down a long, broad landing plank all the passengers hurried, to be greeted with acclamation by the people who had come to welcome them. I would have found it vastly entertaining to watch them all leading, led by Lord and Lady Boomerang, if I had not had Mo so fatally on my mind. What I was clutching now was not an oar. It was my stick ‘Jane’.

They all came with a wild rush, just as if, which was of course what they had done, they had descended from the sky. Poppity Pipstick with Tickly Duck came first after the Boomerangs. Then came Colonel Katterventicle and Professor Porpustle. Then there were Mr and Mrs Lockitite with Mo himself just behind them carrying little Theophil in his arms. The child kept turning round and asking her mother something, a ‘something’ which, as I listened, seemed to have to do with Mo. It was probably to ask her whether Mo might carry her home. Then came Mr and Mrs Runnerini, followed by Mrs Cloddie Smith and Jane Fixem, and last of all came Charlotte Wiggle and Lullaby Skim, followed by a couple of obviously flirtatious engineers who from what I could catch as the two girls turned to speak to them, had already got permission to see them home.

As soon as they were all on shore I called loudly to little Theophil. ‘Come in our boat, my dear!’ I cried. Mr Mo can carry you! We’ll take you both!’ The little girl recognized me at once, and as I expected the sight of the boat excited her and she pulled at Mo’s collar to make him obey us. I took off my cap to Mrs Lockitite, who glanced at Thisbe with obvious relief, feeling that her little girl would be safe with her; and after a few words with each other the two Lockitites waved to their little daughter and went off.

So now the supreme moment of my life had come. We were all four in the fisherman’s boat, Thisbe and Theophil and Mo and I; and Thisbe and I leapt to our feet. It was all over with amazing speed. Thisbe and I by desperately trampling on the side of our boat managed, as we had hoped, to tip it over. The water was deep. I snatched the child, as we did this, from Mo’s arms. The boat turned upside down and we were all in the water. ‘Where is Mo?’ I gasped, holding little Theophil’s head above the water, and swimming with both legs, while with the thumb of the hand that held up the child I still clutched my stick, ‘Where’s MO?’

‘He’s gone down,’ stammered Thisbe. ‘O try to hold her higher!’ At the words ‘gone down’ I could feel a sobbing in that little three-year-old throat; and as I carried her up our beach with Thisbe at our side I remembered — though how I had found out I had completely forgotten — that Mo couldn’t swim.

It was only six months later that Thisbe and I were married, with little Theophil, aged four, as her bridesmaid and Professor Porpustle giving her away. I had even managed to persuade Colonel Katterventicle to be my Best Man. And during the whole ceremony I seemed to hear the combined voices of Um-and-Mum giving us their blessing.

Topsy-Turvy

THE GREY ARMCHAIR gazed across the little room at the Brown Armchair. They were in opposite corners; the grey one in the south corner and the brown one in the north corner of the room.

‘Whirlwind and Whirlpool have left us quiet today,’ said Mr Grey Armchair.

‘I don’t think it’ll last long,’ replied Mrs Brown Armchair, ‘I seem to feel a certain motion of air coming in through the sides of the window.’

‘I hope,’ said Mr Grey Armchair, ‘that they won’t carry Topsy way again. I don’t at all like seeing her whirled down our little square and carried over the wall into the green field. And it must be awful for Turvy. I saw him make a queer jerk when it happened last time just as he was going to shut the door.’

‘He can’t shut the door you know,’ said Mrs Brown Armchair, ‘because it won’t shut after all those frantic jerks he once made to try and hold her back. It sort of closes, but it has never shut properly since then.’

‘Poor Turvy!’ sighed Mr Grey Armchair. ‘How queer life in our room is! If it weren’t for these visits of Whirlwind and Whirlpool we’d be fairly happy. Of course we never can be perfectly happy because of our own different views of things; but how quaint it is that we should all have souls that can move about and go away and return! Life in our room is indeed a strange thing. How it began we have no idea. How it will end we have no idea. Well, I suppose we must take it as it comes; but I can’t help being sorry for Turvy when Topsy is in danger of being carried off, or at any rate when he thinks she is.'

'But don't you understand, you two silly old Armchairs,' said the Rocking-Chair that was under the picture of a Little Girls' Party which bore the name of Topsy and close to the door-handle which bore the name of Turvy, 'that it needs more experience of the Universe outside this little room of ours than either of you two have had, to understand these games of whirlwinds and whirlpools. I must have told you both thousands of times already that I, who was created in America out of materials purchased in New York City, am not in the least disturbed by the wild behaviour of these two lovers, one the soul of a pretty little picture and the other the soul of a jerky black door-handle. I was brought over here on a three-decked liner, so I know much more about the Great World outside this tiny little room than either of you do. And so, I warrant, you do also,' the Rocking-Chair went on, addressing the Carpet under all their feet which had come from Bokhara.

'I do! I do! I do!' cried the Carpet in a shrill little voice that sounded like the combined voices of a dozen baby mice. 'I know much more than those silly old Armchairs!'

It was at this moment that the great white Book-Case, with its six shelves full of books reaching from floor to ceiling, saw fit to intervene.

'What all you lively and quarrelsome folk seem to have quite forgotten,' the Book-Case announced, with its books from floor to ceiling supporting it, 'is that no one, in any civilized house in this country, can argue sensibly about pretty little pictures and competent door-handles, least of all a rocking-chair from New York City, without a deep and subtle knowledge of our Literature, especially of our Poetry, and of our famous translations of the Literature and Poetry of the ancient world. What do you say, Lemprière?' The great white Book-Case paused for a moment. 'What do you say, Aristophanes?' The top shelf shook as the BookCase uttered the first name, and the second shelf shook as it uttered the second name. Then, descending to its third shelf, it uttered in a still more creaking tone: 'What do you say, Walt Whitman?' Then, descending to the fourth shelf, Landor was called upon. At the fifth shelf Lady Charlotte Guest was implored to say something; and finally from the lowest shelf of all, nearly touching the floor, an American History of all the Red Indian tribes was called upon to lift up its voice; which it did with a vengeance, making the whole room rattle.

During this noise little Topsy slipped back into her place above the Rocking-Chair and whispered to Turvy. 'Don't 'ee mind, darling! I didn't let Whirlwind carry me as far as it wanted to. It wanted to carry me to where Whirlpool was waiting to swallow me up. But I was too clever for the wicked old whoremonger. I pretended I wanted to take off some of my clothes before being swallowed up, but I said I was too shy to do it before anybody, so I begged to be allowed to go into that little wood called Bushes Home. But once there of course I skedaddled, and soon got into Wash Lane and over the wall into our Turnstile Corner.'

The Rocking-Chair, whose head nearly touched the tiny little picture of a children's Party, which was the bodily presence of Topsy, thought to itself, as it glanced sideways at the now complacent Door-Handle, who was contentedly keeping the cantankerous door closed: 'I must send my soul jockeying out, along with old Bottom-Step tomorrow, and visit the chimney-top, across Turnstile Corner where Whirlwind's nest is. I have a sort of idea that if I gave that whirligig this bit of red braid that's always coming off when I scratch my back I might be permitted to be present at the swallowing of Topsy by Whirlpool. Nothing, oh nothing, would give me greater satisfaction than to see Topsy go down Whirlpool's throat. Oh how angry that little chit of a starveling makes me feel when I see her playing at being pretty till that idiot of a Turn-Handle grows crazy as he dotes upon her. He's a decent little blackguard in himself but why can't he see what we all think of that little bitch?' Sure enough when tomorrow came and it was about twelve o'clock midday and every soul in the little room upstairs was thinking of what it would do or pretend it was doing that afternoon, the soul of the Rocking-Chair clattered down the nine steps that led to Sideboard's parlour and Big Doll's and Little Doll's matrimonial bed.

'Ready to come out for a bit, Bottom-Step?' he said to the physically rather ponderous and mentally rather fuddy-duddy gentleman in question.

'Well,' responded the Step thoughtfully, 'it might make a fellow feel more comfortable. All right, I'll come!'

The nest of these two vast Whirlabouts was at the top of a tall chimney at Turnstile Corner, just opposite the House with Nine Steps; and as the soul of Bottom-Step lumbered along behind the soul of Rocking-Chair they raised their eyes to this tall chimney. Yes! Both Whirlwind and Whirlpool were wallowing in their wayward thoughts. As they wriggled round each other in the watery nest they had made for themselves from the warped windpipe of a dying wizard, Mrs Whirlwind was saying to Mr Whirlpool, 'I feel sure, my dear, I'll be able to get you another chance of swallowing Topsy, and if Turvy's after her I'll have a go at him myself next time.'

'A nice day, you two!' said the Rocking-Chair, looking up.

'All well at home I hope?' said Mrs Whirlwind.

'Our old Turnstile Corner gets quite a deal of traffic, don't it, these days,' said Mr Whirlpool. 'How are you feeling, friend Bottom-Step?'

'Ask them,' whispered the soul of the Rocking-Chair to the soul of the Bottom-Step, 'at what time of day would they have the easiest fling at this little bitch Topsy.'

'In case,' said the dunder-headed Step, 'we happened to be taking Topsy for a walk, what would be the time of day that you'd like most to greet her?'

Mrs Whirlwind whispered something to Mr Whirlpool to which he responded with an ogrish grin. 'My husband says about six in the evening,' Mrs Whirlwind replied. 'But, of course,' she went on 'in our small world nothing goes always quite according to any arranged plan.'

'They're thinking,' whispered old Bottom-Step to his companion, 'that however well we time it there's always a chance that the wench may slip off as she did before.'

'Well, we'll bring her to greet you about six, just as you say,' concluded the Rocking-Chair.

In her parlour Mrs Sideboard Chest-of-Drawers was contemplating Big Doll and Little Doll as they talked together sitting on their bed, which Master Big Doll had just assisted Missy Little Doll in making very tidy. They had slept late, or rather Master Doll had slept till ten; and from ten to twelve till Rocking-Chair came ncketty-cricketty down the nine stairs, they had been talking together while they made their bed tidy. Big Doll had been telling Little Doll about their first night together in Mrs Sideboard Chest-of-Drawers' parlour, when he had explained to her that he never would ravish her because he didn't want to have the anxiety their having children. 'When a Man-Doll as big as me,' he had told her, 'makes a Girl-Doll as little as you bear him children their tiny dolls become a great responsibility; whereas if Man-Doll and Girl-Doll just enjoy sleeping together without his ravishing her their life remains very happy and is free from all responsibility.'

'But perhaps,' Girl-Doll had replied, 'I should enjoy having a Baby Doll.' And at that reply, Man-Doll or Big-Doll remained silent while Girl-

Doll or Little-Doll gave vent to several deep sighs.

Neither of them had realized that Mrs Sideboard Chest-of-Drawers was listening to their conversation as she reposed at a height half-way to the ceiling, while their bed was so low that it was near to the floor.

‘Why was I so foolish,’ thought Mrs Sideboard-Chest-of-Drawers to herself, ‘as to adopt these kids when I came as a widow to this tiny house? Suppose they had decided to have a baby-doll what in heaven’s name would I have done then? They wouldn’t have known how to look after it and if it had died like my poor Tiny-Stool I should have perished with remorse.’

It was then that the great white Book-Case began addressing the King-Book in each of its six shelves:

‘What do you say, Lemprière?

‘What do you say, Aristophanes?

‘What do you say Walt Whitman?

‘What do you say, Landor?

‘What do you say, Lady Guest?

‘What do you say, Red Indians?’

The speeches which all the six celebrities uttered were so vigorous that it was impossible for the Book-Case that contained them to disentangle one from another, till finally the war-whoops of the Red Indians drowned them all.

‘I don’t wonder,’ said Mr Grey Armchair to Mrs Brown Armchair, ‘that our gold-headed Poker in the grate here is getting agitated by all this fuss. I saw him stand up straight just now, didn’t you, and begin to move, as if he would cross our fireplace from your side to mine.’

‘No,’ replied Mrs Brown Armchair, ‘I was so deafened myself by all this hullabaloo that I didn’t notice. Yes! by Saint Bartholomew you’re right! He’s clear across now and quite close to you! Look! Look! He’s coming back to my side again! What’s this you’re up to? Don’t you remember when I was little and Mother first got you I called you Excalibur because you made me think of King Arthur’s sword? Mother reminded me of that story the last time she was here. I couldn’t say Excalibur then, I called him Exy. Goodness! Where are you off to now, Exy?’

Both Armchairs jerked themselves a little forward, for to their astonishment they actually beheld Exy go thump, thump, thump, across the front of the great White BookCase till it reached the space of about a yard between BookCase and Door-Handle. Here it stopped and looked up at Topsy, the Picture just about a couple of feet above its head. It must have trodden into some slit in the Carpet at this point, for it remained happily balanced where it was, staring up at the Picture.

‘Isn’t it queer, my dear, that we should all have souls in this little world of ours?’ said Mrs Brown Armchair to Mr Grey Armchair. ‘I know we have, not only because of that day when we both went downstairs to see what the Doll’s Parlour on the ground-floor was like, but because the souls of Topsy the Picture and Turvy the Door-Handle have gone downstairs just now. I could feel their souls going with my soul, couldn’t you with yours?’

Mr Grey Armchair nodded; and then he added, ‘and not only their souls but the soul of your little Exy after them! His body may have got caught in the Carpet but his soul like that of old John Brown in the song goes marching on.’

‘There are souls, I suppose,’ said Mrs Brown Armchair, ‘in every material thing in the whole world. And the whole world itself,’ continued Mrs Brown Armchair, ‘has probably got a soul of its enormous own, as conscious of itself as the souls of Earth, Sun, Moon, and Stars are conscious of themselves; and I certainly from the deepest depths of my soul believe that one day, perhaps thousands upon thousands of years away, all the different souls in the entirety of infinite space will approach one another and join together in a universal Celebration of Soul-Life.'

While these prophetic talks went on between the two Armchairs a very different sort of conversation was going on between Big Doll and Little Doll as they sat upon their bed, side by side. They spoke in so low a voice, though it wasn't exactly whispering, that neither Mr Grey Armchair nor Mrs Brown Armchair could hear what they were saying.

'Why have you been so sad lately, my precious little one?' said Big Doll to Little Doll. 'I've noticed this sadness in you ever since the night I decided not to rape you. Do you want to be raped, my darling?'

'Of course not,' replied Little Doll. 'I know it hurts terribly to be raped. The Kitchen-Cupboard over there told me that it made a girl cry till she screamed, it hurt so much. But he also told me, long before I decided that I would agree to sleep with you, that it was the only way to have a baby unless you went to a hospital to be artificially and scientifically raped; and nothing would induce me to do that, I am terrified of hospitals.'

'I don't want a child,' said Big Doll. 'You are the only child I'll ever love. Gee whizz! Why, my precious, we might have a child who was a reincarnation of some monstrous ancestor whose delight was to go about ravishing, killing and eating up little boys and girls, an ancestor like Bluebeard! Oh how awful that would be! Or we might have a child that was so seraphically pure-minded and angelic that it would regard with horror and loathing the very thought that its parents had been sexually attracted to each other and had gone through the process that produces children.'

'But I want a baby! Oh how I want a baby! Take me! Take me! O Bibabug! Bibabug! I do want a baby so!'

'Well you can't have one, Sillysuck, you just can't have one! I've got a horror of ravishing a little girl as sweet as you. I simply couldn't do it! It would be to me just what going to a hospital is to you. I refuse to do it. Surely we can be happy, loving each other and playing together, like we do, I with my what-do-you-call-it, and you with your what-do-you-call-it, both deliciously excited and tossing up and down, without going to this awful extreme of rending your virginity and making it bleed. I couldn't do it, I tell you. I've a horror of doing it.'

Sillysuck gave vent to a sigh so deep that it made her shiver from head to foot; and for a moment she thought in her heart, 'Suppose I let somebody else rape me, couldn't we both pretend that Bibabug had done it?' Big Doll heard this sigh; but if anybody had told him that Little Doll had actually for a moment considered the possibility of somebody else ravishing her he wouldn't have believed it. He would have even said to the Holy Ghost, if It had told him, 'You are a bloody liar!'

2

'Two days have gone by, haven't they, dearest, since we talked about that little girl Topsy who fooled us so?'

Thus spake Mrs Whirlwind to Mr Whirlpool as they sat in their nest in the top of the chimney on the house at the end of Turnstile Corner, just where the road curved round.

'Yes,' replied Mr Whirlpool, 'I've about given up all hope of swallowing that sweet morsel. Besides, after her narrow escape, isn't it extremely unlikely that she'll run such a risk again?'

'But you see, my dear,' said Mrs Whirlwind, 'that child Topsy has got a brother or a lover, or perhaps both-in-one, called Turvy who is a very spirited lad, so I have been told, and you know the confidence girls have in boys. Of course they are wrong to have such confidence, because, as anybody knows who has watched such a pair from our nest up here, it's the other way round; I mean it’s the boy who ought to have confidence in the girl, for all girls are much wiser than all boys.’

‘That’s my old gal’s mistake,’ thought Mr Whirlpool as he settled down comfortably in their chimney-top nest, telling himself that when he was digesting that sweet little morsel of a tender maid it would be easier than usual to admit in words to his formidable wife that he was wrong and she was right.

How are you two this cold evening?’ came a voice from below. They both looked down and there was the soul of the New York Rocking-Chair beneath them, looking up with what seemed quite a friendly interest in his dark eyes.

‘We are both very warm in our nest,’ replied Mrs Whirlwind. ‘We’ve got a splendid little Electric Heater up here that keeps us warm among our chimney-pots on the coldest nights. Won’t you come up, good sir, and sit here with us tor a bit? We know well who you are, for my husband and I have lived here since our marriage nearly half a century ago; and we know everybody round here.’

The soul of the Rocking-Chair muttered ‘Thank you very much. I will indeed come.’ Up he went and crouched down between them over their tiny Electric Heater. ‘O this is delicious,’ he gasped after an agreeable silence. ‘May I ask where you two came from before you settled here?’

‘We’ll soon tell him all we know about that, won’t we, hubby darling,’ said Mrs Whirlwind, delighted to see the pleasure with which the soul of the Rocking-Chair from New York crouched down over the little Electric Heater in their nest at the top of the tall chimney. ‘Well! My husband and I were born in Derbyshire, in a deep cave in the rocks above the River Dove. My husband was born in one cave and I was” born in another. As children we used to wander quite far among the crevices and defiles of a particular district of the Pennines and we used to play at being grownup married people with children of our own. There were the minnows and sticklebacks and newts and tadpoles that we found in the streams and kept in glass jars that we called aquariums.'

'Oh yes!' cried the soul of the Rocking-Chair, 'in the room on the ground floor of the house from which we come, the room nine steps down from the room which was my home, there is a kitchen cupboard full of precious things to eat. The cover of this cupboard used sometimes to fall off by its own weight, which was always a terrible distress to our Aunt Emma who looked after it. On the top of this cupboard there was a shelf up and down which Dick Turpin used to ride.' The soul of the Rocking-Chair was interrupted at this point by King Arthur's sword Excalibur, as the Brown Armchair and the Grey Armchair always allowed their golden-handled Poker to call himself. He had extricated himself from the hole in the Carpet where he had got stuck and had come thump, thump, thump, thump, down the nine steps from the room at the top.

'What are you doing up there?' cried the soul of the Poker to the soul of the Rocking-Chair.

'What the devil is that to you?' cried the soul of the Rocking-Chair in reply.

'They don't understand the Philosophy of Life, these things from the top room,' whispered Mrs Whirlwind to Mr Whirlpool. 'I think it comes from their living indoors like they do, instead of living out-of-doors as we do. You wait, hubby dear, till the souls of Topsy and Turvy come out of their house and walk to our end of Turnstile Corner! You shall have then, I swear to you, hubby darling, that sweet morsel of a girl to swallow, who escaped from us last time.'

‘But may there not be,’ said Turvy, ‘some mysterious Destiny talk about something that was called “Another Dimension”. Don’t you think, my treasure, that this is what it is, Another Dimension? I hope none of those people from our upper room will follow us here and I hope still more that that Whirlwind couple won’t come, or anybody from the ground floor room.’

‘I don’t believe they will!’ gasped Topsy, her voice quivering with excitement, alarm, love, wonder and bewilderment. Moved by an irresistible impulse they both simultaneously turned round to look back. No! there was clearly no possibility of anyone following them for the vast rock-pillars of adamantine stone between which they had come had joined together as if some colossal superhuman hands had united them. Behind Topsy and Turvy there was nothing but an unbroken, stupendous Pamphylian precipice whose top was lost in mist.

3

They both hurried on, thankful beyond words that after the turmoil of their life they were alone and together, however much-awed and thunderstruck by what they saw around them. Their path dissolved at once into what they saw. It was evidently only a kind of invitation from what they saw to enter into it and become part of it. What they saw around them was simply a mass of moving clouds, clouds that curved and curled and quivered and caracoled and circled and collapsed. The extraordinary thing about these clouds was that you could walk upon them! Yes! They had enough substance in them to hold a person up and enable a person not only to tread upon them but to lie down upon them. But Topsy and Turvy had not moved very far through this lively circus of encircling clouds before they looked at each other in bewildered astonishment. They were not alone! In every direction around them they beheld other human forms. The soul of Topsy, though her personality in their upstairs room had been a picture of little girls dancing, had taken care to clothe herself, when she went out with her lover, in appropriate and conventional girls' clothes. Turvy also, chough he knew that his real self was the black handle of a creaky door, had seen to it that his soul wore the proper attire of a spirited young man going out into the world. He carried a hat and a stick, while Topsy carried a dainty brightly-coloured umbrella. It can be easily believed therefore that they were both staggered and utterly bewildered by what they saw around them. What they saw was an immense number of entirely naked men and women, people of all ages who were talking together in pairs or in groups or just quietly reclining upon clouds with an air of comfortable negligence. One of the pairs they were looking at came towards Topsy and Turvy as soon as they caught sight of them. This naked couple seemed about their own age. They approached them, smiling, and Topsy was rather shocked by the crudeness of Turvy's greeting.

'Who are you?' were his words.

'You have heard of us,' the naked girl answered with a bewitching smile, 'for our love for each other has been carried by poets and musicians all round the world.'

'Please tell us your names, oh beautiful ones,' said Topsy as persuasively as she could, thinking in her heart, 'I do pray Turvy won't be rude again.'

'How is it,' said the male partner of the pair, 'that you are both dressed? We are all taught in this paradise that it is bad manners and unkind to the clouds to confront them with dressed-up finery.'

'If one of you will tell me who you are, my friend, I will tell you who we are,' said Turvy.

‘Don’t talk like that, Turvy. Our names, Lady, our names, Sir, are Topsy and Turvy. I am a Picture from the upper room of our house, and my friend here is the Handle of the Door to our nine steps down. We will tell you all about ourselves and about the other things in our room upstairs, if you will be so kind as to tell us who you two are.’ Once more it was the beautiful naked girl who spoke, while her handsome companion glared at them offensively. ‘We are Dido and Aeneas,’ she said. ‘I am the Queen of Carthage and this person comes from the Greek army which is besieging Troy. His mother is the Goddess Venus-Aphrodite and his father’s name is Anchises. Come, Aeneas. The names of this pair are Topsy and Turvy. Their names, from what I have learnt of foreign languages, signify tumbling upside-down. They had no idea where they were when they entered cloud-land and still less when they asked us so roughly who we were. May I suggest,’ Dido went on, still addressing her words to Topsy, for she clearly held the Amazonian conception of the sexes, namely that in wisdom and intelligence and value to the human race, women were infinitely more important than men, ‘that we lour sit down tor a while on this cloud that is now between us, and then we can discuss all these things in quiet and peace. It is hard to think calmly and express our thoughts calmly when on the move. Our thoughts follow our motions. We notice a lot but we are too absorbed in what we see to philosophize about anything.’

Topsy glanced at Turvy whose face suggested no displeasure at Dido’s idea; and they all four, Topsy and Turvy in their clothes and Dido and Aeneas stark naked, sat down upon the cloud, as they might have done upon a bench.

‘What,’ enquired Aeneas, ‘would you say was your most difficult philosophical problem in connection with this human life which it is our destiny to live?’

This question was plainly addressed to Turvy, but Topsy replied. ‘I can tell you my chief difficulty at once.’

‘What is it? Do tell us,’ said Dido.

‘Well, I can’t understand how our souls are so different from our bodies. My body is a little picture of a Children’s Party. My friend’s body is a Door-Handle. Now what would my soul look like if I were to see it in a Mirror? And what would the soul of my friend look like if we were to see it in a Mirror?’

‘I think we can help you here,’ replied Dido. ‘Don’t you think we can, Aeneas? You see, my dear friends, the soul of a thing is not quite like the soul of a person simply because a thing is different from a person. A thing is inanimate whereas a person is animate. But a thing is a thing, just as a person is a person; and as a person propels and ejects an image of himself or herself into the mind of every observer, so every inanimate thing projects an image of itself into the consciousness of everyone who observes it. These images or replicas or embodiments of the body — be it a rock or a beach or a tract of sand — possess all the consciousness that the body ever had. The human race and the whole race of animals tend to be jealous of the power of inanimates to rival them in consciousness. That is why dogs bark and cats miaow and bulls charge and mice nibble, at any statue or any picture or any image that strikes them as intruding upon their privileged position. Don’t you see, my dear children, Dido went on, ‘the fact that a Picture of Children at a Party, or a Door-Handle to a very tiresome Door, doesn’t appear to possess any surviving self or that it is impossible for an outsider to imagine such a thing as a Picture thinking to itself “I am!” or a Door-Handle saying to itself “I shall never love anything as much as I love that Picture,” doesn’t affect the truth that such inanimates have surviving selves. There are a great many things in heaven and earth, as Hamlet says to

Horatio, that we don’t dream of; and prominent among such things is the Consciousness of Inanimates. Just think for a moment what human beings have come to feel about the Mountains of the Moon and the Signs of the Zodiac, the coming and going of Rainbows, and the movements of rain and hail and thunder and lightning. All these things strike us as possessing various sorts of mysterious purposes of their own and yet we have no more idea of the nature of these purposes than they have of the nature of our human or animal intentions.’

‘But why, O wise Lady,’ enquired Topsy, ’is the soul of a Picture able to move about like I can, and the soul of a Door-Handle able to move about like my friend here can? Are the souls of all inanimates able to move about independently of their bodies?’

‘To answer that question as it deserves to be answered,’ replied the Queen of Carthage, ‘something more than the identity, as of a living self, belonging to the Inanimate of whom we speak, has to be considered. I refer to the impression made by this Inanimate upon human beings and upon animals. This impression remains in both the human and the animal mind and it is this impression which gives to the Inanimate’s own awareness of itself as an entity a prerogative or procedure.’

‘But your Majesty,’ protested Topsy eagerly, ‘doesn’t the soul possessed by a human being or by an animal, whether it survives its body’s death or not, have the appearance of the body which it represents?’

Dido and Aeneas exchanged a humorous smile. ‘I am afraid I must confess,’ said the former, ‘that people and animals are sometimes so spirited that their spirits when they escape from their bodies, whether dead or alive, have the exact look of the bodies from which they issue forth. But I confess I cannot see any resemblance to a picture of a party of children in your face, my dear; and I certainly cannot see the faintest resemblance to a door-handle in your friend's manly countenance. So we have to assume, if we treat this important subject in a really philosophical way, that all souls emanating from inanimates are compelled by some inescapable Law of Nature to take the form, not of what they display of themselves to the world around them, but of men and women. If I were asked why this is so I should answer, as I am now going to answer you, though you haven't as yet faced me with such a question, like this. I should say that ever since the creative energy in Nature succeeded in giving birth to men and women it has made use of their forms as the best example of the shape any combination of matter should take when it feels within it the faintest consciousness of personal identity. This leads me, doesn't it, Aeneas?' and she looked at her husband with a certain hesitation, if not trepidation, 'to a further important point. Does the faintest existence of such consciousness imply of necessity the fact that it must be either a masculine consciousness or a feminine consciousness? I am inclined to think it does. Yes, I am inclined to think that from the largest human or animal creature to the smallest bird or fish or reptile or insect the difference between the two sexes definitely appears.'

'But do tell us, your Majesty,' pleaded Topsy, 'at what point does any fragment of matter have a right to claim that it contains the rudiments of consciousness?'

Dido smiled at Aeneas; but he didn't smile back. Perhaps this was one of those subjects upon which male and female creatures find difficulty in taking the same view. 'I think,' said the Queen of Carthage firmly, 'that this claim generally acquires its justification from the interest shown in the fragment of matter in question by beings already possessed of human or of animal consciousness or at least of a strong amount of it. You often see dogs sniffing and harrying such a fragment of half-conscious matter; and you know how little girls feel its existence in their dolls who to them are like their babies. Men with artistic instincts frequently become aware of an element of consciousness in the carvings, the statues, the pictures they admire, and sometimes even in the instruments they habitually use in the creation of these things, such as carving-tools and paintbrushes. And this is obviously especially true in the case of musical instruments such as flutes and harps, violins and guitars, harpsichords and pianos. You must remember my dears that there is a creative energy running through all the creatures of the universe. How absurd to deny, for instance, a vein of actual consciousness to all the carvings and pictures of great artists. The hand that created them has handed on its own inherent life to what it has created.'

'But please, your Majesty, do tell us how things like the little Picture which is I and the little Door-Handle which is Turvy can have a soul like the soul of a man or the soul of a woman, distinct and separate enough to go out and about quite independently of the body we leave behind and not associating itself with that body at all?'

'Your souls,' replied Dido, 'are, as I have just told you, shaped like the shape of a human being. When I look at you, Topsy, now, or at your friend, Turvy, now, I see a human form. Your two faces and the expression on each of them, have nothing to do with the picture you represent or the door-handle your friend represents. Those two things, in their disparate identities are simply the dwellings in which you live. If I were to strike you it would not be in the least like striking a picture nor if I were to strike your friend would it be in the least like striking a door-handle.'

'But your Majesty,' protested Topsy, 'surely if I felt you hitting me, the image of the Picture which is I would pass through my mind? If I were, for instance, wandering through a great forest far away from here, I might be devoured by a lion. Would the fact that I had entirely disappeared for ever have any effect on the picture whose soul I am? Surely, your Majesty, if a thing has a soul and if that soul is devoured by a lion far away from the thing whose soul it is, the thing must feel it in some way, suffer from it in some way? Are our souls and bodies, your Majesty, so utterly different and so entirely independent of each other, that the complete destruction of one of them has no effect on the other? Look at it, your Majesty, the other way round. Suppose now, at this moment while I am talking to you, the Picture which is my body were smitten to pieces by somebody entering the room where it hangs on the wall, would I be unaffected by it and just walk on where I was walking, in complete indifference? And what, your Majesty should I feel when I came back to the room and found my body stricken to bits and lying in little pieces on the floor?'

The Queen of Carthage hesitated for two or three long moments. Then she said quietly, 'I am afraid, my dear child, that, just as you so tragically hint, there does exist this fatal difference between our bodies and our souls. The truth is, little lady, that this life of ours, wherever we are, is no joke. Of course that is exactly what lots of satirical writers have always said it was. But I disagree, and so does Aeneas — don't you Aeneas? — we both feel, as I expect not only you but your friend Turvy does too, that we have to make a definite effort of the mind to be happy. Let us lie back on Fate and let us be ready to accept Chance; but, while our soul remains in its body, both the soul within and the body without must work together so that both can be happy. Oh how afraid I was that Aeneas would forget me! Wasn't I, Aeneas? And you see, my sweet child, he didn't forget me; he came back to me and I've been happy with him ever since. It is the same with our body and our soul. But if our soul doesn't come home — for that is what our body is to our soul, it's its home — and if as you suggest, our home were broken into bits, as any house might be by an earthquake or a whirlwind, well, what is there left us to do but to find another home? Yes, to hunt about till we find some body that is as lost as we are. Then we shall become a lost soul in a lost body. But not for long! The new partners will coalesce and there will soon be the same sort of love between them as there was of old between the former pair. Am I not right, Aeneas? Though you and I have been spared this weird experience we would be able to adjust ourselves to it, wouldn't we, you to another woman and I to another man?'

It was then that Topsy and Turvy suffered a shock.

'No!' cried Aeneas, in a thundering voice, 'No! Never would I mate with anyone else. I couldn't! I wouldn't! The mere thought of it makes me feel murderous! Come along, Dido! You've talked to these children long enough! I'll tell them one thing before you go off with me; and that is, they'd better cast off their silly clothes and be as stark naked in this Dimension of the Truth as the rest of us are!' Thus speaking he seized Dido by the wrist and dragged her away.

Topsy and Turvy were both so disturbed by the violent behaviour of Aeneas that they remained seated on the cloud where the Queen of Carthage had been talking to them and did not dare to move. The idea of taking off their clothes was equally repugnant to both of them though they did whisper to each other that they felt rather uncomfortably warm and Turvy told Topsy that he could see drops of perspiration on her forehead. They were still in the same position upon the same cloud when they saw two very friendly-looking persons, a man and a woman, coming to speak to them. Topsy and Turvy got up politely to welcome this couple and the man said at once, 'Sit you down, my dears, and let's talk of the world from which we've come. This is my friend and Theatre-Manager, Henry Irving.

'Oh Sir: Oh Lady!' our friends cried simultaneously, making room for them both by their sides. 'We've both longed to go to London to see you, but we’ve lived a very limited life and have never had the chance,’ said Turvy.

‘You’d be surprised if we told you what we are at home,’ said Topsy. ‘But I expect,’ she went on, ‘famous people like you two have often had in your audiences, perhaps without knowing it, people with quite as simple a background as what we two have come from.’

‘It’s not what life has made of us,’ said Henry Irving, ‘but what we have made of life that counts. Miss Terry and I have seen many queer people in our time, haven’t we, Ellen? And many famous people too, and I daresay when we learn your names we shall find that you two are well known in the great world.’

‘Alas! no, great sir,’ cried Topsy rather pathetically, ‘we’ve never had any chance, either of us. My friend Turvy would have made a very good actor, I am sure of that, if you had taken him into your Company.’

‘And you a good actress, my dear,’ said Ellen Terry tenderly. ‘I can see you’ve got the most important quality for good acting.’

‘What’s that, Lady?’ enquired Turvy eagerly.

‘Well, my dear man,’ said Miss Terry ‘I think I might call it bravery! I mean the spirit to plunge into the part you’ve been given and not let shyness or nervousness or any sort of self-conscious fear hold you back from asserting yourself and expressing the feelings of the part you have to play.’

‘From what kind of background,’ enquired Henry Irving, ‘did you two come?’

‘Oh! I’ll tell you at once!’ cried Turvy. ‘When at home I am the Handle of a very creaky Door, a door that’s hard to shut. And Topsy here is a Picture painted by a little girl of a children’s dance.’

Henry Irving looked excitedly at Ellen Terry. ‘Wasn’t I telling you only yesterday, my dear, that if the old pieces of furniture in my Aunt Brodribb’s drawing-room could turn into actors and actresses the suppressed life of half a century would become vocal? These youngsters are perfectly right. There are chairs and tables and chimney-pieces and footstools in old-fashioned rooms that could make us all laugh and cry if they could only speak.'

Both Topsy and Turvy were delighted at Henry Irving's words; and Turvy asked, 'Do tell us, Master, why it is that the souls of things are so different from the bodies of things? Why is it that the souls of such a variety of things as Pictures, Handles, Cupboards, Fenders, Coal-scuttles, Pokers, Tongs, Carpets, Rugs, Chairs and Tables as well as Rocks and Stones and Chimney-tops should all have the same sort of soul, namely a soul with the image of a Man, which according to the Bible is the image of God?'

'I think,' said Irving gravely, 'that you've hit on the right track. Was not the first living creature in the Universe an amoeba in the salt sea, that "microscopic animalcule" as the Fowlers say in their Oxford Dictionary, which splits itself into two halves, each half becoming a new amoeba and thus perpetuating the amoebic race? And does not that remind us how in order to have children the man must break the virginity of the woman or else their race will die out? Only through secretive violence of this kind does humanity progress.'

Topsy was beginning to utter something that Turvy feared might offend Henry Irving and Ellen Terry, when suddenly the great Actor and his Actress were completely upset by the appearance of a big black horse with a man on its back who, like the rest of the men and women in this weird Dimension, was stark naked, galloping towards them at top speed.

'Come Ellen, come quick!' cried the great Actor, for whom evidently black horses driven out of all control by something or somebody was an untheatrical and unseemly thing. 'We must clear out of this!' And off they both ran, seeking refuge behind a large group of naked people who were listening to some sort of preacher. Our two friends stood up; and as they did so an airy cloud, full, Turvy thought, of tiny snow-white birds, plucked at their clothes and carried off everything they wore, leaving them as naked as all the other human beings in this strange Dimension of Life's Truth. As for a quick moment they looked at each other Turvy was absolutely amazed at the beauty of Topsy — he had never dreamed she was as lovely as this. Then they both made a feeble attempt to stop the Black Horse. To their surprise however a spirited girl and an athletic man and a queer old parson or priest of some sort, who were talking together, rushed forward to help them and soon brought the black steed, who turned out to be a mare, to a complete stop, while her rider slipped from her back to the ground.

'What's this?' he cried indignantly. 'Don't any of you bounders and molly-coddle shirkers know who I am? I am Dick Turpin and by Jerubbabel I'll tie the lot of ye to Squire Hazelbury's drive gate and use my whip on ye instead of on poor old Black Bess who'll probably die of jitterbugs before my next birthday.'

It was then to Topsy's and Turvy's astonishment that the gay rollicking leader of the group who had helped them to stop the mare cried, 'Who cares who you are, you bouncing blob of cat's spue! Who cares from what pigstye shittery you come, you bumbledy-blummery flap-pot!'

'Everybody knows who I am,' cried the rider, who had gathered the reins tightly in one hand while he brandished his whip in the other at those who had blocked his path. 'I am Dick Turpin and my mare Black Bess is known to all the world. How dare you meddle with me and her you bambery-bumbery set of stinkhards?'

The leader of the gang who had stopped Dick Turpin and Black Bess now came forward. The two men began belabouring each other with filthy abuse, while every now and then the sprightly young girl who clearly was the darling of these newcomers, patted Black Bess on her shoulder so tenderly that the mare turned her head towards her, heedless of her master's reins or whip. 'Don't make too much fuss, Robin Hood,' said his priestly-looking companion. 'Leave the mare to Maid Marion. She's begun to win the beast's favour already. In a little while we'll be having them both at our command and then we can decide what to do with them.'

'You shut up, Friar Tuck,' protested Robin Hood. 'Keep your sermon till we've got the fellow under control — then we'll show him where he's got off.'

'But don't you see, Robin Hood, old boy, if we don't get the Mare quiet and get his whip out of the fellow's hand, we shall never have them as we want them. Let her stay quietly with us, Master Turpin, and you yourself had better stay quietly with us too. You must understand that you have been led on by your mania for riding at top speed and overtaking coaches full of quiet folk and robbing them of every penny they've got, into the ridiculous illusion that you are the only highwayman in Britain. Let me get it now once lor all into your stupid skull that you are anything but that. By far the most successful highway freebooters this country knows are we who have now brought you to book.

I expect you are wondering' — and it certainly did look as if Dick Turpin, as he stood with one hand on Black Bess's rump and the other, from the fingers of which the whip was trailing to the ground, on the back of her saddle, was in a maze of bewilderment— 'why we don't knock you on the head at once since we are two to one. Well, I will tell you why we don't. We don't knock you on the head for good and all because it has crossed our minds that with your aid and the aid of your mare, if we joined forces, we might grow as rich as any of these damned Squire Hazelburys, whose gates we’re always passing.’

What Robin Hood and Friar Tuck and Maid Marion must have had in their minds from the start, when they first encountered Dick Turpin galloping up on Black Bess, was now evidently fulfilled. They were going to work in unison and with the full intent of becoming the most successful and the richest bandits ever yet known in our island.

But Topsy and Turvy had ceased to care how few or how many composed the gang. It was surely impossible, both our friends thought, for this Confederation of Bandits to play their part in a world that had no highways at all and where everybody was naked in a rock-a-bye ocean of drifting clouds. ‘I suppose,’ said Topsy to Turvy, ‘that they are all ghosts and that the whole thing is really a sort of catch-me-out charade among the souls of the dead.’

‘I certainly can’t imagine coaches passing down broad roads down here,’ replied Turvy, ‘and yet that mare, Black Bess, is clearly not a ghost.’

‘Let’s go away from here,’ said Topsy to Turvy, ‘I’m tired of the company of these robbers. Let’s try to find some nicer companions.’

‘Where the devil shall we go?’ said Turvy to Topsy. ‘In this damned place they’ll all be a funny lot.’

‘Let’s try any way,’ said Topsy to Turvy. ‘You never know down here, or up here, or round about here, what you may find.’

So they wandered off among the rolling clouds and the drifting naked people. Quite a long way they went. But at last they saw, not far off, two forms whose appearance attracted both of them quite a lot. One was a bearded man and the other was a youth who was clean-shaven except for a faintly outlined slight moustache. These two were talking together excitedly while the cloud beneath them acted as if it wanted to throw them off.

‘Forgive my impertinence,’ said Topsy, addressing them both in her most charming manner, ‘but do you mind our asking who you are? We have come from a house in North Wales. I am Topsy and my friend is Turvy; and the only things we’re afraid of are Whirlwinds and Whirlpools.’

‘This cloud here is called Manhattan,’ said the bearded man buoyantly, ‘but my friend here keeps talking about beautiful girls he has lost and about the places where they’re buried. I mustn’t make you jealous, sir, by praising your lady but I don’t believe I’ve ever seen in all my life on earth a more beautiful girl than you are.’ And in place of bowing or making any other conventional gesture of respect, he patted Topsy on the head as if she had been his grandchild. Topsy was delighted at such treatment which she greatly preferred to more fashionable signs of admiration, and she smiled gaily at the bearded man.

‘Oh Walt, Walt!’ expostulated his friend, ‘but you must remember that we have all got to keep up the ancient worship of beauty that has come down to us from an antiquity more ancient and more sacred than any of us know. The worship of beauty is the secret underlying inspiration of all life. It goes much deeper, it has lasted much longer than any of these exacting religions whose adherents call them old and sacred. I tell you, Walt old boy, that Baltimore in Maryland is worth a thousand of your damned Manhattan Islands. I know what I am talking about; for my unsurpassably beautiful girl has a still more beautiful Mother and I worship them both equally. I am not saying that this arrogant Mr Allan who picked me up as a kid and patronized me so condescendingly isn’t a noble or gracious personage. What I am saying is that my beautiful girl and her still more beautiful mother are the symbols and living embodiments of a tradition far older than Christianity and far older than those Olympian gods and their pet boys and girls in Rome on the Tiber or London on the Thames or Paris on the Seine or Frankfurt on the Main. In the ancient rocks and caves of every hillside in Europe and Asia there are images of the worship of beauty that go back to a day before human history as it is recorded in written books began. Yes! go back to ages when pictures of men and women and boys and girls and beasts of the field and birds of the air recorded a worship of beauty older than all that has been written in the words of any known language or in the rhythms of any known verse. I tell you, Walt Whitman, it's all very well for you to comfort the wounded in hospitals and sit down with all the magic of your splendid manhood by sick men's beds and gather their spirits up in the guise of a new Messiah, but long before God deserted Jesus on the Cross, and long before Mohammed wrote the Koran, and long before Gautama Buddha preached to the wise the wisdom that sinks in peace into everlasting silence, the mystery of Beauty dominated human life and inspired the minds of men, women, and children as it has done ever since the amoeba in the depths of the sea split itself in two. What you don't or won't understand, you excitable old Walt, is the existence of beauty round and about us in the simplest and most ordinary things. There is beauty in the way a cupboard stands out from the wall against which it is fixed, making an extremely impressive angle. There is beauty in the way a mantelpiece supported at both ends by pillars descending to the floor, stretches across the fireplace. There is beauty about the angle between the ceiling and the walls in every room we live in, not to mention the terrifying secretiveness of each particular corner, suggestive of desperation and escape from hell. Nor is there anything more redolent of dramatic experience than a carpet, or still more than a rug, especially one from Persia or Assyria. And what armchair is there in any apartment in the world, whether with a footstool of gold from

Babylon or a footstool of ebony from Ethiopia, that does not suggest between its welcoming arms a seat for a Conqueror of Mesopotamia or a cushion for the thighs of a Cytherean Aphrodite?'

Before Walt Whitman could answer this oration on the antiquity and divinity of Beauty by Edgar Allan Poe both Topsy and Turvy broke in, 'I should like to say that in these ordinary things, like armchairs and rugs, which you are praising for their beauty there is something else much more important than beauty.'

'She means use, don't you Topsy?' cried Turvy excitedly. 'Use is the important thing. I tell you it wasn't their beauty at all, whatever footstools or cushions they had, that made those armchairs you are talking about so nice. It was their use! I can well imagine — can't you Topsy? — an armchair with a very ugly cover that would be just as useful as any other! Surely you two gentlemen see what we mean?'

Walt Whitman gave his beard a little push forward with one of his hands and allowed his head to sway a little from side to side, as if he were following the music of some unseen instrument.

'To tell you the truth, my dear children,' he said, 'and I include you too, Edgar Poe, in what I am saying, the real secret of our lives is neither the use of things nor the beauty of things; nor is it the things themselves, even if you are talking about the scenery for a great picture with forest and fountains and mountains and the distant sea. The secret of our lives is in us, I tell you, yes! in our hearts and minds and feelings! The key to life lies in two simple words: I LIVE. It is our I, my dear children, the real deep mysterious unknowable self in each one of us, the self in men, women, and children, the self in animals, vegetables and minerals, the self in birds and reptiles and fishes, the self in every insect in the world, as well as the self in the sun, in the moon, in every star! I tell you, Edgar Poe, I tell you, you darling pair of lovers, the whole secret of life lies in ourselves; nowhere, nowhere, nowhere, nowhere else! These clever, inventive, scientific technicians have all manner of wonderful and miraculous secrets. But one secret they have not got; they have not got the secret of life. They can go on telling you that the beginning of life is the element from which life springs. They can tell you that it's in fire, in water, in earth, in air, in space. But they are wrong. In all elements there is Life. But Life is not the element from which it comes. Life is consciousness. Without consciousness there is no Life: there is only the empty house waiting for Life to fill it. The greatest oceans, the greatest mountains, are only the dwellings that Life must enter by way of consciousness. If there were not consciousness within them they would cease to exist. Yes! They would be totally unreal. They would be only visions, the visions of some living thing that has consciousness. You hear people talk, my children, about Mind and Matter. I tell you there are no such things! Mind and Matter are just dictionary words invented by the consciousnesses who construct dictionaries. No amount of mind could make a particle of matter, no amount of matter could make a particle of mind. They need a living Self.'

Whether it was the projected beard of Walt Whitman or the strange wild light in the eyes of Edgar Poe, there was something about the dead silence that followed the former's dissertations upon Self and Selves that caused a queer simultaneous terror to seize upon both Topsy and Turvy. And without a word to either of their famous interlocutors they just jumped to their feet and ran at top speed towards an especially dense cloud which could be seen heaving and toppling about a mile away. It didn't take them long to reach it for they were both swift on their feet; but they were surprised when they reached the cloud to find that there was a rather startling absence of naked persons in that cloud's immediate vicinity. But they quickly realized the reason. There were two crowned heads seated together at the cloud's base, with their backs against it, and as it swayed backwards and forwards their argument, which was clearly a genuine dispute, got more and more vehement.

'What you keep forgetting, you confounded Saxon,' King Canute was shouting when they came on the scene, 'is that we are both ghosts now, and that when we lived we never confronted each other in battle. It was our sons and our sons' sons who fought with each other! No, I'm not saying', the Danish monarch went on, 'that you, Alfred the Great of Wessex, weren't a good sovereign to your people; for you were. That was why I sent most of my fleet and most of my soldiers back to their homeland. I wanted to be as good a monarch of this country, of both our two countries together, as everybody told me you had been in your time. What you don't seem to realize is that there's a close link of racial blood, yes of northern blood, between our two lands; so that it became almost as easy for me to surround myself with English lords and chiefs as with rulers and captains of my own blood.'

Canute was silent for a moment. But his richly resounding voice was still echoing round them when King Alfred's deep, firm, vigorous Saxon voice made itself audible like the sound of a powerful blacksmith's hammer striking an iron anvil.

'You may say what you like; your words are but belching wind to the ears of any honest and faithful Englishman. Nearer related no doubt we are than either of us to these damned Normans and Flemings and Franks from the other side of our English Channel. But though we are nearer to each other than any of these scurvy Frenchmen, that doesn't give you the right to talk as if we lost one of our grandest opportunities to be the most dominant country between Rome and Iceland by not allowing ourselves to be permanently ruled by Danes. Shall I tell you, you boastful and overbearing ghost of what could not be, cannot be, and will not be, what is the best embodiment of the voice of destiny uttering the true prediction and predestination? I tell you, you arrogant claimer of that to which you know you have no right, it is the universal voice of young students of our history in the schools of our land; and it is from there that the rumoured legendary voices reach us still murmuring of how Canute warned his courtiers that he could not command the sequence of the tides upon the coast and the significant and natural story in all its simple homeliness of Alfred King of England and those cakes of his.'

5

'Let's get away from here, my precious,' whispered Turvy to Topsy. 'I don't like watching those two naked men with crowns on their bare heads arguing with each other. I'm all for Alfred, if we had to choose, and I warrant you are too, but we don't have to choose. Let's skedaddle! As Ellen Terry said she did when George Bernard Shaw went up to bully Henry Irving.'

Topsy nodded and gave him her hand and off they ran. Once more among the crowd of ordinary naked ones, mingled with extraordinary naked ones, they alternated between running and strolling and between dead silences and lively chatter. At last they stopped dead. 'Who on earth are those two?' whispered Topsy to Turvy. 'Good Lord! What a pair!' murmured Turvy. 'Let's go and see!' They soon reached the couple who had attracted them; and Topsy whispered excitedly to Turvy at once: 'It's Samson and Delilah! Look at them! Listen to them!' They certainly never in their lives had seen a quarrel between husband and wife equal to what they saw now.

‘What I would like best to see,’ the wife was saying, ‘would be the Chief Executioner of the Philistines standing upon your body, naked as it is now, and very carefully and slowly cutting out all your principal organs one by one and arranging them separately on a silver plate at your side. When it comes to your testicles, or knackers, or balls, as my little brother told me they called them at school, I should like to see him put them on the plate with the rest but on the opposite side, not close together. They are the things I have suffered from: and I want to see them suffer in their turn. Oh yes! And your villainous penis, or prick, as my little brother said they called it at school, that I would love to see cut off and laid in the centre of the plate with its head propped up on a little pebble so that it would point upwards into the clouds, the winds, while its voice would cry pitifully “I’m dissolving! I’m going! I’ll soon be lost forever!”’

‘Can’t you hold your whoresome tongue for one single second?’ groaned the voice of Samson. ‘If I weren’t brought up in the courts of the Lord I would teach you how to talk to me like this!’

Topsy and Turvy had had enough by this time of Delilah’s talk and of Samson’s terrific muscles, which were quivering with wrath. So they just took to their heels and fled.

They were pulled up with interest and with amazement by an exciting discussion, amounting to an indignant dispute at moments, between a group of famous writers: namely, Rudyard Kipling, Rider Haggard, Bulwer Lytton, and Harrison Ainsworth.

‘Who are you two? And where do you come from?’ cried Bulwer Lytton.

Topsy, catching the eye of Harrison Ainsworth, after making a dainty little curtsey, answered, ‘We come from North Wales and we live in the most beautiful county in all the British Isles.’

‘What may that be?’ enquired Rudyard Kipling.

‘Merioneth,’ answered Turvy, loudly and boldly. ‘On one coast we have a shore with the most transparent and lovely pebbles to be found anywhere except at Chesil Beach in Dorset; and on our opposite coast we have the most beautiful shells to be found on any shore in England or Scotland or Ireland!’

‘Well, my dears,’ said Rudyard Kipling, ‘I wonder if either of you have ever been to Brighton?’

‘Or to Eastbourne?’ cried Rider Haggard. ‘Beachy Head has the grandest sea view on the whole of our English coast.’

‘Of course,’ said Bulwer Lytton, ‘not one of the seaside places in England or Scotland can compare for a moment with Naples or with what you see at Pompeii or in Sicily or in Capri. You have no volcanic mountains and no seashores or sea-islands or sea-palaces anywhere to compare with what the gondolas in Venice take you to see.’

‘Shut your mouth, Bulwer!’ cried Kipling. ‘If this couple could see Brighton beach they would see something as good as any of your damned volcanic mountains!’

‘What interests us, gentlemen,’ said Turvy, once more speaking out louder and bolder than Topsy quite liked to hear him speak, ’is a matter to which all of you four great writers have referred as you told your thrilling and absorbing romances, but a matter all the same that the impetuosity of your astonishing inspirations prevented you from developing or enlarging upon. I am speaking of the events in my girl-friend’s life and mine that brought us into this startling and awe-inspiring Dimension where all we naked mortals are encountering the Truth of Life. These events, gentlemen, and please understand that we have both read and absorbed into our bodies and souls the great romantic novels of each one of you four mighty geniuses, are simply the natural causes that led to our loving each other and setting out together on a life of adventure. You see, oh great and famous gentlemen, we both come from the upper room of a tiny half-house which has only two storeys separated by a little staircase of nine steps, one the ground floor and one the first upper floor beyond which is nothing, no attic roof at all. In our tiny upper room, oh great and famous gentlemen, there is only a fireplace with a mantelpiece above it and a poker beside it, two armchairs, and a tall book-case from floor to ceiling. The body of my girl-friend is a Picture by a little girl of fourteen of a child's party and my own body is a black Handle to a very creaky door close to this Picture. We ran down the stairs together, holding hands, and then had to rush as fast as our legs could carry us round the curve of a road called Turnstile where Mrs Whirlwind and Mr Whirlpool tried to catch us because Mr Whirlpool wanted to swallow my girl Topsy. It was then that we were suddenly attracted to a little by-path that precipitated us to our astonishment into this Dimension of naked reality where we are now talking to you. Do please tell us, oh Mighty Four, in what way this Dimension of the Naked Truth of Life differs from the place, wherever it may be, to which the ghosts of all who die upon our earth depart when their bodies are dead. Do they go straight to heaven or hell or to some intermediate purgatory?'

'If we only had a wise lady among us,' replied Harrison Ainsworth, 'I warrant we could answer your question at once.'

'But she'd have to be a little more than just wise,' replied Rider Haggard. 'She'd have to have the sort of intuition in her that the greatest of witches have.'

'She'd have to have the wisdom of a terrific king-wizard,' cried Bulwer Lytton eagerly. 'There are women like that, you know: like Saint Anne the Mother of Mary.'

‘What are you saying!’ growled Rudyard Kipling. ‘You talk like one of those Blacks who are the chief burden of us intelligent Whites.’

‘All I can say,’ burst out Bulwer Lytton, ’is that I wish the whole of Africa were inhabited by Blacks and ruled by Blacks and that the only business we sensible Britishers and sensible Americans had was to see to it that the Yellow Peril was nipped in the bud!’

‘They’re all too clever for us,’ whispered Topsy to Turvy, ‘let’s make a bolt for it and be off!’

6

What stopped their run and pulled them up short were the terrific gestures of an enormous Negro. The group this Negro was addressing was well known to both our friends in one sense, that is to say because each of the faces composing the group was a face that had been pictured again and again in children’s illustrated histories. This will be well understood when it is explained that one face was that of a very early King of Rome whose name was Numa, another the face of a delicate Nymph or exquisitely pretty young girl who lived in a cave in that same early Rome and was visited every day by King Numa, and who taught him by degrees the exact steps to take in order to conquer the world and establish over it the Roman Empire.

The excited talk in this group of recognizable persons was emphasized by the fact that one was clearly an Anglican Bishop and one a particularly seductive and appealing little London Street-Walker. Then there was the excited Negro who kept shouting, ‘I am only a Black! I am only a Black! But the day will come when someone like me will rule the whole of Africa from south to north and from east to west! Africa, I tell you, you crazy world of every race that exists, will one day be entirely governed, yes, from north to south and from east to west, by black men like me! So you'd better prepare for that, you other races of the world, if you wish to survive!'

As a fine contrast to this excited black man there now came from this group an elaborately tuneful voice, a voice so rich and melodious that it seemed to be saying in a rhythmic prose almost worthy of rivalling the Urn-Burial of Sir Thomas Browne, 'I am only Thomas De Quincey but I hold the opinion that what the enemies of rich prose call a mere string of purple passages is what is needed to keep the music of the English language alive. And if you ask me,' De Quincey went on, 'what living human being there is who in her own delicate, exquisite, and unselfish personality offers a parallel to the exquisite harmony of what vulgar-minded people despise as a string of purple passages, I shall point till the end of my days to a certain little London prostitute or street-walker or whore by whose noble unselfishness my own sick and wretched life was restored to me.'

'I'm not worthy! I'm not worthy! I'm not worthy of what he says!' came in a young girl's voice from a slender little girl at his side.

'You did, you did, you did, my precious little Ann,' repeated De Quincey, 'you did. You saved my life and all of my work that was worth saving for posterity by what you did for me! I won't let you deny it! I won't let you! I won't let you!'

'I am mighty glad,' broke in the deep resonant voice of King Numa of Rome. 'Yes! I am mighty glad to learn that in Londinium on the River Tamesis in a far-away island there are lovely ladies who have the power to do for a man what no other man can do and what no wife however queenly can do, but what my Egeria, my beautiful nymph in her secret cavern in this rocky gorge can do, is doing, and will do while we both live, for a thick-skulled, crinky-cranky, muddle-headed old ruler like me. I'll show you, yes, by Jupiter and his father Chronos, I'll show you what a stupid old monarch becomes when he has a Nymph like Egeria to help him! You wait and see, you warrior races! With Egeria to help me I will conquer the whole world for Rome.'

'Would it be right to ask your gracious Majesty if with my little friend Ann I might have an interview with Egeria, the Nymph in Antro? I would not presume to ask for your presence there, oh great King, or for any interview with you personally; but I would regard it as the greatest moment of my whole life if you would let me take my little Ann and introduce her to Egeria in her rocky cave.'

'Yes, you certainly shall take your lovely little Nymph to visit my lovely little Nymph,' said King Numa graciously, 'and I can only wish that in your life, my good sir, the influence of your Nymph upon you will be as momentous and memorable as mine I feel is going to prove upon me.'

At this moment, in a gilded bag which King Numa was carrying in his hand, a clock began to strike. The monarch held it up to his right ear and listened intently to what the clock said. Topsy and Turvy listened too and so more intently still did De Quincey. It must have been a very powerful clock and a very musical clock; for even the fierce Negro who had been muttering to himself all this while, as he stared at Topsy and Turvy, listened spellbound along with the rest of them. 'One, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine' struck the clock.

'You all know, don't you, what clock is striking and where?' said the King of Rome. 'It is Big Ben in London and they tell me everywhere in Britain that it's unlucky for you if you hear it beginning to strike, not to listen to the end, counting the strokes.'

The fierce Negro sprang to his feet from where he had been crouching and muttering. 'I say, may hell and damnation seize these accursed English and their bloody Big Ben! I tell you, King of Rome, I tell you, you pretty little travellers from England, the men who are going to rule Africa are Africans! Yes! None others! Not your blasted Red Indians of America, not your far more blasted Dutchmen in South Africa with their fucking apartheid or "keep the races separate!" We'll "apartheid" you, you bloody Dutchmen, we'll turn you into good meat for honest niggers, you blasted Boers! I tell you all, whether you are brutal Dutchmen or self-conceited, showing-off, snobbish English, there'll come a time and pretty soon it'll come too, when the folk who rule Africa will be the folk to whom Africa gave birth. And they weren't nurtured in England, or in America, or in Australia, or New Zealand either! Africa gave them birth — Africa was their mother. And I tell every single one of you who will beget and conceive children on the soil of Africa, your descendants will be swept off the earth by Africa's real sons and daughters. Don't make any mistake, oh you mumbling and bumbling false prophets of apartheid! Africa herself speaks through me who alone among you all out here, big kings and dainty whores and wily travellers, am her true and faithful child. Yes, I tell you, Africa speaks through me; and one day the descendants of all you bastard interlopers will find it out to your cost!'

The slim little girl who was resting her hand on the arm of Thomas De Quincey suddenly came up to Topsy. Her clothes, like Topsy's, had already fallen off and she and Topsy looked like a pair of sweet little sisters together. 'I am very fond of my man here,' whispered little Ann to Topsy, 'as I bet you're very fond of yours, but it's a comfort to me, a comfort I am sure you can well understand, to be able to talk to a girl of my own age in this funny land of nakedness.

I was able to be a saving help to my friend as I am sure you must have been to yours; but I never expected to find myself with him in a place like this. My friend Mr De Quincey calls this place "the Fourth Dimension".

What on earth he means by that I don’t know. Do tell me what your man calls it.’

‘Well, my dear Ann, I don’t believe’ — here Topsy hesitated a little— ‘that my man is as learned as yours. But I expect the household we come from is less learned than either of you. Your Mr De Quincey, my dear Ann, as I can tell, is a scholar who knows Latin and Greek, neither Turvy nor I know a word of those languages. I expect it’ll be hard for you to believe, but I’d better tell you at once that what you would call our bodies before we became naked ghosts, if we are ghosts here, or at any rate naked males and females or naked masculines and feminines, were nothing but pieces of furniture in a room in a house. These pieces of furniture had the sort of consciousness in them that human beings have. But they were not — I mean we were not — human beings at all. We were chairs and tables and book-cases and mantelpieces and pokers and tongs and carpets and antimacassars and pictures and writing-desks and footstools and all sorts of china ornaments and all sorts of lesson-books and picture-books and story-books. Some of us were lamps and candles and match boxes and a lot of us were toys and dolls’ houses, and even bricks to build fairy castles with.’

‘You see, my dear child,’ broke in Turvy, for he felt a bit jealous of Topsy’s having the whole pulpit just now, ‘people have not realized the amount of livingness that comes to exist in every piece of furniture that has been for many years the background of human lives. When from babyhood up to seventeen or eighteen or twenty a person, whether male or female, has lived with certain chairs and tables and pictures and rugs and carpets and cupboards, these things gather to themselves — and it goes deep into their being, into the material, if you prefer to put it so, of which they are composed. It is we, the persons who are brought up, say for twenty years, along with these objects, who endow them, how could we do otherwise, with this inner life. We come up against them continually. We associate certain particular moments of our lives with them; with this one rather than with that one, and when, on perhaps the following day, we pass by the one against which this experience of ours has brushed its wings, the experience switches back full-fledged upon us, while all the feelings we had at that moment repeat themselves within us. All the chairs and tables and cupboards and book-cases and sideboards and chests-of-drawers and carpets and sofas and rugs and windowsills and staircases and mantelpieces in the house we live in or the room we live in are the recipients of the dominant emotions and major mental disturbances of our life, things that affect us not only before we go out into the elements of Nature or into the business of our day's work, but equally so when we return home after we have walked and climbed and ridden and driven, and after we have finished our day's job, whatever that job may be.

'Yes! the furniture of our dwelling is like the thousand and one material objects we pass each day on our way to our life's work. It collects our feelings and drinks them into itself. The arms of every armchair, the legs of every table, the knobs of every footstool, the edges of every cupboard, are collectors of human feelings; so you see it is quite impossible, unless you live in a completely bare room, and even then the wails, the floor, the ceiling, the window, the door, have their own intake — for the place where you have your feelings not to share these feelings with you.'

It was then that quite suddenly De Quincey rushed up to his Ann and carried her off by main force to share his interview with King Numa and with Egeria the king's Nymph in the cavern. Topsy and Turvy stared at each other in bewilderment. They didn't feel resentment or anger. But they felt disappointed. And Topsy felt frustrated by not being able to carry on her talk with Ann. By a heavenly stroke of good luck it was at this very moment that the Sea-Nymph Galatea, after a quarrel with her sister nymphs in the Pacific Ocean, burst into ‘the Fourth Dimension’, if that really was the proper name for this queer land of naked men and women. Angry with all her companion Nymphs in the deep Pacific Ocean was Galatea and it was only on the strength of her wrath that she had burst the barriers of normal life in our Universe and plunged into this unusual sphere. It was only on the strength of her flight up and out, with a mad desire to be where none of her usual companions could possibly find her, that she had burst into this strange world; and once here, with her desperation lost and her momentary madness vanished, it was natural enough that she drifted into touch with Topsy the moment she caught sight of her. The curious thing was that, in her fury with her companion-Nymphs, she had torn down from the wall of their ‘House of Wings’, one of their most sacred Temples of Power, two of the most forcibly-feathered wings that were kept in that holy receptacle, and these she now recklessly offered to Topsy and Turvy. Galatea was bigger than either of them and much more strongly built and it would have been nothing to her to burst into the sacred cave of Egeria and to toss King Numa aside, as she offered that Nymph in Antro the means to escape. Little did she guess that Egeria, so far from wishing to leave her King, had but one desire, namely to help him to conquer the world. But Galatea had been deeply attracted to Topsy and she came up to them with such a winning smile and with so much of the mystery and magic of the depths of the Ocean about her that she quickly so enchanted them both that they agreed to fly straight back with her from prehistoric Rome to where this ‘Fourth Dimension’, or ‘Dimension of Reality’ touched the turnstile turning from which they had plunged into it. Under the protection of this formidable Sea-Nymph they neither of them had the slightest trepidation about being devoured by that Whirlwind and Whirlpool pair who lived in the chimney-top. So they both allowed her to affix to their bodies these spacious wings, which responded the moment they adhered to their naked shoulders to some interior muscular and fibrous power of assimilation that gave them the feeling that something within them had been long awaiting this moment.

Galatea seemed to know the way through the air across the whole length of the Dimension separating prehistoric Rome from modern London, and her two powerfully winged friends had no difficulty in following her. Indeed they felt as they flew how superior must be the lives of birds to the lives of men and animals. Walking with two legs, and still worse with four, struck them as comically humiliating as they swept through the sky and glanced at the various landscapes and seascapes that lay beneath them.

While these three were on their way Bibabug and Silly-suck, as they lay side by side on their bed, were engaged with their usual topic, the two points of which were Bibabug's shrinking from taking Sillysuck and Sillysuck's longing to have a baby. It was an extra warm night for that season of the year so they had left their house-door wide open as old Mr Bottom-Step had thumped his way round Turnstile Corner to buy a bottle of brandy. What therefore was their amazement when Topsy and Turvy arrived, followed by Galatea, whom they were both excitedly begging to enter the house with them. All three of them, all winged, came swishing in! The confusion was terrific. Everybody shouted at once; and, as might have been expected, Mr Brown Armchair and Mrs Grey Armchair, followed by Master Poker, came clattering downstairs to see what on earth had happened. Galatea the Sea-Nymph kept her wings neatly folded round her neck like a feathery scarf; but Topsy and Turvy carefully removed theirs and hung them up side by side on the wall. Galatea remained naked, save for her wings which played the part of a shawl, but both Topsy and Turvy, without even asking leave, searched Bibabug's and Sillysuck's cupboards till they found clothes that would fit them. During this incredible hubbub, roused to activity as he had never been in his whole life before, Bibabug seized Sillysuck, pulled her down upon the rug and there, while legs and skirts and boots and shoes were tripping and switching and stumbling over their bodies he violently, shamelessly, recklessly, desperately, ravished her and did so with such success that her muffled cry was a mixture of blood and tears and crazy exultation. ‘I shall have a baby, a baby, a baby!’ were the broken sounds that came up from the rug; but in the wild welter nobody heeded them.

Abertackle

1

THE ABERTACKLE FOLK were, it must be confessed, a queer lot. But then it must be remembered that Abertackle was itself a queer-place; and queer places tend to breed queer people. It was the biggest hamlet in the Go Peninsula, a promontory that stretches out quite a long way into the sea and carries with it several rivers and estuaries that have been overflowing their banks for thousands of years.

Why the dwellers in the Go Peninsula have never from time immemorial tried to build enough houses or to collect a big enough population to establish a town it is impossible to say. Visitors to the Go Peninsula, whether tourists or business men, will always tell you that they like the people there very much and find them hospitable and friendly, but what they never tell you for some mysterious reason is why they leave the place so quickly and rarely ever return to it.

Mr Charles Po and Mrs Mary Po, who were the oldest couple in Abertackle, lived in a comfortable little cottage called Crongy and were looked after by an elderly housekeeper called Nancy. ‘I be afeared, mistress,’ said this goodhearted competent lady one morning at the end of a rather cold February, ‘that the master didn’t like the sausages I cooked this morning. He hardly touched them; and yet his appetite is clearly all right for he eat as much bread and marmalade as he usually do.’

‘Oh no, Nance,’ said Mrs Po, ‘he always speaks up when he don’t like a thing. The sausages are all right. I enjoyed them, I ate every bit. If you ask me what I think it was, I should say it was because I was telling him about Miss Tarnt's asking me whether we'd go with her to Mrs Thrapplewait's to lunch tomorrow. Miss Tarnt be always a bit fearful of Mrs Thrapplewait's lunches because she likes to ask Mr Willmop and you know what he is! So I was telling the Master about this and asking if he minded going. He don't like Mr Willmop for some reason. I expect the Master remembers how when Mr Willmop once came to tea here he said he didn't feel like having anything but bread and butter when Master had gone to a deal of trouble opening one of those American tins. Anyway, it was because of something on his mind that the Master didn't eat your sausages. He's funny like that, the Master is. I expect all men are when it comes to table matters. They don't know all the trouble folks are putting themselves to for their sakes. Miss Tarnt be different from us ordinary folk in them things. If she do want to do a thing she just do go and do it, let come what may come! So it weren't only us having Mr Willmop to deal with, it were being taken there by Miss Tarnt. I guess t'were the fear of this tomorrow that made the Master act funny about his meal and not eat his sausages.'

Her mistress's words were evidently just the right ones to soothe the hurt feelings of Nancy Potticup, for she went off happily to the kitchen, thinking to herself: 'Well I be mighty thankful that 'taint me as has to meet Mr Willmop tomorrow afternoon! I be feared I'd forget myself with him and burst out at him!'

On the morning of the following day Mr Ernest Willmop allowed himself to sleep late. He had told his housekeeper, Titty Tinkle, for Mr Willmop was a bachelor of about fifty, not to bring him his cup of tea at eight and that she needn't bother about breakfast till he came downstairs. He knew that when she heard him moving about his room she would begin to prepare the breakfast he liked best, which was always the same, tried eggs and bacon and several cups of coffee.

‘What a damnably bloody business it is,’ thought Ernest Willmop, ‘to be alive on this confounded Earth! But it’s no good saying that. We’ve all got to go through with it till we’re dead.’ Ernest Willmop was a very powerful tall man with brown curly hair and fierce dark eyes. ‘It isn’t,’ he said to himself, ‘that I hate everything that’s alive. It’s human beings I hate, creatures on two legs, human beings and monkeys! I like horses and cattle very well and sheep and lambs too. Why the devil did we go and climb trees and build houses and barns and sheds and walls? And then all this awful cooked food. Why can’t we eat bread and oatmeal and apples and pears and nuts and have none of this blasted cookery? Oh how much nicer sheep and cattle and horses and ponies are than men and monkeys! I don’t mind babies and I don’t mind women so much, when they have babies. No! I don’t mind women and children. It’s men and monkeys I hate; and when women behave like men and monkeys I hate them too! Well, I’ve got to go to lunch at Mrs Thrapplewait’s today and I’ve got to meet Miss Tarnt there and Mr and Mrs Po too, so I mustn’t have breakfast too late or I shan’t be able to touch a mouthful of this blasted lunch.’

Ernest Willmop did manage, in spite of his angry mutterings as he hurried there after his late breakfast, to devour quite a satisfactory lot of Mrs Thrapplewait’s feast. This chivalrous behaviour as he munched and swallowed was in a considerable measure due to his interest in Miss Tarnt whose own share of the Thrapplewaitian spread, or at any rate her own interest in it, consisted in making a map on her plate of France and Spain and Portugal by the aid of the spikes of her silver fork and the various edibles so far uneaten.

Yes, there was something about Miss Tarnt that had a singular effect upon Ernest Willmop. ‘She’s like me,’ he thought, ‘completely independent of the whole confounded lot of them and absolutely indifferent to what anyone thinks about her.’

Miss Tarnt was only twenty-five but she looked over thirty. She had thin dark hair, pale greenish-blue eyes, an aquiline nose and a pointed chin. It was only when somebody said something to her in a tone of affectionate respect that her expression softened a little. When she talked to the company at large it was always on the same topic, the superiority of the age of their grandparents and great-grandparents over their own age. Mrs Thrapplewait was a tiny little old lady, very thin and with features such as a child might have drawn if it had wanted to draw a fairy grandmother; for her nose, mouth and eyes were very small but the lines about them and between them and her ears and throat and across her high forehead were so deep that when she concentrated her gaze upon anyone in particular that person, if a sensitive person, felt as if he or she had become a little wavering, flickering, quivering, bodiless wrinkle, floating in the air between her listening mind and the lecturing mind of her interlocutor.

‘Mr Po thinks,’ said Mrs Po to Mrs Thrapplewait, ‘that he found this morning the first celandine of the year. It’s the last day of February today, isn’t it?’

‘Oh no, Mrs Po!’ cried the little old lady eagerly, ‘it’s only the twenty-eighth, and it’s leap year! So you don’t know what it says in the Bible—“Leap year coming once in four, gives to February one day more!”’

‘It doesn’t say that in the Bible, my good woman, it’s only an old country-saying,’ put in Mr Po. ‘But it’s perfectly true. It’s tomorrow, not today, that is the last day of February. Do you think that people have often found a celandine before February was over?’

‘No I guess not,’ replied their hostess. But her expression was so vague and so dazed and so bewildered that Mrs Po felt afraid that her husband’s rebuke had troubled the old lady’s mind. ‘I wish,’ thought Mrs Po, ‘that he hadn’t said “my good woman” for that isn’t a nice way to address a lady we’re lunching with.”

The thoughts of Mr Po were running in a different channel. ‘I expect I was a fool,’ he thought, ‘to settle in Abertackle; though Crongy is a nice cottage and the walks round here suit me very well. But I’d like the place better if Mary had given me a few children to walk with me. She has to stay in the house, I know, to make sure that old Nancy isn’t treating half the tramps in the place to meals in the kitchen. But my walks were much more enjoyable in those old days at Crockover when Mary and I used to explore the place together. Of course we had Parson Ratrap to deal with then, but after that day I brought Cousin Tony to church with me and Ratrap found out he was a lord, the fellow quieted down.’

Neither Mr nor Mrs Po, nor indeed Ernest Willmop himself, whose hatred of everybody never prevented him from catching the special quirks and quibbles and cranks and whimsies and oddities of any particular person he met, tailed to miss the peculiar relation that existed between a gentleman in the Go Peninsula who was always called Squire Neverbang, and another gentleman who lived with him. These two persons were met by Mr and Mrs Po as they walked home that afternoon, and the four of them not only shook hands but were persuaded by Squire Neverbang to enter a little café called the Clapper-Cove and enjoy a cup of coffee.

‘What do you think of the way this chap Willmop goes barging about abusing everybody?’ enquired Mr Po addressing Ooly-Fooly, Squire Neverbang’s companion. Ooly-Fooly had been a famous European clown from the age of fifteen to the age of twenty-four. Then something happened to him the details of which, though gossip and scandal have derived exquisite satisfaction from turning the mystery of this something over and over and over and over, have never really been brought to light. Was it a normal love affair? We very likely will never know. Perhaps it was no love affair at all. Perhaps it was something to do with his mentality. Perhaps he suddenly made the discovery that he had gone mad. Perhaps he had discovered to his horror that he had been mad ever since some secret mental shock which he had never revealed.

‘I think,’ he said now, ‘what Willmop really wants is to be challenged in the old-fashioned manner to a duel! Would you let me challenge him, Squire?’

‘Oh no,’ threw in Mrs Po. ‘I know Willmop well enough to know that he’d treat such a challenge with ribald and vulgar contempt. I think what he really wants is a good hiding from someone who has the power to give it to him and the power to make him hold his tongue about it afterwards.’

It was then that to the astonishment of everybody Miss Tarnt and Mr Willmop entered the café together.

The landlord of the Clapper-Cove Café, whose name was Dick Underhead, was a big burly man who had one of those brains that clever people never understand and that stupid people always understand. ‘How wonderful,’ he now vociferated as if he had been the manager of a game of charades at a Public School, ready in a moment to set them off spouting like the frogs of Aristophanes, Krekekekex. Ko! Ax! Ko! Ax! Krekekekex! Ko! Ax!— ‘how wonderful to have all the learned people of Abertackle in my little show-place!’

“Tisn’t a show place, silly man,’ said Miss Tarnt. ‘It’s an eat-and-drink place. It’s a restaurant. Give us your best coffee and what you feel goes with it best! What does go with it best? You ought to know, Mr Underhead.’

There was something in her tone as she said this that pleased the burly host of the Clapper-Cove. He had the wit to see that Miss Tarnt was no ordinary pub-frequenting girl. He walked round behind the bar for a bit and then came back holding a couple of paper-bags in his hand. Then he himself sat down beside Miss Tarnt, before whom the barmaid, a plump little wench with a mischievous laugh, had already put a plate and a coffee pot and a double-handled mug.

'Get me a mug, Kitty,' he said, 'and some more coffee and I'll explain everything to the lady. And get the same for Mr Willmop and ask him if he wants milk and sugar.'

Mr Willmop was so noisily explicit on the subject of what he wanted that Dick Underhead was able to give Miss Tarnt, beside whom he seemed to have established himself lor the night, a private little lecture on the biscuits that went best with coffee.

'My husband found a celandine today in the rocks up the hill. Have either of you found one yet?' Mrs Po addressed this remark to both Squire Neverbang and Ooly-Fooly by way of making friendly conversation.

Ooly answered it blithely. 'No, madam, neither Squire nor I are flower-lovers or flower-discoverers. What we do see when we walk out are the mountains and the rivers and the sea and the sky. Yes, it's Nature in the large, not the little — tittle-fittle — wittle-spittle blossoms or leaves coming out that interest us.'

Squire Neverbang let his pet fool speak for them both, not only because it always tickled his fancy to hear what Ooly would say, but also because he had to greet two fresh customers entering Dick Underhead's café. These were Jack Coffiny and Tom Boundary, the well-bred gentlemen who behaved as if they were brothers though really they were only cousins.

Jack Coffiny was thinking to himself: ‘I should never have dared to come into this place alone; but with Tom I seem to be able to go anywhere. Isn’t it quaint how frightened I am of people and how I love the moment they start asking me about my Philosophy of Escape. Tom asked me just now how many books I’ve written on this subject and he didn’t seem a bit surprised when I told him it must be more than a dozen. Oh! do pray that when he asked me last night before we went to bed to sum up in as few words as possible what my message to the world really was I did put it right. I think I told him that our whole human life was, if we consider it mentally, apart from what we have to do and how we have to act, in the ordinary course of each day, a frantic struggle to escape from the old traditional legends and myths and customs and convictions and symbols and ideas and moralities and ethics and religion and idolatries and popular beliefs. I tried to explain that there is no mental reason why we should believe in cither God or the Devil. I told him that because Jesus was the greatest man who ever lived, as I verily believe he was, there is no reason for thinking that every single thing he said or thought was an absolute truth. Indeed, doesn’t his own cry from the Cross about God forsaking him prove that he had made the great mistake of his life by believing in God? Oh! do so pray to Jesus and to old warlike Jehovah, the tribal god of the Jews that I did manage to make clear to Tom what the real essence of my Philosophy of Escape amounted to: namely that we must shake oft all mythology, all religion, all worship of God, all dogmatic and explicit ideas of the nature of another life. We must escape, I explained to him, every fancy about another life alter death. The final escape, I told him, must be indeed an escape from life itself, from any sort of life, an escape into the divine nothingness of death.’

Tom Boundary was thinking as, led by Jack Coffiny, he shook hands with the Squire and Ooly-Fooly and with Charles and Mary Po and with

Willmop and Miss Tarnt, that he wished he hadn't to spend his time in this confounded cafe when he might be practising bowling and batting on the newly-rolled field where they had had nets set up so as to be able to practise at any hour of the day. 'If he doesn't' want to practise batting when we're down there tomorrow I won't bother him with it. We'll go down there late in the afternoon when the club's watching that match with the county's second eleven.'

How often does it happen in life that two of the best friends in the world when confronted by a group of other friends indulge in thoughts directly opposite! Tom Boundary would have been absolutely astonished had he known what thoughts were passing through Jack Coffiny's peculiar mind at that moment. And yet they were thoughts that Jack Coffiny had had since he was a child. He was thinking to himself: 'What a funk I am! What an incredible coward I am! I should never be in this café at all, talking to all these good people, if it weren't for Tom. And yet if they were a group of the undergrads of Cambridge preparing for a debate with the undergrads of Oxford on the topic whether God exists or not, Oxford saying he does and Cambridge saying he doesn't, I shouldn't be scared at all. In fact I'd be in an extra happy mood. I'd soon be showing these Oxonians that it's as silly to believe in the kind of God we are told to believe in as it is to believe that Gaia, the Earth, gave Cronos, or Saturn, the jagged pieces of flint to cut out the testicles of Ouranos or Uranus that were the cause of all the titanic monsters to whom she was forced to give birth. But we must remember that there are episodes in the New Testament quite as moving and as touching as anything in the Old Testament; and we must remember that the birth of Venus Aphrodite out of the sea-foam caused by the dismemberment of Ouranos has a mysterious beauty in it which carries us away beyond any merciful or merciless mutilation.'

While these encounters were taking place, and these thoughts were floating around in the Clapper-Cove Café, Miss Nelly Saunter and Lady Astis were approaching the cottage of Mr Bob Ord and Mrs Letty Ord, who had invited them to tea.

Mr Bob Ord had been helping his wife to spread the bread and butter and arguing with her about whether they ought to provide two kinds of jam for their visitors or only one. ‘What I think myself,’ said Mr Bob Ord, ’is that it’s best to give them only one kind of jam. Do you suppose that what people want when they don’t know you at all is to know all they can about you and your various peculiarities? Of course it isn’t. What they want is to tell you all their ways and tastes and peculiar personal interests. What they want, in other words, is to use you as something to bang upon and knock upon and hammer upon so that they can hear the echoes. And what is the echo they are after? The echo of themselves! Yes, that is what they want. With our habitual companions, who have had all the occasions, all the chances, all the opportunities they can possibly want there is now no more to be got out of us in the way of responsive echoes. They may tap and knock at the cabinets of peculiarity from which they want to get a reverberation or a sigh or groan of response, or at least a tinkle; but they get nothing but dead silence.’

Lady Astis and Miss Nelly Saunter had long been close friends; and recently, for they both had small fixed incomes, they had decided to share a cottage in Abertackle. They both had eccentric tastes, though in rather different ways. and something about the quaintness and oddity of Bob Ord and Letty Ord had appealed to them both very strongly the moment they met them.

‘The great thing,’ said Lady Astis as they approached the street door of the Ords, ’is to avoid like the devil making them angry with each other. Old

Bob is always saying things, calculated, I should have thought, to make any woman furious; but Letty is curiously forbearing. I suppose she knows old Bob so well that she has come to accept his cross-grained outbursts as part of her life. That's a sign of a wise woman, isn't it, Nelly' Men are as they are and apparently very difficult to change, however much we may try. Of course we aren't like that at all; and we soon get to know each other so well that—'

She interrupted herself by ringing the bell of 'Tickety-top', as the Ords' cottage was called. She did this with a smile so familiar to Nelly Saunter that it finished her remark without words.

'Oh here you are!' cried Letty Ord, opening the door. 'Bob was just saving he thought he saw you coming. He can see up and down the lane from our window which is often—' She too, just as Lady Astis had done with her words, completed her sentence with the welcoming sound of the door closing behind them. In a moment they had got their galoshes and jackets off; and the four of them were seated at a little square table enjoying cup after cup of tea and piece after piece of thin bread and butter with all the jam anybody could want spread daintily with little silver knives, one for each of them.

'I saw quite a lot of people,' said Bob Ord, 'go into Clapper-Cove Café. I wonder if old Underhead had enough drink saved up in his cellar to satisfy them.'

'I'm perfectly sure he had,' said Lady Astis.

'He's a crafty old time-server,' said Nelly Saunter. 'But I like him all the same. Do you remember, Susan?' (this remark was addressed to Lady Astis) 'how amusing he was when we took little Tottie Tender to have a glass of cider there? He behaved so nicely to her. I had a letter from her only a week ago in which she spoke of him. Uncle Paul took her with him to Geneva, which is full of our relations and they all were so sweet to her. She's back in Arundel now, where Uncle Paul has a life's job at the Castle. She was there on her birthday and when the Duke talked to her she begged him to give her Alice in Wonderland for a birthday present and the Duke gave her an old copy of his own which he'd kept since he was little. She wrote to me such a pretty letter about it, telling me she keeps it in her bedroom near her bed.'

'I've always thought,' said Bob Ord, 'that the time will come when people will be afraid to speak of machinery without reverently lowering their voices as we do now when we speak of God or the Holy Ghost. They are inventing calculating machines that have the same power of thought as a human brain, only they are less likely to be led astray. A time will probably soon come when this Earth will be ruled by a group of machines, one British, one French, one German, one American, one Spanish, one Portuguese, one Australian, one African, one Icelandic, one Canadian, and after that there will perhaps be a vast Eternal Machine that will rule not only this present Universe but all the Universes that the Life Force may create in the future.'

Whether it was the thought of Bob Ord's Eternal Machine or whether Lady Astis had come to the conclusion from watching her friend's face that Nelly was growing too nervous from listening to all this, she rose up from her chair, helped Nelly to rise by a gentle uplift of her sleeve, and told the Ords that there was a risk of some friends of theirs from London looking in before supper-time, so that they would have to go at once. She shook hands with them both in such a lively and grateful manner that it saved Nelly from anything but a quick handshake.

When the front door was shut behind her Letty Ord said to Bob Ord, 'You bet your life it was your machine talk that hurried them off.'

‘No, I don’t think so,’ said Bob to Letty. ‘I think the Lady thought her friend was feeling ill.’

A day or two after this little tea-party at the Ords’, Miss Tarnt was returning with a full basket from a shopping excursion when she met in a little side-street Squire Neverbang’s friend Mr Ooly-Fooly, who was evidently enjoying the sensation of being by himself without any special purpose or any imperative undertaking. The whole look, appearance, manner and expression of the man seemed to say to the ground beneath his feet and to the air around him and to the sky above his head: ‘Oh how heavenly it is to be tree from every mortal person you know and every practical thing to be done and everything in the past to remember and everything in the future to consider! To come loitering down a road like this with no one to love and no one to hate and no purpose to think of, with nothing but the road to travel on, the air to breathe, the sky to gaze at and no sensation in your whole body and no thought in your whole mind except the feeling of being happily alone, is this not far better than any paradise we are told of or any fairyland we have invented? Could anything in heaven or earth be better? Oh how delicious not even to have to think why it’s so delicious!

3

Miss Tarnt was overjoyed to meet Mr Ooly-Fooly alone like this. The moment she caught sight of him she said to herself: ‘I’m always being led on by my own silly mania for men who seem to me quite different from all other men. And here indeed is one, as anyone can see in a moment, who is completely different from all others, and yet I know him as well as I know anybody in Abertackle! Isn’t it funny that I’ve never got him to know me! I believe I could get him to be quite intimate with me. Perhaps meeting him like this alone in the street and just before twilight begins is an encounter designed especially for us by Providence itself! But I can hardly walk about the town alone with him, can I? Besides, I've walked too much already. I'm tired. I want to go home and rest. And I certainly wouldn't be at my best in talk, unless we could sit down. Oh, but that's a good idea. I've thought of it. Why don't I ask him to have a cup of tea with me at the Cokesy-Wokesy? Aunt Ora's always glad to see me there. In fact I helped her to invent that cosy name for her and Miss Evercan's tiny tea-shop. Yes! Yes! Oh yes! I'll take him to Cokesy-Wokesy and we'll have a lovely talk with Aunt Ora and Miss Evercan.'

She had no difficulty at all in persuading Ooly-Fooly to accompany her. It was indeed just the sort of thing that suited him at the moment; for happy though he was at being alone he had begun to feel a little hungry and thirsty.

Miss Tarnt and Ooly-Fooly were lucky. Nobody but its two owners were in the Cokesy-Wokesy when they arrived. Aunt Ora and Miss Evercan were enjoying their freedom from customers by having a game of cards all to themselves on one of the little tables. They jumped to their feet, and the moment they saw who had opened the door they both cried with delight: 'Oh! it's you! Oh! it's you!' and seating them both at the table where they had been playing they switched the cards away and tidied the table-cloth.

'How's Squire Neverbang?' enquired Aunt Ora.

'Oh, he's all right!' replied Ooly-Fooly. 'He's always all right. I wish I had something of his portentous calm. Do you know what he began last night?' Both Aunt Ora and Miss Evercan gazed eagerly at Ooly-Fooly.

'No! do tell us!' cried Miss Evercan.

'No! do tell us!' cried Aunt Ora.

Miss Tarnt looked pleasantly round the tea-shop. So far from being jealous of the way her companion had monopolized the interest of the two ladies she felt thankful to be with such a monopolizer. She always preferred to be an onlooker and a listener to taking the lead in anything that went on within a house. When it became a matter of being out of doors and of exploring the countryside or following any of the estuary banks of the Go Peninsula or taking a climb up Mount Gogglewog Miss Tarnt was always the one to take the lead.

‘Do you know what I think?’ said Ooly-Fooly.

‘No!’ cried both their hostesses with one voice.

‘I think,’ said Ooly-Fooly, ‘that we ought to start a little theatre in Abertackle. There are so many folk here who come crowding round every wireless and every telly, and we’ve got so many clever couples like Mr and Mrs Po and such real geniuses at comedy and tragedy like my friend Squire Neverbang, and not a few born clowns like my lone self, that it seems silly and wasteful not to start a real proper Little Theatre here that would give us all something exciting to concentrate on and use our dramatic abilities on. What do you think, Aunt Ora? What do you think. Miss Evercan?’

Aunt Ora replied without a second’s hesitation: ‘I’m all for it, Mr Fooly! I’m all for it!’

And Miss Evercan replied also, though in a less excited tone, ‘Yes, I agree entirely with such an idea; but we’d have to have stage-directors and ballet-mistresses and so forth, shouldn’t we? I mean people who know more about the stage than we do, wouldn’t we? and people who know how to cope with men and women in their separate characteristics?’

‘But men and women are both human beings aren’t they?’ threw in Miss Evercan.

‘They’re different sorts of human beings,’ went on Ooly-Fooly. ‘I’ve been studying the difference between them very carefully and not only in regard to one having a penis to push up the hole in front of the other’s body till it makes the other bleed by the loss of her virginity; but in the fact that the one has breasts with nipples so as to suckle babies and the other only little pink dots where a woman's two breasts are, though of course both of them have the same little dark scar in the centre of their human stomachs. But if you want to know the greatest difference in their ways by which you can always distinguish them I will tell you this. You never see a man touch his face. If he has a beard and a moustache he may give each of them a good pull now and again. But if he has no hair on his face at all he never touches it. But every woman and every girl is constantly touching her face. You watch them. You watch the one you live with. You'll soon see her hand go up to her face. It's just as if they thought that at any moment some delicate little flower, like a daisy or snowdrop, might suddenly start growing out of their face. But whatever the cause of their doing it may be, the fact remains that you can't look at any woman or girl for a minute or two without seeing her hand go up to her face.'

Ooly-Fooly stopped haranguing them and looked from the face of Aunt Ora to the face of Miss Evercan with a questioning eagerness.

But it was his companion Miss Tarnt who commented on his eloquent oration. 'What we all must remember,' said Miss Tarnt wisely, 'is the tact that neither a man nor a woman created this world, nor — I speak as what they call a tree-thinker — did some mysterious Being called God create it. It was — I speak as an unbeliever — created by what we call the life-force or that energy in the heart of Nature which drives everything to grow and to become more and more alive, that energy which at the beginning must have driven Man to come out of the sea and to climb up trees, that energy which is at this very moment suggesting to us through the receptive and porous mind of my friend Mr Fooly that we start a Little Theatre in Abertackle like that first and foremost of all Little Theatres which Maurice Browne started in the Middle West of America.'

'But the point is, my dear Miss Tarnt,' cried Aunt Ora eagerly, 'this adventurous energy you speak of is not confined to the creation of Group Movements and Organized Undertakings such as Little Theatres and Borough Committees: it shows itself in us, in ourselves, in the secret soul of each of us men and women individually. And don't you think there may be a faint danger that when we feel this urge within us to action on our own account, and then being, as most of us are, a bit nervous of striking out on our own, we may be tempted by the existence of a Little Theatre or a Borough Committee to dodge this imperative urge from within, which is surely much more in harmony with the energy in all Nature of which we're speaking than any group design like a Little Theatre or a Borough Committee?'

It is extraordinary how we are all affected by currents of feeling in the air originating from sources totally unknown to us. At this moment a weird surge of delight welled up in the heart of Miss Tarnt who was, you must remember, still nearer twenty than thirty, as she gazed at her pick-up, Ooly-Fooly. 'He, anyway,' she thought, 'will be, as long as he lives, whether Squire Neverbang is his companion or a silly girl like me, an embodiment of the World-Energy that created this World and perhaps this whole Universe. And how lovely to think of his frippery, flickety, flittery, fluttering ways! It is indeed delicious to think of the World's Creative Force being embodied in the jocularity and airy-fairy flightiness of a born clown!'

'Thinking thus,' as Homer always says when his champions are preparing to strike a specially terrific blow, Miss Tarnt jumped from her seat, said a lively goodnight to their two hostesses and carried Ooly-Fooly off with her.

‘What rough manners that girl has!’ exclaimed Miss Evercan.

‘She was badly brought up, you know,’ said Aunt Ora quietly. ‘Her mother was a street-walker before the Reverend Tarnt married her. She died in childbirth. Mr Tarnt was a disgrace to the Church — think of a clergyman marrying a whore! But everybody thought he was a very good preacher. What a pity Miss Tarnt didn’t grow up quick enough to hear him preach. Think of her father being a great preacher and her mother a street-walker!’

4

Miss Tarnt’s lodging wasn’t far from Squire Neverbang’s house where Ooly-Fooly lived, so they walked together through the evening streets to that edifice, for it was a large dwelling, and said goodnight at the door. Miss Tarnt felt she could have kissed Ooly-Fooly, for she had taken a real liking to him; but she didn’t dare to take such a risk just then. Besides, Squire Neverbang might have been watching from some upper window. So she just tapped him on his hand with her bare knuckles. ‘We’ll have tea again there, won’t we?’ she said. And though all he said was ‘Sure we will, my dear!’ she derived a curious and special satisfaction from his calling her ‘my dear’, as if they were friends of quite long standing. When she reached her lodging she wasn’t sorry to find her landlady, Dilly Dally, standing at the foot of the stairs.

‘I’ve taken up your cup of tea,’ she said, ‘I’ve left it by your bed. I knew you’d be back by eight and wouldn’t want more than one cup. But I thought you’d like just that one, after being out to a regular tea-party. Did all go well? They are a funny pair, that couple of old spinning-wheels. But I confess I have myself a sneaking fondness for them. Anyway they’ve as good a basketful of naughty tales about old folk in Abertackle as you can hear anywhere else! I like Aunt Ora the best. Which do you like the best?’

Miss Tarnt pondered thoughtfully. Then she said, ‘Were you christened Dilly, my dear? It goes so well with Dally that anybody’d think they went together and that your real name was Brown or Smith or Jones or Green or Robinson. Yes, I like Aunt Ora the best. But I like Miss Evercan too. I love both the dear old things. Do you think, my dear, that when you and I get as old as they are we’ll be as nice a pair of old knitikins as they are? Oh yes, Dilly, but do for the Lord’s sake tell me whether you were christened just for the sport of making it go with Dally?’

Miss Dilly Dally looked smilingly at her lodger. ‘No, my dear,’ she said. ‘My old dad, Jeremiah Dally, was a Jewish Rabbi in Birmingham. He and Mother were both killed in the blitz in the war, when I would have been too, only Cousin Tuckerin had taken me to the shop where they sold fancy-dress dolls. Cousin Tuckerin always said that in wartime the best thing for mothers to do was to nurse babies in the parlour and the best thing for girls to do was to nurse dolls by the nursery fender. Mother’s name was Abigail and I never have forgotten how she taught me to read the Bible. She made me read it, the Old Testament I mean, from beginning to end. Mother and Father were killed when I’d got to the forty-seventh chapter of Isaiah. And I’ve never read a line since then.’

‘Do tell me, Dilly,’ said Miss Tarnt, ‘who that young couple are you’ve got now in the basement?’

‘Oh them,’ cried Dilly Dally. ‘I’ll tell you all about them when I bring up your cup of tea in a few minutes. Then you’ll have something to dream about! I’ll be taking down their supper to them presently.’

Miss Tarnt went upstairs to her bedroom; and in about half an hour when she had already got her dressing-gown on and every thing else except her nightgown off, her landlady kept her word; and while they shared a cup of tea sitting on the bed she told her about the couple in the basement.

‘The boy,’ she said, ’is Bickery Bum and the girl is Fanny Flabbergast. Their love-story is a quaint and touching one. Bickery was an assistant gamekeeper on the estate of Squire Neverbang. He had to be always on the look-out for poachers; not only four-legged ones, such as badgers and foxes, but two-legged ones such as greedy and acquisitive rascais from the slums of the Go Peninsula. Fanny Flabbergast came of a well-known literary family in Valentia and was a clever girl who had earned quite a considerable income from teaching English in a Pans girls’ school. In the Go Peninsula she was fond of taking long walks by the banks of one of the estuaries, all of which led eventually out to sea. It was on one of these very walks that she encountered Bickery, who was a skilled fisherman and caught dace and roach and perch and sometimes even a pike in the Go estuaries. They were attracted to each other at once and in summer time lots of Abertackle townspeople would get accustomed to meeting them; she carrying bunches of wild flowers and he carrying his rod and the fish he had caught. It was our clergyman, one Reverend Squot, who must have put it into their heads to get married. He confided to me once, for though a bachelor, he liked talking to females, and I think he derived quite a smattering of naughty and mischievous delight from telling me about it, that when Bickery and Fanny asked him whether it was right for them to partake of Holy Communion at Church when they had been making love to each other he had replied that if they were engaged to be married it was perfectly and absolutely all right. Sex-play, he told them, is entirely justifiable in the eyes of God if it is going to last, and above all if it is going to result in children. “I”, he told them, “am the representative of God on Earth.” I remember being so shocked when one Sunday I found Bickery embracing Fanny in a mossy glen and making love to her on our ground in a way that fully displayed their sexual excitement that I cried, “I am the representative of God upon Earth and as God I command you to be officially and formally engaged to be married.” They listened to the Reverend Squot’s words obediently with the result that in a week or two he married them and gave them Holy Communion.

‘Thus it has come about,’ said Dilly Dally to Miss Tarnt, ‘that I take them their meals in the basement of my lodging-house where they sleep in the same bed and worship God without restriction by making as much love as they like.’

5

Life seems growing stranger and stranger every day,’ said Mr Charles Po to Mrs Mary Po as they sat by their drawingroom fire a few days after Miss Tarnt and Ooly-Fooly came to tea ‘with Aunt Ora and Miss Evercan. ‘I wonder if we did right in letting things happen like that.’

‘Don’t talk like that, Charley,’ protested Mary Po. ‘You’ve forgotten how it was and how difficult they were to manage. Do remember, my dear, how carefully we argued it all out that evening in June after that dreadful afternoon when Gor was so rude that you boxed his ears and he snatched Nelly up in his arms and carried her out; and when I called after him, “Where are you taking her?” he only shouted back those terrible words that are always returning to me in my dreams, “over the hills and far away!” I know you were right to be angry with him and box his ears. Most fathers would have given him a sound flogging, but it was so cruel of him to take little Nelly off with him. She was only thirteen you know and girls of that age—’

‘Don’t talk about it any more, my dear!’ groaned Mr Po. ‘Gor was a queer child from his babyhood up. You never could tell what he’d do next or say next. We must remember this, my dear, anyway — Nelly loved him intensely, desperately, far more than she loved either of us.'

'But isn't that incest, Mary dear?' said Charley Po gravely. 'I don't know what it is!' cried his wife, 'and I'm sure dear little Nelly didn't either! When a young girl of her age falls in love she thinks of nothing but the youth she loves. Gor loved her too. He'll look after her, you can depend on that. He'll fight for her, work for her, slave for her. I'm not exaggerating, my dear Charley. Don't think that tor a moment. He loved her just as you loved me when we first met and you were seventeen and I was fifteen.'

'But oh I wish, my dear,' groaned Mr Po, 'that I hadn't boxed his ears. But after what he said to me — yes, to both of us, what else could I do? If I'd behaved like that when I was a boy my father would have given me a sound thrashing.'

'No! but think, my dear Charley, here we are, two elderly people in our seventies and how lovely it would have been to have Gor and Nelly to look after us! They ran away from us because we didn't properly understand them; because we frightened them, because we were too severe with them.'

'Well, my dear Mary,' said Charley Po, 'you must remember I did all I could do to find out where they had gone. But nobody had seen them, nobody in the whole of Abertackle that I could find or hear of; nobody in the whole of the Go Peninsula. You must give me credit for a great deal of unpleasant effort and a great many unpleasant encounters and interviews. I did my very utmost. But they were gone, just as Gor called back to you: "over the hills and faraway".'

To Charles Po's astonishment his wife rose to her feet. 'I can't listen to any more of your excuses, my dear,' she cried indignantly. 'If you hadn't boxed Gor's ears that day they would both be with us now. Heaven bestowed those two children upon us in spite of all our sins; and instead of bringing them up properly or trying to understand them we allowed a great gap to yawn bigger and bigger and bigger between them and us. We were too severe with them, too narrow with them, too traditional and conventional with them. We ought to have got it lodged in our pair of stupid heads that both the world and our life in the world has to move forward. There is something in this existence of ours — call it what you will — that refuses to stop moving on, yes, refuses to let what they call evolution be hindered and weighed down and loaded up by obstinate stupidity and foolish clinging to all the old things. Many a night, when you were busy reading Jeremy Taylor or Sir Thomas Browne or The Anatomy of Melancholy or Robinson Crusoe or Middlemarch or Finnegans Wake, our son Gor would be expounding to me the most original, the most daring, the newest and most unexpected theories about the nature of matter and these atoms and monads and neutrons and all those other things we read about in the daily papers and that of course I don't understand a thing about. But Gor did! Yes, he did! You should have heard all the ideas he told me about! Of course he was too awed by his father's presence and by the old tradition of respect for his father to rattle away like that to you. But I swear to you, my dear, if you'd heard him you would have been impressed just as I was.'

It had been very natural indeed that anyone should have acquired such an admiration for Gor but it was also inevitable that it should have ended, or, let me say, should have been interrupted, in the way it was, because Gor was essentially such a peculiar and original youth and the morions of his mind were so deeply born and so violently outflung that nothing could make you sure what he would be up to next. Gor's waist was small but his arms were long for his age; and his hips were broad and muscular; and you felt as you watched him that he could respond not only to any physical challenge by leaping in any direction, but so massive was his forehead and so intelligent his deep-sunk eyes that you could not help feeling that whatever mental appeal you made to him would meet with the exact response you wanted.

As a matter of fact it was under a low arch in a corner of Hyde Park Gardens in London that young Gor was resting that afternoon while he pondered on the great undertaking he had decided to begin that day. Yes, young Gor now was arranging his mind according to his plan. ‘Yes, it’s from this here London that I shall make my start,’ said young Gor to himself, ‘although I shall always regard Abertackle as my home and I shall always be pleased to observe among my coats of arms of Oxford and Cambridge that of Jesus College, Cambridge, where Laurence Sterne began inventing his Shandy tales. But whatever I find in these confounded colleges or in London, Abertackle will remain my home. Who knows? Perhaps one day the old village of Abertackle will be as famous because of me as Jesus College at Cambridge is because of Laurence Sterne, the Shandy man. It was certainly in Abertackle that I learnt to walk on air as easily as a dancer dances on a stone floor. My parents saw me with stick in hand learning or rather teaching myself to walk on air.’

6

‘Yes! I, Gor, am now starting on my career from London, although my home is in Abertackle, in the Go Peninsula. I have learnt to walk on air with the aid of a stick and I am now setting out with the intention of walking round the Sun and the Moon and all the various stars near them of which we get glimpses, including the group to which we have given the name of Orion’s Belt. This is for me, Gor, the start of my career. How it will end the spirits of the air will know better than I ever shall. Oh what a thing Life is! And what a thing Death is!

‘Well, here I am,’ he repeated to himself. ‘And I don’t feel a touch of dyspepsia on my left side nor a touch of duodenal hurting me on my right side where my new trouble, some bad little growth, must have developed. But I am really beginning my true career.’

Deeper and deeper darkness soon began to surround him as the evening became night and so cloudy a night that it was not long before the moon followed the sun; and most of the little glittering stars followed the moon into extinction. Not all of them at once, however, nor was Gor displeased at catching a glimpse of one or two of these little gleaming jewels at intervals. At least they gave him a reassurance that he was doing what he wanted to do, that is to say whirl round the whole astronomical galaxy that surrounded the Earth, where he had been born and brought up, and indicating that he was pursuing the course he had proposed for himself and that he had followed in his imagination night after night. So he went hurrying through the darkness, striding at something like a run with his big stick clutched tight in his right hand. It was when he reached the darkest spot in his circular advance that he met young Maia Tuffalon. They both stopped and stood stone-still staring in bewilderment at each other.

‘Where are you going?’ said Gor to Maia.

‘Where have you come from?’ said Maia to Gor.

‘Abertackle’s my home,’ said Gor. ‘But I’ve come from London. Where is your home?’

‘I too come from London,’ said Maia. ‘But my home is in Portland.’

‘Near Portland Bill?’ enquired Gor.

‘Oh no!’ cried Maia. ‘Near Chesil Beach.’

‘Have you a mother and father?’ enquired Gor.

‘No,’ replied Maia. ‘I have only got great-grandmother Tweedle-Weedle. We live alone together in Tickery-Wickery Villa, a nice big comfortable house where our people have lived for a hundred years. Have you got a father and mother?’

‘To tell you the honest truth, my dear girl, I have run away from them. I have a sister whom I love so much that I have hidden her away from our father and mother, hidden her under the care of an old naval captain for whom she cares as if he were her uncle. I often go to see her. I often sleep in their house. I do envy you, my dear friend, your great-grandmother. I’d give half the money I’ve got — and it’s only a little — to have even a grandmother.’

Evidently delighted to have aroused this handsome young man’s envy, Maia Tuffalon tried to increase it. ‘My great-granny,’ she hastened to tell him, ‘had a brother who lived at St Ives and had several wives, but his wives were all alive and lived with him still. He loved to tell his old sister that he was a poly-something. I forget how to spell the word but I remember he was mighty proud of being whatever it was and whenever he went along the London road he would take his ladies with him as if they were so many schoolgirls.’

7

‘You will come on with me?’ said Gor to Maia. ‘You can take my arm when you feel tired.’ Maia smiled. ‘I don’t want to leave you yet. But unlike you I don’t go on by any steady movements. I go by sudden inspiration.’

It was at that moment that they were overtaken by a person whom both of them knew; for he was famous in that part of the country, namely David Cox, the painter. He was being carried through the air by a space-horse, a creature about whom all the local legends were full but whom few actual persons had ever seen. This particular space-horse who now brought Cox quite close to them was different from others of his kind in that he had a horn, a knotted twisted horn.

‘Where are you two going?’ Cox enquired of them.

‘Exploring space,’ replied Gor.

‘A night or two ago,’ said Cox, ‘I couldn’t sleep. I had been painting several forest scenes, none of which pleased me. I dreamt that if I went on the following Friday to one of the paths I had painted I should find a child’s toy chariot harnessed to a space-horse which would be ready to take me anywhere. So when that day came, dream-drugged I recklessly set out and settled in my boy’s chariot and whipping up its space-horse off I went. But I never thought I’d meet Gor of Gordale or Maia of Go Peninsula!’

Thus speaking, as Homer would say, the painter Cox waved his whip like a flag and all three of them, Gor and Maia with Cox leading, went off round the world.

Oddly enough, in their interest at being three against the whole bulk of Space none of them realized the personal significance of those horns on the space-horse’s head. This lack of insight was by no means unobserved by the alert consciousness of the brain out of which these horns were projected, the brain in fact of none other than the Devil himself. ‘Oh,’ thought he, ‘how incredibly stupid human beings are! Nor is this confounded space-horse into whose being I have entered much more intelligent than the silly girl and these two idiotic men. My old fussy enemy God became as stupid as this before he died. Fancy his being able to invent and manufacture all he did out of empty space, sun, moon, earth and stars, and not being able to prevent old age making him dotty and helpless. I confess I miss the old fool. After all, I owe him my life. He invented me. Shall I get old and idiotic as he did? I wonder if it is possible, as I heard one of them say to another not many days ago, that some clever scientific individual will arise one day and invent a new world more intricate and remarkable even than old God's world now? I hope I'll still be alive on that day. But maybe not. Prophesying is one of the arts that have passed away. What also will have passed away will be the human traditional imagination as to what I am thinking about behind these horns of mine. The general idea no doubt is that I am rejoicing about the death of God — that is to say if the news of that event has already swallowed up the old idea that it was impossible for God to die. But if I were to blurt out now without any hesitation all that I am actually thinking, how completely different all the mortal creatures now alive on the earth and in the sun and moon and every one of these glittering stars would find it from all that they are imagining! As I say, they are imagining that I am going over in my mind every detail of God's death. They are imagining that I am wondering whether I could re-create the flames of Hell so that these flames would be waiting to cause the souls of the dead, who have not willed and worshipped and prayed and purged themselves enough, to suffer the everlasting pains that God so loved to inflict. The truth is that all this time what I had in mind was a series of desperate conjectures about how far it would be possible to re-create the sun, the moon, the stars and this earth with all their inhabitants exactly as they were in those days before the death of God, I mean full of the fear of God and full of all that Curtis Freshel was warning them about, helped by that "Millennium Guild" in which Freshel's wife was so absorbed. By saying "re-create" of course I don't mean re-create the material substance of sun or moon or earth or stars. I mean re-create the state of mind of the dwellers in these worlds and you must remember that in the world-dwellers I am not including animals and other non-human creatures but only human beings and such entities as closely resemble them. I don't suppose any of you three, Gor or Maia or Cox, have ever seen a space-horse before. I expect you think they are purely legendary apparitions. To tell you the truth I had never seen one myself till I took possession of this one body and soul.

‘What I expect you three would like me most of all to tell you is when and how I first met, during those early peregrinations with the Knights of King Arthur, the new Merlin himself. I must be ready to tell you.’ (So the Devil’s thoughts ran on.) ‘But I don’t feel like doing so just yet. Why don’t I? Well, I think it is because of that overpowering sensation I had when I first saw him that he was part of myself and I was part of him. Yes, it was no less than that. Part of myself he was and part of himself I was. The second I saw him that feeling came over me like the curling switch of a whirlwind’s tail. It was partly a feeling that something had pulled me in half in order to make room for him. But it was a still more extraordinary feeling that something had pulled him in halt in order to make room for me. Henceforth, I thought to myself, Merlin is partly me and I am partly Merlin. But soon after this a much more searching thought leapt like a fish out of me and back again whence it had sprung. This thought said, “Never when I was within him or he was within me did I have the feeling of actually being Merlin to the extent of my thoughts being his thoughts. Never For a moment did I feel myself to be Merlin thinking to himself within me, though I certainly did feel myself to be me thinking to myself within Merlin. This surely shows that even with a Being possessed of the spiritual power of Merlin the old natural rules of identity, of me and thee, together with our thoughts, have to go on as usual.”’

Well, the three adventurous explorers, Gor, Maia and Cox, not to speak of the Devil in the space-horse’s body, went boldly on into the darkness. Little did any of them know that no less a being than Murdrawla, the largest of all the space-demons in existence, was hovering over them. The contact, a completely psychic one, between the Devil in possession of Cox’s space-horse and Murdrawla was an extremely simple one, but not devoid of its own special dramatic interest. The Devil knew well that he was a good deal more powerful, as evil spirits go, than Murdrawla could claim to be, but he also knew that Murdrawla had not the slightest idea of this fact. To her mind, as soon as the impact between them began it was like a very powerful Air-Demon, namely herself, discovering the fact that some much smaller, almost infantile spirit of the same class had taken possession of Mr Cox's air-steed and was imposing its superior energy upon that creature's movements. It has always been Murdrawla's beauty that has fascinated visitors to space from sun and moon and earth and from every galaxy of stars. It is impossible to convey in ordinary human words the exquisite beauty of Murdrawla. How did space give birth to her? That was the question which it was impossible to prevent from coming into every visitor's mind. When David Cox asked the lady herself this daring question, her reply was as follows: 'I haven't, my dear sir, the faintest idea. I can remember when I was a child of two or three or four. I can remember when I was fourteen, but cannot remember any parents or any companion at any epoch. I'm very glad you like my looks. They are all I have.'

So Murdrawla floated above them and Gor was aware of the unequalled sweetness of the aura of feminine flesh. Maia was aware of it too, but being feminine herself it did not affect her in the same way though it affected her quite a lot. David Cox was extremely affected but what he felt was mingled with various other agitations. Gor was suffering from acute dyspepsia under his left rib as they all three moved on. Whatever it was, however, that hurt him under his right rib struck him now as being greatly eased. But the further and faster they went the worse did Gor's dyspeptic pain become till Maia couldn't help asking him why he was grabbing so desperately with both hands under his braces at the left top of his trousers. 'It's dyspepsia, my dear,' he replied. 'It's this old trouble I've had since I was fourteen at school.'

'It has nothing to do then with this naked angel or demon flying above our heads?'

'Oh no,' replied Gor decisively, 'nothing whatever. I had it before she appeared and I shall doubtless have it still when she has disappeared.'

'Perhaps,' said David Cox, 'if you prayed to the lady over our heads as if she were a goddess, she would act like a goddess and command that pain to go away. Pain is a thing, especially that kind of pain, that is particularly responsive to divine influence.'

'But how do I know,' cried Gor angrily, 'that this naked creature over our heads is a divine influence? How do I know that she isn't some pretty devilkin that God created tor a special torment of the lost souls he loves gloating over in Hell?'

'Do you know what I think?' said Maia suddenly.

'Do tell us, tor Heaven's sake!' cried Gor. 'What you think about this lady over our heads is the important thing. You are much more likely to grasp the situation than we are.'

At this point in their plight David Cox addressed Maia: 'What had we better do? You must understand this Being as none of us men can.'

'Well, I think she wants a lover. I think it you, Gor, or you, David Cox, were to stretch out your arms and throw them round her you would find she would yield at once to your embrace.'

'But would either of us be able to fly with her through space?'

'She would see to that,' responded Maia. 'An angel doesn't need help from a mortal man when she is holding him in her arms.'

It can be well imagined how the Devil, still in full possession or David Cox's space-horse, listened to this conversation. 'I wonder.' he thought within himself, ‘what this space-angel would feel if, as David Cox embraced her, she suddenly became aware of my presence within the space-horse beneath them? It is really very queer how much better God understood me and I understood God than either of us has ever understood the thoughts of human beings or animals. I think I understand animals better than God does and he understands human beings, especially children, better than I do. Love and Hate are more interesting, far far more, than understanding. We don’t need any understanding to love and hate. I long to ask this naked angel above us what she hates and what she loves, quite apart from me and God and men and women and children and animals and birds and insects. What I love most of all are shadows and what I hate most of all are ceilings. Why in the name of Heaven and Hell do we have to have those horrid, grey flat, colourless, meaningless, lifeless lids above the airy spaces of the room or rooms where our nicest human beings spend their lives? I, the Devil, have only to look at the backs of the books in this bookshelf in this room up the nine or eleven steps of this house, to see what I love best here: namely the backs of the four enormous folios of Littré’s dictionary of the French language. But it is this lovely naked girl Murdrawla herself whom I would like most to obey at this juncture, if she would only speak up boldly and tell us all what would be the wisest thing for us to do.’

8

Gor felt an ecstasy of happiness when Murdrawla responded to his outstretched arms. In five minutes they were locked together in a passionate embrace and for half a year they were flying and floating sometimes between Cox and Maia. sometimes alone in the darkness without the sight of a single star I heir excrement, like that of a pair of enamoured horses or cattle slid down through the darkness, followed by their urine; and as ‘wandering pedestrians in London’s most frequented parks saw it. or even perhaps felt it fall rumours kept spreading that certain swiftly mewing vessels were careless about their sanitary overflow. As can be imagined. The Devil in his exultant possession of the soul — and in the sense of the body too — of David Cox’s space-horse found himself perpetually conveying that highly-strung adventurer into positions from which he could spy with not very honourable interest upon the united and double-enhanced swooping of the love-wave whose foam-white vibrations made the air quiver as it carried Gor’s caressing ardours and Murdrawla’s aerial responses within the mystic dance-curve of zodiacal destiny. But Cox’s rapturous contemplations of aerial love, accompanied by Maia’s virginal commentaries, were not the only background to what Gor and Murdrawla were enjoying, it was the Devil who had suddenly got into his inexhaustible head a new idea, he had begun to feel that his guidance of the space-horse that was pulling Cox along was not causing as much disturbance to the three friends, Gor, Cox and Maia, as he had intended to cause. It had had, as was only too clear to him now, no effect at all upon the movements of Murdrawla. Then it suddenly came into his head that he must do something to vex, hinder, trouble, disturb, interrupt, delay, defeat, agitate, upset, bewilder, confuse, harass, invalidate the love between Gor and Murdrawla. What could he do? They were so happy together, so absolutely absorbed in each other. What could he do to shake up and belittle their frantic and abandoned emotion? Then the idea occurred to him. Yes! Yes! That is what he would do! No sooner had it come into his head than he did it. He shook off his hold on Cox’s space-horse and left it free to follow its own will. Then he quietly, cunningly, silently, surreptitiously, left Cox and Maia to themselves and flung his whole personality and all his strength into the stick Gor held in his hand, which contact with the naked girl had not loosened from his grip. Oh how happy the Devil felt when he had plunged into Gor’s stick and taken full possession of it! Gor did not relax for a second his embrace of Murdrawla because of the stick in his hand. If he clutched the stick tighter because — though he knew it not — the Devil was in it, he embraced Murdrawla closer than before. But the Devil was thinking exultantly within himself: ‘What is now to prevent me from ruling the whole universe? Riding as I am upon the bodies — even between the bodies now and then — of these two lovers and dominating with absolute control this magic stick of Gor, and knowing, as few others in the world do, that God is dead, who is there that can prevent my declaring myself Lord of the entire universe?’

‘My space-horse is acting very queerly,’ said Cox to Maia. ‘I can’t understand what has come over it.’

‘I expect,’ said Maia to Cox, ‘it has to do with those two making love as they float above our heads. When human beings act in an unusual way, some way they’re not accustomed to witness, animals always tend to get funny.’

‘I wish,’ said Cox to Maia, ‘I hadn’t started making love to Murdrawla. If only I’d just let her sail over me untouched all would have been well.’

‘All is well,’ said Maia to Cox.

‘I pray so,’ said Cox to Maia.

‘I wish we could put a stop,’ said Maia to Cox, ‘to this love-making in the air. I think it is not only terribly agitating to your space-horse but I begin to find it rather bad for my health. I have never before felt seasick in this space-trip of ours but I have felt like that twice lately now. And I’ve been flying quite as calmly as usual. I’m sure it’s the effect upon me of this airy-fairy love-making.’

While Gor and Murdrawla followed by Cox and Maia were steadily encircling the sun, the moon and the stars, led by Gor's stick, which in its convulsive possession by the Devil was able to be instinctively aware how closely Cox and Maia were following it, the Arch-Eagle of the Universe in a remote portion of space was unfolding its tremendous wings. Its parents had instructed it, when it first emerged from its colossal egg-shell which it broke into tiny bits, how to unfold its wings so as not to create too much disturbance in the air. But it was not long after it had learnt this lesson, that they and their nest had disappeared forever. When its gigantic wings were at last unfolded the Arch-Eagle gazed intently towards the sun, moon, earth and stars and did not fail to notice Murdrawla and her lover Gor with his Devil-possessed stick, followed by Maia and Cox. Maia was moving through the air just as gracefully as if she were flying and Cox was rather irritably trying to drive his space-horse in the direction of a deliberate circle round sun, moon, earth and stars. No sooner had the Arch-Eagle caught sight of this group than he began flying towards them. There was something about the couple of lovers who led them that especially appealed to him. Before his parents had disappeared forever into the Heaven of space-dwellers they had named their son Paragon; so it was Paragon who came rushing down and tried to seize Murdrawla by the throat. The sweetness of her body was such, however, and her laugh when she felt him there so enthralling that his jaws refused to close, especially as his head was receiving extremely sharp blows from a stick that Gor carried. The next thing that happened was simple and natural enough. Paragon unclosed his jaws, unfolded his great wings and rose up above them all, where he kept flying backwards and forwards just as Murdrawla and Gor had done before. Maia, with nothing but her arms and legs, and Cox with his erratic space-horse, felt extremely uneasy as they watched this huge bird, that looked more and more like a dragon as it grew darker, flying backwards and forwards above their heads.

But Paragon's mind was working actively. 'What can I do with them?' he thought to himself, 'now that I have got this little group under my control? Heaven and Earth! I believe I've got it. Why shouldn't I convey them all to that remote and solitary region of empty space of which I caught a glimpse a week ago? I might establish a little kingdom for them there! I think this fellow Gor and this exquisitely lovely creature Murdrawla would make a fine king and queen. In tact I might go further and have their kingdom turned into a sort of psychic empire over every country in the world. I could fly to all these countries and carry with me a paper for them to sign submitting to the spiritual authority, whether they are Christians or Buddhists or Mohammedans, of King Gor and his great mysterious wife Queen Murdrawla.'

The great Arch-Eagle Paragon, according to what he had decided, now spread his enormous wings, and using them with the comfortable and easy motion of a tidal wave whose original earthquake was far away, swept Gor and Murdrawla and David Cox with his hard-working space-horse and the gallant solitary Maia flying quite alone, without causing them any special agitation, till, somewhere about eleven o'clock in the morning by Abertackle time he established them safely in the secluded region he had discovered. Once there it was easy for him to inspire them, for the Arch-Eagle had more psychic power than any other offspring of pure space, with all the daring and audacity he had been formulating for them in his own mind. He soon collected them all around him and one of the most remarkable conferences began that have ever taken place in the world. Perhaps it was the most remarkable of all. At any rate it shall now be described. The first word to be uttered came from the hooked beak of the Arch-Eagle; and it took the form or a simple and direct question. It was addressed by the Arch-Eagle to the Devil who suddenly emerged from Gor's stick and presented himself, horns and all, in his accustomed human shape, at the head of the bed of cloudy mist upon which, side by side, Gor and Murdrawla were seated.

'Who are you?' said Paragon to the Devil.

'Well,' replied the latter, 'I am tempted to reply "Ask Mister Cox", tor he belongs, as indeed does Mr Gor also, to the race of earth-dwellers who invented me. They also were the ones who invented God, although I shrewdly suspect that if you had put your question to God before he died of old age, he would have retorted that he invented himself. Yes, both God and the Devil were the invention of the earth dwellers, God being their idea of the first cause of everything Good and the Devil being their idea of the first cause of everything Evil. The human race in its earliest ages must have had a wild and desperate fear of all animals with horns, which must be the reason that, though they imagined my form and shape to be human, they always visualized me with horns protruding from my head.'

'What did you feel like when you were first invented by the Christians? For we all know that neither the Buddhists nor the Mohammedans believe in you.'

'Well,' replied the Devil with the greatest ease. 'I just felt an enormous sense of relief. You see they invented me to embody all the most wicked things they felt themselves and I can't tell you what relief I felt when I found that to please the people who invented me and to be their invention to the limit, I had only to hate as much as I could! Oh how I loved hating! And to hate as much as I liked and could — Oh what a perfect joy!'

While the Devil was recovering his breath after his eulogy upon hatred Gor was examining his stick very carefully, the stick out of which the Devil had burst forth. ‘How did this Evil one,’ he enquired of Murdrawla, hugging her to his heart, ‘get out of my stick as it lay between us?’

‘The question I would like to answer, if only I could,’ replied Murdrawla, ’is how he got into it. I have the idea, though how that came into my head I don’t know, that before he got into your stick he was in possession of David Cox’s space-horse. But if that were so it seems very queer that he should leave possession of a horse to enter a stick.’

‘I expect you can never tell with devils; I expect they never know themselves,’ said Gor, ‘what they’re going to do next.’

‘Well,’ said Maia, ‘we must think clearly and decide definitely what we’re going to do. Our present lord and master is our friend Paragon the Arch-Eagle who brought us hither. I suggest that humbly and naturally, without pretending any emotion we don’t feel, we ask him what he would advise us to do.’

‘I can reply to that at once,’ said the Arch-Eagle. ‘I advise you all to agree simultaneously, without electing or voting or arguing or discussing the matter at all, to make Gor your King and Murdrawla your Queen and appoint Maia as your Defence Minister and David Cox as your Finance Minister. Then I would, all four of you together, with what help I can give you, draw up a document, in as legal language as you know how, announcing that we have established in this region of empty space a new world kingdom above all Christians, all Buddhists, all Mohammedans, yes! a psychic, or spiritual World-Kingdom, entitled “The Kingdom of Mankind”. I myself. Paragon, the super ArchEagle, will be the herald or royal messenger of this new state, and I will fly to every country in the world carrying our legal paper and I will make the government of each country I visit sign with its official signatures its spiritual adherence and submission to our universal world rule.’

Gor and Murdrawla calmly accepted their position as King and Queen of Mankind's Kingdom, of which Maia became the Minister of Defence and Cox the Minister of Finance, while the Arch-Eagle, whose name was Paragon, became the courier or herald of the New State. The ArchEagle had no difficulty in securing General de Gaulle's signature nor that of Dr Adenauer but he was refused any by East Germany and also by South Africa because of apartheid, and also by Turkey and Pakistan. New Zealand and Australia took a long time to persuade and Canada would have been the same, if it had not been that using a wise hint from a subtle writer in that remarkable country the Arch-Eagle flew through the office window of one of their chief foreign correspondents when he was fast asleep, and obtained his signature while he was in one of the curious nightmares his sleep was subject to, a nightmare which lent itself to the Arch-Eagle's appearance and request.

Then it happened that from a part of America where there was a settlement of Red Indians without one white man, or one black man, or even — for it was at some distance from China — one yellow man, there came an appeal to the great-winged Emissary of this New State of Mankind to pause and allow them to consider the object of his journey. With every degree of willingness, as you can imagine, the Arch-Eagle stopped in his flight, and entered into a colloquy with the Red Indians and their Chief which ended in the signature by this latter, in a handwriting that made King Gor and Queen Murdrawla feel exultant when they saw it, of a special request to be included among those who supported the New State of Mankind.

But what none of the supporters of the New State realized, and what even the messenger of the New State didn't realize, was that before the time of Adam and Eve, that is to say before our human race began its career upon earth, there existed a Being whom all the living creatures of our world, fish, animals, birds, reptiles, when they referred to him in any intercourse among themselves — and this included insects also — always referred to as the 'Unknown One'.

This Being had the body of an enormous lizard and the head of a rhinoceros; but out of its eyes there looked forth an expression that was most decidedly human, and in addition to this there emerged from its shoulders two rather short but otherwise quite normal arms and hands. This Being lived in a large cave on the outskirts of the region that had now become known through the activity of the Arch-Eagle as the New State of Mankind. Among the characters of this New State who have now become familiar to us, it was naturally the Devil who was the most active; and it was the Devil who was the first among them all to have the audacity to visit the Unknown One in his cave.

So inured was the Devil, by reason of his various experiences under the authority of God, to pain, that he felt as if there was nothing particularly queer or unusual when, having boldly entered his cave, he found the Unknown One wriggling and scriggling and clutching with his short arms and shorter hands at everything within reach of the bed of straw upon which he or it lay extended.

'You are suffering, Master?'

'Who in the name of God are you?'

'My usual name is the Devil, but in my time I've had grander names than that.'

'How did you know I was in pain?'

'If anyone in the world knows what pain is like and what it makes one to do it is I.'

'How is that?' enquired the Unknown One.

‘Because God,’ responded the other, quietly seating himself on the floor of the cave and folding his arms round his shins, ‘employed me for hundreds of years in the task of increasing the pain of his enemies by pushing them back into the flames out of which they had managed to scramble.

That, as you probably know. Unknown One, was God’s chief pleasure. Paul, who invented Christianity, was the letter-writing missionary. But where he muddled things up a bit was in regard to Love and Hate. He learned in watching the exquisite delight that God took in torturing his enemies and making them believe that the flames that were causing them such pain would last for ever what Hate was. He knew that such men as the Marquis de Sade and Gilles de Retz have always been examples of wickedness, whereas God’s delight in burning his enemies has become something like a Law of Nature that fits in perfectly with his Love for those among us who try to love him. How did Paul muddle things up so? I know he lived long before the Marquis de Sade and Gilles de Retz. But that wasn’t the reason. The reason was that in his own heart — and I know I’m right there — Paul felt Love and Hate contending and sometimes one and sometimes the other dominating him completely. But the point, oh Unknown One, suffering such pain, is simply and solely the nature of pain! It certainly is a queer thing. Compare it with its opposite, for example. Yes! Compare it with pleasure. When we enjoy pleasure we feel it all around us. It is in everything we look at with our eyes, hear with our ears, smell, feel, taste! But this confounded pain that St Paul delights to see his God of Love inflict on those who hate him, is not all around us, is not in our eyes, ears, taste and smell. Pain is always localized, whereas pleasure is spread abroad in all directions. When the adorable Saint appears who has made us happy we look round us on all sides, we dance and play and sing. But when the stern punisher of us for our sins and wrongdoings turns up do we look round? Not a bit of it! We clutch with our hands just as you are doing now that particular place in our suffering body where the pain is lodged.'

'Please go away,' said the Unknown One to the Devil, and the Devil obeyed him. He flew as quickly as he could to their little encampment and related to them all that he had found. The Unknown One, he explained to them, 'is suffering from some internal pain. He squirms and shivers and shudders and he keeps clutching with his hands, which are just like ours, only his arms are much shorter than ours, at every curve or protuberance in his body from where his legs begin to where his neck begins. At last, after I had been talking to him for a little while about the difference between pain and pleasure, he asked me to go away; and I obeyed him without protest. I wonder what is the matter with him and whether it's anything serious?'

'What is he like,' enquired Murdrawla, 'apart from his legs and hands?'

The Devil pondered for a minute. 'What I think he's like,' he said, 'is one of those monsters we read about and see pictures of in books. I expect he is one of those monsters who has lived in this cave ever since those early days and by long experience knows exactly where to find a flock of sheep or a group of cattle from which he can carry a good meal for himself back to his cave. I sat on the floor while I talked to him, but he had a bed of very soft and comfortable hay which long experience must have taught him how to collect and arrange. Unless my imagination is completely running away with me, it struck me more than once as I sat on the floor clinging to the top of my socks, that it was crossing the mind of the Unknown One whether it was worth his while to seize me with one of his human hands and short human arms and devour me, beginning with my head and ending with my feet.

'Is he like any animal alive today?' enquired Gor.

‘Well,’ replied the Devil, ‘he is a little like a rhinoceros. If some magician were to turn him into a beast I am sure that would be the one into which he’d be transformed. But at the same time,’ the Devil went on, ‘there is something about him that makes you think of some sort of enormous shark. Is there such a thing, do any of you know of such a thing, as a shark almost as big as a whale?’

There was quite a stir in the little camp of the New State of Mankind when the Devil asked this question. The liquid voice of Maia and the gravelly voice of David Cox collided together as they both answered. ‘Oh yes,’ cried Maia. ‘I’ve seen pictures of a creature exactly like what you describe. I’m sure that in the depths of the ocean there are monsters exactly like that!’

‘Oh but you don’t have to go to the bottom of the ocean,’ cried David Cox, ‘to find such things! They come out of the sea, and swim up the estuaries to the rivers! My own home at Abertackle where I was born looked out on an estuary where fishermen used to drag up in their great nets the most extraordinary creatures. Yes, I have seen them take out of their nets and kill things just like the monster whose cave you’ve been into!’

It was the voice of Murdrawla that finally floated over all their heads, like a gentle zephyr above a lake of thick-headed wrangling reeds.

‘We must act as our wise Devil did,’ murmured Murdrawla, ‘and sit on the floor of the World while the rising tide of Nature’s wildest intention is checked by a splutter of chance and calmed down by the steadily blowing wind of destiny.’

9

The present camp of the New State of Mankind was soon sunk in deep slumber. Gor and Murdrawla slept in each other’s arms. Maia slept alone with her head on a pillow of her own making which she had propped up against the stump of a tree which had been blown down long ago. David Cox slept not far from Maia with his head upon a very large and richly embroidered pillow which Maia had made especially for him. By eight o’clock that night the Devil arose from a comfortable sleep he had allowed himself to enjoy inside the entrance to an old badger’s hole only a few yards distant from the two heads of Gor and Murdrawla as they lay side by side. The Devil had no sooner emerged from his badger’s hole than he decided he had been unwise in allowing himself even that retreat. ‘I bet my life,’ he told himself, ‘that Old Horror has already come across from his cave and is exploring our camp, hoping to find we’ve forgotten some child or some cat or dog or serving-maid whom he could snatch up and carry home to devour mouthful by mouthful at his confounded pleasure.’

The Devil had hardly experienced the wafture of this disturbing thought pass through him like the whiff-whiff-whiff of the breath of an infantile volcano when he saw in the distance the unmistakable figure of the Unknown One lumbering heavily towards him. Down on his stomach he went, and sprawling along by the aid of tufts of grass and withered stalks of bracken he worked himself clear of his retreat till he reached the feet of Gor and Murdrawla, round whom he scrabbled as softly as he could and then sat up hugging his knees as he had done on the monster’s floor and watched for his approach. ‘Ought I,’ the Devil said to himself, ‘to wake these people oh the New State oh Mankind? At this moment it might mean a wild scuffle between them and the Unknown One which would end in his victory and not theirs. I heel entirely on the side oh these people, though why I have such a normal, earthly heeling I don’t know. Gor and Cox would take it tor granted that being the Devil and not God I should be on the Unknown One’s side; but I fancy Maia would understand things better. She, with a wise woman’s instinct, would know that in all those hell-burnings I was God’s agent and servant because of my cowardice and oh my hear that if I didn’t obey him he would toss me into the flames and begin at once whispering in my ear his gloating delight in torture— “not tor only a million years but forever and forever and forever will you burn in these flames.” No,’ thought the Devil. ‘It would be a mistake to wake them all now; not only because it would give the monster an opportunity to leap upon them or whatever thing belonging to them he pleased; for if they were suddenly aroused from sleep they would all be too confused to defend themselves properly.’

‘Thinking thus,’ as Homer always says, the Devil remained in his seated position watching most intently the approach oh the monster. ‘If he comes straight here,’ thought the Devil, ‘he’ll see that I am not asleep, but on the other hand if I lie on my back and pretend to be asleep he may leap upon me and make me his victim, which is the last thing I want to happen.’

What he did accordingly, after thinking thus, was to work himself or worm himself backwards till he was well behind the feet oh Gor and Murdrawla. Here he remained on his back, but not deprived oh the power to peep out over the feet oh Gor and Murdrawla and watch the advancing Unknown One.

It was then that out of the badger’s hole at the entrance to which our friend had paused ere making his former discoveries there emerged an extremely youthful badger. This apparition was observed at once by the Unknown One who came, leap after leap, towards it. The small badger, however, clearly had all its wits about it, for it slyly waited till the monster was quite near and then with a leap worthy of any offspring of the monster itself, rushed round him and scampered off in the direction from which they had all come. The monster followed him as well as it could; but it was evident that the fact that they had all come from the direction in which the badger fled made its pursuit much more difficult. 'I suppose,' said the Devil to himself, 'the scent of such a move as we all made to get here has made it very hard to pursue any one of us along the route we took to reach this place unless kept in sight.'

The monster was certainly quite out-run by the little badger when this small animal emerged from the deep hole made by its ancestors thousands of years ago; and as the Devil watched, the Unknown One returned in an evidently exhausted state towards its Cave.

It was then that an exciting idea came into the Devil's mind. 'Why,' he thought, 'don't I build for myself out of these tree logs and tree stumps and fallen branches a very strong but very small woodman's hut? And why don't I keep in it little toy figures which I could easily carve out of wood and paint them so that they would represent all the human beings that have lived in the world before the New State of Mankind was constructed. Yes, I would paint Red Indians and Black Africans and White Settlers and Yellow Chinamen. I would have black and white and red and yellow little men, all in a row on a shelf. Then if any children came — Oh!' and the Devil heaved such a deep sigh! 'What would I not give for some grandchildren! Just two! Only two! One boy and one girl!'

The word grandchildren, for an innate reason in his own mind caught the ear of Gor who gave Murdrawla a special hug and sat up. 'How could I have grandchildren,' he asked the Devil, 'if I haven't a son or daughter?'

'By adoption,' replied the Devil. 'That is how I'm thinking of having mine!'

Still waiting rather eagerly to follow to the end the topic of grandchildren, the Devil shrugged off the dramatic finale of the Unknown One's pursuit of the little badger, a finale which must have left the monster groaning with pain on his bed and the little creature slipping with delicious satisfaction down the larder-drop of his ancestors' subterranean dwelling.

But Gor had awakened Murdrawla, who found the Devil regarding her with an expression of worshipful devotion, for it there were anyone better acquainted with the best way to appreciate myth-creating ladies such an one had never as yet come near Murdrawla.

The shameless, plain-speaking David Cox was also awake now and what he said brought another aspect of their journey to their minds. 'We'd better have a drink and go to sleep again, for the early morning is the best time to reach the centre of any space journey.'

Maia's was the last word. 'None of us know what any of us feel. So "on all together!" is the word: and let the future keep its revelation.'

As soon as the Unknown One had gone galumphing back to his cave and the Devil knew that Gor and Murdrawla and David Cox and Maia were all awake, he got up and followed the monster. It can be believed how staggered he was when on entering he found there were two of them in the cave. The monster knew him at once and introduced him to the other monster whom he described as his mother and whose name, he said, was Wow. 'No,' he went on, 'Wow darling, we can't gobble him up, because he's got a much more powerful spirit than we have and a much more powerful spirit than any human beings on this Earth excepting only Red Indians, who, as you used to teach me when I was little, were able without any weapons at all but simply by the power of the spirit to dominate every other race in the world. This personage, featured and embodied like a man — like a little man — but with horns coming out of his head, has some connection with that Being who called himself "Father of All" and whom the Earthlings called God. He will explain to you, Wow darling, what the connection exactly was. I have forgotten. But he will tell you himself.'

The Unknown One was right. The Devil had no sooner been introduced to Wow, whose hand he kissed devoutly, than he began delivering the sort of regular lecture on the theological, psychological and biblical revelation between God and himself, such as anyone as yet unschooled in the appropriate expressions would have wanted to hear.

‘But how could you,’ enquired old Madame Wow, whose appearance because of her age tended to accentuate the ferocity of her face, ‘bear to obey such a cruel burner of his enemies as I have always heard your God was?’

‘Well, lady,’ replied the Devil, ‘if I hadn’t thrown back again into the flames any human soul who was scrambling out, God would have pitched me in at once. It was extraordinary the pleasure God derived from causing pain. I was present at the confession of Gilles de Retz or Bluebeard as they called him and his fear of falling into God’s flames certainly made God a crueller Being than any Bluebeard.’

‘Thank you very much indeed, Mr Devil, for all you’ve told me. I shall never forget it.’

Wow’s words were uttered in such a sincere voice that the Devil could not help accepting them as absolute truth. ‘May I,’ he asked her nervously, ‘beg you to tell me one simple thing.’

‘By all means,’ replied Wow, and the Devil felt highly delighted that he had reached a point of intimacy as deep as this. ‘How long,’ he asked her, ‘has your race dominated this particular position in space?’

‘Only a little over two thousand years,’ replied Wow. ‘I can tell you that with exact certitude, because it was from you earthlings that we have learnt the art of numeration; and we have kept it up very carefully, and we possess an exquisitely delicate calendar, it such you could call it, giving all the signatures of our forbears — not of course their pictures, tor as you know none of us look very pretty — going back year after year, century after century; just as if we were not monsters at all but very learned and scientific historians.'

10

'I am very much impressed by all you say, Lady Wow. Oh yes, Lady Wow, I am deeply impressed by the idea of your ancestors in this cave for over two thousand years having kept a commemoration and calendar of all the centuries as they passed, for my own life has had nothing, no! has never had anything, with which to celebrate its uneven course, and I have always longed for something of the kind.'

'May I follow your example, Monsieur Devil, and ask you a bold question?' enquired Wow.

'O please do!' cried the Devil. 'I shall be so thrilled to try and answer it if I can.'

'Did this cruel God of the earthlings,' Wow asked him, 'create you? Or, if not, who or what did? Or did you perhaps have horned parents like yourself who brought you into this world?'

'You have asked me,' replied the Devil, 'the most important question in the world; and I will try to answer it. Your question is, "How did the cruel God of the Christians flattered by St Paul as being the God of Love and how did his supposed opposite, namely myself, the Devil, come to exist? Who, or what, created them?"'

The Devil spoke with such earnestness that both the monster, or the Unknown One, and his mother Wow, listened intently to every syllable.

'It was the human spirit that created both God and me,' said the Devil. 'Human nature contained in itself something beyond what Nature alone — I mean the elements of air and water and earth and fire — could provide.

This something was, and undoubtedly still is, the Power to Create. This power comes from the human spirit containing in itself all that it calls Good and all that it calls Evil. It applies those adjectives of course to everything it knows of; every projection of mind, every projection of matter, in the entire universe, or if you prefer that idea, in the entire multiverse, was quickly endowed, the moment the human race appeared, with its own notion of what was good and what was evil. How was it, then, you may ask, that their Christian God who ought to have been, and indeed was, according to St Paul, who by his crafty use of the scattered words of Jesus Christ may be said to have invented Christianity, a Being composed of Love, was soon understood to be a monster of cruelty who gloated over the sufferings of people's souls in Hell, and as he hovered over them there delighted in reminding them that their pain was not for a million years but for ever and for ever and for ever, and that it had come to them because they were his enemies. But, as various human atheists have argued, who wouldn't, what decent man or woman wouldn't, call a cruel monster like the God of Christianity their enemy? What did Jesus himself cry out when he was on the Cross? "Eloi! Eloi! lama sabachthani?"

"My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" To this the Jesus-lovers who are atheists ought to answer: "He deserted you, oh Best of Men, for the simple reason that he had fooled you from the start in making you believe that he existed."'

It was at that point in their conversation that the Devil heard a sound in the air outside the cave, a sound that by this time he had come to know very well indeed. It was none other than their ally, Paragon, the Arch-Eagle. 'Oh,' thought the Devil, 'if only I could lure one or other of them — perhaps both! — out of the cave's entrance! Maybe if I told him they were our enemies — now that he seems to have become quite definitely our friend and our helper — he would swallow the Unknown One or the Unknown One's Mother, at a gulp, and I'd be spared any further explanation of how our silly earthlings egged on by St Paul and his passion for a deity composed of Love just as — you know the sort of thing — is composed of oil. Oh how I long to hear the wings of Paragon at this moment! Yes, monster, you would have reason for shuddering then! Yes, Madame Wow, you would have reason for crying out "Wow! Wow! Wow! Wow!" if I had heard those great wings and had lured you out of your cave! I wonder what happens in the inside of our Arch-Eagle when a creature as big as the Unknown One or as big as the Unknown One's mummy gurgles down into a place like our Arch-Angelic eagle's belly? Will it struggle to come up again? And if so what will happen? Oh Arch-Eagle, descend and help us!'

The Devil issued from the Cave with prayers to the Arch-Eagle Paragon. But the last thing he expected or the last thing he could have thought of expecting was, as is so often the case with human beings as well as with gods and devils, the thing that now happened. The magic all-conquering sword of King Arthur, torn from his hand in the last battle of his life, the battle of Lyonesse, came suddenly floating up from the Earth through the avenue of space which Gor and Murdrawla and Maia and David Cox had followed. There it was! There was Excalibur itself within reach of the Devil's hand! The Devil seized it. The Devil brandished it. 'Just think!' he thought to himself, 'after all it's gone through, and after all I've gone through, that this should happen! Oh how I wish God hadn't died a natural death! How heavenly it would have been if I could have killed him with Excalibur!' He looked round. No, he had come out of the cave alone. No sign of mummy Wow or of her offspring the monster.

‘Oh what can I do with Excalibur?’ cried the Devil to himself: and then, with rather a pathetic gesture when you come to think of it, he raised his left hand — not the one which was brandishing Excalibur — to his forehead as if to make sure that his horns were there, in other words to make sure that by brandishing Excalibur he hadn’t changed from being himself. ‘The truth is,’ he said to himself, ‘my contact with these earthlings, combined with their space-born Murdrawla, has had a queer effect upon my mind.’

Very slowly the Devil, having reassured himself about his horns being in their usual place, walked out of the cave. He was just going to direct his steps to where he had left Gor and Murdrawla when a sound he had never heard before came to his ears. It came from up the slope towards the base of the Moelwyn Range and when the Devil looked in that direction he saw a person walking. It looked like a human dwarf with a monstrously large face and long legs and arms. The Devil burned boldly towards it.

‘Who are you?’ said the person to him. ‘You look just like all the stories I used to hear as a child about the Devil.’

‘I am the Devil,’ was our friend’s answer. ‘May I enquire who you are?’

‘Well, at any rate we both speak the same language. We have both lived on the Earth,’ said the person. ‘My name is Gonflab,’ he went on. ‘As you can see, my arms and legs come straight out of my head. What on earth is called a stomach is in the back portion of my head. I bite and chew and masticate with my mouth and teeth. I have no neck or shoulders, no chest, no belly... nothing but arms and legs.’

The Devil looked Gonflab over and over with the greatest interest. Yes, he had spoken quite correctly. His head went back absurdly. Its back was a lot bigger than its front. Yes! He had no stomach, no neck, no chest, no ribs, no belly. His legs and arms came straight out of his head. ‘How do you kill for your food, Gonflab?’ the Devil asked him.

‘You will see, Mr Devil, how the Creator of the World has only recently died leaving his creation to look after itself, or Nature to look after herself, and if you examine my hands you will also see how it has been arranged that I can kill what I want to eat.’ Thus speaking, Gonflab held his right hand close beneath the Devil’s face, who examined it carefully as he had been told to do. He noticed that it had tremendously long and curved and sharp nails.

‘What do you find, Gonflab, in this space-world to eat?’

‘There are lots of things, Mr Devil, that suit me perfectly,’ Gonflab replied. ‘Whether,’ he went on, ‘you have ever noticed these space-bats which fly about in pairs holding tightly to each other I don’t know; but they make extremely tasty food.’

‘No, I’ve never seen—’ the Devil began — and then he chanced to catch sight of a pair of the very creatures they were talking about and he saw Gonflab seize them with both his hands and squeeze them, prodding them as he did so through and through with his sharp nails, into his widely open mouth.

‘I wonder,’ the Devil asked himself as he watched this going on, ‘whether by clinging together the bats make their death easier, or whether by quickening their flight in that way they make it harder to catch them?’

And then it was that the Devil’s mind swung over to quite a different cogitation. ‘Suppose,’ he thought, ‘our great friendly Arch-Eagle Paragon was to come hovering above our heads at this moment, would he, could he, might he, seize upon Gonflab himself by the head and with his super-aquiline claws tear his head open and swallow everything in it and then begin making a feast for himself out of Gonflab’s two sturdy legs after he had bitten off both his arms and watched them sink side by side down towards the world that had so many similar bones covered with sweet flesh.

Paragon's appetite,' the Devil told himself, 'will be greatly excited by the taste of the flesh upon Gonflab's leg-bones, not to think of what it gets out of the back of Gonflab's head.' Tightly the Devil's right fist clutched the handle of Excalibur. 'Just think of my having King Arthur's sword!' his whole soul cried within itself.

The Devil had no sooner come leaping down after disposing of Gonflab, his left hand repeatedly and almost mechanically touching his own horns, to make sure he was still his proper sell, and his right hand clutching the handle of King Arthur's Excalibur than he became aware that both the monster's mother Wow and the monster — otherwise the Unknown One — were cautiously, cunningly, craftily, calculatingly, encompassing mankind's new camp with steps as camouflaged as it each paw they put down was touching velvet. 'Where can Paragon the Arch-Eagle be? There he is! Oh thanks be! He must have seen that I was clutching Arthur's Excalibur, for the moment he descended he seized upon Wow, the Unknown One's mother, and held her by the top of her head. He then actually turned his arch-angelic eyes on me as much as to say, "I see you've got Excalibur, so I know what you will do." I did what he hinted in a moment. With one sweep of the sword I cut off Wow's head. Down, down, down, down it sank and the people of Abertackle must have seen it falling, for the touch of Excalibur threw a magic light on it and it must have looked like a meteorite as it fell. You can believe how I, the Devil, pressed my left hand against my horns to be sure I was in my right senses; and then brandishing Excalibur rushed after the monster.'

That there was indeed every reason for him to pursue the Unknown One or the monster, having with the help of the arch-eagle disposed for ever of this being's mother, Wow, who had been quite as deadly a creature, if not more so, than her terrific son, the Devil knew as his left hand flew to his horns to make sure he was still himself, and he now clasped the handle of King Arthur's Excalibur very tightly and pondered in his mind whether he had better cut at the monster's throat as he had done with Wow or stab him to the heart. 'Is his heart in the same place in his body as ours is?' he said to himself. But suddenly a totally different idea came into his head. He asked himself whether it would not be more exciting and more full of strange possibilities if he made the monster a prisoner and kept him in bonds, but always in such a way that at any moment he could be released, like a fierce chained-up dog, and sent rushing at someone whom it was desirable to attack. But the Devil didn't quell this sudden inspiration at this point. He let it carry him, he encouraged it to carry him, as far as it wanted to go. And it evidently wanted to go a long distance. What he now began thinking about was the idea of binding together with a huge rope the whole camp of his friends, these human explorers of space, Gor with Murdrawla, Cox with his horse, Maia with all her mystical insight, and then calling upon the Arch-Eagle to spread its wings and grasp the rope with its beak and to carry them on and on and on and on and on into empty space, to let happen what would.

The Devil's inspiration worked out well. The Arch-Eagle was delighted with the idea. The thought of being in the position of carrying space-ward beyond all known worlds this whole camp of human civilization was just the kind of thought to appeal to him.

The first event to happen in connection with the Devil's activity before the Arch-Eagle carried him, clinging to Cox's horse, beyond all known worlds, was his killing of the Unknown One. He hid himself so skilfully behind Cox's horse that when the monster came near it gave him his opportunity. Then he rushed out and with his right hand tightening its grip upon Arthur's Excalibur he plunged its whole length, clear up to the hilt, through the monster’s heart, and, as the Arch-Eagle carried the Devil up with the rest, the Devil could see the monster he had slain and Excalibur gleaming out of its body, sinking down, just as the monster’s mother Wow had sunk, into the world of sun and moon and earth and stars.

After watching the descent of the monster, otherwise ‘the Unknown One’, with Excalibur through his heart, the Devil asked himself whether he had better cling to a strip of Murdrawla’s night-shirt which Gor’s impassioned embrace had loosened and which flew trailing through the air, or whether he’d better hang on to a strip of wood which projected downwards from the rear of Cox’s wagon? Or finally whether it wouldn’t be wisest of all to clutch the hem of Maia’s skirt, seeing that the weight of all her garments was supported and held up by a beautifully strong broad belt which she had fastened carefully and securely round her waist. He finally decided in favour of the strip of Murdrawla’s night-gown, for he recalled well how the first they had all seen of her was her form as she floated in that night-gown across and across the ascending space-path of the upward flight of them all.

Up, up, up they all went, until day after day and night after night passed over their heads for what struck them as a time too long to be measured by any human calculation.

At length they began murmuring among themselves. ‘I don’t believe we are going up into space any more,’ murmured Gor.

‘I think the darkness round us now reminds me of what it felt like at home before midnight was chimed from the church tower,’ murmured Cox.

‘I thought a moment ago,’ murmured Maia, ‘that I heard those chimes.’ It was then that Gor suddenly remembered his sister Nelly who had been so fond of him and of whom he hadn’t had a thought for what seemed like hundreds of years. ‘Goodbye to you all,’ whispered Murdrawla, escaping from Gor’s arms and gliding off till she was out of sight. ‘I can smell the seaweeds of Go,’ announced Gor. ‘We shall go down near the shore.’

‘Abertackle!’ they all murmured with one voice. ‘We are home.’

Cataclysm

1

IN THE LITTLE town of Riddle in the county of Squat in the west of Bumbledom there was a young man called Yok. He had just reached his seventeenth birthday on the first of January in the year nineteen-hundred and sixty, and he now sat by his open hearth on which burned a glowing red fire. Yok was his Christian name. His surname was Pok. Opposite him on the other side of the fire in a less comfortable chair sat his sister Quo Pok, who was still sixteen.

‘I have decided at last that I’ll do it,’ said Yok Pok. ‘I’ve been thinking about it very carefully from every possible angle, for more than a couple of years; and I have now decided that I’ll do it.’

Miss Quo looked at him with alarm. All manner of wild thoughts rushed through her mind. Was her brother thinking of suicide? Was he thinking of killing them both? Was he thinking of leaving their home and setting off to visit Paris or Berlin or Jerusalem? And if so, was he thinking of taking her with him? She had longed dreamed of seeing something of the great world before she grew too old to travel. But there was a look in her brother’s face that scared her. What in heaven’s name had he decided to do? Then without further delay he told her. ‘I have decided,’ he said quietly, ‘to destroy the whole human race.’

Miss Quo gasped and stared intently at him. Had her brother gone mad? She suddenly remembered that her mother had once told her that her great-great-grandfather had been put into a lunatic asylum, where he had been kept until he died. Could it be — no, surely, surely not — that the grave, earnest face, looking so intently at her, was that of a madman? 'But tell me, Yok, Oh for pity's sake tell me what you mean by saying such a thing? Destroy the human race? But you and I are the human race. Our mother and father were the human race; and so are Uncle Eeak and Aunt Zoo-Zoo. You aren't going dotty, are you my dear? You frighten me by saying things like that!'

Yok Pok turned his head away from his sister's frantic scrutiny and said with a rather forced chuckle: 'Well, you see, my dear, that anything as important as one solitary man making up his mind to become the destroyer of all mankind is likely to be upsetting when you hear of it for the first time and from the actual person who is thinking it. But if you give yourself up to listening carefully while the person in question, that is to say I myself here, sitting opposite to you and talking to you, offers you all the various reasons to think over by which he arrived at his conclusion, his decision, terrific and crazy as it sounds in your ears when first announced, may take on quite a different aspect.'

Yok Pok's voice was so calm, and his expression so unruffled and undisturbed that Quo Pok could only bring herself to murmur, 'Well, the best thing we can do, my dear, it seems to me, is to sleep on it and over it, and when we've both considered the sort of shock you've given me, and when I've considered the various reasons for what you call your decision, which no doubt you will give me tomorrow, we shall both be in a better mood for understanding each other. Let us sleep over it, dear Yok, I beg you. Don't let's refer to it any more tonight.'

Yok Pok agreed to obey his sister and went to bed. But it was some time before he could go to sleep. 'Why,' he kept asking himself, 'have I decided to put to death the whole human race?' His answer was definite. 'Because my conscience tells me it’s the right thing to do. My conscience tells me that if I don’t destroy the human race the present slaughter of animals for food and the torture of animals by these appalling vivisectors will increase and increase. When once there isn’t a single human being left alive on this earth the animals will be tree. They may kill each other for food, but they will all have their young to look after; and the cows will give their calves their milk and the birds will build nests tor their little ones and teed them with what they like best to eat, and all the fish, whether in salt water or fresh water, will be in no danger from the hooks of those abominable anglers and will be able to escape or unable to escape, as destiny or chance may decree, from the sea monsters who swim about seeking their natural food. Have I,’ Yok Pok asked himself, ‘enough of that smoke-bomb I discovered three years ago in the cellar or Castle Rumpus? It could have finished off the whole damned lot of us. It certainly did for those three old beggars who used to bother me so much on the woodpath to Castle Rumpus. I never knew where they were from, and when I asked them the only person who told me anything was a gypsy girl who said they came from Austria. But that smoke-bomb certainly finished them off. One moment they were standing begging and the next they were lost in a cloud of smoke that seemed to carry them up into the air. I only used a handful of the bomb-dust on them; and now I’ve got hidden, in a harness loft that Quo doesn’t know about, enough to do for every man, woman and child in this whole bloody world, if I could get an aeroplane far-sighted enough to carry me, and it with me, over the whole surface of our globe.’

Yok Pok couldn’t help thinking to himself before he went to sleep as if he were talking to someone else. He was always like that. It was what made him so trying a companion. But their parents had died so long ago that his sister had had to get used to it. Yes, she had had to get used to his tiresome trick of announcing every detail of his private thoughts as if it were a speech from the throne to which all listeners had to give respectful assent. Yok Pok evidently felt that before he would be able to slide peacefully into a beatific ocean of sleep it was necessary for him to make clear to his imaginary listener, who might have been the corner of one of his two pillows which happened to protrude a little under his chin, tickling that important feature like an impertinent mouse, exactly how the smoke-bomb operated. ‘You have to take a handful of it,’ he explained, ‘or much more than that if many people are involved, and just fling it at them like sand, as if you were seated on a sandbank above a well-frequented esplanade. It would be the rushing impact of the bomb-powder upon the air that would set it off; and once started in this way its collision with the crowd of persons at which it was aimed would result in a strange kind of explosion. Not an ordinary explosion,’ Yok Pok continued, addressing, it might well be imagined, the intrusive tip of the corner of his second pillow, ‘not an explosion such as gunpowder makes, but a wild gust of violent wind, of wind invisible, like a whirlwind, wind like a burst of water pouring from a tank where its terrific pressure has broken the encasing steel, hurling itself forth more like fire than water, rending, rushing, billowing, bursting, flinging itself upon the enemy in a liquid avalanche, like a volcano of irresistible floods of water.’

How far the tickling little corner of his second pillow understood a word of this it would be hard to say; but at least its delicate prod at the recumbent chin of the wordy thinker kept the torrent flowing till he sank into the ocean of sleep.

Yok Pok slept a deep and long sleep; but so far from this absolute escape from consciousness having the effect of relaxing his resolution and diminishing his decision, when he awoke about eight and rose from his bed simultaneously with the rising of the sun he was, if possible, even more determined to extinguish the race of mortals to which he belonged than he had been when he went to sleep. ‘Yes, I shall do it,’ he told himself. ‘There’s enough bomb-sand or bomb-dust or bomb-secretion in my harness-room — and I’m not yet sure I took all there was in Rumpus cellar — to blow to smithereens the whole bloody spawn of Adam and Eve. I could cry like a babe,’ he went on, and tears as big as the eggs of hedge-sparrows did drop from his eyes upon the floor as he bent to pull out the chamber-pot from under the bed, ‘when I think of the animal revolution I am going to bring to pass. Yes, there shan’t be the smallest dwarf with two arms, two legs and a squeaking phiz left alive on the earth when I’ve finished my job. Every animal, every bird, every fish, every reptile, every worm, every insect, shall lift up to heaven such a scream of ecstasy that the other planets will think disease and death have been abolished for ever upon earth. I know very well what Quo will say,’ his thoughts ran on. ‘She will say, “What about yourself? Don’t you belong to the human race yourself?” And what shall I answer to that?’

He sat down on the edge of his bed and rested his sharp chin on his clenched knuckles and his sharp elbows on his knees. What crossed his mind was a triumphal ceremony in which all the friends and relations he possessed were gathered together for slaughter and after having killed them all he would kill his sister Quo and himself. ‘The great difficulty,’ he said to himself, still seated on his bed in intense thought, ‘will be the steering of the aeroplane on which I shall fly all over the earth.’

It was then that he suddenly thought of his Great-uncle Eeak, an extremely eccentric old gentleman who was very rich and who always told them that his wife, their Great-aunt Zoo-Zoo, had Jewish blood and was descended, centuries upon centuries upon centuries removed, from a cousin of the grandparents of Jesus Christ. He also told them that there had always been rumours in Aunt ZooZoo's family that they were descended from a person not so dear to Christians as Jesus, but perhaps even more dear to polytheistical scholars with an obsession for all early legends about the human race, from nobody less in fact than Penthesilea, Queen of the Amazons. 'I wonder,' he said to himself while his forehead pressed violently upon his knuckles and his elbows so violently upon his knees that he almost groaned with pain, 'whether Uncle Eeak would lend me his aeroplane and explain to the men who run it that they must obey me. Would Great-uncle Eeak be so angry at the whole idea that he would call upon his wife Zoo-Zoo to curse him with the curse of her centuries-removed cousin Jesus of Nazareth for his presumption and wickedness in regarding the descendants of Adam and Eve as less precious than the creatures with which Noah filled his Ark? Wasn't this the very curse with which Jesus lambasted the Scribes and Pharisees, not only for their hypocrisy but for behaving so differently from the Good Samaritan towards the weak and helpless and for bringing their wretched business cheats into the holy temple?'

Yok Pok had never dressed more rapidly than he did that morning and had never hurried off more hastily to the house of his Great-uncle Eeak. Eeak was not a rabbi though his head was full of rabbinical learning, and the constant presence of Zoo-Zoo and her intense interest in all that was religious and ritualistic gave him a daily and nightly delight in discoursing on these things. Yok Pok was shown into his Great-uncle's study by his butler, Ur Veer, who might well have acquired the dignified art of his important office in a training at the palace of a Pharaoh.

‘Zoo-Zoo is out shopping,’ were Uncle Eeak’s first words after Ur Veer had closed the door, ‘but she will be back soon. She’s always pleased when you visit us.’ Eeak’s study seemed made of dark mahogany and heavily laid-on gilding. Pictures, chairs, tables and even the edges of an enormous bookcase were all richly and heavily gilded.

There were three armchairs, one facing a richly burning coal fire and one on each side of it. The two latter were evidently intended for Eeak and Zoo-Zoo, while the guest faced their hearth; and it was facing this beautiful red fire that Yok Pok now stretched out his feet, his toes erect, his heels firm against the fender.

‘I think you agree with me, Uncle Eeak,’ he said, ‘more than anybody round here, about the wickedness of this awful vivisection of animals that these confounded scientists love £0 excuse on the grounds that it benefits humanity. I think it does just the opposite. Yes! I think what it really does is to encourage our bloody doctors to experiment upon their patients when they get ill, just as these accursed scientists do on these unfortunate animals. I tell you, Uncle, half the things they do to us these days are purely scientific experimentation. They want to know more about the insides of men for purely scientific reasons, not in order to save their human patients from pain and suffering.’

‘Yes, my dear boy, I do agree with what you are saying,’ replied Uncle Eeak from the depths of his comfortable armchair. ‘I would sooner be shot dead by a murderous burglar than have scientific treatment from a scientific doctor. You see, my child, this age of ours is the most degenerate age we have ever endured since the days when David killed Goliath and Samson brought that temple down, or was it a theatre, on the heads of all those enemies of Israel. O what happy Christmasses we used to have when my grandfather was the Vicar and I was a youth with a host of brothers and sisters! In those old days clergymen were like consecrated policemen who went about their parish with a pocket full of shillings; and policemen were like competent schoolmasters who went about threatening poachers and burglars and highwaymen with having to "bend over" and be birched or caned into proper behaviour. Clergymen and policemen were the rulers of country places in those days, while the roguish old Squire in his big house thought only of how many foxes he could hunt and how many pheasants he could shoot. Nowadays the government thinks it has done nobly for a village when the Squire has to earn his income tax by showing tourists over his big house while he and his family live in the lodge and send their gamekeepers to Australia and their sons to Canada and their daughters to New York to find American husbands.'

Yok looked at his rich relative with respectful silence for a moment. Then he went on: 'I know you agree with me in my feelings about all this sad change, Uncle, but most of the people I talk to think things have greatly improved; and that in the old days the majority of folk were simply the working-class who had to earn their living while the upper class enjoyed itself by killing foxes and deer and birds and fish. I know you do agree with me, uncle, in all this. But what I want to ask you now is a special and particular question. You own an aeroplane, as they call them, don't you Uncle Eeak?'

Eeak smilingly acknowledged this weakness. 'Yes,' he replied, 'and I often fly in it. Its name is Irah. It has, or she has, two men, extra skilled in our grand new art of flying, who in themselves are captain and crew. They are bosom cronies and have been so from their childhood, though they are cousins, not brothers. Their names are Kar and Lar.'

For some reason, that although he tried to analyse it, Yok Pok couldn’t get to the bottom of, there was something about the names of these two cousins, Mr Kar and Mr Lar, who were so good at flying the Irah whose name Uncle Eeak pronounced Ire-Rah, giving it the emphasis that would make it the ire or wrath of some mysterious great person called Rah, yes, something about the names Kar and Lar that caused him profound discomfort. Was it perhaps that, although Uncle Eeak might possibly accept without question the murderous use to which he had decided to apple the Irah, Mr Kar and Mr Lar were likely to indignantly refuse to consider such a proceeding for a single moment? ‘Shall I,’ he asked himself, ‘explain fully and completely to Uncle Eeak what I have decided to do; and then leave it to him to deal with Kar and Lar?’

Yok Pok finally came to the conclusion — and it took him more than a couple of days and nights to arrive at it — that it would be wiser to keep it dark from his uncle until that gentleman had placed him in command of the Irah and allowed him to set off with Kar and Lar as his subordinate officers.

In spite of having reached this conclusion Yok Pok still felt a certain uneasiness, which a little disconcerted him until he had the spirit to tell himself that what troubled him was the attitude of Aunt Zoo-Zoo. Ever since he first spoke of the Irah to his uncle, he had begun to notice that Aunt Zoo-Zoo frequently regarded him with a queer expression of unsympathetic if not actually hostile mistrust.

She was a formidable lady; much more formidable as a woman than his Uncle Eeak was formidable as a man. Had his Uncle told her all that he had been talking to him about? Had she detected with the perception with which Nature, the Mother of us all, has endowed women, especially old maids, that there was more in his trip — if his Uncle allowed him such a trip — than he had confessed to Uncle Eeak? Thus a most agitating question arose in his mind. Should he — could he — dare he, actually reveal what was in his mind to Aunt Zoo-Zoo? No! It would be sheer madness to do such a thing — but would it be? Or was he on a completely wrong track in this line of thought?

The discussion about the aeroplane Irah between Yok Pok and his Uncle Eeak still went on while Yok Pok remained there on board arguing as cleverly and as subtly as he could with Kar and Lar and not allowing the vessel to leave port or set out tor any purpose or destination till he had done his best to reason these two young men into his way of thought. His sister Quo was a great help to him in this difficult enterprise as she was such a young and pretty girl, so slim, and so exquisite in her ways, that it soon became clear that neither of the young men was anxious to leave their harbour if it meant leaving little Quo behind.

But meanwhile Auntie Zoo-Zoo became more and more dissatisfied with everything. She was about forty and her love for her husband Eeak had been the chief thing in her life since she was four and he was five. She had never had a love affair and she had never wished to have one. She idealized her husband and imagined that he was a far greater man than he was. She was thrilled when he purchased Irah and she made up her mind that she would use it at once to pursue the chief purpose of her life, which was to put an end forever to the infernally cruel practice of vivisection. Her influence, for she was an extremely persuasive and magnetic person, and her presence, for she was a remarkably handsome woman, had always had a great effect on Yok Pok and Quo Pok. They ad no difficulty in blindly accepting her idealization of Eeak but their respect for herself was a thing they had taken for granted from their childhood and they never especially emphasized it or enquired into it.

Zoo-Zoo herself, however, forty as she was, had never allowed her youthful enthusiasm for the double legend of her ancestry to die out. She was still constantly thinking of the tale that she actually had in her veins the blood of the family of the Madonna, the Mother of Jesus, and — to herself anyway almost equally thrilling — that she was descended from Penthesilea, the Queen of the Amazons. Zoo-Zoo had always possessed — from her earliest girlhood and in spite of her frantic idealization of her husband Eeak it persisted still — a profound belief in the superiority of women over men. She had steadily refused, and did so now that she was forty as passionately as she had done when she was fourteen, to cease meditating upon the life of the Queen of the Amazons. She had no idea whether it was usual for school-teachers to reveal to young girls in their early age the basic secrets of sex. But, usual or not, there was a teacher at the village school to which her parents sent her who took a delight in emphasizing these secrets. She didn't do it in public in the class. She did it in private in her own bedroom which was in the school, for she came from Paris and none of the other school-teachers had any idea whether she was a lonely orphan or whether she had a host of relations there. Her name was Ripple-Pipple, and nobody but herself and the pupil she was teaching in her bedroom knew what she taught or how she taught it. It must have been the effect of her lessons that the girl she instructed revealed nothing of it to her parents but did discuss these lessons with passionately shameless interest with other girls of the same age who had been similarly instructed. The Head Mistress of the school where Ripple-Pipple taught was Miss Goldenguts, and Miss Goldenguts, without talking about it, always felt a little uneasy when she saw Miss Pipple's pupils whispering furtively to each other. ‘Can she,’ Miss Goldenguts would ask herself, ‘can she possibly be a Lesbian?’ Miss Goldenguts was herself so far from being a Lesbian that the greatest moments of pleasure in her life were when her cousin Lar brought his cousin Kar to have supper with her. This the two lads did even after they had begun living on their aeroplane lying at rest at present on the landing at the port; for Miss Goldenguts was an extremely good cook and knew to a nicety the sort of dishes that boys like best.

Quo Pok had been to Miss Goldenguts’ school and had been instructed by Miss Ripple-Pipple, and if anyone had dared to ask her where she learnt what Miss Goldenguts always called ‘the Facts of Life’ she would always speak of Miss Ripple-Pipple as ‘one of the teachers’ and never mention her name. Quo Pok had as a matter of fact been emboldened so much by the intimacies of her sex lessons as to dare to ask Miss Pipple how it was that she was baptized Ripple. And Miss Pipple told her frankly, ‘Oh that is because I had a cousin called Ripple who came from Upwey, a village near Weymouth in England where there’s a sacred fount where a Saint — I forget his name now — made the water run when the whole countryside was perishing of thirst. It’s a place not far from an estuary where swans had their nests and where my Uncle once gave me a swan’s egg which I took back to France and kept in our cellar till the rats devoured it.’

Auntie Zoo-Zoo had a very strong prejudice against Miss Goldenguts’ school and she never approved of her niece Quo Pok being educated there. She would never display any real politeness towards Miss Ripple-Pipple, in spite of the fact that she knew well that she came from Pans. What caused her a curious and queer feeling of real jealousy was what she heard from the gossip of neighbours about Ripple-Pipple of Paris and her sex-lessons; but some secret resentment in her nature forbade her to ask her niece Quo Pok any questions about Mademoiselle Ripple-Pipple.

One evening after she had been talking to her husband, Uncle Eeak, for a long time about their nephew Yok and their niece Quo, Aunt Zoo-Zoo sat down in the little room upstairs which she called her Boudoir and gave herself up to a fit of quite elaborate introspection. ‘What is it in me,’ she asked herself, ‘that makes me so shrink from the idea of having a baby? I know well that Eeak never dared to “take” me, as we say; but that was a peculiar fear he had of “taking” a girl, though he loved me from the bottom of his heart. He had no idea, and still has no idea, of the curious horror I had of childbirth. We were a queer pair in those things; a very queer pair, when you remember that we were really in love with each other. But the truth was’ — and so searching and daring were Auntie Zoo-Zoo’s thoughts that she got up from her armchair and went to a mirror hanging on the wall and tapped with her knuckles the reflection of her forehead, and then, returning to the armchair, she stretched out her legs and clapped her hands to her face — ‘the truth was that though we were in love we were both obsessed by the same nervous mania, an unnatural horror of natural fornication. What would I have done,’ her thoughts wandered on, ‘if I had been Penthesilea’s youngest child? Would I have protested when my mother told me I must let myself be “had”, as we say, by some handsome young Greek, knowing perfectly well that when he had “had” me, or when he had lived with me long enough for me to give birth to a baby girl, she, my Mother, would have him put to death?’ Aunt Zoo-Zoo’s mind then veered to her Bethlehem legend. ‘Were all the relations of Joseph and Mary as nice as Mary’s mother, Saint Anne?’ Aunt Zoo-Zoo pulled in her long legs and crossed her hands above her knees. ‘The legend in our family always said, my mother used to tell me, that it was from a cousin of Saint Anne’s called Rebecca that we are descended. Eeak was saying only last night that the best of having Jewish blood is that there is no other race in the world that holds the family, to which any man or woman or boy or girl belongs, as the most important thing about them. Jewish carefulness about money is, Eeak reminded me, an essential part of their family feeling.'

Auntie Zoo-Zoo pondered in her mind every aspect of her present situation and grew, the more she thought of it all, less and less pleased. 'Yok Pok and Quo Pok are sweet kids,' she told herself, 'but I'm not content to devote my life to nice youths and maidens solely because I happen to be their aunt. What have I got at the back of my mind that keeps pricking me on larger, grander, far more exciting and far more daring undertakings than just petting a couple of youngsters and helping them to enlarge their minds?

'Eeak doesn't really understand me at all,' her thoughts ran on. 'Of course he never really did. No, not even when we first fell in love with each other. I knew he didn't, but that didn't bother me; and as to having children, we were just the same. We both had the same neurotic and morbid dread of the sexual act. I just worshipped Eeak, and I do still reverence and respect him, but I would not have him know what my thoughts are about myself for anything. He would be shocked and horrified and deeply disturbed. He would probably be seriously hurt in his feelings. For I am sure he just thinks that I admire the spirit with which he just takes lor granted that because I was so desperately in love with him when we started living together I must be quietly and happily and peacefully congratulating myself that he has never turned away from me or wanted to live with any other woman. How quaint and curious it is that it never occurs to him that I should want to be great and famous myself quite apart from him. I suppose that is the difference between men and women. Men must all want to be great and famous and must feel that compared with women they are intended to be so, and that nature intends women to take this for granted and simply to feel happy and proud that nature has allowed them to have found for their mate in life a man whose greatness will go down to posterity. It is interesting to think,' thus did Auntie Zoo-Zoo's meditations run on, 'how few women there are in the history of the human race who have become world figures of renown compared with men. It is no use for us to say to ourselves that the two great rulers of human life, Destiny and Chance, have always found it easier to bestow their gifts upon men than upon women. Nature evidently takes for granted that the place for women is in the kitchen while the place for men is wherever their instinctive ambition and power working together have the strength to project them.

'Now what,' thought Auntie Zoo-Zoo, 'could I do to make myself and my name famous forever?' She stretched herself out further and clasped her hands tighter. 'Suppose,' she said to herself, 'that I had the power of becoming in my own person the great goddess of the Earth about whom I learnt so much at school. Gaia was her name. I remember that very well indeed. She was so persecuted by the embrace of Ouranos or Uranus who was always begetting monsters upon her as awful as the Hydra and the Chimaera and the Gorgon and the Python, if not actually those particular ones, that she gave her son a weapon of flint by which he was to cut off the testicles of Ouranos; and unless I am mixing it all up with another story it was from this that Venus Aphrodite was born of the foam and was tossed up by the waves on the island of Cyprus. If I became a fresh incarnation of Gaia the Earth and used my strength and the warm richness of my planetary blood to assert my personality would I not be able to render this wild and insane idea of my nephew Yok about killing off the whole human race, this mad scheme which Quo Pok has confided to me, as futile and vain as the attempt of Achilles and Agamemnon and Menelaus and Diomed to burn Troy to the ground. But there was something else Quo Pok told me,' said Auntie Zoo-Zoo to herself. 'What the devil was it?' Then it suddenly came to her what it was; and fixing her eyes on a stain on the carpet where a night or two ago she had upset a large bottle of eau-de-Cologne, it came to her mind like a flash of lightning what her lovely little niece had told her.

She had told her that a distinguished committee of modern scientists all of whom were strong supporters of and strong believers in vivisection had heard from various space-explorers who were possessed of planetary telescopes of super-ordinary power that there existed upon the planet Venus a number of animals very well-known upon earth. They had discovered that there were badgers there, and beavers and hares and foxes; and they were thinking of setting out in a large aeroplane to collect a number of these creatures and bring them home to experiment upon. ‘It will be,’ Quo Pok had reported them saying, just the sort of thing we need to prove to the English newspapers the importance of our experimental work and what a valuable contribution it offers to the work of Newton and Darwin and Galileo and a lot of very important modern scientists also.’ Quo Pok had told her too that the news had excited Yok Pok to such a pitch that he could hardly continue his reasoning and argumentation with Kar and Lar in the aeroplane on the dock landing. He was wild with furious impatience to set off and if possible lurk near enough to the coast to catch this vivisection aeroplane on its way out and to kill every man on board. Since she heard this piece of news Auntie Zoo-Zoo had wondered in what way, if she became a modern incarnation of Gaia the Earth-goddess, she could assist Yok Pok in killing this crew of cruel scoundrels ere they set out to Venus with this infernal design of theirs. ‘I wonder,’ Auntie Zoo-Zoo said to herself, ‘if I have got in me the power of enlarging not only the magic and influence of my presence, but my actual physical size? Oh! would so like to turn myself into a giantess of such terrific size that I should tower over everybody and when people saw me approaching they would cry, “Oh take care, take care! Here comes that terrific goddess! Take care lest she eats you up!”’

As she said this to herself she suddenly became convinced that she did possess this power; and she deliberately began to use it. It only felt to her as if she were pulling her muscles together as she used to do some thirty years ago when, as a child of ten, she began a tennis match. Yes, she found she could do it. She felt as if she had a godlike force within her that could enlarge her body just as if with pencil and paper she could make a female figure she was drawing larger and larger and larger. Her body soon began to get so large that her feet reached to the wall and the armchair on which she was sitting became like a little object sticking fast to her bottom. She rose to her feet and found that the top of her head bumped against the ceiling. Her breasts had become so big that her blouse hurt them and with her two strong arms and hands she tore the thing from her and flung it in tatters upon the bed. Then Auntie Zoo-Zoo decided that the moment had come for informing her husband Eeak what had happened to her; but she decided it would give him too great a shock if she appeared before him without any warning and she told herself that the wisest thing to do was to summon Quo Pok and make her her messenger. It was now just nine o’clock p.m. Where was Quo Pok? Had she gone to bed? Auntie Zoo-Zoo decided to call her. ‘But I mustn’t shout. My voice would be too loud,’ she told herself. ‘Perhaps if I just whispered a simple whisper from this colossal chest of mine might sound as loud as a shout.’

Auntie Zoo-Zoo had judged correctly. A whisper from her did turn out to be as loud as a shout; and soon she heard the airy-fairy steps of Quo-Pok tripping down the stairs.

Then the colossal lady, as she now was, acted very wisely. She opened the door but held it firmly by the handle, keeping it only a little ajar. When Quo Pok knocked she spoke to her through this inch wide entrance, whispering as softly as she could. ‘You’ll get a shock when you see me, my dear. I’ve been praying hard to heaven to turn me into a giantess: and heaven has done so and my size will startle and shock you. But though my appearance and even my voice may startle you I am just the same old Auntie Zoo-Zoo I always was. What I wanted you for was to ask you to go to Uncle Eeak’s study and tell him what I have done to myself, or permitted heaven to do to me. Tell him he must be prepared for a shock; but tell him I am just the same ZooZoo underneath it all. Will you do this for me, my darling? You might come down with him too for I’d feel easier about it if I had you both in the room with me. I’ll sit on the floor and hug my knees when you enter. I expect I’ll look less frightening if I do that.’ Quo Pok gave a rather forced little laugh, for she was evidently nervous; but she replied at once, ‘All right, Auntie, I’ll come down with him.’

Uncle Eeak and Quo Pok entered together and found Auntie Zoo-Zoo, as she had announced she would be, seated on the floor, hugging her legs. ‘Oh my dear,’ cried Uncle Eeak, ‘how could you do this, or make heaven do it?’

‘I’m sorry, my dear,’ said Auntie Zoo-Zoo from her seat on the floor, ‘but it suddenly came into my mind that the best way of dealing with these cruel scientists who practise vivisection purely for their own experimental interests and then pretend when we attack that they do it for our good, would be to give them a shock. And it came into my mind — I thought it was sent there by Providence — that if little Quo Pok’s Auntie Zoo-Zoo turned into the great heathen goddess Gaia the Earth, who was forced by the embraces of Uranus the Heavens to give birth to a series of appalling monsters, it came, I say, into my mind that if I could get Providence to make me big enough to resemble a great planetary goddess, when this set of cruel vivisectors were preparing to set out on this diabolical quest of theirs to collect animals to vivisect from the shore of the planet Venus, whose torture would be a great triumph for these fiendish men, it would be a shock from which some of them might never recover if I could appear before them as a giantess of terrific size and declare myself to be the Goddess Gaia now returned to her place in the world after an absence of a couple of thousand years, and I should feel that the shock I gave them would be empowered by the ghosts or all the animals they had vivisected since this accursed practice began. Of course, Eeak darling, you must ask Kar and Lar if they don't feel it would be possible for me to ride in your Irah at a little distance from the coast until these cruel vivisectors set out in their aeroplane and then rush upon them; so that they would see me in my present gigantic shape rise up from Irah's deck, and not only see me but hear me shout their damnation in such a thundering voice as will make every family living along the coast think that the Day of Judgment has arrived.'

Uncle Eeak was undoubtedly deeply impressed by the words of his transformed spouse; but it was clear to little Quo Pok that he was still suffering from such a terrible nervous shock by her changed appearance that his usually calm and collected mind found it no easy task to function in its accustomed manner.

'You're not afraid, I hope,' the lady went on, 'that my weight will be too heavy for the Irah? That indeed would be a stumbling block to my plan. Perhaps in that case I might manage to swim, for as you know, Eeak dear, I can swim, holding on to the Irah, and then, when we were close to them, I might rise out of the water and scare them so much by my appearance that it would be easy for Yok Pok who, I learn, is ready for battle, to dispose of them in his own dire way.'

‘Little did I dream,’ thought Eeak, ‘when I married Zoo-Zoo, that a girl who claimed to admire me so much and who was as much in love with me as I was with her would ever do a thing like this to herself or make Heaven do it. But, since it’s done, it’s done; and I certainly shall be glad I bought Irah if through her, and between us all, we do manage to send these appalling vivisectors to play their little games at the bottom of the sea.’

It was at this moment that Yok Pok himself came on the scene, followed by Kar and Lar. He had been to his store in the harness-room where he had put his precious explosive discovered in Rumpus Castle; and he now carried it in an enormous coal-sack over his shoulder. He was startled but not frightened by the sight of Auntie Zoo-Zoo turned into a colossal giantess; and he promptly began discussing with her and Uncle Eeak how they could most speedily destroy this crew of notorious vivisectors on their way to the planet Venus to collect their animals to torture. ‘My practical difficulty,’ Yok Po explained to them all as they sat round their enormous Auntie Zoo-Zoo in Uncle Eeak’s dining-room, ’is how to snatch my handfuls of explosive from my sack if I keep it hanging round my neck as it is now.’

‘Why not cut a hole in the centre of your bag?’ said Kar, so that you can stick your hand in and pull out a handful of the stuff whenever you want to?’

‘But more will come out, like that,’ said Lar, ‘than you want, and you won’t be able to stop it coming out.’

‘What makes your stuff explode?’ enquired Auntie ZooZoo from the position on the floor which she still preferred to make her throne.

‘Oh just its contact with the air,’ replied Yok Pok. ‘I found that out when I stole it from Rumpus Castle. I killed three fellows with it who used to annoy me by begging from me at a particular place in the wood. It’s just the rush of air when you throw it that makes it explode. And then it just blows what you’re aiming at up into space. There is no fire or smoke, only a sort of cloud.’

‘What I would suggest,’ said Auntie Zoo-Zoo from her position on the floor, ’is that you let me sew on to the side of the bag a big loose sleeve into which you could thrust your arm and pull out a handful of the stuff whenever you need it.

I could sew one sleeve on to the side of the sack so that you could thrust your arm down it and pull out one handful of the stuff after another; but I could sew it, I think, in such a way that the stuff would not come trickling out when it was not required.’

‘Have you got a needle and thread up here in this room, Zoo-Zoo?’ enquired Uncle Eeak.

‘Certainly I have,’ his wife replied, ‘if you’ll hand me my work-basket. It’s behind that inkstand and it’s got that sleeve of my old dressing-gown folded on top of it.’

‘Shall I put my sack down there by your side on the floor,’ enquired Yok Pok.

‘Yes,’ she said, ‘by all means do so; only we must be a bit careful in case a gust of wind comes down the chimney, as we’ve got no fire in our grate today.’

Very carefully this huge giantess into whom Auntie ZooZoo had been transformed sewed a loosely hanging sleeve to the rough sack at her side, a sleeve made of a material sufficiently heavy to hang down from the sack in such a manner as to keep the sack’s contents from slipping out into it. ‘When you’ve got your sack round your neck, Yok,’ she told him, ‘don’t forget to arrange it in such a way as to make it easy for you to slip your arm up the sleeve I have sewed on without having to twist your neck too much!’

‘I sure will,’ replied her nephew, ‘and oh I do thank you so very much, Auntie, for taking all this trouble. Please Heaven we’ll be able to give these devilish vivisectors a good sound lesson tonight or tomorrow.’

‘I think we shall,’ murmured Auntie Zoo-Zoo hugging her knees after helping him arrange the sack. ‘But I think I’d better stay on the land and not weigh down your Irah with my weight.’

As he pondered on board the Irah about all these things it was not long before Yok realized that their discovery about this particular plan of these unspeakable vivisectors had rather modified his original decision to make this voyage a pitiless crusade against the whole human race. ‘Something like that,’ he said to himself, ‘may come of it; but the first thing for us to use the Irah tor is to destroy every single one of these infernal vivisectors.’

Yok Pok experienced a certain element of relief in feeling that now, with this immediate narrowing down of his problem to the destruction of a set of cruel devils whom all his friends and relations hated just as he did, he was making war against the wickedness of his race rather than against his race itself He took up his abode on the Irah and though he had several rather violent arguments with Lar and Kar, he also had several very friendly talks in which they all offered new and original suggestions as to how to go to work when their enemy’s aeroplane appeared on the scene. Nor was it very long before this actually happened. It was from a port known to the world in general as one of the most historic in British history that the vessel hired by the vivisectionists, a vessel whose name was Adamant, came up the coast, collecting special little groups of ‘Sworn Tormentors’ from many townships as they publicized their quest. These grand looking gentlemen, for in their minds they must have possessed the same sort of conviction of personal righteousness that Calvin must have had when he burnt Servetus, and that Torquemada must have had when he ruled over the Spanish Inquisition, allowed themselves to anticipate with luxurious and unctuous satisfaction the newly designed tortures they were preparing when they returned with their captives from the misty shore of the planet Venus.

The clash between the infernal vivisection vessel Adamant and the thrice blessed animal rescuing Irah occurred at about eight o'clock in the morning of the twenty-second of January 1960. Auntie Zoo-Zoo, now transformed into Gaia the Goddess of the Earth, had begged her husband Uncle Eeak and the two lads, Kar and Lar, to allow her to stretch out at full length on the upper deck of the Irah; and all three had given their proud consent. It goes without saying that Yok Pok derived indescribable pleasure from the ease with which he was now able, thanks to Auntie Zoo-Zoo's so carefully adjusted sleeve, to draw all the explosive dust he required out of his sack at any given moment. The moment came when the vivisectionists from the prow of the Adamant called out their challenge to all on that shore. Yok Pok's arm shot down the carefully prepared sleeve into his sack and brought out a big handful of this terrible essence of all the explosive powder in the world. Then when the prow of the Adamant approached the edge of the landing-stage where the Irah lay, with Auntie ZooZoo stretched out on her back along the deck, he flung the powder at the approaching enemy. It exploded in the faces of a group of the vivisection leaders who were calling their challenge to the line of the coast as they floated in. Every one of this group was blown into the air and they were carried upward in such a cloud of mist and smoke that it looked to Uncle Eeak, as he watched from his bedroom, as if a swarm of sojourners from Hell were desperately invading Heaven. The Adamant was ordered by its other commanders not to risk any further attack from this dangerous coast, for they evidently didn't realize that it came from an aeroplane in the water near the landing-stage, and without further delay they flew off towards the evening star which was still just visible, though only just, in the light of dawn.

‘After them! After them!’ cried Yok Pok.

‘You’d better come with us,’ he added to his sister, for it was clear that delicate little Quo Pok was hesitating whether to mount into the air with them or to stay at home.

‘Please come, Missy!’ cried Kar and Lar with one pleading voice. And that cry from the two lads did decide her. She nodded and smiled and went to stand near her brother, while Lar and Kar went down into the engine-room to make their aeroplane follow the Adamant into the brightening evening sky.

Uncle Eeak smiled sadly as he watched from his bedroom window the Irah follow the Adamant into the air. ‘I might have had the child to myself,’ he thought, as he watched the two aeroplanes ascend, carrying his wife with them.

The Irah was soon only a mile or two behind the Adamant as they ascended together in the direction they wished, though the sun was now brightening the whole sky and Venus with the other stars and planets had totally disappeared.

Auntie Zoo-Zoo pulled herself together and sat up with her heels beneath her and her knees bent, leaning her back against the midship rail. The day slowly passed. She had her meals; she had her evacuations. She had her strolls from end to end of the vessel. Then the night descended; the stars came out and the planet Venus once more showed herself. As they mounted higher and higher, following the lights of the Adamant, which were visible above them and remained at about the same distance away, Auntie Zoo-Zoo had a very weird and frightening experience. She was crouching by the rail of the vessel when she became aware of three snouts emerging from the water and breathing against her face.

The awful thing about these three snouts or appalling faces was that they all three murmured the word ‘Mother’. Then in a flash Auntie Zoo-Zoo realized what it meant. By persuading Heaven to make her so big, and by thinking of herself as the goddess Gaia the Earth, she resurrected and brought back the horrors as well as the glories of that lost, ancient and forgotten world. And now it all came back to her and she knew who these three awful beings were. ‘Gorgons and Hydras and Chimaeras dire’ — yes, it came back to her how Ouranos and Uranus had begotten these monstrous beings upon her; until in her desperation she had given her son Saturn a sharp stone of flint in order that he might cut out the genitals of Ouranos or Uranus. This he did; with the result that out of foam thus generated in the sea Venus Aphrodite was born and brought to shore at Cyprus.

So it now happened that as she leaned against the rail of the Irah, with gusts of cloud-foam sprinkling her at intervals, she was forced into contact with each of the three monsters whose father was Ouranos or Uranus. ‘If I gave birth to you,’ she said to the Gorgon, ‘why is your face so hideous? My face is the face of an ordinary woman of the Earth, all the strength and richness, all the depth and delicacy of the Earth I can feel within me, why then, oh child of my womb, is your face so indescribably hideous?’

‘Your thoughts must have been like my face as you let my father have you!’ answered the Gorgon.

‘Why did you let Hercules slaughter me?’ asked the Hydra of her. ‘I was your child, wasn’t I? You can’t deny that, can you? What a cowardly mother you were, then, to let all my beautiful serpents’ heads, seven of them, remember, seven of them! be torn off by that great, muscular, rampaging brute?'

And then came a third voice, the voice of Chimaera: 'And you only pretended to be my mother, you swollen-bellied bitch! My mother was Echidna and it was that bully, that wandering, blustering rogue Bellerophon who killed me! Neither you nor your confounded Uranus had anything to do with me! You want to be the mother of all the world, don't you, you big harlot?'

'Well,' thought Auntie Zoo-Zoo to herself, 'I certainly undertook a laborious job when I projected myself into the personality of Gaia the Earth-goddess. But I never thought I pretended to be the mother of other people's monsters!' She summoned Yok Pok to come to her. 'Can't you make your lads Lar and Kar run this aeroplane a bit faster? I don't see why we shouldn't overtake that confounded Adamant. Wouldn't it be better if you could kill off with your explosive every living man on the deck of that blasted plane?'

'They'll lessen their speed, Auntie, don't you worry, when they get near Venus. The mist round her is so thick that our poor old Irah won't have to go any faster to catch them up; and once we're on a level with them I'll finish them off, all of them, the whole damned lot, don't you make any mistake! But we must get level with them, don't you see, before anything like that can be done.'

'Well,' replied Zoo-Zoo, 'it's all a wild game, and whether we kill them in time to save those Venus animals is still a bit of a gamble. But I think we shall win. I think the odds are in our favour. When we've finished them off then we can say with Catullus — it is Catullus, isn't it?— "Soles occidere et redire possunt. Nobis, cum semel occidit brevis lux nox est perpétua et una dormienda."'

The Gorgon, the Hydra and the Chimaera, all three, returned to the air, through which apparently they intended to follow the Irah till she overtook the Adamant. Little Quo Pok whose slender figure struck her Auntie as touchingly slight and slim when she stood by that new Gaia's side, asked what would happen if her brother Yok did succeed in killing all the vivisectionists on board the Adamant. 'Shall we all have to land on Venus, Auntie?' she asked: 'And if so, what shall we do with the plane of those cruel vivisectionists? Shall we have to leave it stranded on Venus or will Kar and Lar be able to tow it all the way back to the Earth behind us? And if they do that, will you and Uncle Eeak be able to keep both planes?'

'You must remember, my dear,' replied Auntie ZooZoo, 'that these wicked and diabolical vivisectionists have headquarters all over Britain. They don't only live in our coast towns. They torture animals in all our big cities. Their grand excuse is that they do it for the advance of science and for the benefit of patients in hospitals who will gain by their discoveries. Pain and nervous terror and the exquisite quivering of exposed nerves and all the horrible experiments which delight these infernal sadists are done, they will calmly assure you, for the benefit of science and of medicine and for the curing of patients in hospitals and the supplying of both night and day nurses and all hospital authorities with valuable information. Until our government passes an Act of Parliament making all vivisection illegal and ordering the police to enter these premises and arrest the men who are practising it, this monstrous thing will continue unsuppressed. What we deserve will very likely soon happen to us. The masters of scientific vivisection will dominate the human race. They will do to us what hitherto we have allowed them to do to animals. In fact, in certain directions they have already begun to do it. Very soon the rulers of this world will be a group of so-called scientists who will establish — finding no difficulty in finding architects to build it — a universal scientific inquisition, the rulers of which were pre-figured and predicted by Edgar Allan Poe when he wrote: “Mimes in the form of God on high mutter and mumble low and hither and thither fly — blind puppets they that come and go at bidding of vast formless things that move the scenery to and fro and flap from out their condor wings invisible woe.”’

Auntie Zoo-Zoo had only just finished quoting Edgar Allan Poe’s verses when her delicate little niece Quo Pok, leaning at her side against the same rail, suddenly whispered: ‘Did you hear that, Auntie? Something’s been happening down below. I heard Kar and Lar and I heard a strange man’s voice.’

‘You go and see, my precious, you go and see! And come back and tell me!’

The slim little girl scrambled to her feet, hurried to the ladder and disappeared. Auntie Zoo-Zoo listened intently, putting everything else out of her mind. Yes, she did hear a stranger’s voice, a man’s voice, and a deep-throated formidable one! ‘I’d better stay where I am,’ she said to herself. ‘Little Quo will soon be back.’

And so she was. ‘Oh Auntie Zoo-Zoo!’ the girl cried. ‘He was hidden down there when we started. He’s a big man. Yok told me to tell you he’d bring him up to talk to you in a minute. He’s a big man!’

And in a moment there he was, led to her side by Yok Pok and followed by little Quo and soon after by Kar and Lar. The stranger was indeed ‘a big man’. He was about six feet in height, and he had a very large and commanding head covered with curly brown hair. His nose was aquiline, his eyes deep-set, a dark greenish blue in colour, and separated from each other more widely than is usual. This was emphasized by the fact that he had no eyebrows at all. His ears were minute in proportion to the size of his head but they were very delicately formed, and every now and then, if you watched his face carefully, they seemed to quiver, as if listening to sounds that nobody else could hear. Auntie Zoo-Zoo looked up at him from her seat on the deck and boldly asked him his name. ‘My name is Ki,’ the man replied. ‘I pronounce it to rhyme with cry or shy or fly, not with flea or bee or tea.’

He knelt down very politely at Auntie Zoo-Zoo’s side and laid his hands upon hers, which were folded round her knees. They looked closely for a moment into each other’s eyes. ‘Why did you come?’ enquired Auntie Zoo-Zoo. ‘That’s just what he won’t tell us,’ said Yok.

‘Yes, we can’t get it out of him,’ cried Lar. ‘Though we’ve tried every way, haven’t we, Quo Pok?’ echoed Kar.

They all crowded closely round the two figures, one seated and one on his knees. At last Auntie Zoo-Zoo enquired whether they had got a berth for Mr Ki below stairs. Yok Pok replied at once that they had. ‘It is a berth, but it is more than a berth; it’s a small bedroom. It’s where the captain of the plane used to sleep; the fellow from whom Uncle Eeak bought our Irah.’

Auntie Zoo-Zoo restrained a natural desire within herself to ask more questions about this ‘captain’ or boss of the Irah before her husband bought it. She knew that for long there had been a great many things that she had never asked Eeak about, just as there had for long been a great many things that she had taken good care he shouldn’t ask her about. ‘It must be so,’ she said to herself now, as she stroked one of Mr Ki’s knuckles with the little finger of her left hand, ‘with all elderly or middle-aged married people when the passionate desire of early love to tell all and hear all has been outgrown. I must,’ she continued to herself, ‘have some talk with him up here before he goes to bed and before I go down to our boys’ lounge to get more sleep than I can get up here.’ Then she spoke aloud to Yok Pok. ‘Take the boys downstairs, will you, Yok, and show Quo where you've got that little cupboard for her to sleep in you told me about when we first came on board. Leave me here to chat for a few minutes with Mr Ki and when I do come down to sleep in the lounge, beg the boys to leave for me to wrap myself in that big thick blanket I brought with me from home.'

Yok Pok promised to do just what she wanted; and he went down with his sister and the two boys and left her alone with Mr Ki. 'We were destined from the start of things to meet like this,' said Ki to Auntie Zoo-Zoo.

'You have expected it for many years?' enquired Auntie Zoo-Zoo.

'Since I was ten,' replied Ki. 'A voice in my innermost being said to me once when I was playing with a large teddy bear in Ay House, Dorchester, Dorset, "You shall rule the world if you do what I tell you." I called out in answer, holding the teddy bear high above my head; "I will, I will, I will, I will!" Then the voice said: "You must say to the moon and the sun and all the stars: Obey me! Or in every vein there shall be pain and in every head a weight like lead."

"Whose voice are you?" I asked, for you see I was only ten when it spoke. "Yours! Yours! Yours! Yours!" said the voice. And being only ten I tried it on my brothers. And they each cried out: "It hurts! It hurts! It hurts! It hurts! It hurts! It hurts!" Then I said to the voice, "Do you mean that the veins in the sun and moon will hurt and the head of the sun and the head of the moon will feel as heavy as lead?"

"No," said the voice. "What I mean is that all the creatures who live on the sun and the moon will feel a terrible hurting and their heads will feel like lead."

"If they don't do what I tell them?" I said. "Yes," the voice within me answered. "If they don't obey you that is what they will feel."

“But what shall I tell them to do?” I asked the voice within me. And the voice replied, “Recognize me as your lord and king, forever and ever.” You see, my dear lady,’ Mr Ki went on, ‘what I have not yet confessed to you is what the voice finally said to me. “You are to be the ruler of the entire universe,” the voice said. “You are to be King of the World. But in order to be this utterly and completely it will be necessary for you to have a Queen. This Queen need not be your wife. She need not even be your mistress. All she must be is your Queen, the Queen of the Universe, just as you are its King.” The voice went on more definitely still. It described you to me. It told me where I could find you. You must understand, dear lady, that the older I grew the more I obeyed the voice within me. It told me that you were already married and that your husband would own this aeroplane from which you and I as King and Queen would rule the entire Universe and go travelling around it, commanding the allegiance and obedience of every galaxy of stars we visited.’

Mr Ki gazed passionately into the eyes of Auntie ZooZoo and she returned his gaze. Up and up towards Venus they went and Ki’s words turned out to be true; for so dense was the mist — what in Welsh is called niwl — all around Venus that the Adamant was forced so to slacken her pace that Irah was soon at her side. Then Yok Pok had his chance. Into the sleeve of his sack went his arm. Blow up! Blow up! Blow up! And every vivisector on board the Adamant was whirled into the air in a cloud, yes! a whirly-whistly-windy-waggly-wiggly cloud of human fragments.

It was not long after this that Ki, with a golden crown on his head and Auntie Zoo-Zoo with a golden crown on her head, set out on their world-tour of visiting all the ports of call in their obedient Universe. Ki was so clever at arming himself that what with his steel and gold and silver and copper and leaden accoutrements he brought it about that he and Zoo-Zoo, enormous as she had become, didn’t differ an inch in height or in breadth from each other. They rode on Irah; and behind them came trailing Adamant, closely towed in the rear under the direction of Yok Pok and Kar and far, who had no difficulty in managing both planes thus connected together.

King Ki and Queen Zoo-Zoo came to love each other so well as they toured the Universe over which they ruled that they finally had a child. This child was called Why. They had a long and sometimes almost angry discussion as to what name to give their infant. They agreed that the name must begin with the letter W; but Ki liked the name What and Zoo-Zoo liked the name When. At the moment their difference was at its height Zoo-Zoo suggested the name Where This rather pleased Ki and in the subsequent reconciliation it was after Zoo-Zoo had, without thinking of any name, simultaneously asked the question ‘why’ about something King Ki had said that they agreed that they would call their child by that name. Why was a boy, and it was when he became nine years old that the great event of his life occurred. He suddenly decided that he was weary of this life of following his royal parents to every portion of the Universe over which they ruled, and he boldly turned to them when they were all three together and asked whether they would allow him to go off on an exploring expedition of his own. King Ki and Queen Zoo-Zoo looked at each other with considerable dismay. She thought: ‘I would like to have a private conversation with Ki before letting the boy go,’ and he thought, ‘I expect the best thing to do would be to tell him to fly back to the Earth and explain to him how to dodge the sun and the moon on his way there.’ But Why was too quick for them both. ‘Don’t fly after me, Dad,’ he said, ‘for that will only make me fly the faster and I know I can outstrip you. I will come back, Mother dear, for sure, so don't worry or let Dad worry.' And with that he was gone, circling round the nearest galaxy as swiftly as a swallow and soon completely disappearing from their sight.

'He'll come back all right, my dear,' said Ki quietly. 'He's a wise kid.'

'Heaven grant he will,' gasped Queen Zoo-Zoo. 'I don't think we ought to have let him go.'

Why was soon far past the nearest galaxy and away off into the growing darkness. 'I must find,' he thought to himself, 'some completely new world, something I can really tell them an exciting tale about, and I have an instinct that I will.'

The last thing that Why expected to happen, as is the case so often in life, was the thing that did happen. It had already become so dark that the only stars he could see were a few faraway, tiny sparklers, when suddenly he saw somebody or something flying straight towards him.

'By God!' he murmured. 'It's a boy!' He was quite right. It was a boy. Each of them had been rushing through space as if they had been swimming at a terrific speed through a dark ocean. Now they stopped and faced each other, flapping their hands and stamping their feet so as to retain the same position.

'Me be speech reader,' said the strange boy to Why. 'Me read other-world thoughts. Thy mind be English mind so speech-reading me say English words to thee.'

'Where do you come from?' enquired Why.

'From I'm, yes, from I'm,' replied the other boy. 'I come from the great, wonderful, noble, mighty, unequalled, immeasurable, indestructible land of eyes and mouths which is called I'm.'

'What do you mean by a land of eyes and mouths?'

‘Feel me on both my front and my back,’ said the strange boy. Neither of them had any clothes on, so this was easy. All down his front from his chin to his toes were very small deep-set eyes shielded by enormous eyelids which to Why as he passed his hand down them, felt like the wings of large butterflies. ‘And feel my back, young Master English,’ said the stranger. Why obeyed; and it was a real shock to him. All the way down the boy’s back there were open mouths, each with lips and teeth and a tongue. Why was glad enough not to have to feel any more; but he couldn’t resist saying: ‘Where is your prick and your balls?’

‘On my side, at my hip,’ replied the other. ‘Yours, I suppose, are in the front?’

‘Yes,’ responded Why gently, praying in his mind that the other boy would want to feel the aforesaid sexual organs. ‘I suppose,’ Why said, ‘a girl’s quim would be just opposite the prick and balls at your side?’ The other boy chuckled naughtily. ‘I certainly hope so.’ Then Why said, ‘I don’t believe my parents. King Ki and Queen Zoo-Zoo, have ever seen your country of I’m, and if you don’t think me rude to ask, will you please tell me your name?’

‘My name is Ve Zed,’ said the boy. ‘My father’s name is No Zed and my mother’s name is Yes Zed and I have a grandfather still alive whose name is Well Zed. My father has always been careful not to annoy him in any way; but my mother feels differently about that.’

‘I suppose in my English way of talking your land of “I’m” is pronounced so that it rhymes with time?’

‘Yes,’ replied the Ve Zed, ‘you’ve got it quite right. The “I” part refers to the eyes in my front and the “M” part refers to the mouths in my back.’

‘But wouldn’t it have been much easier,’ said Why, ‘to rape your wife when you marry, or your girl if you get a mistress, if the sexual organs of both of you had been in the front part of your bodies?'

'I know what you mean,' replied Ve Zed. 'You mean it must be rather a queer job to squeeze and push my begetting-spear up her quim and through her maidenhead by just cuddling and pressing her sideways? I expect you feel it would be impossible to "take", or to "have" a girl, as we say, unless you did it front to front?'

'Yes, Yes! That's just exactly what I do feel,' cried Why. 'Of course what the big boys of our land do at school, if they prefer being naughty with a boy rather than a girl, is to push their prick up the boy's bottom. That's what nowadays people call being a "homo", rather a silly name, as homo is the Latin for a man and the old Romans were much more addicted to loving women than other men. But the ancient Greeks were different. Socrates was condemned to death by his government for corrupting the lads with whom he fell in love.'

'Would you like me,' said Ve Zed in an almost caressing and coaxing voice, as Why's allusion to Socrates had made him feel as if he lived under Pericles and Aspasia, 'to take you to my home in I'm? I am sure both my parents would love to meet you, and I wouldn't be surprised if my grandfather Well Zed didn't come round to see you if he heard you were there.'

Why agreed at once. He had already been feeling, before he met Ve Zed, a little lonely and desolate; and the idea of being installed for a few days or even a few weeks in this country of I'm of which his relatives had never heard satisfied his spirit greatly.

It took the two boys much longer than Why had expected to reach their goal. 'No wonder,' he thought in his heart, 'Father and Mother have never seen this place. I would never have seen it if it hadn't been for meeting Ve Zed.' And then, as they flew side by side, using their arms and legs as if they were swimming, Why suddenly asked Ve Zed what had set him off on this long flight from I'm towards the planet Earth. 'I'd got tired,' was the answer, 'of hearing Father and Mother argue about old Well Zed and of Mother always telling Father that her family was much older and more mythological than his. I thought that if they let me fly to a different part of space altogether I would see and hear things that would enlarge my viewpoint and teach me more about life in general.'

'And they did let you,' said Why.

'Yes, they did, but it took some while to persuade them. It was Mother's always bringing back the topic of the greatness ol her ancestors compared with the Zeds that prolonged the delay of their permission.'

'Who were her ancestors?' enquired Why, thinking in his heart, 'I mustn't bring up the cousin of Our Lady or Penthesilea, Queen of the Amazons.'

'They were.' Ve Zed replied, 'a sister of St Helena, the Mother of Constantine the Great, and a man whom that sister married. The man's name was Bobby-Up and he was a descendant of the famous Daedalus, the father of Icarus, but from an early love affair of this great artist-inventor before Icarus was born. Bobby-Up was a creative artist of extraordinary power, and it was his power and genius that my mother used to tease my father about, insisting that it was superior to anything possessed by any of the Zeds. My mother always declared,' went on Ve Zed, evidently with a desire to beguile their visitors from the earth into taking his mother's side in this ancestral dispute, 'that Bobby-Up invented a chemical substance which had the power of attracting to itself the remains of ancient worlds, long-forgotten galaxies of stars, which in the remote distances of space still hung about like scattered dust floating this way and that way in the vast emptiness of the immeasurable void. The effect of Bobby-Up's invention was that this substance, by drawing to itself by degrees the floating atoms of vanished worlds, was able to thicken out in space a resurrected mass of pregnant matter that gradually became the body of a new world, a solid productive body, full of the diffused juices and essences of grains and fruits and plants and roots and seedlings and sucklings and the scattered rudiments of upward-springing vegetation. Thus did my mother's ancestor, Bobby-Up,' Ve Zed went on, 'create the vast body of a new world, a body that filled a reeking gap in the Universe out of which not only vegetation could spring but so far unknown beasts and birds and reptiles and so far unknown creatures resembling men and women.'

Why and Ve Zed flew on together happily now that they had come to know each other, and it was a really exciting moment for Why when he was led into his new friend's house.

There was only one kind of tree in I in and the name of that tree was Urb. It was short in height but of colossal girth. In fact it was twelve feet round and its branches weren't branches in the sense of branching out. They were short, upright sprigs, about half a dozen of them together, each with one round cup-shaped leaf on the top of its upright spike, a leaf that when it rained, as it did regularly once a week in the middle of the afternoon at I'm, became filled to the brim with dripping water. No Zed, Ve Zed's dad, was tall enough to stand up to one of these Urb trees which grew just in front of their door and drink from their cups, each of which contained about as much water as a teacup.

But it was the inside of Ve Zed's home that captivated Why most. The house contained only one level ground-floor room. But this room was very large and the interesting thing about it was that in place of chairs, though there were bookcases, and on the floor a series of richly-coloured extremely thick rugs, there were beds, some designed for two people, as could be seen by two pillows side by side, and some for only one person. Why was offered a seat on one of these beds, and on the bed next to him Ve Zed flung himself down on his back. They all spoke English and Why decided that the first thing he would ask them, when the stir of his arrival had subsided a little, was how this had come about.

Mr No Zed and Mrs Yes Zed were both soon talking to Why. Mrs Zed was sitting at the foot of her son's bed, tenderly loosening the tennis shoes he had been flying in and stroking his feet; while Mr Zed was sitting by Why's side and had begun to show him an enormous folio, half of which rested on the visitor's knee and the other half on his own. The book was illustrated by pictures of palatial interiors that reminded Why of pictures he'd seen in various churches and cathedrals and also in museums in London. But it was only the statuesque and prehistoric look of this book that made him think of the Louvre in Paris, the National Gallery in London and the Prado in Madrid. When, however, Mr No Zed turned its pages all was otherwise. These fronts of ferocious mouths and these backs of waving eyelids, and above all these improper, ill-adjusted fantastical side-way bursts of hipping fornication, soon made Why realize that the land of I'm was no resuscitated archaic Agora of Pericles.

'Where did you all learn to speak such good English?' he flung out at them. Mr No Zed and Mrs Yes Zed exchanged a word or two together that sounded as if they felt that 'The Jabberwock with eyes of flame, came wiffling through the tulgey wood. And burbled as it came.' But they were now interrupted and Mr No Zed had to snatch the folio up, close it with a bang, and lay it on an empty bed.

Into the room rushed Grandfather Well Zed, bringing alarming news. 'There's an attack on us! The King of Kanawitakon has sent his son Gee Wizz, the Admiral of the Kanawitakon Fleet to attack us! No attack could be worse! These men under Gee Wizz are like madmen. They run and jump and gyrate the windmills without anything but their sails! There's no standing up against them. Their cruelty is the talk of our country. In that war between Kanawitakon and Kokaloo, as soon as Kanawitakon won, what did it do? Your generation is too young to know. But though I was only a lad then I can tell you. They took all the members of Kokaloo royal family and burned them in the ground up to their necks, leaving only their bare heads exposed in a long row. Then the same Gee Wizz, only he was much younger then, danced forwards and backwards from head to head along that line of heads! Those buried men with their heads exposed and their eyes looking about them remained like that till they all died. They talked to each other and they didn't die all at once. Get ready all of you! Get your swords and staves and shields and spears! We've got to fight Gee Wizz and these mad Kanawitakans until we've driven them out!'

It was then that Mrs Yes Zed went up to the old man Well Zed and whispered to him of the presence of Why, the son of King Ki and Queen Zoo-Zoo. The old gentleman didn't hesitate a moment. He walked straight up to Why and begged him to face these invaders and order them out. 'Your parents, my boy, would support my word,' he said. 'We have all recognized them here in I'm as the Rulers of the Universe.'

Never to the end of his life did Why forget the scene that followed. He signed to Ve Zed to accompany him, which the young flier bravely did, and the two lads rushed out of the hall together. I'm was a land of promontories and estuaries and the hall out of which the boys rushed was on the bank of a harbour up which the barges of the invading Kanawitakans were now forcing their way. At the prow on the front of these barges stood Gee Wizz. He was a man of about thirty. He was grotesque in his appearance; for he was very tall and thin but he had an enormous head and face, and at the ends of his long thin arms and legs he had colossal hands and feet. He was now brandishing a huge battleaxe and as Why and Ve Zed rushed to meet him it occurred to Why that it must have been with a weapon like this that Bellerophon set out to slay the Chimaera. Gee Wizz swung it round his head and then swaying his whole thin body to make the blow effective he smote at the two boys as they advanced side by side. It was clear that Gee Wizz with all his warlike experience knew nothing of the instinctively quick movements of young boys; for both Why and Ve Zed slipped down on their knees like a couple of pygmies attached to Achilles; and the great axe sweeping over their heads crashed into the base of the impenetrable rock upon which the Zed citadel had been erected. The whole rock with the majestic building upon it quivered and shook from top to bottom. Still waving in triumph the handle of this axe, though the blade of it remained embedded deep in the great rock which it had nearly cleft in two, Gee Wizz, followed by all the wild crews of all the barges of their now grounded fleet, rushed up the slope to the great Hall at the brazen-gates of which the whole historic squadron of Zedite guardsmen waited to hew them to pieces. Before the battle began, however, there suddenly appeared from the south the aeroplane called the Adamant. It was flown by Yok Pok and his sister Quo Pok alone. As can easily be imagined, Why, the son of King Ki and Queen Zoo-Zoo was full of joy to see such a propitious arrival at this moment of moments, for it looked as if the Zed-guardsmen at the gate were not strong enough to resist the attack headed by the terrifying Gee Wizz.

He expected to see exactly what he did see. Yok Pok signed to Quo Pok to go down below and touch some knob or some handle; and the girl, stepping easily and lightly as she always did, obeyed him to the letter. Then he thrust his hand down the long sleeve so carefully and so skilfully fastened to the mysterious sack which he kept slung over his left shoulder.

Down went his arm; and up came his hand full of the explosive powder. Into the air he flung it, and in the explosion that followed something like half a dozen of those murderous invaders vanished in a whirling, upward-flying cloud of grey mist. Again Yok Pok's arm sank into that sleeve and again, as the powder flew from his hand a second time, half a dozen sturdy naval veterans were lost in that ascending vapour of death.

It was when it had become quite clear with the arrival of the Adamant, with Yok Pok and Quo Pok on board and the former armed with that terrible sack of destructive powder, that the attack on the Zed citadel was doomed to fail, that Why Ki and Ve Zed instinctively drew together.

'I am getting sick of all this killing business,' said Why Ki.

'Come then, my friend,' said Ve Zed boldly, 'Let's go off by ourselves! We got on before quite beautifully flying together. And now if we just become obedient slaves to the folk here, or obedient slaves of your Daddy Ki and your Mummy Zoo-Zoo, we shan't have anything like the feeling we had then.'

'Besides,' agreed Why Ki, 'what none of our relations realize is that fellows like us, after having once tasted independence aren't made by Nature to sink back into the old domestic round of doing what our "elders and betters", as they say, tell us to do.'

'Come on then,' cried Ve Zed. 'Let's fly straight off now, over there! Yes, above all this damned flat land in front of us, and leave it behind, and fly, side by side, as we did before, into unknown space.'

The happiness which these two youths, Why Ki and Ve Zed, derived from their flight together, when the land they left behind vanished from their sight and all that remained of the galaxy to which Venus and the earth and the sun and the moon belonged were faint streaks of red light and little sparkles of white light, was a happiness such as neither of them since they were children had ever dreamed of enjoying.

7

Happy as Why Ki and Ve Zed were, as they flew along side by side into infinite space, they were neither of them oblivious of the terrific enormity of their adventure. Nor did any sign appear as they flew side by side, using their arms and legs rather in the manner in which swimmers use them but much more easily, carelessly and casually.

‘What will happen to us,’ said Ve Zed to Why Ki, ‘if we go on like this, with no sign of any stars anywhere and without meeting anything?’

‘Well, I suppose,’ answered Why Ki, ‘we shall get so tired and so hungry that we shall decide to stop flying altogether and let ourselves sink, making no motion at all, sink down and down and down, like a couple of dead bodies. We could hold hands, so we wouldn’t be separated; but otherwise just sink, sink, sink, sink, and let fate decide upon what planet or into what world we shall come galumphing down.’

‘Well, my dear,’ said Ve Zed to Why Ki, ‘from what I feel, and I expect you feel much the same, there’s something in me that seems to say, fly on, fly on, fly on, fly on, and let happen what will happen! I don’t feel really hungry myself, and I bet you don’t either. Nor do I feel really tired, and I’m sure — yes! I can feel it through your hand — that you don’t either. So let’s go on, old friend, till we both are certain sure that our flight must be brought to a finish.’

Why Ki responded to this by tightening his grip on the other’s hand, and on and on and on and on they flew. Then there suddenly was a change, a change of the most astonishing kind, a change in themselves.

‘Are you there?’ said Why Ki to Ve Zed. ‘Why have you dropped my hand?’

‘You dropped mine!’ replied Ve Zed. ‘But I don’t believe we’ve got any hands any more! What the devil, my dear, has happened to us?’

‘It seems to me,’ said Why Ki, ‘that we both have become bodiless! It must be a crazy dream, a mad dream, a nightmare, due to our long flight through all this empty space.’

They were both silent; but they flew on, each still trying to hold the other’s hand. Then, still completely bewildered by what had happened, the whole change came over them; and not only so, but they knew they were now in the midst of a large crowd of people in exactly the same situation that they were in themselves, only more used to it. One of these people, a young girl of about their own age who evidently realized that they were newcomers and consequently caught in a cloud of dazed bewilderment, came gently and tenderly up to them.

‘Don’t worry about your bodies, laddies,’ she said to them; and it was her presence, combined with the obvious fact that she had no body, that baptized them into a realization of the situation. ‘None of us,’ she went on, ‘nobody here has any bodily form. What has happened is that we are all now pure minds, thinking, imagining, analysing, speculating, pretending, dissenting, agreeing, disagreeing, discerning, philosophizing, recapitulating ideas, expressing ideas, developing ideas, denying ideas, revealing original intuitions and clarifying individual selfdeceptions. You must realize, dear boys, that what we all are here and now is a galaxy not of stars or planets or suns or moons or meteorites or comets, but simply and solely of floating intelligences, yes, of bodiless minds crowding about one another and struggling each of us to express our individual thoughts and ideas. What you must understand, my dear lads, is that none of us here have any senses

— we don’t feel heat or cold or hunger or thirst. We don’t hear or taste or touch or smell or see anything. We are bodiless minds, like so many invisible butterflies, flitting in and out and round and about one another. But you can feel, my dears, that we still have the will-power to dart about and assert ourselves and talk to the particular companions and particular strangers to whom we are attracted, even if we have to dart through this aura or little life-cloud of complete strangers to reach the one we want to talk to. I had to dive through or shoot through or launch myself through endless floating personalities of conversing groups of friends in order to reach you two when I first caught sight of you in the distance and saw at once how puzzled you were by this bodiless “scrum” as they say in Rugby football, and I felt I must come to explain things.’

‘You were good, lady,’ said Ve Zed.

‘May I ask what your name is?’ said Why Ki.

‘My name is Nelly,’ replied the girl, ‘and my surname is Wallet and my father was a house-master at Sherborne School. Both he and my mother died in a car accident driving to Yeovil when I was ten. I was brought up by Auntie Quittle of Quattermount but when she died I worked in a rug-maker’s office in Sussex till my Uncle Rang-Tang took me up through space in his plane till he had that accident you must have read about in the papers. I escaped here, and here I’ve been ever since.’

‘Thank Heaven you are here!’ cried Why Ki.

‘And pray Heaven you stay here as long as we have to!’ added Ve Zed.

‘At first I found this place rather difficult to live in,’ Nelly continued. ‘I’d been rather particular about everything in my taste; about what I wore and ate and drank and the places I went to, the moving pictures I saw, the pictures on the wall, the rugs and carpets on the floor and the antimacassars on the backs of the chairs. And suddenly to have to live in a place like this where all you can do is to think and tell people what you think I found very difficult and almost repugnant.

Let me tell you two boys about my last conversation with my uncle. “Well, my child, he said to me, there’ll be nothing more for you now than this crazy country we’re in now, this country in infinite space which they tell me is called Tappaskulltinkadom.” At that I cried out to him, “Take me with you, Uncle! I’d sooner be dead with you than alive in a country like this. To be dead is to be dead. It’s the end. No intelligent person believes any more in all this silly talk about God and the Devil and heaven and hell. You were alive and now you are dead, and that’s the end of it. You’ve been very good to me, Uncle, and I honestly thank you for it. I’ve learnt a lot from this voyage with you into space; and it certainly has been amusing, lighting upon a fantastical country like this absurd Tappaskulltinkadom. But I’d sooner be dead and done for with you, Uncle, than live to be a hundred in Tappaskulltinkadom, with my ideas growing bigger and wiser and subtler and truer for years and years and years! You have carried me into space, Uncle, and are now dying in space. Oh Uncle, let me die with you! I’ve been alive. Life is an experience. But I’ve had enough of experience. The beauty of death is that it isn’t experience. It’s just simply nothing. You were, you are not. You never will be again. And you don’t want to be again. Life is interesting, Uncle, I don’t deny it. And death is wholly and entirely devoid of interest. I don’t deny it. But when we’ve had the interest of life, that’s enough. Now let us have the opposite of interest. Let’s have the divine and delicious dullness of death.” But as you boys can well imagine,’ Nelly Wallet went on, ‘when Uncle did die and I had done exactly what he had told me to do, that is to say bury his body in this confounded Tappaskulltinkadom and ordered the men on board his plane to take it back where it came from with the quickest speed possible, I did all I could to compel this blasted place to mean something to me. I made no attempt to make friends. For everybody seemed to be far too occupied with spouting forth their ideas and floating up and down in trances of mental contemplation, or in ecstatic enjoyment of their own cleverness, to want to bother about somebody else's ideas or somebody else's thoughts, or even with somebody else being there at all. In fact I very soon became convinced that if you could be what is called selfish about enjoying your senses and eating and drinking and tasting and smelling and hearing and feeling and seeing things you liked, you could be still more selfish about displaying and trying out and indulging and enlarging your ideas and thoughts. Another thought has come to me of late,' Nelly Wallet went on, 'and that is how delighted many moralists would be at the complete absence in this skull-thumping, idea-worshipping world of sexual pleasure. Apparently it never occurred to the creatures of Tappaskulltinkadom that few things lent themselves more enticingly and ecstatically to long brooding thoughts than the delicate art of masturbation. Why, among all these thinkers, among all these brooding ponderers upon the thoughts that can fill a self as a self meditates upon itself, has no missionary of exquisite provocation advocated a prolonging of the adorable spasms of masturbating abandonment? Why has no habitual practiser of the more than voluptuous extension of the paradisiac organ of the imagination when the self alone with the self prolongs the self-play of luxurious erotic saturation, ever advocated his practice Here?'

Our two lads, Why and Ki, looked at each other with extremely puzzled expressions. They had always taken it for granted that masturbation was as much a prerogative of young men as menstruation was a prerogative of young women. And anyhow, what in the name of all the worlds in space, was the part to be played in this mad game of life by somebody dwelling in Tappaskulltinkadom, where all the senses had to be relinquished and only thought was allowed, who wanted to enjoy, even if unshared by anyone, nothing but long-drawn-out indulgences in the most absorbing sense of all, possessed by all living creatures, the sense of sex?

Then suddenly an inspiration came to Why Ki and he boldly said to Nelly Wallet: ‘What is there about this life in Tappaskulltinkadom to prevent my becoming an ardent advocate of sexual thought? It is surely an idea of some length and breadth and height and depth? As an idea to be advocated by me as if I were a missionary of Buddhism, or of Mohammedanism, or of Christianity, it is surely in accordance with the fundamental principles of Tappaskulltinkadom that I should from now on set about advocating mental and spiritual masturbation?’

Nelly Wallet replied at once. ‘What you are confusing in the back of your brain, my dear Why Ki, are two quite different and separate things: the first is the idea which we were all as children, wherever we come from, instructed by our elders to accept, namely that sexual thoughts are wicked and ought to be blotted out from the mind that dwells on them. The second is that the suppression of sexual feelings is the sign of a puritanical mind, a mind whose ferocious and savage hatred of sexual pleasure has caused one of the largest and most genial fountains of human sympathy that we possess to dry up at the source.’

‘What would you yourself, my dear Nelly,’ murmured Ve Zed gently, ‘best like to do if you became our permanent companion?’

She answered without a second’s hesitation. ‘I am your permanent companion,’ she said. ‘I decided to be so in the middle of last night, and what I want to do with you is to leave Tappaskulltinkadom forever and to fly on and on and on until we reach some world as different from this as this is different from the Earth from which you came.’

As can easily be believed the result of this conversation was that during no more than the next five minutes they were all three flying together hard and fast in the most extremely opposite direction from the one that would have led them back from Tappaskulltinkadom to the Earth. On and on and on and on and on the three of them flew together. The girl flew between the two boys who now and again would touch each other's hands across her back, as if to indicate to each other that their acceptance of her as their sister was absolutely mutual. On and on and on and on and on and on they flew. Then what they all three were sure would eventually happen did happen. They were in another world. They knew it from the presence of two phenomena. The first of these was now suddenly beneath them. Yes, there it was! In place of the darkness of aerial space stretching indefinitely and infinitely away from them in every direction, there was now Something beneath them. What was it? Oh it would have been so hard to describe it to anyone who had not been with them and felt its presence! It resembled, they told each other later, a circular landscape like an enormous globe composed of half-frozen water which was sufficiently solid to make them aware that its presence beneath them had taken the place of the emptiness they had grown used to. This globular orb was made of air and water and ice, and it gave them the clear, unquestionable feeling that they were floating above a rounded world whose surface sloped up and sloped down, just as if it had been a colossal soccer ball projected by some lively immortals at each end who were using space as their playing-field.

'But who lives here?' enquired Ve Zed of his two friends.

'I think there's one of its inhabitants squatting on my left instep,' replied Nelly. 'Could either of you catch it with your fingers?'

'I'll have a try,' said Why Ki. 'There, I think I've got it! But it's a very little thing!'

Little no doubt it was, but both the boys were soon able to examine it and to hold it near enough to the face of their adopted sister for her also to examine. This was rendered possible by the object itself, who carried with it, or wore upon it, a shining blaze of light by which they could all three look at it and look at one another as they did so and at the surface of the world they had reached. It was then that the little creature spoke to them.

‘Where do you come from?’ it enquired.

‘How is it,’ said Why Ki to the small object, ‘that so many worlds in space understand English?’

‘Because,’ the little Being replied, ‘English is the most simple and superficial and plain of all the languages existing. French, German, Italian, Spanish, Portuguese and all Nordic and all oriental languages have something deep and subtle in them that English lacks.’

8

So anxious were both the boys, and so anxious was Nelly, to learn about this new discovery of theirs that they accepted this derogatory remark concerning their native tongue without protest.

‘Please tell us more about your world,’ said Nelly.

‘Well, its name is Orb,’ said the little creature, who was a small round ball, a ball that had two orifices or holes in it, with one of which it breathed in and with the other breathed out.

‘Do you eat and drink,’ enquired Why Ki, ‘with those two holes you’ve got?’

‘We don’t require food or drink,’ replied the little round ball, who was composed of a substance that was almost as transparent as the surface of the orb beneath it. ‘We breathe in and we breathe out. We live on frozen air, air that resembles what you call hail, only it is more quiescent.’

‘What about the ancient classical languages?’ enquired Why Ki.

‘Oh you mean Greek and Latin,’ replied the little ball. ‘We call those languages nursery talk. We are brought up on them. It is only when we begin to grow up that, little by little, our parents teach us English.’

The three young visitors looked at each other with an interest beyond anything they could say. They soon became aware that the air was full of these tiny fluttering creatures. When they had rested for a few minutes, the two boys with their hands and their toes pressed against the surface of Orb, and Nelly kneeling upon Orb while she pushed back her hair from her forehead, one of these little balls, out-breathing and in-breathing with more energy than the others, came and sat on the back of Nelly’s hand as she tidied her hair.

‘You three must realize,’ it said, ‘that your appearance is a very important event in the history of Orb. We have no language of our own now. But quite apart from our readings in ancient Greek and Latin and our pleasure in modern English, we sometimes wonder whether it isn’t possible that there is far away from this present universe of infinite space dotted by thousands of worlds completely unknown to one another, a universe as different from this one as our Orb and we who inhabit it are different from the other worlds and their inhabitants which you have visited in your journey. Don’t you think it is possible that long ago, perhaps what you would describe as a million years ago, there came down here from another universe a group of space-travellers who expressed themselves as we do today by breathing in and breathing out, but in such a way as to form the actual words of a memorable language, a noble language, a musical language, a subtle language, a language with infinite complexities and intricacies such as was able to express the thoughts and feelings and ideas of Beings far more divine than any race we know or you know today. Our universe with its infinite space, dotted with countless worlds such as you have seen and we have never seen and countless others such as neither of us have ever dreamed of seeing or ever will see, may it not possibly be a mere pygmy of a universe compared with the one that visited us a million years ago, or rather whose travellers visited us. Think of any human being's ways, feeling, prejudices, loves, hatreds, speculations, lasting a million years. And think of an Orb's units lasting the same length of time, so that you as you are and we are, can discuss life as we are now discussing it. Wouldn't it be marvellous if such were the exact truth?

And why shouldn't it be? I tell you, oh earthly travellers, the mystery of life goes deeper than your world or mine, deeper than our universe or any other universe, even than one a million years old.'

'Isn't it funny,' said Nelly to her two boy friends, 'that we should have arrived at this world of mind and ideas before reaching the end of space? You'd think it would be at the very end, and be the last word about human life.'

'I suppose,' cried Ve Zed, 'that we've made a great mistake in thinking for a moment that space can have an end. Space must be infinite, surely, my dears? It's the background, isn't it, to everything in the universe?'

'Is it necessary,' burst out Why Ki, 'that the universe should have a background apart from itself? Isn't space part of the universe? Isn't space as much part of the universe as a chair's legs are part of a chair, or an armchair's arms part of an armchair, or a floor and a ceiling part of the room to which they are the above and below?'

Nelly startled them both by what she said in reply to these two remarks. 'I've had a sudden vision,' she announced, in a low, calm, quiet and yet intensely earnest voice: 'Yes! I've just had such a clear, definite, decisive vision that it would be madness in me and wholly against my conscience not to describe to you.'

'Tell us! Oh tell us!' cried Why Ki. 'Tell us! Oh tell us!' echoed Ve Zed.

'Well, my friends,' said Nelly, 'I have just seen the Wall of the World. You can have no idea how clear, how natural, how vivid, how entirely real and how unquestionably there, this vision was! I could tell simply from its appearance that it was more than a hundred feet thick. It was built of rough, small, granite-like stones that had accumulated many tiny seaweeds between them which increased its look of solidity and antiquity and majestic impenetrability. It soared up till it was out of my sight and it sank down till it was out of my sight. It produced on my whole mind and body the effect of being the end of everything. I kept murmuring to myself, "The Wall of the World — the Wall of the World! This is the end of all." It was a faint grey in colour. And this greyness increased its impenetrable look of absolute finality.'

There was complete silence. Then very gravely Why Ki said, 'Let us leave Orb and all these round bits of Orb, each of which we could call an Orb-it as we escape its orbit, and let us fly on into space! Maybe, Nelly, we shall reach your Wall of the World as we fly on!'

'Goodbye, Orb!' cried Ve Zed.

Nelly agreed with a gentle murmur, and on they all three flew, the girl between them, with Why Ki on her right and Ve Zed on her left.

'When I said that the Wall of the World,' Nelly murmured as they flew, 'had little seaweeds between its stones, I think I was wrong. They were more like, as I remember them now, the small, grey patches of lichen which we've often seen on old walls at home.'

On, on, on they flew, and with nothing but darkness and space round them for so long they began to feel sad and tired. Then all at once there was a decided change. They were in twilight. This twilight swiftly brightened. They were in light, a light that came, as the two boys soon saw, from little crevices and cracks and holes in a great wall, the very wall which Nelly had seen in her vision. They all three stopped and clung to it with their fingers and their toes, Nelly still having Why Ki on her right and Ve Zed on her left. It was hard for Nelly to turn her head, as she would like to have done, first to Why Ki on her right and then to Ve Zed on her left. So all she could do was to talk to the former for a while, and then, after getting a firm hold on one stone with one hand and finding a deep slit for the support of one toe with one foot and pressing her forehead, though the little stones pulled her hair and hurt her, turning her head round to talk to the latter for a while. She was half-way between them, her face to the wall, and one of the little stones had caught her hair and was pulling it so that it hurt her, when they were all three startled by the sound of two ugly voices, extremely ugly voices, talking not so much to them, they all three felt, as at them.

> ‘Hugger and Mugger are we, are we,
> And we built this Wall for Posterity.
> Architects both, and architects loth
> To see their world dissolve like froth.
> What will our Wall of the World keep out?
> God and the Devil and rascals worse
> Such as make all honest men rave and curse
> To see what money they put in their purse!
> Says Hugger to Mugger, “Our Wall goes down
> Below the country, below the town.”
> Says Mugger to Hugger, “Our Wall goes up
> Where Nebuchadnezzar can’t get a sup.’

‘I guess we three can disregard all this,’ said Why Ki. ‘And so, by Heaven, we will,’ said Ve Zed.

‘Let us sink down to the bottom of it,’ said Nelly.

And both the boys clutched her hands, Why Ki her right hand and Ve Zed her left hand, and she led them in a reckless, desperate, abandoned drop, down, down, down, down, down, down, down, down, till they came to the bottom of the Wall of the World.

At that point they were confronted by an extremely natural problem: what to do next. The Wall of the World simply ended. It hung suspended in space. They had come down to see what had happened to it and what would happen to them. And now here they stood, all three of them, holding hands, Nelly between the two boys; and when Why Ki lifted up his left hand the tips of his fingers touched the bottom of the Wall of the World, and when Ve Zed lifted up his right hand the tips of his fingers touched the bottom of the Wall of the World.

Then suddenly both boys dropped their hands and both of them embraced Nelly and hugged her to their two hearts. ‘If we were to plunge down into the darkness outside this wall,’ said Why Ki, ‘what would happen to us, I wonder?’

‘We shouldn’t be killed. We shouldn’t die,’ murmured Ve Zed. ‘We should still be ourselves, wouldn’t we? And we should still have Nelly.’

‘Don’t hug me too tight, my dears,’ gasped Nelly, ‘or I shan’t have breath enough to tell you what I think. I think we are going to dive into Nothingness. I think that though we are here now, under the Wall of the World, and all three of us fully alive and fully ourselves, after we have agreed to do it, after we have made our plunge, we shall be a part of Nothingness, or, if you like to put it so, we shall have been three persons, two boys and one girl, who are no longer three in one, no longer boys or girls or any other sort of beings, but are as completely lost in Nothingness as if we had been black-beetles or bugs or fleas or frogs or toads or tadpoles or newts or minnows or sticklebacks.'

'Do you think, Nelly,' enquired Why Ki, 'that in every direction, all round all the worlds we have visited and all the worlds we have never visited, there extends this great mass of Nothingness? Does it extend to such a distance in all directions that it might well be said that, when the world is considered as a whole, far the larger part of it is Nothingness?'

It was then that Ve Zed burst out: 'But doesn't the Bible talk of God creating Darkness and Light? Then did God deliberately create a World whereof the larger part was Nothingness? Are we then to believe that it was God the Creator of the World who deliberately created Nothingness as the largest part of the World?'

'But, my dear Ve Zed,' protested Why Ki, 'Isn't God the Creator part of the World's Nothingness? Isn't the Bible only speaking of that little portion of the World that existed then and that still exists, quite independently of the much larger portion that has always been Nothingness? You must remember that if God himself was in reality only a part of the Nothingness of which we three are really a part, however we may think otherwise, then the creative God of the Bible is now as much a part of Nothingness as we three shall be in a minute or two when we plunge into the abyss.'

But Ve Zed was by no means content with his friend's argument. 'But because we've reached the bottom of the Wall of the World,' he protested, 'is that any reason why you and I and our dear Nelly should die? Surely we could fly through empty space, avoiding every one of the worlds we've discovered, until we arrive at the world you came from, Gaia, the earth; and then you can show this earth and its chief city, which I was taught to call London, to me as well as to Nelly. You'd be thrilled, wouldn't you, Nelly dear, to tread the fields and shores of Gaia, and to walk through the famous streets of London about which they taught me such a lot at school, and you too I expect?'

'I don't like,' said Nelly nervously, and both the boys could feel from her hands that she was trembling, 'two voices I heard through the Wall of the World when I first saw it in a vision. The feeling I got from those voices was a feeling I've never had before and hope I shall never have again. It was terror, but it was much worse than that. It was disgust and loathing. But, my dears, please realize that it wasn't my vision of the Wall of the World that gave me these horrors. It was two voices that I heard behind it telling me they had built it. One called himself Hugger and the other called himself Mugger; and they kept on repeating an unending tedious dialogue, bawdily and grossly made up between them, and Hugger said one thing and Mugger said the other thing; and in all that they both said growing grosser and grosser and grosser and grosser and grosser, and more and more and more ridiculously stupid.'

'Well, Nelly darling,' said Why Ki. 'We three have to decide now, standing here together beneath the Wall of the World, whether we'd better plunge into the darkness beyond the Wall under which we stand and perish in nothingness, or whether we'd better remain safely this side and fly down together, avoiding every world that exists, until we reach Gaia, the earth; and find ourselves in the streets of London.'

But, as so often happens in life, whether in the life of human beings or in the life of the immortals, this terrific and terrible choice was not left to them. Striding towards them through the air came the greatest and strongest and tallest giant that any universe has ever known. It was none other than Gyges himself, a giant who possessed three arms. With one of these arms Gyges seized the base of the World Wall and shook it as if it had been the rail of a small staircase, until the whole thing began to crumble and fall to bits. Then with his right hand Gyges seized Why Ki and with his left hand seized Ve Zed, each by the hair of his head, and banged their skulls against the skull of Nelly until all three skulls became a congealed mass of blood and bones and brains which the Chant swallowed handful after handful until the three friends' heads were reeking in his belly, and the dust of the Wall of the World was scattered, along with their headless bodies, into every corner of space.

DEDICATED

TO

MARIAN POWYS

Oh lace-maker, what joys, what fears
  Do you weave into your thread?
What sorcery from the far-off years
  Hovers above your head?
Your flickering fingers are dipped deep
  In the magic-flowing stream.
Is there a sleep beneath this sleep
  And a dream beyond this dream?

THE FLUTE-PLAYER

ONCE I saw her. ’Twas long ago;
From the bridge of a dream-city.
Drops of rain were falling slow.
It was autumn and long ago;
And somewhere in the fields below
A flute-player played this ditty —
  One look and never the same again
  Are the roses on the wall;
  One look and forever the midnight rain
  With a different sound must fall.

Gables and gardens, roofs and towers,
Hung vague and rich and dim.
From somewhere there came a scent of flowers,
And a wind from the world’s rim;
And the sun sank red behind the towers,
And she stood and looked at him.

She looked at him from a closed window,
Then at me did she look down.

It was autumn and very long ago,
And drops of rain kept falling slow
And a flute-player played on his flute below,
From the fields below the town.

And now they have told me so constantly
That the place was a city of dreams.
That my reason believes it; but in my heart,
In my heart most real it seems!
And thro' town and country I still must go
The shadowy roads along,
Seeing always that closed window
And hearing that flute-player's song.

And when the sun most rich and dim
Sinks down behind dark towers,
And there comes a wind from the world's rim
And from somewhere a scent of flowers —
I stand again on the bridge of that city
And hear that flute-player;
And my Love looks down on me in pity,
And I look back at her.

— One look and never the same again
Are the roses on the wall;
One look and forever the midnight rain
With a different sound must fall!

THE CUP

AH, be satisfied, my dear;
There is none but you
Who can hold me from the fair,
Brimming, glimmering, lovely, rare
Cup of exquisite despair,
Cup of black basalt —
   Salter than the sea is salt.
   Older than the sea is old.
   Fuller than the sea is full!
I have cried, “How beautiful
Is that cup!” have wept and cried,
“It is full of heavenly dew!”
   Ah, my dear, be satisfied;
   There is none but you.

THE VIGIL

LET the huge stars roll on!
My vigil's kept.
Love lies his grave upon —
   What is there left?
I swore to guard the shrine
   Where the bright candles shine.
Bread is bread, wine is wine.
   Darkness on all be poured!
The altar has no God.

Let the huge stars roll on
   Space beyond space!
Love was; and love is gone.
   Cover his face!
Let the great gulfs abhorred
   Take it, my flaming sword.
   Deep below deep!
Hail, thou that wast my Lord,
I have kept watch and ward —
   Now I can sleep.

HER LOVE

I TOOK the love you threw away
When the moon was full;
When in the river the full moon lay
And the river-reeds were hushed in their play
  And gave their souls to the moon,
And whispered and cried, “Ah, well-away!
Today must turn into yesterday
And the moon must wither and fade away,
  The beautiful full moon!”

I took the love that you had scorned.
  Where it lay in that cold reed-bed.
Took it when the morning dawned,
  Making the river red.
“Behold, in spite of her bitter scorn,
In spite of the blood spilt by the dawn,
  That love is mine,” I said.

And now when the moon is old
And the sun, all burning gold.
  Scorches the city street;
Now when the river is dried
And the reeds have drooped and died,
  Your love is a fountain sweet;

A fountain and a cup!
   And the wretchedest and the worst
Bless God as they drink it up,
   For it quenches their deepest thirst.
And the air of the hottest day
   Grows cool and beautiful,
Because of the love you threw away
   When the moon was full.

WAYFARERS

THE wind is very cold!
Does it blow from the ultimate sea,
Or over cities sad and old,
Lost beyond memory?” ‘
So cried my heart to my soul,
As it shivered by its side;
But “Follow the wind — follow the wind!”
My soul replied.

And the wind led them on and on.
Till they came to the city of Dis;
“Here shall we rest!” my poor heart cried,
“Here shall we find our bliss;
Behold, this is great Babylon!
The Heart’s Desire is this!”
And it blessed itself and blessed my soul
With a wicked heathen kiss.
So cried my heart to my soul.
As it shivered by its side.
But “Follow the wind — follow the wind!”
My soul replied.

And the wind led them on and on.
Till they came to the city of God.
“Here shall we rest!” my poor heart cried.

And tears of blood it poured.
"On these streets shine the sun and the moon:
The City of God is this!"

And it blessed itself and blessed my soul
With a most holy kiss.
So cried my heart to my soul,
As it shivered by its side.
But "Follow the wind — follow the wind!"
My soul replied.

And the wind led them on and on
Till they came to the City of Dreams,
To the place where the king called "Might-have-been"
Dwelleth with "Never-to-be," his queen,
And all is as it seems.
"Here shall we rest!" my poor heart cried,
"The City of Dreams is this."
And it blessed itself and blessed my soul
With a wistful and weeping kiss.
So cried my heart to my soul.
As it shivered by its side.
But "Follow the wind — follow the wind!"
My soul replied.

And still they follow and follow.
Beyond each ultimate shore;
And Aldebaran shines behind them
And Arcturus shines before.

And when my poor heart murmurs,
  “When we left those gates we sinned!”
My soul thro’ the darkness answers her —
  “Follow the wind!”

EPISODE

SO now that all is over,
And it does not greatly matter
How long the same roof cover
  The hope that perished there,
The fleeting hour to flatter.
  Now that it all is over,
Forget the sad word lover.
  And breathe — the air, the air!

Lean down and watch the river
  Flow fast beneath our bridge;
Watch the faint grasses quiver
  On the familiar ridge.
If all were well there would be
  No difference in the dew,
Nor in different fashion could we
  Catch the horizon’s clue.

A sign, a symbol captured
  From the eternal flow!
Stood we by love enraptured,
  What more could either know?
Nothing! Between us ever
  The old unfathomed sea.

Not less than now would shiver
   With its bitter mystery.

So now that all is over,
   Let the great stars emerge,
Placid and calm, and cover
   The sky from verge to verge!
The deep and flowing magic
   Of the universe is such,
Comic be it, or tragic.
   It does not matter much!

THE WRITER

IN the shade of the pyramids
I knelt and wrote on the sand,
While with softly drooping, veilėd lids,
You watched in the shade of those pyramids
   The movements of my hand.

I wrote of the fall of Troy,
   I wrote of the Grecian ships,
I wrote of Adonis the lovely boy.
And of winged Psyche’s virgin joy
   As she clung to Eros’ lips.

I wrote of the Syrian pearls.
   Of Herod, the Jewish king.
I wrote of Salome’s tossing curls
And the pale lips sweeter than any girl’s,
   Of her blood-stained offering.

But all the while you kept.
   Dark-lowered your veiled lids.
You neither laughed nor murmured nor wept;
A watcher would surely have dreamed you slept
   In the shade of those pyramids.

But when I wrote in the sand
   A little unlegended name,

A human unhistoried name.
With a bitter cry and uplifted hand
You rose and over that famished land,
Fled away like a flame.

BLASPHEMY

O FAIRY form, O flower-like face,
O piteous tender breast,
Why did you come with your childish grace
And trouble my heart’s rest?

The tide, my darling, is bitter and deep
That washes that cruel shore.
The happy lovers are those that sleep
And love not any more.

Calm filmy dreams thro’ each tired head
Flow softly, mingle and flow.
The happy lovers are those that are dead.
That died full long ago.

O child, forgive me; I lie, I lie
With an evil blasphemy!
I lie to the clouds in the air above!
I lie to the earth and the sea!

The living, the living must worship love!
The dead, the dead must be.

THE FLOWER

I COULD not see at that hour,
I tell you, I could not see!
The Face of the night was wet
And there was rain on the wind.
Oh, misery — oh, regret!
Blind! Blind! Blind! Blind!
I tell you, I could not see.
There was too much rain on the wind
When I stooped and picked that flower.

I hold it now in my hand,
As the moon thro' the branches peers,
Wickedly, wantonly peers.
But now it is too late,
And its petals desolate
Droop and lose their power.
And I see that this murdered flower
Would have changed the course of my fate.

And now, oh wanton moon,
As you flicker thro' boughs where the rains
Drip to a fitful tune,
I see on that flower the veins
Of a delicate-pencilled rune,
A hope that no longer remains.

Oh moon! if only it grew
   Still living, still tender and free,
Oh wanton moon, I would laugh at you;
   Nor bitterly wander the forest thro’,
While the rain drips sadly from tree to tree.
   Cursing the cause of my misery,
   The blindness — the blindness — that ruined me!

VENI CREATOR SPIRITUS

MY strength is shifting sand; the waters
Of jealousy meet over my head;
I am scorned and scourged by Satan’s daughters;
  And crucified on a salt sea bed.
I have prayed to the gods. Oh, little the use!
  Thou, greater than God, descend on me.
  Thou breath of the deep world, set me free.
  Blow from your primal eternity.
    Veni Creator Spiritus!

My strength is trodden dust. The claw
  Of envy tears me day and night,
And the tawny lion of “Nevermore”
  Eats my heart for his delight.
Oh, calm cool breath, your floodgates loose!
  Oh, breath of the deep world, set me free.
  Oh, greater than God, descend on me.
  Blow from your primal eternity.
    Veni Creator Spiritus!

My strength is the dregs of poured-out wine.
  The dry ground drinks me. The poison-flower
Grows fat with me. The root malign
  Of the night-shade waits its baleful hour.
Life is too bitter. “I could not choose

But weep to see another thus.”
O breath from beyond the land and sea,
O calm and cool eternity.
Veni Creator Spiritus!

My strength is smouldering ashes. The molten stream
Of love consumes me; all day and night I waste
Burning from fever-dream to fever-dream,
My parched mouth full of the dead-sea taste.
O air, O breath, give what the gods refuse!
O depths beyond all depths, have pity on me!
O space beyond all spaces, set me free.
Blow from your calm and cool eternity.
Veni Creator Spiritus!

THE BLOOD

I FOUND bright drops of purple blood
Beside a dying faun.
A mushroom-cup had caught that flood
   From the brown body torn.

I took the blood and went apart
   With her whose love I killed.
“Take this and fill with it your heart,
   In place of what I spilled!”

She looked at me out of her pain —
   Sweet saints, on my death-bed
Let me not see that look again!
   Then lightly, lightly she said —

“I take that blood. When we shall meet,”
   And she gave me her mouth to kiss —
“At the White Christ’s golden judgment seat,
   I will lie to him of this.

“I will lie to him, the great White Christ,
   About the love you killed.
I will say the brown faun’s blood sufficed
   In place of what you spilled.”

Softly she turned and left me there.
  And I was left alone;

And her voice came faintly upon the air,
  "A faun's blood shall atone!"

But from where she left me I did not move,
  And never yet have moved.
For I am he that murdered love,
  And yet am I not loved?

THE WIND

THE night is sobbing and crying with rain,
And the wind is drifting among the trees;
Drifting and whispering to me again
Of the memories — of the memories!

Like a phantom sea is the drifting wind;
Flowing towards us, ebbing apart;
The merciless wind without a heart!
Like a phantom sea is the drifting wind.

And my memories tear me away from you;
And your memories tear you away from me;
While the wind goes wailing between us two,
The drifting wind, like a phantom sea.

Oh hollow spaces, oh midnight springs!
Oh deep night-valleys wet with the rain!
Lure, lure this wind to fold up its wings
And bury our memories again!

Then I would forget, and you would forget;
And beneath the sleeping wind
We would pray to the darkness, and watch regret
Drift away o'er the pastures wet,
Till silence healed our mind.

ESCAPE

DEEP pools there are, pools quiet and still,
  Far off, where none of them guess;
Beyond the peaks of the world's last hill
    And the desert's loneliness.
But all about the edge of those pools
Flutter like troubled birds,
The little gestures you used to use,
    And your light, forgotten words.
And when the moon from the purple sky
Makes signs to the silent grass.
Those pools grow charged with your memory,
    And I see your image pass.
I see you not as you really are,
But pale as the lately dead,
With a faint marsh-flame like a fallen star
    Flickering above your head.
O wild white cheeks, O scarlet mouth!
    Is my heart's deep whisper true
That beyond the peaks of the world's last hill,
I can flee the human race at my will
    And yet cannot escape from you?

THE OLD CRY

IF only ages ago
I had buried my restless heart
Under mountains of snow
In a lonely place apart,
I could bring it now to her,
Locked with a silver key;
And its shadowy pearls would never stir
From that sweet sanctuary.

Oh wind that wafted my boat
To the isles where the Sirens sing,
Somewhere — washed up upon sands remote
Those pearls he glittering.
Gather them, gather them up,
Oh wind, and bring them to me
In a misty foam-wreathed cup —
The pearls that I lost in the sea.

Dim with the salt are they,
Blurred and bleached with the sun;
But, gathered from far away.
Bring them back, every one;
That Iain once more at rest
Where her heart beats and feels.

They may sleep forever against her breast,
    Sealed with a thousand seals!

WAITING

THE flowerless weeds along the tangled hedge
Listen and wait.
The willow-bushes by the water’s edge
Listen and wait.
Under the earth I feel the roots of trees
Listening, waiting.
Oh Earth, oh Sky, oh secret hope of these!
Is it worth waiting?

So sinks my heart’s faint whisper hopelessly,
Sinks and is gone;
While the round earth sweeps weeds and willows and me
Carelessly on;
And morning becomes noon, noon becomes night
In the same doubt.
No answer, not a word; till one by one
The stars come out.

And then — but not from them, for they too wait,
Ah, they wait too, the stars! — but from the night,
The night itself, oldest of all the gods.
The answer!
And all the flowerless weeds and the willows and I
Listen — hear nothing — yet are satisfied.
Portions of that Night we know ourselves to be;

Children of the oldest of all the gods are we,
And from ourselves we hide our own hearts’ mystery!

A FACE

IF I could only pass
  Into that ultimate later time
Where the solemn planets cease to climb,
And one unruffled sea of glass
    Breaks on the sand with monotonous fall,
    Calls to the land with continuous call,
Breaks and ebbs and flows and drifts,
While its endless motion lifts
    The grey-cold tops of unearthly reeds
And marge to desolate marge succeeds.
    With never the trunk of a single tree;
If I could only see
    The face of the wind in that ultimate place,
I think it would be less heavy with dreams,
    Less heavy with dreams of sea-weeds drifting.
    Less heavy with dreams of reed-tops lifting,
    Than the human face of one I know!
If I could only go
    Into that passionless later time
Where long sea-memories rock like rhyme.
    And the sun and moon forever set.
    Tinge all with eternal violet.
The face of the wind in that ultimate spot
    Where all is equal and nothing forgot,
Would have the look of a face I know

Or dreamed long ago that I know —
    Heavy with joy — heavy with woe!

THE SEA-BIRD

YOU saw my heart as it lay
   Like a hushed rock-pool, aside
From the ocean’s wind-tossed spray.
   And you were hurt in your pride.

And the wild sea-bird in you
   Rose and spread out its wings,
And flapping down over cliff’ and ledge.
Lighted upon that rock-pool’s edge
   And troubled it thro’ and thro’.

And now that its depths are dim
   And heavy and blurred and blind,
Over the purple waves you skim
And bathe in the sun and make sport for him,
   And give yourself to the wind.

A flashing meteor of pearl,
   You laugh and waver and dart —
In silver circles you gleam and whirl,
A rainbow, a sea-bird, a demon — a girl
   Who has flown across a heart.

AT THE END OF THE WORLD

THE patient earth, the breathless trees,
Have listened here for centuries.
Have listened under the silver moon
To this little streamlet's flowing.
Hearing nothing in its going
Save its own enchanted tune.

Oh, how silent on moss and stone
Sleeps the whole world's bitter wrong!
While the shadow of love, lying alone.
Listens to the streamlet's song.

At the end of the world this place might be!
So hushed are the shadows, so hushed the grass;
So hushed are the hemlocks of mystery,
Waiting for feet that never pass!

Listen! A voice out of the night!
A voice from the silence — a passionate cry —
Beautiful, terrible, infinite!
The voice of a god who comes to die.

And the patient earth and the breathless trees
Turn to that voice; and the listening air
Yearns to it, thro' the immensities.
As tho' God Himself were dying there.

Only the little streamlet flows
  Beneath the hemlocks, beneath the moon;
Hearing nothing as it goes,
  Save its own enchanted tune.

And silent, silent, on moss and stone.
  Sleeps the whole world’s bitter wrong;
While the shadow of love, lying alone,
  Listens to the streamlet’s song.

NIGHT

ALONE again! And the silence flows
Round the windows of this place.
The night is starless and heavy and close,
Rain-scented like a drooping rose;
And on the night floats your face.

It does not smile, it does not frown.
It does not laugh, it does not weep;
It only rocks itself up and down.
Floating, as if on the waves of sleep.

Like a drooping rose is your dreamy face
With the starless night about it furled;
And infinite silence fills the place.
And there is nothing else in the world.

THE DAUGHTER OF THE SPHINX

MY mind is a plain with blackened stalks
And the crumbling stones of a buried city,
Where hooded desolation walks,
And all alone in an empty sky
A solitary kite sails by.
But yet, because of the sudden pity
Of the youngest daughter of the sphinx,
Great Amnion on my burden winks
And I have found — ah, none too soon!
A little pallid petalled flower.
Hid in the dust of a fallen tower.
With a phantom lustre like the moon;
And now I can watch the kite sail by,
And the long, long shadows among the stones,
And the blackened stalks and the empty sky,
And the wind-blown dust of ancient bones.
With strange exultant serenity,
And across that plain which is my soul,
Soft incense-clouds of healing roll
With balm, and the breath of a whispered spell,
And an opiate-rain ineffable.
For on him whose mind is scarred deep.
With secrets sad as the dead who sleep.
On him whose soul is a buried city.
The daughter of the sphinx has pity.

THE LITTLE FLAME

TRAMPLE it fiercely down,
It will not burn your feet.
The little flame that your savage frown
   Hated as it went up and down,
Because it had no heat.

Trample it in the dust!
   It only carries in it
The far horizon of one hope,
   One faith, one trust, one horoscope,
Cast by one fatal minute.

Press your heel hard on it there.
   You know it cannot burn.
It can only answer a hurt life's prayer.
   With an ecstasy delicate as air,
That you have yet to learn.

Look! It still licks the ground.
   Out with it! Turn it to clay!
The wind will blow with its ancient sound.
   When that flame is buried underground
And you have gone your way.

No, it never had heat,
   Love sometimes shows that lack!

But you — you have spurned beneath your feet,
  What one day, weary of wine and meat.
In vain you'll summon back.

A pale flame, after your fierce sunsets!
Yet the Spring came at its call,
Bringing windflowers and pansies and violets,
And the rosemary that has no regrets
And lasts the longest of all.

Pray, child, to the gods that when you've found
What the heats of passion prove.
You sob not aloud with a piteous sound.
Over the plot of trampled ground,
Wherein you murdered love.

THE RIVER

THE pallid river of regret.
Flows thro’ that empty land;
The land you call my heart, where yet
The poplar-trees of memory, wet
With ancient sorrow, stand.
And mournfully, mournfully evermore
Thro’ those trees the wind goes wailing.
And like wreckage strewn on a lonely shore,
Where no man dwells and nevermore
Shall any ship come sailing.
The dead leaves lie where they have fallen.
Lie on the land where they have fallen,
The land where the roots of sorrow are set.
The land of the river of regret.

AVE MARIA

HOLLOW spaces, large and deep,
Flow around your quiet sleep.
One would think your dreaming head
Had eternity for its bed!
Oh, how green, for all the night.
Is the floating liquid air.
Full of whispers, full of light.
Vague earth murmurs everywhere!

Listen! Did you hear that sound
In your eyelid-drooping sleep,
Falling thro’ the listening night,
Falling, falling? And the earth
Melts in vaporous mist before it,
Melts as if from very birth
It had watched and waited for it!
Listen!

’Tis a petal from the moon
From that cold and chaste moon-flower.
Flung in languid lotus hour.
Like a thought after a tune;
Like a tune after a thought,
Sweet with ecstasy unsought!
And all other lovely things.

Such as shadow-veined moth-wings.
Such as shells from drifting seas.
Such as wild anemones,

Float with it thro’ hollow space,
Dark against your white, white face,
Float and flutter and waver now,
Pale against your shadowy brow!
Listen!

Ah! You are listening deep and deep,
And you stir at last in your quiet sleep,
Fall the petals of the moon
To their soft eternal tune,
Thro’ the green and hollow night.
All transparent tender things
From their cold creative springs
Fall, fall down into the night.
With a tremulous shy delight.
Listen!
Ave Maria!
The heart must be pierced with a sharp sword,
That would be the heart of the mother of God!

THE RECLUSE

WHY do you live in shadows and sighs,
‘Mid waving grasses and faint, faint scents
‘Mid floating murmurs and mysteries,
And the ghosts of roses? Arise! Go hence!

“Go hence and wrestle beneath the sun!
Go hence and live before you die!
For laurels, not roses, the race is run.
In the great arena under the sky.

“Go hence! Or my God, the Lord of Hosts,
Will put it into my heart to smite
You and your roses that smell like ghosts
Into the everlasting night!”

“Smite on, dear heart. The eternal night
Will cover me with shadows and sighs;
And, like one great rose, the Infinite
Will hide me forever from your eyes!”

THE LEAVES

THE first dead leaves of the year are down!
Look, how pale they float,
Under the bridge of the market-town
   By wharf and barge and boat!
How cold the rain-drenched meadows lie,
   Heavy with mist each one!
And the elm-trees stand how silently
   Against the horizon!

Oh, Love, oh, Life, most strange, most blind
   Are our days beneath the sun!
A leaf on the water; on the wind
   A feather — and all is done.
The market-town still sleeps — Sweet Christ,
   How motionless it seems!
As if one night of rain sufficed
   To cover it with dreams.

Can it be only yesterday.
   On this same bridge I stood.
And watched the red sun sink away
   Behind a fairy wood?
The gods protect us all! So soon
   Can summer cease? So light

Can they drift, the leaves that played love’s tune?
    Can the world end in a night?

IN THE NIGHT

A CRY like a child’s cry lost in the rain
Came to me out of the mist.
I rose and answered that cry again,
   But it went sobbing over the plain
And died into the mist.

And where it had been came the scent of flowers
   Out of a world’s distress,
With a moan of gathered thunder-showers
   And a gasping loneliness.

And the gods with their faces wet with crying,
   The old gods strange and wild,
Swept out upon us across the night,
   And — oh mystery, mystery infinite!
The gods and the weeping child and I
   Laughed and kissed in ecstasy!

REQUIEM

WHERE, oh where, should love be laid?
Where the sigh of the heather-bell,
  To the wandering wind can tell,
  Tell too heavily, tell too well.
How human hearts are made!

Lift him gently from where he lies
  So pale now!
With frozen kisses upon his eyes.
  And faded petals upon his brow.
Carry him gently far away,
And bury him out of the sight of day,
  Where neither sun nor rain
  Can trouble him again.
We have killed him and love grown cold
Is better buried under the mould.

Where, oh where, should love be laid.
  Where the lost soul of the sea
  Moans and weeps perpetually.
Where the cold night cries in vain
For what cannot come again.

Where, oh where, should love be laid?
  Where the sigh of the sea-shell.
  To the sobbing wind can tell.

Tell too heavily, tell too well.
    How cruel-faithless, how cruel-light.
    While love lies dying in the night,
Human hearts are made.

THE TRAITOR

JUDAS am I, or Peter,
  Or am I only one
Set by malicious destiny
  Between the moon and sun?

Silver upon the land!
  Silver upon the sea!
A world of silver in my hand —
  And my Love looking at me.

It is not only the Lord,
  Who in the high priest’s hall,
Looks on the man who can betray,
Till bitterly weeping, he turns away,
Too common grows that word.

Put out the altar-light!
  Let no wine redden the floor.
Cover that lovely face from sight!
Let me go forth into the night,
  And see that look no more.

Silver upon the land!
  Silver upon the sea!
A world of silver in my hand —
  And my Love looking at me!

THE TEARS

WHERE, oh wind, do you carry the tears
That the muffled heads are weeping,
Under the roofs where no one hears,
While the Lord Christ is sleeping?

“Cold he lies in the reeds of the dawn,
But I carry them to him there.
Where far away from the world’s scorn
They gleam like dew on his hair.

“The tears that are shed for loneliness
Like pearls on his forehead rest.
And the tears of passionate distress
Are opals on his breast.

“But where, oh wind, are the hopeless tears —
The tears no comfort know —
The tears that none but the midnight hears —
The tears of love’s deep woe?

“Tell me, oh wind, ere you depart.
On his white body where are they?”
“Ah! They are in the Lord Christ’s heart
And none can take them from him away!”

SPRING

PAIN and spilt blood and an appalling cry
Turn the earth’s air to poison and make bitter
The bread we eat and lay across our sleep
A quivering shadow like a gash that bleeds.
We laugh and are ashamed as those who mock
An open grave.
And yet the wet stalks of the hyacinths
Must soon, amid green spears, bear purple flowers!
And yet, from rain-soaked earth and crumpled leaves,
The yellow primrose, with a sweet swift pang.
Must send Spring’s perilous breath, sharp-shuddering
With faint and delicate treachery, thro’ our veins!
Shall we henceforth before these hushed wood-things
Stand dazed and shamed? Or shall we in strange mood
Laugh weeping laughter, as those laugh who hear
Infants make holiday upon a grave?
Softly with pungent scent of fields fresh-ploughed
The small soft misty rain through dripping boughs
Washes the crumbling roots of fallen trees;
Red-Campion droops his petals to the earth;
While, wild and clear, from liquid rain-sweet throat.
As though no graves covered the green earth’s face,
Bursts, as of old, the blackbird’s shameless song.

A LOOK

I WOULD not stop you on your way;
I would not bind your feet;
Or on your shining forehead lay
 One shadow of defeat.
Go forward — if you turn, the crowd
 Might trample you with me.
Let the flute-players play more loud
 And the dancers dance more free I
But once before the palace gate
 Rolls back and I'm bereft —
Turn and look on me; and if fate
 Has any pity left,
A passing mist upon your eyes
Will redeem every sacrifice.

THE HORIZON

PALE trees on the horizon grow,
  Pale, faint and dim and grey —
Can they be real trees? They flow
    Into the mist away.
Between us the valleys are green and wide,
But what is beyond on the other side?

Beyond I see a wooden pier,
    Stretching into a shadowy lake.
And a sudden cry of wild-fowl I hear
    As over the reeds their flight they take.
Over the reeds and far away
Beyond the trees, dim, pale and grey;
    A wooden pier — a shadowy pond.
    But what is beyond? What is beyond?

Beyond there is a long, long road.
    Bordered by ditches dark and wide.
Where a wayfarer with a heavy load
    Talks to the silence at his side.
Talks to the silence and talks to the trees.
But what is beyond, beyond all these?

Beyond is a house with a ruined wall,
    Where the long road enters an ancient wood.

And its rafters rot and sink and fall,
   And nothing disturbs its solitude,

Only a heron, high up in the sky,
Cries with a melancholy cry;
   Cries to the house, to the road and the trees,
   Cries to the wayfarer passing these;
Between us the valleys are green and wide,
But what is beyond — on the other side?

Pale trees on the horizon grow,
   Pale, faint and dim and grey.
Can they be real trees? They flow
   Into the mist away!
Beyond and beyond, and further still,
Beyond, till we cross the world’s last hill —
So it goes. So it always will!

DEMETER CONSOLATRIX

TROUBLED heart and fevered forehead —
Ah! with calm immortal hand
Soon the mother of all shall take you
To a green and silent land.
Great red lilies hushed and splendid
Shall be lamps to light your dreams,
And your sleep shall be attended
By the flow of hidden streams.

Large mild stars shall shine above you,
Cool deep grass your bed shall be.
With the mother of all to love you.
You shall lose your misery.
She shall quench your forehead's fire
With her calm immortal hand;
You shall have your heart's desire
In that green and silent land.
From the great red lilies' splendour,
From the large mild stars shall fall
Magic wonderful and tender,
And the mother of all shall give you all!

THE GOLDEN CUP

LOVELY with memories surging up,
  From a fount beneath the years,
This light spring day like a golden cup.
  Holds something deeper than tears.

Misty and tender, beneath, above.
  The green, green sap flows sweet.
And beyond the mountains waits my Love,
  With daisies at her feet.

Is it I, is it I, whom love has found?
  No! No! It cannot be!
I have lost my sense for such heavenly sound
  And my ear for such harmony.

Who am I that such liquid and tender mist
  From the green, green trees should rise?
Who am I to be welcomed and healed and kissed
  By the wonder of such skies?

Not unto me, oh. Lord, not unto me.
  This lovely and golden day!
Take it and scatter it abroad
  Over the land and sea!

Let it float and flicker, this heaven-sent light,
  Where the saddest wanderers roam;
Till the healing dews fall with the night,
  And the lost return to their home!

THE POPLAR-LEAVES

WHY do they, all of them, lean one way.
The poplar-leaves of your heart's sad tree?
Why do they shiver and tremble so
When the wild sea-winds have ceased to blow
And the wild sea-swallows have flown away
From the edge of the bitter and lonely sea?
If I call them to me from over the hill —
The other swallows — the swallows that fly
O'er the cool, fresh streams of a clearer sky —
Would those leaves lean the same way still?

Ah! they must all of them lean one way
Whatever wind the other follows,
However swiftly fly the swallows;
For the sea-born can only the sea obey.

But if from the sea itself should blow —
From the sea itself, from the lonely sea,
A strange new wind; then I should know, —
And — perhaps — those leaves would turn to me!

THE MIST

IN and out of the mist
We waver, ghosts that we are!
And the hands and lips we have kissed
Beckon us from afar:
Beckon us, whisper us, cry to us.
In and out of the mist;
Mock us, elude us, fly from us;
The hands and lips we have kissed.

In and out of the mist, like ghosts
We waver along the shore.
Flickering phantom-hosts,
Lost evermore — evermore!
Whispering, beckoning, sighing,
Weeping, vexing the night.
Nothing can stop our crying.
Except red burning light!

Ghosts in the mist are we,
And ghosts are the planets who peer
And peep at our misery.
With their tender pitiful leer;
But the great vermilion sun
That in one moment's blaze
Could melt, transfigure, and clarify.

And outline against eternity.
Our inmost selves and our troubled days,

The laughing, careless, reckless sun,
The life-giver, when all is done,
Knowing no weakness or tenderness,
Having no pity for our distress.
Sick to death of our mists and lies,
Pours himself upon other skies.

OPTIMISM

YOU who boast you’re an optimist.
May the leprosy of the Jews
Wither your flesh for the truth you’ve missed
And the cozening lies you use!

One little child, tender and weak,
Hurt by life’s devil’s-wheel
Should make you blush thro’ your bowels sleek.
But you are not worthy to feel.

As long as the smallest one
Of earth’s children by pain is riven.
As long as one cry goes up under the sun,
God must not be forgiven!

He does not forgive Himself,
The rain in the night is his prayer.
From the cross, from the cross, he forgives such pelf
As you — who hung him there!

THE APPEAL

OH that at this last hour
 The word might be given me
To tell you the power — the power
  That you have over me!

Oh that I could enfold
  Dyed in purple and blue,
Writ in gold upon gold,
  The feeling I have for you!

What can I give to you
  To take on your cruel way,
That will cry at your heart all night
  And cry at your heart all day!

What can I find for you
  To place close to your breast —
Something fatal and true.
  Something to trouble your rest?

O, wraith of the rain and the mist,
  How can I live without you?
You float on a sea of amethyst
  And the moon is silver about you!

You float and drift on a shadowy tide,
  And the feathered reeds bend low.

And the moonlit pastures yearn to your side,
  And the forests beckon you.

Each night, each night ere my eyelids fall
  I shall feel you calling to me,
With a low persistent plaintive call.
  Like a sea-bird lost on the sea!

And I shall answer and you will hear,
  And above the wind and rain
The people a strange sobbing will hear;
  We shall be together again.

Oh that at this last hour
  The word might be given me
To tell you the power — the power
  That you have over me!

GOD

WHAT is that face at the window?
  What is that form at the door?
Of white mist are its shadowy limbs
  And with moonlight covered o'er.

Is it a girl or a ghost?
  Pile up the fuel higher!
Pour out the wine and heat the roast!
  Let us warm ourselves at the fire.

Look! It wavers and moans.
  It is very cold and drear!
Pelt it with nuts and cherry-stones!
  It must not enter here.

Let us talk philosophy,
  While the roast is on the spit.
That moonlit thing which wavers there,
  What have we to do with it?

Listen! Its white lips move.
  Christ! Are you mad that you rise
As if each one saw his buried love
  Stand living before his eyes?

I have no love. I lie!
  I lie not! — The wine is poured
And the roast is ready; and I —
  I refuse to believe in God!

PERSEPHONE

AT last!
After the dumb sick longing; —
At last!
Filling the ancient urns
With odours and all the air
With a shudder, a laughter, a cry —
On a wind blown over leagues of tremulous grass,
Leagues of transparent grass,
Leagues of a million of grass-blades moist with rain,
Moist with warm rain and fresh from the brown earth —

At last!
The ravished one, the birth-pale one.
The holy one, the wanton one.
The Spring returns!

O, youth of the world!
O, martyred innocents!
Murdered on all these battlefields of ours —
Fields that are wet with something else than rain —
Is it your blood that lends unto our flowers
This quivering beauty that redeemeth pain?
For at last!
The ravished one, the birth-pale one.

The holy one, the wanton one.
   The Spring returns!

THE VISITOR

FORGET? I had forgotten
Little the use!
A feather in the doorway —
The flood is loose.

Forget? I had forgotten.
No candle burns.
A leaf within the doorway —
The dead returns.

Forget? I had forgotten.
Nail up the door!
You should nail up my heart
If she’s to come no more.

WITH FLOWERS IN OUR HANDS

COME let us walk thro’ their burning hell
With flowers in our hands!
With flowers in our hands let us walk there,
And see what power that evil air,
That evil air and those burning hours,
Have to hurt us who carry flowers!

WAR

THESE, these are not the hours
  For mention of sweet flowers,
Or for light whispers blown thro' brittle reeds.
  The smoke of war's eclipse.
  Rolls dark across love's lips,
Cypris is silent while Adonis bleeds.

So be it. It is so.
And yet while come and go
  Sun, moon and stars, the old emotions waken
Which, while we breathe, we must Feel thro' our human dust
  Even tho' the pillars of the earth are shaken.

Oh hero hosts struck low,
That a new world may know,
  Some rest from power, some escape from pride,
Faint over each dear head,
The shaméd gods must shed
  Tears for the cruel pain in which you died.

Never quite as before,
Will spring come to our door —
  A red stain lies upon love's tender star.
All born of human race,

Henceforth upon the place,
  Where beats the heart must feel an aching scar.

In Nature’s judgment-hall,
The gods are guilty all,
  All who stood by and let these things be done.
New Hope the world may gain,
It is not worth the pain —
  Not worth it! — of one torn and martyred one!

TO LULU

IT is not only love
That for one another we feel,
But a strange, a strange identity,
Like spokes of the same wheel.

Yes, we have walked together,
With buttercup dust on our shoes,
Thro’ the lovely rainy weather
With nothing to win or lose,
And the wild-rose scent of the hedges.
And the wild-thyme scent of the hill.
And the fresh, damp smell of the river sedges
Are with us still.

Can they ever come back again,
Those infinite, mystical hours.
With love dissolved in the rain
And pain asleep in the flowers,
Where the men we met were like men.
On some God-like errand bound,
And the girls we met were — like girls
As the world goes round!

Will they ever come back? Will they ever?
Who can say? But at least they were,

And God himself can never
   Of the past make empty air;

Should one of us die, the other
   Will have two souls to keep —
His own and what was his brother
   Saved from sleep.

For it is not only love,
   That for one another we feel;
But a strange, a strange identity-
   Like spokes of the same wheel!

THE ORACLE

THE world is malleable,” you said
  And like a young god passing by
Who with large gesture carelessly
  Raises to life one who is dead.

That royal oracle sets free
  The old sweet reckless powers of chance,
And lifts from lovely circumstance
  The monolith of destiny.

“The world is malleable” you said,
  “And its horizons still are blue.”
Oh subtle heart, oh crafty head!
  I take the hint and follow you!

THEY SAY

THEY say the sky Is azure fair,
    I do not know;
They say the spring is in the air,
    It may be so.
They say the crimson-throated shrike
    Will nest this year in Alder Dyke —
’Tis very like, ’tis very like.
•••••••••
The spring? Oh God, in heaven above.
Let the spring go — give me my Love|

OVER

WITH the blood of my heart on my hand
As the wind goes over the hill,
Very quiet I stand
At your darkened window-sill.

Does the rain that beats on your roof,
Thro’ your dreams send not one cry?
In all the world is there no reproof
For your thoughtless cruelty?

Do you see on the shore of dreams
In the misty nebulous land
A bowed phantom who seems
To carry blood on his hand?

Do you hear as the pale rain drifts
Over yellow poppies and graves,
A desperate pleading that lifts
Its voice above the waves?

The voice of the love that your frown
Has driven from human breath,
Do you hear it wandering up and down
Over the country and over the town,
From the reedy shores of death?

Rise up, rise up for awhile,
And press your shadowy cheek
Against the window and smile,
I will not beckon or speak.

I will only show you the blood
As a sign, a symbol, a token —
Be happy now in your mood,
The golden bowl is broken.

THE WILLOW-SEEDS

LOOK! The seeds of a willow-tree,
Falling on grass that must have grown,
In this one spot for a thousand years!
The tossing wind like a gusty sea
Over the elder-bushes blown,
Over the hollow-foliaged elms,
With their orbed shadows in hemispheres,
What wild, strange thoughts it brings to me
From what deep reluctant realms!

Can Fate itself remember the day
When I wandered here from some sea-shore?
I saw these elder-bushes, I saw
This lonely place — that tree-trunk grey;
I saw the willow-seeds cover the grass —
The grass that has grown for a thousand years!
I saw the hollow-foliaged elms,
And then, as now, from reluctant realms.
Came thoughts that would not pass.

What lives we lead — dear God, what lives!
What a palimpsest of double days,
The Master of our journey gives!
Forever round our casual ways
Strange omens peer, strange portents wink;

And we stand darkly on the brink
Of more than mortal mysteries.

REVERSION

SOMETHING has kept us apart
And has flowed between us twain —
Yet my heart has always been to your heart
As the earth to the healing rain —
But a shadow of sorrow has wounded your breast
And a far-off fragrance has troubled my rest
And we have been kept apart.

But now all will be well!
The immortal gods have spoken!
Fate moves at last with the long-drawn swell
Of the sea; and the charm is broken.

Out of the magical night,
Full of shadows and whispering streams;
Out of the hollow, holy night
Where fade all passing dreams,
We meet and all is well.

And the eyelids of sorrow, the lips of delight
Are bathed in lethe-drenched moonlight,
In oblivious, infinite moonlight,
In the deep mandragora of the night;
And we meet — and all is well.

FOR ONCE

THRUST upward your green shoots and drink the rain
Tulip and daffodil! Not till I die
Shall my heart throb with such a spring again
Or from the wine-press of my ecstasy
Such purple waves flow o’er the city’s towers,
Making a sunrise of the midnight seas,
And on far roads, like royal embassies,
Telling the green earth of my happy hours.

Not till I die shall such a spring return,
But memory will return, borne on faint airs,
And from the ashes of its ravished urn
Love will repeat the spring-time of its prayers.
How then will look, ‘mid such rememberings
These places, where the prints of ancient pain
Hold me, until, with laughter and with rain,
You come to me, O Spring of all my Springs?

They will be brimmed with tears intolerable,
They will be tender with an infinite light,
They will be sadder than a sunken bell,
They will be sweeter than a lover’s night,
They will be exquisite with broken sighs,
And faintly whispered words that catch the breath,

They will be quiet as the wings of death,
That quiver between two eternities.

Thrust upward your green shoots and drink the sun,
Tulip and daffodil! The leaves shall spread
Their foliage and the punctual seasons run
Their unremitted course till I am dead.
O Memory, Memory, sharp must be your sting
And bitter-sweet; for ‘till my dream-tossed world
Into the night from which it rose is hurled.
No more, no more shall I know such a Spring!

THE SATURNIAN

AH, I must follow it high and low,
Tho’ it leave me cold to your human touch!
Some starry sorcery made me so;
And from my birth have I been such.

What is it I follow so secret-lone?
Over the hills and along the sea?
Beauty with every seed is sown,
For you, for them, for me?

Not so, by the gods! Do I not hear
In the night a tender-muffled crying,
Rising, falling, sinking, dying?
Oh, I must follow it thro’ the world!

Not so, by the gods! When the dawn-wind stirs,
Rustling over the river-reeds,
Trembling over the wet pastures,
Shall I not follow it, whither it leads?

Oh, wild and sad, oh, wild and sweet,
Is the lonely horn that I always hear,
Blown from the place where all streams meet,
Where all horizons disappear!

The long sea-tides bring home to port,
Their ships by many a moonlit wharf,

But an ebbing twilight carries my thought
Beyond every coast it would anchor off.

Like a reef-bell rocking and ringing low,
Under a grey and rain-swept sky,
The beauty I follow doth come and go,
And if I found it, I should die.

The wild-bird of my longing sings
Always in the next hollow,
And always, always it spreads its wings,
When I cross the hill to follow.

All! Once when the burning noon was poured
On moss and stone and dreaming sod,
I saw the great blue flower that God
Made for the Son of God.

And do you think I can go content,
With the beauty we meet with everywhere,
When I have breathed that flower's scent
And seen it melt into the air?

Oh, I must follow it high and low,
Though it leave me cold to your human touch,
Some starry sorcery made me so;
And from my birth have I been such.

THE HOUR

COME let us take this hour and hold it up
  While our stars shine,
Leaving our joy untouched, as in a cup
  Of unspilt wine;
Then, though the deluge break and we be driven
  Into the grave,
Like gods unto the gods we shall have given
  The gift they gave.

OBSEQUIES

INCH by inch — for it takes some time, this thing —
  You have killed my love;
Till at last a look, a gesture, an anything
  Did fatal prove.
And now, ah now, how desperately you cling
  To its dead bier.
As tho’ thro’ your calm breast passed the same sting
  That laid it here!

ACCUSATION

IF this Is what you meant,
Why did you not go by?
I had got used to my lonely place
And amid the shadows had found a face,
A phantom-face ‘neath a pallid sky,
A phantom-face ‘neath a leaden tent —
Why did you not go by,
If this is what you meant?

Why did you not pass on,
If this is what you meant?
Why did you rise like a dumb moss-rose,
Brooding in somnolent repose,
Just where the moonlight shone,
On the path of my content?
Why did you not pass on,
If this is what you meant?

Why did you not go past,
If this is what you meant?
Why did you fling abroad in the air
A royal ransom of rich despair?
Why with rain were your petals so full
And with dew why were you so beautiful?
The charm that held me fast

Had never then been rent.
Why did you not go past,
If this is what you meant?

THE MONK

OUT of our Lady's cloister torn,
I swept like a hunted flame,
Over valleys and hills forlorn
To a leafy wood where in shades are born
Mosses without a name.

And there I found — poor monk that I was —
My curse, my fate, my spell —
Lightly she leaped from the leafy grass
With a sigh like a vesper-bell.
And her eyes to me had the strange soft look
Of the "Introibo" signs
In my illumined Missal-book,
Where the "Sursum Corda" begins.

O God! I loved her from my heart;
And a little she loved me!
And day and night she led me apart
Where the flickering sunbeams gleam and dart
In the mid-wood's mystery.

Her childish movements, her broken words,
They were my only beads.
For choir we had the twittering birds,
For candles the moonlit reeds.

O God! I loved her from my heart,
   And a little she loved me!

And to watch her laughter flicker and dart
   And the rose in her cheeks come and depart,
Were the prayers of my breviary.

But alas for the monk from his cloister strayed!
   Cold in that very place
Where the hyacinths grew in leafiest shade
   And my Love’s head by my side was laid
I saw our Lady’s face.

And all night now and all day too,
   I tremble those twain between;
And I hate the sky for its holy blue
   And the earth for its heathen green.
I have lost my love because of my heaven
   And my heaven because of my love.
Is there no mercy ever given
   To him that two faiths move?

DESERTED

NONE know her; none remember her.
  Cold lies she. Round the place
The wind-blown shadows as they stir
  Fall on no human face.
Leagues distant the moon draws the tide
  As the moon has always done.
Whom does she draw to her dead side?
  Not one of us — not one!

The grasses sway beside the door;
  The wind shrieks thro' the hedge.
No fire-light thrown across the floor
  Reddens the window-ledge.
Gone! All, all gone! save those faint ghosts
  Her memories, her pain,
And on the roof the fluttering hosts
  Of leaves that fall like rain.

And yet the same sky overhead —
  The same moon in the sky!
Surely some token of the dead
  Who went so wistfully,
Some sign, some token, lingering on
  In earth or air or sea,

Must cry upon the hearts of stone
   That can let these things be!

REMORSE

I WROTE my remorse on a forest-leaf
That the wind might bear it to you;
But the wind cared nothing for my grief
And over your roof it flew.
I wrote my remorse on a leaf for you;
But you never knew.

I wrote my remorse on the glimmering sand
Where your tired feet might stray;
But the sea rose up and covered the land
And carried my words away.
I wrote my remorse on the sand for you;
But you never knew.

I wrote my remorse on the breast
Of the Sphinx with the woman's eyes;
And your name remained — but the rest, the rest
Turned sorcery and lies!
I wrote on the Sphinx's breast for you;
But you never knew.

And now, when you weep o'er the spot
Where, earth in earth, I rot.
Do you read, as the rank-grown grass you pull,
What remorse has a grinning skull?

And do you laugh too and let all go?
I shall never know!

TO ISADORA DUNCAN

WITH the gesture of a god,
You gave me back my youth;
And a scent of violets
Overflowed the world.
With the gesture of a god.
You gave me back my love,
And tears deeper than tears
Overflowed my heart.
With the gesture of a god,
You trampled on fate,
You lifted up on high
Those that had fallen —
All the oppressed,
All the humiliated,
All the offended;
You lifted them up on high
And they were comforted.
With the gesture of a god,
You wrestled with Demogorgon;
You brought hope back
And freedom and triumph
To those whom the world had crushed.
All of us, sitting in darkness,
Saw a great light.
You danced as dance the morning stars

And the universe was conquered.
You smote the universe in the mouth;
And you saved us —
You — a woman.

TRAVELLERS

TOO many times have we both been born;
Too far have we voyaged — dear Christ, too far!
Too deep disguises have we both worn,
And the masks of too many an avatar!

I catch on your face the old sad smile
Of our ancient disillusionment,
When the ardent crowd tries to beguile
Your world-old soul to impassionment.

And in a moment I know you again.
And you know me and we mock them all,
As we did of old on the Trojan plain,
As we did of old on the Roman wall.

As we did in Carthage and Syracuse,
As we did in Syria and Cathay,
One look — and in a moment they lose
All hold on us. We have slipped away.

Love? Let them talk of Love! Our bond
Goes deeper. It has been sealed in death.
We have looked on Isis in Trebizond
And in Tyre have worshipped Ashtoreth.

Truth? Let them talk of Truth! We laugh,
  Who have seen Eleusis wreath'd in flame
And the high lamps swung o'er the cenotaph
  Of Her the immortals must not name.

Beauty? As tho' breathed not from you
  The very dawn of creation's day,
When the planets with all their retinue
  Leaped forth to meet you on your way!

Our dreams have mingled. The new times bring
  Old snatches of buried memory,
Which trouble us like a whispering,
  Heard at the bottom of the sea.

We have been too far; we have dived too deep,
  Death itself cannot quench the spark.
We know too much of the ways of sleep
  To fear the everlasting dark.

THE DANCE

DANCE on; we would not touch you,
Nay — let us turn aside,
Lest the shadow of what we’ve looked on
In our eyes should be descried.
Somewhere at least must fingers
Be clasped to the burning sun;
Somewhere must limbs be music
To the tune the fates have spun;
Somewhere the high immortals
Must have oblations poured;
Somewhere in classic portals,
The gods must be adored;
Somewhere must life be beauty
Though the prophets darken their eyes,
Somewhere must beauty be very truth
Though the planets fall from the skies.
Dance on: heed not our plight;
Dance on: be cruel and free;
Dance like a flame in the night!
Dance like a star on the sea!

TWILIGHT

OH day of shadows and scents! Oh day of roses!
Roses down-drooping into the dark lane —
Once, ere this indolent twilight ebbs and closes,
Have pity and restore my dead again!

Soon will the moon rise, luminous and tender!
Already on the night her pallor is shed.
O roses, roses, pity me and render
Back for one hour my darling from the dead!

God! How the air is full of shadows and roses!
Shadows and scents and roses fill the lane —
Somewhere — oh listen! — where a river flows is
Music beyond all pleasure and all pain!

Oh large and indolent midsummer-night!
Breaking our hearts with memories that bleed,
Oh night of roses, oh moon-tranced night,
Have mercy! Give me back the one I need!

THE TUNE

I PLAYED a crazy tune
  To the river-weeds.
I played it to the moon,
  And the sad dark reeds.

And the face that for so long
  Has vexed me hour by hour
Like the rhyme of a lost song,
  Like the scent of a dead flower.

Drew near me; and the cold
  Lethean, lamentable
Lilt of my love-song old,
  To give me her lips was able!

But I played a note too high
  Or I played a note too low —
And the same moon looks down from the sky
  And the same waters flow.

REACTION

OH heart, sink into yourself and rally
The old fierce strength of your lonely mood —
Tho' the train goes whistling thro' the valley,
And the moths go fluttering thro' the wood.

The cold dew rises from field and river,
The night-wind wanders from hill to hill,
The tall June grasses sigh and quiver,
Oh heart, sink into yourself, be still!

Have done with love and its shilly-shally!
Have done with love and its poison-smart!
Oh heart, sink into yourself and rally
The old fierce strength of your lonely mood —
Let the train go whistling thro' the valley
And the moths go fluttering thro' the wood.
Return to your solitude, oh heart!

SATURN

IT is the place!
No moon, no mist, no sound,
As the oracles had writ,
Only the huge and starry night,
Liquid, cool, and infinite,
Lit with lamps, by the old gods lit,
Floating, floating, over it,
Over the place I have found.

It is the place!
I had known it, in the deep
Full-brimmed cup of flowing sleep,
From which, in the vast silence, I
Had drunk inviolability.

It is the place!
Upon the terrace I step forth
And look to the east and look to the north.
On the north there are water-meadows wide,
With shadowy reeds on every side.
On the east — ah! where can I have seen
Mists and marshes so grey and green?
In no human dream I have known this place.
How slow is the sun to show his face!

Did ever the winds with so indrawn breath
Wait and listen, and listen and wait?
Did ever life come so near to death
And remain so wistful and passionate?

The silence deepens. The grey cold light,
Stealing over the pools and the reeds —
Is it only the common dawn? This night
For more than the morning intercedes.

Oh night, and have I not also prayed?
Oh dawn, and have I not also cried —
Betrayed! betrayed! betrayed! betrayed! -
Unto the hollow spaces wide?

It is the place!
And now as the vapours rise,
And now as the mist recedes,
In his old immortal guise,
Looking down on the reeds,
Luminous, lovely, silver bright,
Heaven's antagonist, bearer of light;
Still untouched by passion's stir,
Loving the earth and laughing at her —
Son of the Morning, Lucifer!

Then I heard them. From the far
Ledges of the dawn I heard them.
Every fragile, quivering thing
Of earth's primal gendering;

Every hidden, trembling, shy
   Child of ancient mystery,
Raised a cry out of the cold
   Shadows of the forests old;
Cold and low and sweet and clear,
   Like a sea-shell held to a sea-god's ear —

"They have buried him in vain!
   Saturn, Saturn comes again!
He was old. He was weak. He was dolorous,
   And they buried him far away from us.
They planted mountains upon his breast
   And they mocked and said, 'There let him rest!
Let the leaves of aeons of forests dead
   Cover his eyelids, hide his head!
Into a midnight deep as the world,
   Let his old sad, mad heart be hurled!'"
Ah, that cry! From many a pool
   Where are reflected strange dim faces,
Faces tender and sad and cool,
   Under the shadow of leafy places,
Came that voice that still I hear,
   Wild and low and sweet and clear,
Over hushed dew-drenched lawns,
   Where rivers flow from secret dawns;
Over forests faint and dim,
   Where the leaves and the shadows remember him.
"They have buried him in vain!
   Saturn, Saturn comes again!"

Oh tremulous hope! Oh large escape
  From the intolerable oppressors!
Oh bent and bowed, resume your shape
  And dispossess the dispossessors!

Bring back the old and tender things,
  The things that weep, the things that play
By the margins of eternal springs,
  Where twilight is lovelier than day,

  And the white dawn never flows away.
Oh tremulous hope! Oh large escape!
Oh bent and bowed, resume your shape
  And disposses the dispossessors!

          Can it be true?
Can the weak overcome the strong?
  Can forgiveness all things cover?
Can the singer hear the end of his song?
  Can the loved return to the lover?

Oh planet silver-scornful, oh planet calm!
  Riding the ether alone,
Will this great dawn bring us the longed-for balm
  And for all griefs atone?

Still low and sweet the cry comes to my ears —
  "They have buried him in vain!" —
But fainter, fainter, comes it, and cold salt tears
  Are on my cheek again.

It is the place!
From the high terrace I lean forth
And look to the east and look to the north.
Oh pity! Why does that sweet cry fail?
And why grows Lucifer so pale?
Why do the lovely and tender things
Sink back again to their primal springs?
What wheels are those whose terror draws nigh,
Rolling up the slope of the sky?
Look!

Must it forever be like this?
Oh Fate! Oh Fate remediless!
Look!

Out of the east with a stream of blood,
With music no man has understood,
With splendour, with power, with terrible joy.
With strength to create and strength to destroy;
Kissing all life with a careless kiss,
Creating pain, creating bliss;
The dead, the dead only, free from him,
Red with blood from rim to rim,
Over the conquered throat of the world
The chariot of the sun is hurled!

And so — it is not the place;
And once more I bow my face.
They have not buried him in vain!

Saturn will never come again!
They rule — they rule from sky to sky.
Hopeless — hopeless, was that cry!
And yet —
Though the oracles have lied to us.
And the gulfs of space have cried to us,
And every chance has died to us,
Oh Saturn, Oh Lucifer, Oh Christ —
Oh Love —

THE SHOES

I HAVE a pair of new shoes.
  They are nice. They have low heels."
So her letter says, and the brief words bruise
  My soul and break deep seals.

It is strange! I have talked with her
  Of the wistful tears of things;
Of the earth and the gods and the thoughts that stir
The soul, as a wave-tossed voyager
  Is stirred by the touch of wings.

But nothing of all I said
  Of the gods and the fatal sky,
And the magical stars that over each head
  Go heavy with destiny,
Had half such power to bruise;
  Or break such world-deep seals,
As, "I have a pair of new shoes.
  They are nice. They have low heels."

ETERNITY

ETERNITY is a wind-blown husk
  And fools run after it;
And when a sand-storm brings the dusk,
  They call it the infinite.

On the surface — the surface — is Beauty found,
  And the surface of life goes deep;
For where it is lost in the underground,
  We sleep — we sleep — we sleep.

There is nothing else but the surface of life,
  Nor ever was nor will be!
— Except the sleep that endeth life;
  And may that fall gently on me!

Fall gently on me, and ere it fall,
  Let me once more pretend
That the one I love the most of all,
  Is with me at the end.

Let the wind-blown husk, eternity,
  Dance over infinite sand,
So the one I love come once to me,
  And give me her little hand!

THE MASK

WITH treacheries bitter and deep
I have kept my place.
With a mask like the mask of sleep
I have covered my face.

I have smiled while my heart beneath
Was deadly with fate,
And the sword in my jewelled sheath
Was white with my hate.

But now as you lift up your hand,
Light as a flower,
By the word of the wind in the sand
I know it, my hour!

And I drop my mask and let fall
The sheath from my sword —
You shall know me, O my one of all,
As I am before God!

WHAT WE SAY

YOU have gathered somewhere to you
The softness of pastures cool,
And the tender, ineffable blue
Of the deep leaf-shadowed pool,
Where a lovelier sky than ours
Sinks down between wavering weeds
And the roots of the floating water-flowers
Blend with the roots of the reeds,

You have gathered to you somewhere
The passion of hyacinth-stains,
Where the odorous moss-dark air
Is moist with a thousand rains;
You have formed your virgin flesh
Of the suppliance of crescent moons,
And the tender ferns that enmesh
The shadows of summer noons.

When my days are yours there passes
With primrose-scented showers,
The thought of cool deep grasses
And beds of cuckoo-flowers;
When my nights are yours, my dreams
Are full of the flight of swallows,

Dipping their wings in rushy streams
   And shady river-hollows.

O child, you have made your own
   All lovely and delicate things,
And losing you, I am left alone
   In a place where no bird sings;
In a place where no reeds quiver
   Or tender rain goes by,
Nor clouds nor cooling river
   Soften the arid sky.

“BE HARD!”

SWEET Christ — our hearts should be stone.
  Then it would be the end!
For the sake of one — of one —— —
  I hurt my friend.

There should be lamps in the sky,
  Not dead moons flickering,
  Not mists to cover us.
There should be lamps in the sky.
We tread too heavily
  And the darkness is over us.
Sweet Christ, our hearts should be stone!

There should be lamps in the sky
  To read the loneliness,
The loneliness we cannot smother
While blindly we stab at one another
  With a rage that is a cry.

O that our hearts in one lightning flash
  Were illumined thro’ and thro’!
Then we should know the oak from the ash,
  The rosemary from the rue!
Then would be proved what we dare not prove,
  And seen what we dare not see;

Then love would be justified of love,
  And a friend a friend would be.

There are no lamps in the sky;
  There are hearts under all our feet,
And we tread heavily,
  And the circle is complete.
Sweet Christ, our hearts should be stone!
  Then it would be the end.
For the sake of one — of one —
  I hurt my friend.

“MANY WATERS”

O BRIGHT and terrible Love,
  From the depths of your bitter sea,
I turn my eyes to your planet above,
Tender and luminous, O Love —
  And its splendour healeth me.
Tender and large you swim into sight,
  A Lotus, a lamp of liquid light.
You lean on the sunset and draw the night
  As the night draws the sea.
Your tide is bitter, O terrible Love,
  In which I sink and drown,
But large and luminous, high above,
  Your planet still looks down,
And the bitter waves that go over me
  Are bright with your serenity.

THE BASSARID

DANCE with the Maenad crowd;
Follow your pulses' beat.
Toss back your hair from your forehead proud;
Crush in the madness of cymbals loud
The hyacinths at your feet.

Deep in the dewy dawn,
Where the serpent of passion hisses,
Pan and Sylvan and Satyr and Faun,
Let them whirl you on through the branches torn,
And stain your mouth with kisses.

With parted lips and with eyes
Brimming and drugged and bright,
Cry aloud your wild Thessalian cries,
Cry aloud your Phrygian ecstasies,
In the hot perfumed night.

Let the wood-spurge cling to your waist,
Let the woodbine tangle your hair,
Let your breast by hazels be embraced
And from oozing green-wood sap be a taste
Of pungent ivy there.

With wild-flung arms and with limbs
Shuddering and wounded lips,

Cry aloud as your brain in frenzy swims,
And loosed by the sweetness of Bacchic hymns,
   Your vine-wreathed girdle slips.

As the torches flicker and fall,
   Flame on through the dew-dark wood;
Answer the thrill of the mad god’s call
To the bitter end of the festival
   With every drop of your blood.

Fear not. When back you steal,
   Broken and weary, to me,
With oil and wine I will surely heal
Each bruise and hurt that your senses feel,
   As I take you on my knee.

I will heal each hurt of your outraged soul,
   Each mark of the wood-god’s force.
I will cause the eternal sea to roll
With waves more pure than the boreal pole
   Over your least remorse!

THE CRY

DO you not hear her crying
  Out and away and beyond?
Those are the grasses sighing
  To the lilies in the pond!
All night long they sigh and talk
  As the wind wails up the garden-walk.
They sigh to the lilies in the pond —
  But what do they know of away and beyond?

Do you not hear her crying
  Out and beyond and afar?
Those are the wild-swans flying
  Towards the evening star!
All night long they fly to the west;
  And a hundred forests beneath them rest,
And a hundred sunsets behind them are!
  But what do they know of beyond and afar?

Out and away and beyond,
  I tell you I hear her crying!
Beyond the grass and the pond —
  Beyond the wild-swans flying —
Do you think I am mad that I know not
  That rise and fall in her cry?

There is no God if I go not
  To find her before I die!

RENEWAL

OVER the heavy hills, over the drowning seas,
The shadows ride;
And the bowed necks of the gods,
Drooping like willow-trees,
Sink side by side.
While over their heads the shadows go,
Drifting, whirling across the sky,
And voices that are not voices flow,
Flow and mingle and lose themselves
In a cry that is no cry.
It must have been in a broken dream
Somewhere else than under our heaven,
That I saw the yellow cowslips gleam
And marigolds to the meadows given.
For while such murder as this is done
And shadows like this ride on the night,
How can the feet of the spring be light?
How can the sap through the branches run?
The natural look of human faces
Is altered. Delicate thoughts are fled.
Torn and gashed in blood-strewn places,
More than the heart can count lie dead.
Bow low your heads, ye gods!
While the troops of the murdered
Rush by you, rush by you on terrible wings.

Bow low your heads, ye gods!
It is not you who will bring us better things.

We have no hope left, save in her,
  The ancient mother of men,
And the old ineffable stir
  Of life breaking forth again!
  Moss upon ruins,
  Grass upon graves,
  And the fragile leaves of hope
  In the cracks of broken hearts.
For the faint wind-flowers will quiver yet,
  And beneath impenetrable trees,
Will bloom as of old the violet,
  In the ashes of these insanities.

UNDERSTANDING

HE does not understand
Or know his own heart’s truth!”
I heard her say, with a wave of her hand,
And the treacherous hope of youth.

Ah! beautiful one, indeed
He does not; nor ever will
For all the tears that your heart may bleed
And the tears your eyes may fill.

Till the rivers flow back to their source,
Till the grass grow on desert sand,
Till the terrible planets change their course,
He will not understand.

Let him go. But the further he goes
The closer you keep, my dear,
Something he little knows,
Something he cannot hear,
You have touched the eternal sea
And the gods have taken your hand.
When he speaks of the love that used to be,
You will not understand.

THERE IT IS!

LET it go, then; let it go!
It was that frail thing
You will never, never know,
Winter-time or Spring.
It was only what the sad
Poets used to call
Love, and praise in many a mad
Song and madrigal!

Let it go, then; let it go!
Send your pity after!
For this thing called love is so,
Pity moves its laughter,
Did you whisper the word “friend”?
Send that also packing!
Let the smoke be at an end
When the flame is lacking!

All is well. I blame you not.
You were born to this.
God in heaven! ’Twas I forgot
What a woman is!
Let it go, child, let it go!
I can live without you.

But I cannot bear life so,
   Loving you, to doubt you!

PAX VOBISCUM

OH eyelids of the dying day,
Fall gently on her pain.
And give her peace and take away
he madness from her brain I”

So wept the trees, so sighed the grass,
As that pale form went by;
But the weary evening let her pass,
And the sun sank pitilessly.

“Oh healing ocean of darkness deep,
Your cool nepenthe pour
Over her sorrow; give her sleep!”
Cried the sea to the silent shore.

But the night looked into her white face
And read such things written there
As are written on the gulfs of space —
Emptiness and despair!

And the night was helpless and could not stir;
Then I arose
And watched the waves of nothingness roll,
I who was nothing, nothing to her!

And I took my soul and crucified it,
   Crucified it between night and day.
Then at last she knew repose,
   And her madness passed away.

THE LANE

No one can take away from me
  A storm-swept lane I once wandered through,
Overhung with ivy and briony,
  And heavy with holly and sombre yew.

The wind in the tree-tops moaned and cried,
  And ‘mid ancient stalks of faded sedge,
Wild basil drooped, grew pallid, and died;
  And dying marjoram filled the hedge.

In long-drawn gusts from the down-land’s verge,
  The cold rain sobbed disconsolately;
And borne on the wind from the distant surge,
  The sound of the sea came lamentably.

Well did I love the rain in my face
  And the smell of the leaf-mould and tangled grass,
And the flapping wings that rose from the place,
  As flocks of starlings heard me pass.

And again and again, when in crowded squares
  The pulse of my life falls low and sinks,
Of the deep-drawn breath of those down-land airs
  My parched and harrowed spirit drinks.

And I pray to the gods I may find ere I die
  A heart that shall be as that lane to me,
With wild-tossed branches and windy sky
  And the sound of the everlasting sea!

CONDEMNED

DO you want to break my heart
  That you say this to me,
With eyes low-lidded and silent lips —
“This is the place of love’s eclipse.
Love at this place sinks out of sight,
As, in a tideless, fathomless night,
  The lead sinks in the sea.”
Do you want to break my heart
  That you say this to me?

Do you want to break my heart
  That you look thus at me;
Look without speech, look without sign,
  Look with eyes that meet not mine;
Look, as if, beyond my face,
You looked thro’ empty gulfs of space
  Into eternity?
Do you want to break my heart
  That you look thus at me?

Do you want to break my heart
  That you let your head fall so;
Fall like a flower with petals furled,
  Forgetting life, forgetting the world?
Fall on my shoulder and hide it there,

Like a marble thing whose cold despair
   Has no more tears to flow.

Do you want to break my heart
   That you let your head fall so?

Hush! Let us pray together!
   Though we have deeply sinned,
If on the wind stirs a feather,
   If a leaf stirs on the wind,
We are saved. Oh, far apart!
   Nothing, nothing has stirred.
Do you want to break my heart

THE ROSE-LEAVES

AS long as the roots of the green, green grass
  Grow cool in the kindly clay,
The rose-leaves of sorrow will fall and pass
  And drift on the wind away.

Oh, rose-leaves, rose-leaves of delicate sorrow!
  Oh, rose-leaves passionate!
Over the grasses of tomorrow
  You drift on the wind of fate.

Lightly, lightly you fall and drift,
  Delicate rose-leaves of exquisite pain;
But something is left that no wind can lift,
  That returns again, that returns again.

Quivering rose-leaves, lighter than air,
  The wind may carry you away;
But your passionate perfume is everywhere,
  The pitiless perfume of yesterday.

And tho' the roots of the green, green grass
  Grow cool for the feet of tomorrow;
And tho' on the wind they drift and pass,
  The delicate rose-leaves of sorrow,

There are things that stay, there are things that stay,
For the heart to feed upon.
Though today is more than yesterday,
And the grass grows green in the kindly clay.
And the wind has carried the past away,
And the rose-leaves of sorrow have gone.

THE EXILE

EXILED and alone
  I wander over the land,
Since gleaming under the sun
  I saw you stand.
In your passionate, childlike way,
  You looked at me and the old
Night fled far away.
And the world was blue and gold.
  Blue was the sky above me;
Gold was the earth beneath,
When you leapt forth to love me
  Like a sword out of its sheath!
Would I had poured them wine,
  The high, remorseless powers!
Would I had covered their cruel shrine
  With holocausts of flowers!
Then perchance they had held their hand
  Ere they turned your heart to stone,
And sent me wandering over the land —
  Exiled, alone!

MORTMAIN

GREY and ghostly cypresses
Meet above our bed.
That is surely why she presses
Close to me her head.

Dead are we. Be quite at rest!
There can be no harm
If across what was her breast
I should lay my arm.

She was never very brave,
And these damned trees
A most evil whisper have
In the midnight breeze.

Close she clings with body thin;
She was always slender;
Do you hold it a deep sin,
Buried, to be tender?

She is frightened, she would say,
But her lips have gone —
Curse you! Look the other way.
Read our burial-stone!

What? She brought me to this pass?
   Brought me to this place?
Oh, it may be! Turn the glass.
   She had a lovely face.

FIRST AND LAST

DAWN broke over us cool and sweet
  So long ago!
The great gods walking in the dew
  Made a path for our feet;
Gave roses to me and lilies to you,
And with reeds of the river rare music blew
  And made a path for our feet.

But the hours that came with the growing light
  Drooped as if they were years,
And in faint flute-music from far away,
  The gods, departing, turned to say,
“Nothing can heal the heat of the day
  Save night with its rain of tears.”

The wind may carry the roses away,
  But the human heart can only pray;
Pray to the gods thro’ the weary years
  For night — for night with its rain of tears.

PIETY

OH liquid moon that silvers the rims
  Of the mountain heights,
Oh lotus-flower that floats and swims
  In the island nights.
Oh pale white arms that are stretched to me
  With a siren's song,
I answer the spell of your witchery;
  I come! I come!

Wait but awhile, oh white, white arms,
  Wait but awhile.
I feel your power and I want your charms;
  I need your guile.
Let me but plant one red, red rose
  On my true Love's tomb,
Then your tide shall bear me wherever it flows.
  I come! I come!

EVASION

HAD I loved the wind In its flight,
Or the storm-cloud darkening the blue.
Had I loved the meteor crossing the night,
I had held it closer than you!

Had I followed the path of the moon
As it quivers on each wave’s crest,
I had touched the fount of its light more soon
Than the outermost veil of your breast.

Whirl on, whirl on, on your way!
I can wait, my sun-kissed flower.
At the bitter end of your burning day,
You will hang your head and the gods will say,
“She is his. It is his hour.”

No! No! Forgive me, dear heart!
Even then I’ll leave you free.
The long pursuit, the cruel smart,
Shall unavenged be.
Till of yourself you lift your lips,
My hour shall dwell in its eclipse.

THE GODS

LET us leave them all, my dear!
   Love, for you, is dead;
Dead and buried far from here,
With the shadows on his bier,
   Earth upon his head.

Let us leave them all, my child!
   Love, for me, has flown;
Flown and vanished in the wild,
Reconciled, unreconciled,
   Turning to his own.

Let us leave them, oh my friend!
Shall not the deep night
   With its large and liquid breath,
   Like the flowing of calm death,
Heal our memory at the end
   And make all things right?

Put the burning fierce unrest
From your brain and from your breast.
   Let us kiss the earth and rest.

Ah! perchance if we lie still —
   Very still and very quiet

With our pulses’ ancient riot
   Hushed and silenced by our will,

There will come thro’ the green shadows,
   Thro’ the eternal leafy shadows,
Lingering, pausing, watching, dreaming,
   Turning all our pain to seeming;
While the mole of memory delves,
   The immortal gods themselves!

THE WATER

WHERE the curlew cries all night
I know a lonely water,
Tall reeds grow there and they bow the head
As at the passing of one dead,
Who had been a king’s daughter.

And a low faint sobbing goes up from them
Like the voice of the grey, cold rain,
That drifts without pause o’er the marshes dim,
Where the road crosses the plain.

And I gaze with a vacant eye.
On the shadowy weeds that float,
With their arabesques of destiny
Around a fairy boat.

And I start and shudder with fear,
What dead went by this water?
Did my own love drift by me here?
Was it this that filled me with ghastly fear?
Was she that king’s dead daughter?

Oh curlew crying again:
Oh reeds that sob in the waters!
They are human tears that make this rain

  That darkens the marshes and fills the plain.
Our loves are all kings' daughters!

THE ROSE

MY heart is burnt in this deadly air,
And the ashes of it are grey,
But the red, red rose you planted there
Blooms in my heart alway.

Out of grey dust and bitter pain,
Its soft red petals blow;
For they are washed by morning rain
And cooled by mountain snow.

You planted that rose and went your way;
And though long, long days you’re gone,
Out of the dust of those ashes grey,
Its petals still bloom on.

They are fed by love; and the love they need
My heart can furnish well;
For the heart whose love has tears that bleed
Can make flowers bloom in hell.

They are fed by pain; and pain can draw
Fresh dew from a dried-up spring;
For the pain of love has a secret law;
Can conquer everything.

With that red rose growing in ashes grey,
  I can bear what fate may send;
You planted it and went your way —
  You are mine now, till the end!

THE WOOD

COME with me to the mossy places.
Where the rippling amber stream,
Mirroring our shadowy faces,
Leads us on from dream to dream.

Come with me where the leaves are still;
And the wood is hushed like a grassy hill,
A hill of silence, whose fleecy sheep
Are the clouds of sleep — the clouds of sleep!

Heavy and dark are the rain-wet ferns
Drooping over the rocky pool —
See how the steamlet ebbs and turns
Sprinkling the moss with its ripples cool!

Ah! The wisdom of life is here;
As old as I, as young as you;
Thrilling both of us thro’ and thro’.
Ah! The wisdom of life is here!

In every plant and in every sod,
The old earth-wisdom here is furled;
Wisdom older than any god,
Wisdom older than the world!

There are whispers here, there are whispers deep,
Hid in these places, that can raise
Memories out of caverns of sleep,
That throw strange meanings upon our days!

Is it life, is it life, that all these years,
We've been living, tasting, and calling good?
Ah! Your eyes are full of tears!
The wood has caught you, the magic wood.

Something breaks down where the wood begins;
Something breaks down in this hidden spot!
What are our virtues? What are our sins?
It matters not! It matters not!

Round the boulders the ripples play.
The dead trunks, lying the stream across,
Catch the sun in a lovelier way
Than the living plants or the living moss.

Death, what is it? What do we care?
It is strange. It is magical. It is well.
Give me your hand — tie up your hair —
If I kissed you, the wood-gods would not tell!

THE BOOK

I MOVED from the sun-warmed garden-seat,
Where the damask-rose petals covered the ground,
And all the people with quiet feet
Followed the mass-bell's holy sound.

I left the terrace; I wandered away,
Past larkspur and lilies and monk's-hood tall,
To where the lake in its reed-bed lay,
On the sunset-side of the castle wall.

With a thousand years in its human sigh
The vesper murmur came to me
Of the people's patient piety;
Then my heart stopped. What did I see?

I saw her — I saw what the moonlit spell
Summoned by my dark heathen book,
Night by night had brought! Too well
I saw her. Too well I knew her look.

O lost one — lost one — from days long dead,
When love gave all and died when it gave!
O head thrown back! O arms outspread!
O passion stronger than the grave!

When the people returned on quiet feet
From following the mass-bell's holy sound,

They found me still on that sun-warmed seat,
With the damask-rose petals strewn on the ground.

But they did not know that their voices took
A tone like the wind in a sepulchre;
They did not know that a heathen book
Had made me a monk for evermore!

SUPREME UNCTION

OUT of the eternal night,
Rumours and murmurs infinite,
Come to me where here I sit,
Watching in silence where dead love lies,
Pouring balm upon his closed eyes,
Anointing him with memories.
They are deep, the reservoirs of the night!
They are deep, the wells of the infinite!
And who can say but love may stir
While I pour balm, while I pour myrrh;
And rise like a flame and wander free
Over the land, over the sea,
And in the end come back to me?

A QUESTION

WHAT do I want of you? You fill
The air about me with delight.
A power stronger than my will
Draws me towards you day and night.
And yet I do not ask to press
Even your hand in a caress.

Your presence vague and nebulous
Moves with me as I cross the street;
Your sweetness like an angelus
Makes holy ground beneath my feet.
In every lovely form I pass
You shape yourself as in a glass.

What do I want of you? I see
Your other lovers pine to drain
The passion of your ecstasy
In kisses desperate as rain,
And yet, although I am not blind,
Not to that harbour steers my mind.

What do I want of you? God knows!
I only know it is too high,
Too rare a venture to disclose,
Save to the vast and starless sky.

Nothing I want, yet when we meet,
   I think the world hears my heart beat.

EUTHANASIA

OUT of a world of pain,
In a trance that may well be death,
I drift on a barge thro' the fields again
Wherein I first drew breath.
And the river cools my face
And the river-scented flowers,
Water-mint and tall loose-strife
Bring me memories deep as life
From all my vanished hours,
And a white wraith-figure of you —
White arms, white hands, white breast —
Drifts by my side, and alone we two
Drink of the river of rest.
And the wind sighs in the reeds —
Gently — a little wind —
And lightly and sadly the gossamer-seeds
Float away o'er the river-meads,
Blown by that little wind,
And cool airs touch our faces
And your wraith-like hollow eyes
Grow soft with the leafy places,
And the low-breathed reedy sighs;
And on and on we drift,
Where the cattle stand in ranks,
And the swallows flit and skim

Over green and mossy banks;
Till the willows droop like ghosts
And the twilight fills the plain

And the rooks in solemn hosts
Gather and drift like rain.
Then at last I feel and know
That all my memories
As they wavered and flickered in endless flow
Were premonitions sent long ago
Of nothing else than this!
Than that I with you by my side,
Wraith-like but lovely still,
Should follow the river and drift and glide,
Past forest and forest — past hill and hill;
Till the river we follow grows one with the sea.
Ah, the pain again — it will never be!

A FAREWELL

LIFT not your head before you turn away!
  Let not your eyes grow tender, as they grew
Long since — long since! Oh! it is hard to say
  How long, so cruel-fast that hour flew!
Go, then, and take away with you the light
  Laughter of all the leaves, the pleasant stir
Of all the rain falling on all the flowers;
  You cannot take away with you the night!
That you must leave — Love's Holy Sepulchre;
  Whereat forlorn hope weeps thro' the dead hours.

Go, then, and take with you the tender mist,
  That all these days has floated round the trees,
And gathered in the glens and lightly kissed
  The willows quivering in the scarce- felt breeze;
Take it with you and with it take along
  The vague sweet thoughts that into it I've poured,
Glimpses and dreams, such as the gods afford,
  So rarely, that to earth they scarce belong.
Take them with you! They are far better gone
  Than mirrored in my heart, as on a stone.

Go quickly, with no word, if you must go;
  Nay, it is only pity in your eyes;

Only sweet pity — and too well I know
   How soon that little mist will leave its skies!

Go quickly — for I would not cling to you
   With any desperate ultimate arrest,
And it were hard, if you but raised your hand
   Not to lose all my pride upon your breast.
Then, even now, the sea might drown the sand.
   Go quickly, oh my friend — adieu! adieu!

THE GARDEN

WHERE the wet fields stretch away, away,
  And travellers never come,
There is the land where my thoughts stray
  And the house I call my home.

No house had ever so deep a moat,
  Or such tall reeds round It, and no man ever
  Heard such lamentable trees
Whispering In the fatal breeze!
  Will the keel of that strange boat
Lying under the lilies there,
  Lying in weeds like drowned girl’s hair,
Ever rise again and float?
  Never did the wandering wind
Press its sad invisible face
  ‘Gainst such window-casements blind!
Never did the night-hawk chase
  Thro’ a sultrier, heavier night
Moths so ghostly in their flight!
  Never did the wild swans fly
Over such roofs of mystery!
  But do you think it is only of these
Desperate, far-off, piteous, strange,
  That I dream, when you see my memory range?
  Do you think it is only of these?

No! No! dear heart. If you had seen
  That inner garden with crumbling wall,

That garden where a dying queen
  Might listen all night to a ghost’s foot-fall,
If you had seen that old parterre
  Of roses red with forbidden passion
You would know too well why I wander there,
  Too well why my dreams are out of fashion!
Oh, their classic skies are blue and white.
  But grey upon grey is best;
And to follow the rain is my delight
  And the wild swans in their long, long flight
Into the night — into the night —
  To that garden of the West.

NUNC DIMITTIS

I AM dying; but what of that?
Your hands are under my head,
And your tears are on my cheek
And I am happy at last —
Bitter has been the pain!
Yea I have paid the price
For this last moment with you
But all is well at the end;
Your hands are under my head,
And your tears are on my cheek.
So you love me, after all!
And I bless the eternal dark
Into which I sink and fall
That I’ve found you — at the last.

MOMENTS

OH, there are moments in our life,
When the dim marshes of the mind,
Those livid swamps, where birds of strife
Beat up against a sullen wind.

Sink, drowned, in one tremendous flood,
Full-brimmed, resistless, like the sea.
I rose and praised God where I stood.
When such a moment came to me!

NOON

OVER the hills and far away
Are shadowy places where forests deep
Cover with everlasting sleep
Old dethroned gods of an earlier day,
And sometimes when heavy on stone and sod,
The noon-tide heat lies languid and dim,
We feel the passing of such a god,
And the hushed earth yearning to welcome him.

Now — very now — do you feel it? — That breath
Falling, rising, floating, drifting?
What sudden immortal presence is this
That the place and the hour witnesseth?
It rustles the reeds of the meadow rills;
The dreamy July grass it is lifting.
Ah! You are pale. Did something kiss
Your forehead that was sweet as death?
“Look up to the hills” — the psalmist saith —
Our help comes from beyond the hills!

Oh friend, that can be no more than a friend;
As you and others and all decide,
See — the horizon has no end!
See — the doors of the world stand wide!
They are wise, wise, gods, — I know it well —

Wise and strong, that hold us apart;
   But this summer-noon has a different spell,
   Do you not feel it in your heart?

From over the hills and far away
   There has come some old forgotten god,
Some old dethroned, unsceptered god.
   Caring nothing for their wise sway,
And has joined us with a nod.

LOST

THE purple waves recede,
The wings of the sunset sink —
Sea-birds, sea-foam, sea-weed
Are lost on the world’s brink,
The flowing darkness covers the deep
And I weep — and I weep!

Oh, desperate memory!
Oh, hopeless, bitter cry!
She is dead who was all my life to me,
And the wind goes heedless by!

Lost! Lost! Lost!
She can never hear me again!
Under the tides of the sea she is tossed
And her tangled hair drifts round her head
And her tender eyelids are closed and dead.
She can never hear me again!

Can it be so?
Can such things be,
As the things that have been between her and me,
And the waters flow on eternally?

Better had neither of us been born!
Oh darkness, darkness, do not stir,

One word, only one word with her
   One little word, before the dawn!

OBSESSION

OH, take away those haunting eyes
That come with the moonlight still.
When the heavy clouds forsake the skies,
And the rain goes over the hill.

Oh, take away what that lovely hand
On the wild sea-margin writ.
Let the wind hide it in the sand
And the sea roll over it!

Oh, lost one, lost one, of whom I dreamed!
On the long white road ’twas you
Who always before me wavered and gleamed,
Who always towards me turned and seemed
The heart’s desire come true.

By lonely bridges where ancient floods
Flowed towards lands unknown,
’Twas you, O child of a thousand moods,
Who waited for me alone!

But now, oh now that you’ve touched me and fled
The long white roads grow cold;
And the water at every bridge’s head
Flows darker than of old.

Oh, take away those haunting eyes
  That come with the moonlight still.
Let the heavy clouds cover the skies
  And the rain cover the hill!

EXILES

EXILES are we from our very birth,
  But strange memorial glimpses come
At cross-roads of this alien earth,
  To trouble us with our true home.

A grey tree by a forsaken way,
  A forest pool with a shadowy face —
And we breathe deep a moment and say,
  “This is the place! This is the place!”

What place? We shall never, never know!
  We shall die before our feet have found it.
  Yet by its borders all streams flow;
And there’s not a wind but blows around it!

It is near, yet far — our natural home.
  That an evil magic has hidden aside;
Leaving only tokens of it, that come
  To tantalize us and deride.

Exiles are we from our very birth;
  And we shall die and be buried far
From that wilder, lovelier, madder earth.
  Where the lost gods of our people are!

MEMORY

OH, let me forget
  That ever the air was sweet
With the breath of your flower-like ways,
With your wistful, heart-breaking ways,
  And the music of your feet.
Oh, let me forget
That ever the air was warm
With the glow of your youthful lips,
With the rich soft bloom of your lips,
  And the magic of your form!

Forget that body so white
  And that hair that slipped its bands,
And the eyelids kissed by the perfumed night,
  And the pale and passionate hands.

Forget — forget these things!
  For these things have an adder's tooth;
And beauty like a scorpion stings,
  And cruel — ah, cruel is youth!

Let me feel on my forehead the wind
  That blows from the classic shore
Where the wise and lonely shadows find
  Rest and need love no more!

No more? If I’m to forget
   Your ways, your looks, your tones,

There must be no flowers by Lethe set,
Or only scentless ones!

Ah, God — the scent of a flower!
All else the flesh can endure.
But for that — in its hour — in its hour —
There is no cure.

NOTHING

WILL my love come to me?
Alas! I have no love.
Though in green and rainy places
The fronds of the ferns uncurl.
And violets lift their faces
To a crescent moon of pearl.

Will my love come to me?
Alas! I have no love.
Far off — somewhere — a shining head —
O sweet Lord Christ who canst raise the dead.
Take my soul and give me my love instead!
Will my love come to me?
Alas! I have no love.

WHITENESS

WHITE roses set in ivory urns,
White violets wreathed in silver cups;
White marble founts whose moss and ferns,
The shadow of the moon drink up.

Since I have known you and your ways,
Things such as these are my delights.
A whiteness glimmers on my days,
A whiteness hovers o’er my nights.

White dews, white crescent moons, white dawns,
White flickering feet, white-gleaming hands,
White limbs that dream on twilight lawns,
White limbs that dance on shimmering sands.

O child, O maiden-acolyte,
Whose censer breathes such silvery breath,
Pour wine white as the flesh of Christ
Upon the altar of white death!

Then all red things shall fade away —
Red flame, red roses, and red blood,
And we shall voyage night and day
The white sea of the tears of God.

SILENCE

MY dear, that crying in the heart,
When the summer's done,
Hide it away, hide it apart,
That none can hear it, none!
If the wind and the owl and the cold raindrops
Heard that crying that never stops,
The crying of the daughters of men,
They too would be silent — and what then?

All would be silent then again!
Silent the bird of woe —
Silent the wind — silent the strain
Of the rain-drops dropping slow.
All would be silent and with one sigh
A silent world would float on the sky.
Worlds such as these, made of silent tears,
They call the music of the spheres!

FINIS

SO it ends, my dream of loving!
In this empty house I sit,
With my tired spirit proving
All the cynics' bitter wit.
Round me thro' the open shutters
Floats the heavy-scented night;
Not a leaf or grass-blade flutters;
Vapours hide the moon from sight.

Endless, boundless, high above me,
Yawn the ghastly gulfs of space.
I'd have looked, with her to love me,
Those abysses in the face!
All illusion! Well, what matter?
Dim the lights — applaud the play!
Fill the silence with our chatter.
Lay the fairy masks away.

Oh, deep night! My invocation
Is to you, to you alone!
Pour, pour down your consecration,
Though the dream of love has flown.
Large-enfolding night, receive me!
Drown the treacherous siren-songs.

Ah! the love that will not leave me,
  Night, to you alone belongs.

THE GRAVE

WHAT are you thinking when so you look,
Holding my hand with cold, cold fingers,
As we watch this babbling summer brook
Where the virginal flush of spring still lingers?’

“Your eyes are vacant. They stare and stare.
They seem not to see these blossoms white
That drink the sun and perfume the air.
They stare like a dead man’s into the night.”

“I think of a white road crossing a hill,
And a ruined church where no man passes,
And a tombstone lying hushed and still
And a north wind whispering thro’ the grasses.

“Is my body not warm to your touch.
That you hold me so quietly on your knees?
Look how the sunlight falls thro’ the trees!
Is love dead so soon? Is it always such?”

“The white road crosses the barren hill;
No blossoms are there, no bodies warm;
Only a tombstone, very still,
And one beneath it, a shrouded form.”

“Had she lips that were warm like mine?
   When I am dead a thousand lovers
Will kiss the earth my body covers;
   And the splendid sun on my dust will shine.

“Far, you say, is that ruined place?
   No man walks on that lonely road?
Was it so beautiful, then, that face
   That is mingled now with the heavy mould?”

“No! No! Not beautiful at all!
   Withered and wasted — what you will!
And the north wind blows thro’ that ruined wall,
   And no man ever crosses that hill!

“Yes, your thousand lovers will come.
   I believe it! And till the sea
Drown in its flood her grassy tomb
   She will unremembered be!”

THE RETURN

WHAT can I give to you
  Who have given me everything?
Can I rob the sky of its blue?
  Can I take the green from the spring?
Can I catch the dew as it falls?
  Can I reach the fount of the rain?
Can I snare the foam of the waterfalls
  And their rain-bow mist retain?
Can I enter the tombs of kings
  And their cerements unbind?
Can I steal the Tetrarch's rings
  And Salome's pearls unwind?
Will Helen of Troy give up
  The bracelets from her wrist;
Or Iseult restore the cup
  That Tristram drained and kissed?
They are gone — they are gone, all these —
  And their names, like a small faint rain,
Drift by without surcease
  Across time's grievous plain.
Oh, lonely and classic face,
  My harbour and heathen heaven,
Can I find nothing to replace
  All that to me you've given?
Let these dim shades depart

And their sad faint ghosts go hence.
Out of my heart — my heart —
   I will give you your recompense!

THE SHIP

I MADE a ship of my cruelty,
A wonderful, terrible ship,
With masts of silver and ebony,
And bulwarks of carven ivory,
And a figure-head of chalcedony,
And a prow like a lion's lip.

And I sat in the stern of my ship,
Alone, be it said and known,
You are always alone in that kind of ship,
Put your finger upon your lip!
Christ's mother, how deep alone!

And in my ship I sailed;
And the waters were purple and green;
And all day long the sea-gulls wailed
And the sun went down and the waters paled
And a phantom-moon was seen.

And under the moon I still sailed on;
But not only the moon was there!
Algol, the Demon's Eye, looked down —
Algol, the Eye of the Demon, shone,
Thro' the chill and frozen air.

Oh ship, my ship, called Cruelty!
Is it forgotten then of thee

How we came in the hour of dawn
To a land where silence covered the sea,
To a harbour of virginal mystery
And a little pier forlorn?

For the people fled away
When they saw my terrible ship,
Livid, phantom-like and grey,
Led by Algol, at break of day,
Into that harbour slip!

But one fled not. One stood
On the edge of the little pier,
A boy — a boy in his solitude!
A girl — a girl in her fear!

No boy — no girl; a god, a god!
And I hoisted the sails of my ship;
And Cruelty, with Love on board,
— Your finger on your lip!
Went sailing, sailing over the sea
Till the sun grew like the moon;
Till the moon — oh, mother of mystery!
Till the moon grew like the sun.

And Algol, the Demon's Eye, looked down
Upon that curious ship;

Algol, the Eye of the Demon, shone —
  Your finger on your lip!
But Love and I played a deeper game
  Than any Demons know,

And my ship, my ship without a name,
  On the purple sea a silver flame,
From Earth to Heaven did go.

O Prince! make of your cruelty
  A ship and not a sword.
Give it masts of silver and ebony!
  Give it bulwarks of carven ivory,
And a figure-head of chalcedony;
  And take on board a god!

PREFACE

What I aim at in this book is little more than to give complete reflection to those great figures in Literature which have so long obsessed me. This poor reflection of them passes, as they pass, image by image, eidolon by eidolon, in the flowing stream of my own consciousness.

Most books of critical essays take upon themselves, in unpardonable effrontery, to weigh and judge, from their own petty suburban pedestal, the great Shadows they review. It is an insolence! How should Professor This, or Doctor That, whose furthest experiences of “dangerous living” have been squalid philanderings with their neighbours’ wives, bring an Ethical Synthesis to bear that shall put Shakespeare and Hardy, Milton and Rabelais, into appropriate niches?

Every critic has a right to his own Aesthetic Principles, to his own Ethical Convictions; but when it comes to applying these, in tiresome, pedantic agitation, to Edgar Allen Poe and Charles Lamb, we must beg leave to cry off! What we want is not the formulating of new Critical Standards, and the dragging in of the great masters before our last miserable Theory of Art. What we want is an honest, downright and quite personal articulation, as to how these great things in literature really hit us when they find us for the moment natural and off our guard — when they find us as men and women, and not as ethical gramaphones.

My own object in these sketches is not to convert the reader to whatever “opinions” I may have formulated in the course of my spiritual adventures; it is to divest myself of such “opinions,” and in pure, passionate humility to give myself up, absolutely and completely, to the various visions and temperaments of these great dead artists.

There is an absurd notion going about, among those half-educated people who frequent Ethical Platforms, that Literary Criticism must be "constructive." O that word "constructive"! How, in the name of the mystery of genius, can criticism be anything else than an idolatry, a worship, a metamorphosis, a love affair! The pathetic mistake these people make is to fancy that the great artists only lived and wrote in order to buttress up such poor wretches as these are upon the particular little, thin, cardboard platform which is at present their moral security and refuge.

No one has a right to be a critic whose mind cannot, with Protean receptivity, take first one form and then another, as the great Spells, one by one, are thrown and withdrawn.

Who wants to know what Professor So-and-so's view of Life may be? We want to use Professor So-and-so as a Mirror, as a Medium, as a Go-Between, as a Sensitive Plate, so that we may once more get the thrill of contact with this or that dead Spirit. He must keep his temperament, our Critic; his peculiar angle of receptivity, his capacity for personal reaction. But it is the reaction of his own natural nerves that we require, not the pallid, second-hand reaction of his tedious, formulated opinions. Why cannot he see that, as a natural man, physiologically, nervously, temperamentally, pathologically different from other men, he is an interesting spectacle, as he comes under the influence first of one great artist and then another, while as a silly, little, preaching school-master, he is only a blot upon the world-mirror!

It is thus that I, moi qui vous parle, claim my humble and modest role. If, in my reaction from Rabelais, for instance, I find myself responding to his huge laughter at "love" and other things, and a moment later, in my reaction from Thomas Hardy, feeling as if “love” and the rest were the only important matters in the Universe; this psychological variability, itself of interest as a curious human phenomenon, has made it possible to get the “reflections,” each absolute in its way, of the two great artists as they advance and recede.

If I had tried to dilute and prune and “correct” the one, so as to make it “fit in” with the other, in some stiff, ethical theory of my own, where would be the interest for the reader? Besides, who am I to “improve” upon Rabelais?

It is because so many of us are so limited in our capacity for “variable reaction” that there are so few good critics. But we are all, I think, more multiple-souled than we care to admit. It is our foolish pride of consistency, our absurd desire to be “constructive,” that makes us so dull. A critic need not necessarily approach the world from the “pluralistic” angle; but there must be something of such “pluralism” in his natural temper, or the writers he can respond to will be very few!

Let it be quite plainly understood. It is impossible to respond to a great genius halfway. It is a case of all or nothing. If you lack the courage, or the variability, to go all the way with very different masters, and to let your constructive consistency take care of itself, you may become, perhaps, an admirable moralist; you will never be a clairvoyant critic. All this having been admitted, it still remains that one has a right to draw out from the great writers one loves certain universal aesthetic tests, with which to discriminate between modern productions.

But even such tests are personal and relative. They are not to be foisted on one’s readers as anything “ex cathedra.” One such test is the test of what has been called “the grand style” — that grand style against which, as Arnold says, the peculiar vulgarity of our race beats in vain! I do not suppose I shall be accused of perverting my devotion to the "grand style" into an academic "narrow way," through which I would force every writer I approach. Some most winning and irresistible artists never come near it.

And yet — what a thing it is! And with what relief do we return to it, after the "wallowings" and "rhapsodies," the agitations and prostitutions, of those who have it not!

It is — one must recognize that — the thing, and the only thing, that, in the long run, appeals. It is because of the absence of it that one can read so few modern writers twice! They have flexibility, originality, cleverness, insight — but they lack distinction — they fatally lack distinction.

And what are the elements, the qualities, that go to make up this "grand style"?

Let me first approach the matter negatively. There are certain things that cannot — because of something essentially ephemeral in them — be dealt with in the grand style.

Such are, for instance, our modern controversies about the problem of Sex. We may be Feminists or Anti-Feminists — what you will — and we may be able to throw interesting light on these complicated relations, but we cannot write of them, either in prose or poetry, in the grand style, because the whole discussion is ephemeral; because, with all its gravity, it is irrelevant to the things that ultimately matter!

Such, to take another example, are our elaborate arguments about the interpretation, ethical or otherwise, of Christian Doctrine. We can be very entertaining, very moral, very eloquent, very subtle, in this particular sphere; but we cannot deal with it in the "great style," because the permanent issues that really count lie out of reach of such discussion and remain unaffected by it.

Let me make myself quite clear. Hector and Andromache can talk to one another of their love, of their eternal parting, of their child, and they can do this in the great style; but if they fell into dispute over the particular sex conventions that existed in their age, they might be attractive still, but they would not be uttering words in the "great style."

Matthew Arnold may argue eloquently about the true modernistic interpretation of the word "Elohim," and very cleverly and wittily give his reasons for translating it "the Eternal" or "the Shining One"; but into what a different atmosphere we are immediately transported when, in the midst of such discussion, the actual words of the Psalmist return to our mind: "My soul is athirst for God — yea! even for the living God! When shall I come to appear before the presence of God?"

The test is always that of Permanence, and of immemorial human association. It is, at bottom, nothing but human association that makes the great style what it is. Things that have, for centuries upon centuries, been associated with human pleasures, human sorrows, and the great recurrent dramatic moments of our lives, can be expressed in this style; and only such things. The great style is a sort of organic, self-evolving work of art, to which the innumerable units of the great human family have all put their hands. That is why so large a portion of what is written in the great style is anonymous — like Homer and much of the Bible and certain old ballads and songs. It is for this reason that Walter Pater is right when he says that the important thing in Religion is the Ceremony, the Litany, the Ritual, the Liturgical Chants, and not the Creeds or the Commandments, or discussion upon Creed or Commandment. Creeds change, Morality changes, Mysticism changes, Philosophy changes — but the Word of our God — the Word of Humanity — in gesture, in ritual, in the heart's natural crying — abideth forever!

Why do the eloquent arguments of an ethical orator, explaining to us our social duties, go a certain way and never go further, whereas we have only to hear that long-drawn Vox Humana, old as the world — older certainly than any creed— “Santa Maria, Mater Dei, ora pro nobis peccatoribus, nunc et in hora mortis nostrae” — and we are struck, disarmed, pierced to the marrow, smitten to the bone, shot through, “Tutto tremente?” Because arguments and reasoning; because morality and logic, are not of the nature of the “great style,” while the cry— “save us from eternal death!” — addressed by the passion and remorse and despair of our human heart to the unhearing Universe, takes that great form as naturally as a man breathes.

Why, of all the religious books in the world, have “the Psalms of David,” whether in Hebrew or Latin or English, touched men’s souls and melted and consoled them? They are not philosophical. They are not logical. They are not argumentative. They are not moral. And yet they break our hearts with their beauty and their appeal!

It is the same with certain well-known words. Is it understood, for instance, why the word “Sword” is always poetical and in “the grand style,” while the word “Zeppelin” or “Submarine” or “Gatling gun” or “Howitzer” can only be introduced by Free Versifiers, who let the “grand style” go to the Devil? The word “Sword” like the word “Plough,” has gathered about it the human associations of innumerable centuries, and it is impossible to utter it without feeling something of their pressure and their strain. The very existence of the “grand style” is a protest against any false views of “progress” and “evolution.” Man may alleviate his lot in a thousand directions; he may build up one Utopia after another; but the grand style will still remain; will remain as the ultimate expression of those aspects of his life that cannot change — while he remains Man.

If there is any unity in these essays, it will be found in a blurred and stammered attempt to indicate how far it may be possible, in spite of the limitations of our ordinary nature, to live in the light of the “grand style.” I do not mean that we — the far-off worshippers of these great ones — can live as they thought and felt. But I mean that we can live in the atmosphere, the temper, the mood, the attitude towards things, which “the grand style” they use evokes and sustains.

I want to make this clear. There are a certain number of solitary spirits moving among us who have a way of troubling us by their aloofness from our controversies, our disputes, our arguments, our “great problems.” We call them Epicures, Pagans, Heathen, Egoists, Hedonists, and Virtuosos. And yet not one of these words exactly fits them. What they are really doing is living in the atmosphere and the temper of “the grand style” — and that is why they are so irritating and provocative! To them the most important thing in the world is to realize to the fullest limit of their consciousness what it means to be born a Man. The actual drama of our mortal existence, reduced to the simplest terms, is enough to occupy their consciousness and their passion. In this sphere — in the sphere of the “inevitable things” of human life — everything becomes to them a sacrament. Not a symbol — be it noted — but a Sacrament! The food they eat; the wine they drink; their waking and sleeping; the hesitancies and reluctances of their devotions; the swift anger of their recoils and retreats; their long loyalties; their savage reversions; their sudden “lashings out”; their hate and their love and their affection; the simplicities of these everlasting moods are in all of us — become, every one of them, matters of sacramental efficiency. To regard each day, as it dawns, as a “last day,” and to make of its sunrise, of its noon, of its sun-setting, a rhythmic antiphony to the eternal gods — this is to live in the spirit of the “grand style.” It has nothing to do with “right” or “wrong.” Saints may practise it, and sometimes do. Sinners often practise it. The whole thing consists in growing vividly conscious of those moods and events which are permanent and human, as compared with those other moods and events which are transitory and unimportant.

When a man or woman experiences desire, lust, hate, jealousy, devotion, admiration, passion, they are victims of the eternal forces, that can speak, if they will, in “the great style.” When a man or woman “argues” or “explains” or “moralizes” or “preaches,” they are the victims of accidental dust-storms, which rise from futility and return to vanity. That is why Rhetoric, as Rhetoric, can never be in the great style. That is why certain great revolutionary Anarchists, those who have the genius to express in words their heroic defiance of “the something rotten in Denmark,” move us more, and assume a grander outline, than the equally admirable, and possibly more practical, arguments of the Scientific Socialists. It is the eternal appeal we want, to what is basic and primitive and undying in our tempestuous human nature!

The grand style announces and commands. It weeps and it pleads. It utters oracles and it wrestles with angels. It never apologizes; it never rationalizes; and it never explains. That is why the great ineffable passages in the supreme masters take us by the throat and strike us dumb. Deep calls unto deep in them, and our heart listens and is silent. To do good scientific thinking in the cause of humanity has its well-earned reward; but the gods throw incense on a different temper. The “fine issues” that reach them, in their remoteness and their disdain, are the “fine issues” of an antagonist worthy of their own swift wrath, their own swift vengeance, and their own swift love.

The ultimate drama of the world, a drama never-ending, lies between the children of Zeus and the children of Prometheus; between the hosts of Jehovah and the Sons of the Morning. God and Lucifer still divide the stage, and in Homer, Shakespeare, Dante, Milton, and Goethe the great style is never more the great style than when it brings these eternal Antagonists face to face, and compels them to cross swords. What matter if, in reality, they have their kingdoms in the heart of man rather than the Empyrean or Tartarus? The heart of man, in its unchangeable character, must ever remain the true Coliseum of the world, where the only interesting, the only dramatic, the only beautiful, the only classical things are born and turned into music.

Beauty! That is what we all, even the grossest of us, in our heart of hearts are seeking. Lust seeks it; Love creates it; the miracle of Faith finds it — but nothing less, neither truth nor wisdom nor morality nor knowledge, neither progress nor reaction, can quench the thirst we feel.

Yes, it is Beauty we crave, and yet, how often, in the strain and stress of life, it seems as though this strange impossible Presence, rising thus, like that figure in the Picture, "beside the waters" of the fate that carries us, were too remote, too high and translunar, to afford us the aid we need. Heine tells us somewhere, how, driven by the roar of street-fighting, into the calm cool galleries of the Louvre, sick and exhausted in mind and body, he fell down at the feet of the Goddess of Beauty there, standing, as she still stands, at the end of that corridor of mute witnesses, and as he looked to her for help, he knew that she could never bend down to him, or lift him up out of his weariness, for they had broken her long ago, and she had no arms!

Alas! It is true enough that there are moments, when, under the pressure of the engines of fate, we can only salute her — the immortal one — afar off. But if we have the courage, the obstinacy, the endurance, to wait — even a short while longer — she will be near us again; and the old magical spell, transforming the world, will thrill through us like the breath of spring!

Why should we attempt to deceive ourselves? We cannot always live with those liberating airs blowing upon our foreheads. We have to bear the burden of the unillumined hours, even as our fathers before us, and our children after us. Enough if we keep our souls so prepared that when the touch, the glimpse, the word, the gesture, that carries with it the thrilling revelation of the “grand manner”, returns to us in its appointed hour, it shall find us not unworthy of our inheritance.

RABELAIS

THERE ARE CERTAIN great writers who make their critics feel even as children, who picking up stray wreckage and broken shells from the edge of the sea waves, return home to show their companions "what the sea is like."

The huge suggestiveness of this tremendous spirit is not easy to communicate in the space of a little essay.

But something can be done, if it only take the form of modest "advice to the reader."

Is it a pity, one asks oneself, or is it a profound advantage, that enjoyment of Rabelais should be so limited? At least there are no false versions to demolish here — no idealizations to unmask.

The reading of Rabelais is not easy to everyone, and perhaps to those for whom it is least easy, he would be most medicinal. What in this mad world, do we lack, my dear friends? Is it possibly courage? Well, Rabelais is, of all writers, the one best able to give us that courage. If only we had courage, how the great tides of existence might sweep us along — and we not whine or wince at all!

To read Rabelais is to gather, as if from the earth-gods, spirit to endure anything. Naturally he uses wine, and every kind of wanton liquor, to serve as symbols of the intoxication he would produce. For we must be "rendered drunk" to swallow Life at this rate — to swallow it as the gods swallow it. We must be drunk but not mad. For in the spiritual drunkenness that Rabelais produces there is not the remotest touch of insanity. He is the sanest of all the great writers; perhaps the only sane one. What he has the power of communicating to us is a renewal of that physiological energy, which alone makes it possible to enjoy this monstrous world. Other writers interpret things, or warn us against things. Rabelais takes us by the hand, shows us the cup of life, deep as eternity, and bids us drink and be satisfied. What else could he use, if not wine, as a symbol for such quenching of such thirst. And after wine, sex. There is no other who treats sex as Rabelais does; who treats it so completely as it ought to be treated!

Walt Whitman is too obsessed by it; too grave over it — Rabelais enjoys it, fools with it, plunges into it, wallows in it; and then, with multitudinous laughter, shakes himself free, and bids it go to the Devil!

The world will have to come to this, sooner or later — to the confusion of the vicious — and the virtuous!

The virtuous and the vicious play indeed into each others hands; and neither of them love laughter. Sexual dalliance is either too serious a matter to be mocked by satyr-laughter; or it is too sad and deplorable to be laughed at at all. In a few hundred years, surely, the human race will recognize its absolute right to make mock at the grotesque elements in the sex comedy, and such laughter will clear the air of much "virtue" and much "vice."

Wine is his first symbol of the large, sane, generous mood he bequeaths to us — the focusing of the poetry of life, and the glow and daring of it, and its eternal youthfulness.

But it is more than a symbol — it is a sacrament and an initiation. It is the sap that rises in the world's recurrent spring. It is the ichor, the quintessence of the creative mystery. It is the blood of the sons of the morning. It is the dew upon the paradisic fields. It is the red-rose light, upon the feet of those who dance upon graves. Wine is a sign to us how there is required a certain generous and sane intoxication, a certain large and equable friendliness in dealing with people and things and ideas. It is a sign that the earth calls aloud for the passionate dreamer. It is a sign that the truth of truth is not in labor and sorrow, but in joy and happiness. It is a sign that gods and men have a right to satisfy their hearts desire, with joy and pleasure and splendid freedom. And just as he uses wine, so he uses meat. Bread that strengthened man's heart (and bologna-sausages, gammons of bacon, or what you will, else) this also is a symbol and a sacrament. And it is indeed more, for one must remember that Rabelais was a great doctor of medicine, as well as of Utopian Theology — and the stomach, with the wise indulgence thereof, is the final master of all arts! Let it be understood that in Rabelais sex is treated with the same reverence, and the same humor, as meat and wine. Why not? Is not the body of man the temple of the Holy Ghost? Is it not sacrosanct and holy within and without; and yet, at the same time, is it not a huge and palpable absurdity?

Those who suffer most from Rabelais' manner of treating sex are the incurably vicious. The really evil libidinous people, that is to say the spiteful, the mean, the base and inhuman, fly from his presence, and for the obvious reason that he makes sex-pleasure so generous, so gay, so natural, so legitimate, that their dark morbid perverted natures can get no more joy out of it. Their lust, their lechery, is a cold dead Saurian thing, a thing with the gravity of a slow-worm — and when this great laughing and generous sage comes forth into the sunshine with his noble companies of amorous and happy people, these Shadow-lovers, these Leut-lovers, these Fleshly Sentimentalists, writhe in shame, and seek refuge in a deeper darkness. How strained and inhuman, too; and one might add, how mad and irrelevant — that high, cold, disdainful translunar scorn with which the "moral-immoralism" of Nietzsche scourges our poor flesh and blood. One turns with relief to Zarathustra after associating with pious people. But, after Rabelais, even that terrific psychologist seems contorted and thin.

For after all it is generosity that we cry out for. Courage without generosity hugs its knees in Hell.

From the noble pleasures of meat and drink and sex, thus generously treated; we must turn to another aspect of Rabelais' work — his predilection for excrement. This also, though few would admit it, is a symbolic secret. This also is a path of initiation. In this peculiarity Rabelais is completely alone among the writers of the earth. Others have, for various reasons, dabbled in this sort of thing — but none have ever piled it up — manure-heap upon manure-heap, until the animal refuse of the whole earth seems to reek to the stars! There is not the slightest reason to regret this thing or to expurgate it. Rabelais is not Rabelais, just as life is not life, without it.

It is indeed the way of "salvation" for certain neurotic natures. Has that been properly understood? There are people who suffer frightfully — and they are often rare natures, too, though they are sometimes very vicious — from their loathing of the excremental side of life. Swift was one of these. The "disgusting" in his writing is a pathological form, not at all unusual, of such a loathing. But Rabelais is no Dean Swift — nor is there the remotest resemblance between them. Rabelais may really save us from our loathing by the huge all-embracing friendliness of his sense of humor.

There are certain people, no doubt, who would prefer the grave enthusiasm of Whitman in regard to this matter to the freer Rabelaisian touch. I cannot say that my personal experience agrees with this view.

I have found both great men invaluable; but I think as far as dealing with the Cloaca Maxima side of things is concerned, Rabelais has been the braver in inspiration. In these little matters one can only say, "some are born Rabelaisian, and some require to have Rabelais thrust upon them!"

Surely it is wisdom, in us terrestrial mortals, to make what imaginative use we can of every phase of our earthly condition?

Imagination has a right to play with everything that exists; and humor has a right to laugh at everything that exists. Everything in life is sacred and everything is a huge jest.

It is the association of this excremental aspect of life, with those high sacraments of meat and drink and sex, which some find so hard to endure. Be not afraid my little ones! The great and humorous gods have arranged for this also; and have seen to it that no brave, generous, amorous "sunburnt" emotion shall ever be hurt by such associations! If a person is hurt by them, that is only an indication that they are in grievous need of the wholesome purgative medicine of the great doctor! When one comes to speak of the actual contents of these books criticism itself must borrow Gargantua's mouth.

What characters! The three great royal giants, Graugousier, Gargantua and Pantagruel — have there ever been such kings? And the noble servants of such noble masters! The whole atmosphere is so large, so genial, so courteous, so sweet-tempered, so entirely what the life of man upon earth should be.

Even the military exploits of Friar John, even the knavish tricks of Panurge, cannot spoil our tenderness for these dear bully-boys, these mellow and magnanimous rogues! Certain paragraphs in Rabelais recur to one's mind daily. That laudation of Socrates at the beginning, and the description of the "little boxes called Silent" that outside have so grotesque an adornment, but within are full of ambergris and myrrh and all manner of precious odours.

And the picture of the banquet "when they fell to the chat of the afternoon's collation and began great goblets to ring, great bowls to ting, great gammons to trot; pour me out the fair Greek wine, the extravagant wine, the good wine, Lacrima Christi, supernaculum!" And, above all, the most holy Abbey of Thelema, over the gate of which was written the words that are never far from the hearts of wise Utopian Christians, the profound words, the philosophical words, the most shrewd Cabalistic words, and the words that "lovers" alone can understand— "Fay que ce Vouldray!" Do as Thou Wilt!

Little they know of Rabelais who call him a lewd buffoon — the profanest of mountebanks. He was one of those rare spirits that redeem humanity. To open his book — though the steam of the grossness of it rises to Heaven — is to touch the divine fingers — the fingers that heal the world.

How that "style" of his, that great oceanic avalanche of learning and piety and obscenity and gigantic merriment, smells of the honest earth!

How, with all his huge scholarship, he loves to depend for his richest, most human effects, upon his own peasant-people of Touraine! The proverbs of the country-side, the wisdom of tavern-wit, the shrewdness and fantasy of old wives tales, the sly earthly humors of farmers and vine-tenders and goat-herds and goose-girls — these are things out of which he distils his vision, his oracles, his courage.

There is also — who could help observing it? — a certain large and patriarchal homeliness — a kind of royal domesticity — about much that he writes. Those touches, as when Gargantua, his little dog in advance, enters the dining hall, when they are discussing Panurge's marriage, and they all rise to do him honor; as when Gargantua bids Pantagruel farewell and gives him a benediction so wise and tender; remain in the mind like certain passages in the Bible. These are the things that aesthetic fools "with varnished faces" easily overlook and misunderstand; but good simple fellows— "honest cods" as Rabelais would say — are struck to the heart by them. How proud the man might be, who in the turmoil of this troublesome world and beneath the mystery of “le grand Peut-être” could answer to the ultimate question, “I am a Christian of the faith of Rabelais!”

Such a one, under the spell of such a master, might indeed be able to comfort the sick and sorry, and to whisper in their ears that cosmic secret—“Bon Espoir y gist au fond!” “Good Hope lies at the Bottom!” “Good Hope” for all; for the best and the worst — for the whole miserable welter of this chaotic farce!

Therefore, “with angels and archangels” let us bow our heads and hold our tongues. Those who fancy Rabelais to be lacking in the kind of religious feeling that great souls respect, let them read that passage in the voyage of Pantagruel that speaks of the Death of Pan. Various accounts are given; various explanations made; of the great cry, that the sailors, “coming from Paloda,” heard over land and sea. At the last Pantagruel himself speaks; and he tells them that to him it refers to nothing less than the death of Him whom the Scribes and Pharisees and Priests of Jerusalem slew. “And well is He called Pan, which in the Greek means ‘All’; for in Him is all we are or have or hope.” And having said this he fell into silence, and “tears large as ostrich-eggs rolled down his cheeks.”

To all who read Rabelais and love him, one can offer no better wish than that the mystic wine of his Holy Bottle may fulfil their heart’s desire. Happy, indeed, those who are not “unwillingly drawn” by the “Fate” we all must follow! “Go now, my friends,” says the strange Priestess, “and may that Circle whose Centre is everywhere and its Circumference nowhere, keep you in His Almighty protection!”

DANTE

THE HISTORY OF Dante’s personal and literary appeal would be an extremely interesting one. No great writer has managed to excite more opposite emotions.

One thing may be especially noted as significant: Women have always been more attracted to him than men. He is in a peculiar sense the Woman’s great poet. There is a type of masculine genius which has always opposed him. Goethe cared little for him; Voltaire laughed at him; Nietzsche called him “an hyaena poetizing among the tombs.”

The truth is, women love Dante for the precise reason that these men hate him. He makes sex the centre of everything. One need not be deceived by the fact that Dante worships “purity,” while Voltaire, Goethe and Nietzsche are little concerned with it. This very laudation of continence is itself an emphasis upon sex. These others would play with amorous propensities; trifle with them in their life, in their art, in their philosophy; and then, that dangerous plaything laid aside would, as Machiavel puts it, “assume suitable attire, and return to the company of their equals — the great sages of antiquity.”

Now it is quite clear that this pagan attitude towards sex, this tendency to enjoy it in its place and leave it there, is one that, more than anything else, is irritating to women. If, as a German thinker says, every woman is a courtezan or a mother, it is obvious that the artists and thinkers who refuse alike the beguilements of the one and the ironic tenderness of the other, are not people to be “loved.” Dante refuses neither; and he has, further, that peculiar mixture of harsh strength and touching weakness, which is so especially appealing to women. They are reluctantly overcome — not without pleasure — by his fierce authority; and they can play the "little mother" to his weakness. The maternal instinct is as ironical as it is tender. It smiles at the high ideals or the eccentric child it pets, but it would not have him different. What a woman does not like, whether she is mother or courtezan, is that other kind of irony, the irony of the philosopher, which undermines both her maternal feeling and her passionate caresses.

Women, too, even quite good women, have the stress of the sexual difference constantly before them. Indeed it may be said that the class of women who are least sex-conscious are those who have habitually to sell themselves. It all matters so little then!

How fiercely is the interest of the most virtuous aroused, when any question of a love affair is rumored. In this sense every woman is a born "go-between." Sex is not with them a thing apart, an exciting volcanic thing, liable to mad outbursts, to weird perversions, but often completely forgotten. It is never completely forgotten. It is diffused. It is everywhere. It lurks in a thousand innocent gestures and intimations. The savage purity of an Artemis is no real exception. Sex is a thing too pressing to be dallied with. It is all or nothing.

One cannot play with fire. When we make observations of this kind we do not derogate from the charm or dignity of women. It is no aspersion upon them. They did not ask to have it so. It is so.

Domestic life as the European nations have evolved it is a queer compromise. Its restraints weigh heavily, in alternate discord, upon both sexes.

Masculine depravity rebels against it, and the whole modern feministic movement shakes it to the base. It remains to be seen whether Nature will admit of any satisfactory readjustment.

Certainly, as far as overt acts are concerned, women are far “purer” than men. It is only when we leave the sphere of outward acts and enter the sphere of cerebral undercurrents, that all this is changed. There the Biblical story finds its proof, and the daughters of Eve revert to their mother. This is the secret of that mania for the personal which characterizes women’s conversation. She can say fine things and do fine work; but both in her wit and her art, one is conscious of a mind that has voluptuously welcomed, or vindictively repulsed, the approach of a particular invasion; never of a mind that, in its abstract love for the beautiful, cannot even remember how it came to give birth to such thoughts!

It is the close psychological association between the emotion of religion and the emotion of sex which has always made women more religious than men.

This is perhaps only to say that women are nearer the secret of the universe than men. It may well be so. Man’s rationalizing tendency to divorce his intelligence from his intuition — may not be the precise key which opens those magic doors! Sanctity itself — that most exquisite flower of the art of character — is a profoundly feminine thing. The most saintly saints, that is to say those who wear the indescribable distinction of their Master, are always possessed of a certain feminine quality.

Sanctity is woman’s ideal — morality is man’s. The one is based upon passion, and by means of love lifts us above law. The other is based upon vice and the recoil from vice; and has no horizons of any sort.

That is why the countries where the imagination is profoundly feminine like Russia and France have sanctity as their ideal. Whereas England has its Puritan morality, and Germany its scientific efficiency. These latter races ought to sit at Dante’s feet, to learn the secret of the “Beatific Vision” that is as far beyond morality as it is outside science. There are, it is true, certain moments when the Italian poet leads us up into the cold rarified air of that "Intellectual Love of God" which leaves sex, as it leaves other human feelings, infinitely behind. But this Spinozistic mood is not the natural climate of his soul. He is always ready to revert, always anxious to "drag Beatrice in." Wagner's "Parsifal" is perhaps the most flagrant example of this ambiguous association between religion and sex. The sentimental blasphemy of that feet-washing scene is an evidence of the depths of sexual morbidity into which this voluptuous religion of pity can lead us. O that figure in the white nightgown, blessing his reformed harlot!

It is a pity Wagner ever touched the Celtic Legend — German sentimentality and Celtic romance need a Heine to deal with them!

It is indeed a difficult task to write of the relations between romantic love and devotional religion and to do it in the grand style. That is where Dante is so supremely great. And that is why, for all his greatness, his influence upon modern art has been so morbid and evil. The odious sensuality of the so-called "Pre-Raphaelite School" — a sensuality drenched with holy water and perfumed with incense — has a smell of corruption about it that ought never to be associated with Dante's name.

The worst of modern poets, the most affected and the most meticulous, are all anxious to seal themselves of the tribe of Dante. But they are no more like that divine poet than the flies that feed on a dead Caesar are like the hero they cause to stink!

Our brave Oscar understood him. Some of the most exquisite passages in "Intentions" refer to his poetry. Was the "Divine Comedy" too clear-cut and trenchant for Walter Pater? It is strange how Dante has been left to second-rate interpreters! His illustrators, too! O these sentimentalists, with their Beatrices crossing the Ponte Vecchio, and their sad youths looking on! All this is an insult — a sacrilege — to the proudest, most aristocratic spirit who ever dwelt on earth! Why did not Aubrey Beardsley stop that beautiful boy on the threshold? He who was the model of his “Ave atque vale!” might have well served for Casella, singing among the cold reeds, in the white dawn.

For there are scenes in Dante which have the strange, remote, perverted, archaic loveliness of certain figures on the walls of Egyptian temples or on the earliest Greek vases. Here the real artist in him forgets God and Beatrice and the whole hierarchy of the saints. And it is because of things of this kind that many curious people are found to be his worshipers who will never themselves pass forth “to re-behold the stars.” They are unwise who find Dante so bitter and theological, so Platonic and devoted, that they cannot open his books. They little know what ambiguous planets, what dark heathen meteors move on the fringe of his great star-lit road. His Earthly Lady, as well as his Heavenly Lady, may have the moon beneath her feet.

But neither of them know, as does their worshiper and lover, what lies on the other side of the moon.

What Dante leaves to us as his ultimate gift is his pride and his humility. The one answers the other. And both put us to shame. He, alone of great artists, holds in his hand the true sword of the Spirit for the dividing asunder of men and things. There is no necessity to lay all the stress upon the division between the Lower and the Higher Love, between Hell and Heaven. There are other distinctions in life than these. And between all distinctions, between all those differences which separate the “fine” from the “base,” the noble from the ignoble, the beautiful from the hideous, the generous from the mean; Dante draws the pitiless sword-stroke of that “eternal separation” which is the most tragic thing in the world. In the truest sense tragic! For so many things, and so many people, that must be thus “cut off,” are among those who harrow our hearts with the deadliest attraction and are so wistful in their weakness. Through the mists and mephitic smoke of our confused age — our age that cries out to be beyond the good, when it is beneath the beautiful — through the thick air of indolence masquerading as toleration and indifference posing as sympathy, flashes the scorching sword of the Florentine's Disdain, dividing the just from the unjust, the true from the false, and the heroic from the commonplace. What matter if his "division" is not our "division," his "formula" our "formula"? It is good for us to be confronted with such Disdain. It brings us back once more to "Values"; and whether our "Values" are values of taste or values of devotion what matter? Life becomes once more arresting. The everlasting Drama recovers its "Tone"; and the high Liturgy of the last Illusion rolls forward to its own Music!

That Angel of God, who when their hearts were shaken with fear before the flame-lit walls of Dis, came, so straight across the waters, and quelled the insolence of Hell; with what Disdain he turns away his face, even from those he has come to save!

These "messengers" of God, who have so superb a contempt for all created things, does one not meet them, sometimes, even in this life, as they pass us by upon their secret errands?

The beginning of the Inferno contains the cruellest judgment upon our generation ever uttered. It is so exactly adapted to the spirit of this age that, hearing it, one staggers as if from a stab. Are we not this very tribe of caitiffs who have committed the "Great Refusal?" Are we not these very wretches whose blind life is so base that they envy every other Fate? Are we not those who are neither for God or for his Enemies but are "for themselves"; those who may not even take refuge in Hell, lest the one damned get glory of them! The very terror of this clear-cutting sword-sweep, dividing us, bone from bone, may, nay! probably will, send us back to our gentle “lovers of humanity” who, “knowing everything pardon everything.” But one sometimes wonders whether a life all “irony,” all “pity,” all urbane “interest,” would not lose the savor of its taste! There is a danger, not only to our moral sense, but to our immoral sense, in that genial air of universal acceptance which has become the fashion.

What if, after all — even though this universe be so poor a farce — the mad lovers and haters, the terrible prophets and artists, were right?

Suppose the farce had a climax, a catastrophe! One loves to repeat “all is possible;” but that particular possibility has little attraction. It would be indeed an anti-climax if the queer Comedy we have so daintily been patronizing turned out to be a Divine Comedy — and ourselves the point of the jest! Not that this is very likely to occur. It is more in accordance with what we know of the terrestrial stage that in this wager of faith with un-faith neither will ever discover who really won!

But Dante’s “Disdain” is not confined to the winners in the cosmic dicing match. There are heroic hearts in hell who, for all their despair, still yield not, nor abate a jot of their courage. Such a one was that great Ghibelline Chief who was lost for “denying immortality.” “If my people fled from thy people — that more torments me than this flame.” In one respect Dante is, beyond doubt, the greatest poet of the world. I mean in his power of heightening the glory and the terribleness of the human race. Across the three-fold kingdom of his “Terza Rima” passes, in tragic array, the whole procession of human history — and each figure there, each solitary person, whether of the Blessed or the Purged, or the Condemned, wears, like a garment of fire, the dreadful dignity of having been a man! The moving sword-point that flashes, first upon one and then upon another, amid our dim transactions, is nothing but the angry arm of human imagination, moulding life to grander issues; creating, if not discovering, sublimer laws.

In conveying that thrilling sense of the momentousness of human destiny which beyond anything else certain historic names evoke, none can surpass him. The brief, branding lines, with which the enemies of God are engraved upon their monuments "more lasting than brass," seem to add a glory to damnation. Who can forget how that "Simonist" and "Son of Sodom" lifts his hands up out of the deepest Pit, and makes "the fig" at God? "Take it, God, for at Thee I aim it!" There is a sting of furious blasphemy in this; personal outrage that goes beyond all limits.

Yet who is there, but does not feel glad that the "Pistoian" uttered what he uttered — out of his Hell — to his Maker?

Is not Newman right when he says that the heart of man does not naturally "love God?"

But perhaps in the whole poem nothing is more beautiful than that great roll of honor of the unchristened Dead, who make up the company of the noble Heathen. Sad, but not unhappy, they walk to and fro in their Pagan Hades, and occupy themselves, as of old, in discoursing upon philosophy and poetry and the Mystery of Life.

Those single lines, devoted to such names, are unlike anything else in literature. That "Caesar, in armour, with Ger-Falcon eyes," challenges one's obeisance as a great shout of his own legionaries, while that "Alone, by himself, the Soldan" bows to the dust our Christian pride, as the Turbaned Commander of the Faithful, with his ghostly crescent blade, strides past, dreaming of the Desert.

It is in touches like these, surely, rather than in the Beatrice scenes or the devil scenes, that the poet is most himself.

It needs, perhaps, a certain smouldering dramatic passion, in regard to the whole spectacle of human life, to do justice to such lines. It needs also that mixture of disdain and humility which is his own paramount attribute.

And the same smouldering furnace of "reverence" characterizes Dante's use of the older literatures. No writer who has ever lived has such a dramatic sense of the "great effects" in style, and the ritual of words.

That passage, "Thou art my master and my author. It is from thee I learnt the beautiful style that has done me so much honour," with its reiteration of the rhythmic syllables of "honour," opens up a salutary field of aesthetic contemplation. His quotations, too, from the Psalms, and from the Roman Liturgy, become, by their imaginative inclusion, part of his own creative genius. That "Vexilla regis prodeunt Inferni!" Who can hear it without the same thrill, as when Napoleonic trumpets heralded the Emperor! In the presence of such moments the whole elaboration of the Beatrice Cult falls away. That romantic perversion of the sex instinct is but the psychic motive force. Once started on his splendid and terrible road, the poet forgets everything except the "Principle of Beauty" and the "Memory of Great Men." Parallel with these things is Dante's passion of reverence for the old historic places — provinces, cities, rivers and valleys of his native Italy. Even when he lifts up his voice to curse them, as he curses his own Firenze, it is but an inversion of the same mood. The cities where men dwelt then took to themselves living personalities; and Dante, who in love and hate was Italian of the Italians, was left indifferent by none of these. How strange to modern ears this thrill of recognition, when one exile, even among the dead, meets another, of their common citizenship of "no mean city!" Of this classic "patriotism" the world requires a Renaissance, that we may be saved from the shallowness of artificial commercial Empires. The new "inter-nationalism" is the sinister product of a generation that has grown “deracinated,” that has lost its roots in the soil. It is an Anglo-Germanic thing and opposed to it the proud tenacity of the Latin race turns, even today, to what Barres calls the “worship of one’s Dead.”

Anglo-Saxon Industrialism, Teutonic Organization, have their world place; but it is to the Latin, and, it may be, to the Slav also, that the human spirit must turn in those subtler hours when it cannot “live by bread alone.”

The modern international empires may obliterate local boundaries and trample on local altars. In spite of them, and in defiance of them, the soul of an ancient race lives on, its saints and its artists forging the urn of its Phoenix-ashes!

Dante himself, dreaming over the high Virgilian Prophecy of a World-State, under a Spiritual Caesar, yearned to restore the Pax Romana to a chaotic world. Such a vision, such an Orbis Terrarum at the feet of Christ, has no element in common with the material dominance of modern commercial empires. It much more closely resembles certain Utopias of the modern Revolutionary. In its spirit it is not less Latin than the traditional customs of the City-States it would include. Its real implication may be found in the assimilative genius of the Catholic Church, consecrating but not effacing local altars; transforming, but not destroying, local pieties. Who can deny that this formidable vision answers the deepest need of the modern world?

The discovery of some Planetary Synthesis within the circle of which all the passionate race cults may flourish; growing not less intense but more intense, under the new World-City — this is nothing else than what the soul of the earth, “dreaming on things to come” may actually be evolving.

Who knows if the new prominence given by the war to Russian thought may not incredibly hasten such a Vita Nuova? We know that the Pan-Slavic dream, even from the days of Ivan the Terrible, has been of this spiritual unity, and it may be remembered that it was always from “beyond the Alps” that Dante looked for the Liberator. Who knows? The great surging antipodal tides of life lash one another into foam. Out of chaos stars are born. And it may be the madness of a dream even so much as to speak of “unity” while creation seethes and hisses in its terrible vortex. Mockingly laugh the imps of irony, while the Saints keep their vigil. Man is a surprising animal; by no means always bent on his own redemption; sometimes bent on his own destruction!

And meanwhile the demons of life dance on. Dante may build up his great triple universe in his great triple rhyme, and encase it in walls of brass. But still they dance on. We may tremble at the supreme poet’s pride and wonder at the passion of his humility — but “the damned grotesques make arabesques, like the wind upon the sand!”

SHAKESPEARE

THERE IS SOMETHING pathetic about the blind devotion of humanity to its famous names. But how indiscriminate it is; how lacking in discernment!

This is, above all, true of Shakespeare, whose peculiar and quite personal genius has almost been buried under the weight of popular idolatry. No wonder such critics as Voltaire, Tolstoi, and Mr. Bernard Shaw have taken upon themselves to intervene. The Frenchman's protest was an aesthetic one. The more recent objectors have adopted moral and philosophic grounds. But it is the unreasoning adoration of the mob which led to both attacks.

It is not difficult to estimate the elements which have gone to make up this Shakespeare-God. The voices of the priests behind the Idol are only too clearly distinguishable. We hear the academic voice, the showman's voice, and the voice of the ethical preacher. They are all absurd, but their different absurdities have managed to flow together into one powerful and unified convention. Our popular orators gesticulate and clamour; our professors "talk Greek;" our ethical Brutuses "explain;" and the mob "throw up their sweaty night-caps;" while our poor Caesar of Poetry sinks down out of sight, helpless among them all.

Charles Lamb, who understood him better than anyone — and who loved Plays — does not hesitate to accuse our Stage-Actors of being the worst of all in their misrepresentation. He doubts whether even Garrick understood the subtlety of the roles he played, and the few exceptions he allows in his own age make us wonder what he would say of ours.

Finally there is the “Philosophical Shakespeare” of the German appreciation, and this we feel instinctively to be the least like the original of all!

The irony of it is that the author of Hamlet and the Tempest does not only live in a different world from that of these motley exponents. He lives in an antagonistic one. Shakespeare was as profoundly the enemy of scholastic pedantry as he was the enemy of puritan squeamishness. He was almost unkindly averse to the breath of the profane crowd. And his melancholy scepticism, with its half-humorous assent to the traditional pieties, is at the extremest opposite pole from the “truths” of metaphysical reason. The Shakespeare of the Popular Revivals is a fantastic caricature. The Shakespeare of the College Text-Books is a lean scarecrow. But the Shakespeare of the philosophical moralists is an Hob-goblin from whom one flees in dismay.

Enjoying the plays themselves — the interpreters forgotten — a normally intelligent reader cannot fail to respond to a recognisable Personality there, a Personality with apathies and antipathies, with prejudices and predilections. Very quickly he will discern the absurd unreality of that monstrous Idol, that ubiquitous Hegelian God. Very soon he will recognize that in trying to make their poet everything they have made him nothing.

No one can read Shakespeare with direct and simple enjoyment without discovering in his plays a quite definite and personal attitude towards life. Shakespeare is no Absolute Divinity, reconciling all oppositions and transcending all limitations. He is not that “cloud-capped mountain,” too lofty to be scanned, of Matthew Arnold’s Sonnet. He is a sad and passionate artist, using his bitter experiences to intensify his insight, and playing with his humours and his dreams to soften the sting of that brutish reality which he was doomed to unmask. The best way of indicating the personal mood which emerges as his final attitude is to describe it as that of the perfectly natural man confronting the universe. Of course, there is no such "perfectly natural man," but he is a legitimate lay-figure, and we all approximate to him at times. The natural man, in his unsophisticated hours, takes the Universe at its surface value, neither rejecting the delicate compensations, nor mitigating the cruelty of the grotesque farce. The natural man accepts what is given. He swallows the chaotic surprises, the extravagant accidents, the whole fantastic "pell-mell." He accepts, too, the traditional pieties of his race, their "hope against hope," their gracious ceremonial, their consecration of birth and death. He accepts these, not because he is confident of their "truth" but because they are there; because they have been there so long, and have interwoven themselves with the chances and changes of the whole dramatic spectacle.

He accepts them spontaneously, humorously, affectionately; not anxious to improve them — what would be the object of that? — and certainly not seeking to controvert them. He reverences this Religion of his Race not only because it has its own sad, pathetic beauty, but because it has got itself involved in the common burden; lightening such a burden here, making it, perhaps, a little heavier there, but lending it a richer tone, a subtler colour, a more significant shape. It does not trouble the natural man that Religion should deal with "the Impossible." Where, in such a world as this, does that begin? He has no agitating desire to reconcile it with reason.

At the bottom of his soul he has a shrewd suspicion that it rather grew out of the earth than fell from the sky, but that does not concern him. It may be based upon no eternal verity. It may lead to no certain issue. It may be neither very "useful" or very "moral." But it is, at any rate, a beautiful work of imaginative art, and it lends life a certain dignity that nothing can quite replace. As a matter of fact, the natural man’s attitude to these things does not differ much from the attitude of the great artists. It is only that a certain lust for creation, and a certain demonic curiosity, scourge these latter on to something beyond passive resignation.

A Da Vinci or a Goethe accepts religion and uses it, but between it and the depths of his own mind remains forever an inviolable film of sceptical “white light.” This “qualified assent” is precisely what excites the fury of such individualistic thinkers as Tolstoi and Bernard Shaw. It were amusing to note the difference between the “humour” of this latter and the “humour” of Shakespeare. Shaw’s humour consists in emphasizing the absurdity of human Custom, compared with the good sense of the philosopher. Shakespeare’s humour consists in emphasizing the absurdity of philosophers, compared with the good sense of Custom. The one is the humour of the Puritan, directed against the ordinary man, on behalf of the Universe. The other is the humour of the Artist, directed against the Universe, on behalf of the ordinary man.

Shakespeare is, at bottom, the most extreme of Pessimists. He has no faith in “progress,” no belief in “eternal values,” no transcendental “intuitions,” no zeal for reform. The universe to him, for all its loveliness, remains an outrageous jest. The cosmic is the comic. Anything may be expected of this “pendant world,” except what we expect; and when it is a question of “falling back,” we can only fall back on human-made custom. We live by Illusions, and when the last Illusion fails us, we die. After reading Shakespeare, the final impression left upon the mind is that the world can only be justified as an aesthetic spectacle. To appreciate a Show at once so sublime and so ridiculous, one needs to be very brave, very tender, and very humorous. Nothing else is needed. “Man must abide his going hence, even as his coming hither. Ripeness is all.” When Courage fails us, it is— “as flies to wanton boys are we to the gods. They kill us for their sport.” When tenderness fails us, it is— “Tomorrow and tomorrow and tomorrow, creeps in this petty pace from day to day to the last syllable of recorded time.” When humour fails us, it is— “How weary, stale, flat and unprofitable, seem to me all the uses of this world!”

So much for Life! And when we come to Death, how true it is, as Charles Lamb says, that none has spoken of Death like Shakespeare! And he has spoken of it so — with such an absolute grasp of our mortal feeling about it — because his mood in regard to it is the mood of the natural man; of the natural man, unsophisticated by false hopes, undated by vain assurance. His attitude towards death neither sweetens “the unpalatable draught of mortality” nor permits us to let go the balm of its “eternal peace.” How frightful “to lie in cold obstruction and to rot; this sensible warm motion to become a kneaded clod!” and yet, “after life’s fitful fever,” how blessed to “sleep well!”

What we note about this mood — the mood of Shakespeare and the natural man — is that it never for a moment dallies with philosophic fancies or mystic visions. It “thinks highly of the soul,” but in the natural, not the metaphysical, sense. It is the attitude of Rabelais and Montaigne, not the attitude of Wordsworth or Browning. It is the tone we know so well in the Homeric poems. It is the tone of the Psalms of David. We hear its voice in “Ecclesiastes,” and the wisdom of “Solomon the King” is full of it. In more recent times, it is the feeling of those who veer between our race’s traditional hope and the dark gulf of eternal silence. It is the “Aut Christus aut Nihil” of those who “by means of metaphysic” have dug a pit, into which metaphysic has disappeared!

The gaiety and childlike animal spirits of Shakespeare’s Comedies need not deceive us. Why should we not forget the whips and scorns for a while, and fleet the time carelessly, “as they did in the golden age?” Such simple fooling goes better with the irresponsibility of our fate than the more pungent wit of the moral comedians. The tragic laughter which the confused issues of life excite in subtler souls is not lacking, but the sweet obliquities of honest clowns carry us just as far. Shakespeare loves fools as few have loved them, and it is often his humour to put into their mouth the ultimate wisdom.

It is remarkable that these plays should commence with a “Midsummer Night’s Dream” and end with a “Tempest.” In the interval the great sombre passions of our race are sounded and dismissed; but as he began with Titania, so he ends with Ariel. From the fairy forest to the enchanted island; from a dream to a dream. With Shakespeare there is no Wagnerian, Euripidean “apologia.” There is no “Parsifal” or “Bacchanals.” From the meaningless tumult of mortal passions he returns, with a certain ironic weariness, to the magic of Nature and the wonder of youth. Prospero, dismissing his spirits “into thin air,” has the last word; and the last word is as the first: “we are such stuff as dreams are made on, and our little life is rounded with a sleep.” The easy-going persons who reluct at the idea of a pessimistic Shakespeare should turn the pages of Troilus and Cressida, Measure for Measure, and Timon of Athens. What we guessed as we read Hamlet and Lear grows a certainty as we read these plays.

Here the “gentle Shakespeare” does the three things that are most unpardonable. He unmasks virtue; he betrays Woman; and he curses the gods. The most intransigent of modern revolutionaries might learn a trick or two from this sacred poet. In Lear he puts the very voice of Anarchy into the mouth of the King— “Die for adultery? No!” “Handy-dandy, which is the Magistrate and which is the Thief?” “A dog’s obeyed in office.”

Have I succeeded in making clear what I feel about the Shakespearean attitude? At bottom, it is absolutely sceptical. Deep yawns below Deep; and if we cannot read "the writing upon the wall," the reason may be that there is no writing there. Having lifted a corner of the Veil of Isis, having glanced once into that Death-Kingdom where grope the roots of the Ash-Tree whose name is Fear, we return to the surface, from Nadir to Zenith, and become "superficial"— "out of profundity."

The infinite spaces, as Pascal said, are "frightful." That way madness lies. And those who would be sane upon earth must drug themselves with the experience, or with the spectacle of the experience, of human passion. Within this charmed circle, and here alone, they may be permitted to forget the Outer Terror.

The noble spirit is not the spirit that condescends to pamper in itself those inflated moods of false optimistic hope, which, springing from mere physiological well-being, send us leaping and bounding, with such boisterous assurance, along the sunny road. Such pragmatic self-deception is an impertinence in the presence of a world like this.

It is a sign of what one might call a philosophically ill-bred nature. It is the indecent "gratitude" of the pig over his trough. It is the little yellow eye of sanctified bliss turned up to the God who "must be in His Heaven" if we are so privileged. This "never doubting good will triumph" is really, when one examines it, nothing but the inverted prostration of the helot-slave, glad to have been allowed to get so totally drunk! It blusters and swaggers, but at heart it is base and ignoble. For it is not sensitive enough to feel that the Universe cannot be pardoned for the cry of one tortured creature, and that all "the worlds we shall traverse" cannot make up for the despair of one human child.

To be “cheerful” about the Universe in the manner of these people is to insult the Christ who died. It is to outrage the “little ones” over whose bodies the Wheel has passed. When Nietzsche, the martyr of his own murdered pity, calls upon us to “love Fate,” he does not shout so lustily. His laughter is the laughter of one watching his darling stripped for the rods. He who would be “in harmony with Nature.” with those “murderous ministers” who, in their blind abyss, throw dice with Chance, must be in harmony with the giants of Jotunheim, as well as with the lords of Valhalla. He must be able to look on grimly while Asgard totters; he must welcome “the Twilight of the Gods.” To have a mind inured to such conceptions, a mind capable of remaining on such a verge, is, alone, to be, intellectually speaking, what we call “aristocratic.” When, even with eyes like poor Gloucester’s in the play, we can see “how this world wags,” it is slavish and “plebeian” to swear that it all “means intensely, and means well.” It is also to lie in one’s throat!

No wonder Shakespeare treats reverently every “superstition,” every anodyne and nepenthe offered to the inmates of this House of the Incurable. Such “sprinkling with holy water,” such “rendering ourselves stupid,” is the only alternative. Anything else is the insight of the hero, or the hypocrisy of the preacher!

Has it been realized how curiously the interpreters of Shakespeare omit the principal thing? They revel in his Grammar, his History, his Biology, his Botany, his Geography, his Psychology and his Ethics. They never speak of his Poetry. Now Shakespeare is, above everything, a poet. To poetry, over and over again, as our Puritans know well, he sacrifices Truth, Morality, Probability, nay! the very principles of Art itself.

As Dramas, many of his plays are scandalously bad; many of his characters fantastic. One can put one’s finger in almost every case upon the persons and situations that interested him and upon those that did not. And how carelessly he “sketches in” the latter! So far from being “the Objective God of Art” they seek to make him, he is the most wayward and subjective of all wandering souls.

No natural person can read him without feeling the pulse of extreme personal passion behind everything he writes.

And this pulse of personal passion is always expressing itself in Poetry. He will let the probabilities of a character vanish into air, or dwindle into a wistful note of attenuated convention, when once such a one has served his purpose as a reed to pipe his strange tunes through. He will whistle the most important personage down the wind, lost to interest and identity, when once he has put into his mouth his own melancholy brooding upon life — his own imaginative reaction.

And so it happens that, in spite of all academic opinion, those who understand Shakespeare best tease themselves least over his dramatic lapses. For let it be whispered at once, without further scruple. As far as the art of the drama is concerned, Shakespeare is shameless. The poetic instinct — one might call it “epical” or “lyrical,” for it is both these — is far more dominant in our “greatest dramatist” than any dramatic conscience. That is precisely why those among us who love “poetry,” but find “drama,” especially “drama since Ibsen,” intolerably tiresome, revert again and again to Shakespeare. Only absurd groups of Culture-Philistines can read these “powerful modern productions” more than once! One knows not whether their impertinent preaching, or their exasperating technical cleverness is the more annoying.

They may well congratulate themselves on being different from Shakespeare. They are extremely different. They are, indeed, nothing but his old enemies, the Puritans, “translated,” like poor Bottom, and wearing the donkey's head of "art for art's sake" in place of their own simple foreheads.

Art for art's sake! The thing has become a Decalogue of forbidding commandments, as devastating as those Ten. It is the new avatar of the "moral sense" carrying categorical insolence into the sphere of our one Alsatian sanctuary!

I am afraid Shakespeare was a very "immoral" artist. I am afraid he wrote as one of the profane.

But what of the Greeks? The Greeks never let themselves go! No! And for a sufficient reason. Greek Drama was Religion. It was Ritual. And we know how "responsible" ritual must be. The gods must have their incense from the right kind of censer.

But you cannot evoke Religion "in vacuo." You cannot, simply by assuming grave airs about your personal "taste," or even about the "taste" of your age, give it that consecration.

Beauty? God knows what beauty is. But I can tell you what it is not. It is not the sectarian anxiety of any pompous little clique to get "saved" in the artistic "narrow path." It is much rather what Stendhal called it. But he spoke so frivolously that I dare not quote him.

Has it occurred to you, gentle reader, to note how "Protestant" this New Artistic Movement is? Shakespeare, in his aesthetic method, as well as in his piety, had a Catholic soul. In truth, the hour has arrived when a "Renaissance" of the free spirit of Poetry in Drama is required. Why must this monstrous shadow of the Hyperborean Ibsen go on darkening the play-instinct in us, like some ugly, domineering John Knox? I suspect that there are many generous Rabelaisian souls who could lift our mortal burden with oceanic merriment, only the New Movement frightens them. They are afraid they would not be "Greek" enough — or "Scandinavian" enough.

Meanwhile the miserable populace have to choose between Babylonian Pantomimes and Gaelic Mythology, if they are not driven, out of a kind of spite, into the region of wholesome "domestic sunshine."

What, in our hearts, we natural men desire is to be delivered at one blow from the fairies with weird names (so different from poor Titania!), and from the three-thousand "Unities!" What "poetry" we do get is so vague and dim and wistful and forlorn that it makes us want to go out and "buy clothes" for someone. We veer between the abomination of city-reform and the desolation of Ultima Thule.

But Shakespeare is Shakespeare still. O those broken and gasped-out human cries, full of the old poignancy, full of the old enchantment! Shakespeare's poetry is the extreme opposite of any "cult." It is the ineffable expression, in music that makes the heart stop, of the feelings which have stirred every Jack and Jill among us, from the beginning of the world! It has the effect of those old "songs" of the countryside that hit the heart in us so shrewdly that one feels as though the wind had made them or the rain or the wayside grass; for they know too much of what we tell to none! It is the "one touch of Nature." And how they break the rules, these surpassing lines, in which the emotions of his motley company gasp themselves away!

It is not so much in the great speeches, noble as these are, as in the brief, tragic cries and broken stammerings, that his unapproachable felicity is found. "Upon such sacrifices, my Cordelia, the gods themselves throw incense." Thick and fast they crowd upon our memory, these little sentences, these aching rhythms! It is with the flesh and blood of the daily Sacrifice of our common endurance that he celebrates his strange Mass. Hands that "smell of mortality," lips that "so sweetly were forsworn," eyes that "look their last" on all they love, these are the touches that make us bow down before the final terrible absolution. And it is the same with Nature. Not to Shakespeare do we go for those pseudo-scientific, pseudo-ethical interpretations, so crafty in their word-painting, so cunning in their rational analysis, which we find in the rest. A few fierce-flung words, from the hot heart of an amorist's lust, and all the smouldering magic of the noon-day woods takes your breath. A sobbing death-dirge from the bosom of a love-lorn child, and the perfume of all the "enclosed gardens" in the world shudders through your veins.

And what about the ancient antagonist of the Earth? What about the Great Deep? Has anyone, anywhere else, gathered into words the human tremor and the human recoil that are excited universally when we go down "upon the beached verge of the salt flood, who once a day with his embossed froth the turbulent surge doth cover?" John Keats was haunted day and night by the simple refrain in Lear, "Canst thou not hear the Sea?"

Charming Idyllists may count the petals of the cuckoo-buds in the river-pastures; and untouched, we admire. But let old Falstaff, as he lies a' dying, "babble o' green fields," and all the long, long thoughts of youth steal over us, like a summer wind.

The modern critic, with a philosophic bias, is inclined to quarrel with the obvious human congruity of Shakespeare's utterances. What is the use of this constant repetition of the obvious truism: "When we are born we cry that we are come to this great stage of fools?"

No use, my friend! No earthly use! And yet it is not a premeditated reflection, put in "for art's sake." It is the poetry of the pinch of Fate; it is the human revenge we take upon the insulting irony of our lot.

But Shakespeare does not always strike back at the gods with bitter blows. In this queer world, where we have "nor youth, nor age, but, as it were, an after-dinner's sleep, dreaming on both," there come moments when the spirit is too sore wounded even to rise in revolt. Then, in a sort of "cheerful despair," we can only wait the event. And Shakespeare has his word for this also.

Perhaps the worst of all "the slings and arrows" are the intolerable partings we have to submit to, from the darlings of our soul. And here, while he offers us no false hope, his tone loses its bitterness, and grows gentle and solemn.

It is— "Forever and forever, farewell, Cassius. If we do meet again, why then 'tis well; if not, this parting was well made." And for the Future:

"O that we knew
The end of this day's business ere it comes!
But it suffices that the day will end;
And then the end is known."

EL GRECO

THE EMERGING OF a great genius into long retarded pre-eminence is always attended by certain critical misunderstandings. To a cynical observer, on the lookout for characteristic temperamental lapses, two recent interpretations of El Greco may be especially commended. I mean the Secret of Toledo, by Maurice Barres, and an article in the "Contemporary" of April, 1914, by Mr. Aubrey Bell.

Barres — Frenchman of Frenchmen — sets off, with captivating and plausible logic, to generalize into reasonable harmlessness this formidable madman. He interprets Toledo, appreciates Spain, and patronizes Domenico Theotocopoulos.

The Secret of Toledo is a charming book, with illuminating passages, but it is too logical, too plausible, too full of the preciosity of dainty generalization, to reach the dark and arbitrary soul, either of Spain or of Spain's great painter.

Mr. Bell, on the contrary, far from turning El Greco into an epicurean cult, drags him with a somewhat heavy hand before the footlights of English Idealism.

He makes of him an excuse for disparaging Velasquez, and launches into a discourse upon the Higher Reality and the Inner Truth which leaves one with a very dreary feeling, and, by some ponderous application of spiritual ropes and pulleys, seems to jerk into empty space all that is most personal and arresting in the artist.

If it is insulting to the ghostly Toledoan to smooth him out into picturesque harmony with Castillian dances, Gothic cloisters and Moorish songs, it is still worse to transform him into a rampant Idealist of the conventional kind. He belongs neither to the Aesthetics nor to the Idealists. He belongs to every individual soul whose taste is sufficiently purged, sufficiently perverse and sufficiently passionate, to enter the enchanted circle of his tyrannical spell.

When, in that dark Toledo Church, one presses one's face against the iron bars that separate one from the Burial of Count Orguz, it is neither as a Dilettante nor an Idealist that one holds one's breath. Those youthful pontifical saints, so richly arrayed, offering with slender royal hands that beautiful body to the dust — is their mysterious gesture only the rhythm of the secret of Death?

Those chastened and winnowed spectators, with their withdrawn, remote detachment — not sadness — are they the initiated sentinels of the House of Corruption?

At what figured symbol points that epicene child?

Sumptuous is the raiment of the dead; and the droop of his limbs has a regal finality; but look up! Stark naked, and in abandoned weakness, the liberated soul shudders itself into the presence of God!

The El Greco House and Museum in Toledo contains amazing things. Every one of those Apostles that gaze out from the wall upon our casual devotion has his own furtive madness, his own impossible dream! The St. John is a thing one can never forget. El Greco has painted his hair as if it were literally live flame and the exotic tints of his flesh have an emphasis laid upon them that makes one think of the texture of certain wood orchids.

How irrelevant seem Monsieur Barres' water-colour sketches of prancing Moors and learned Jews and picturesque Visi-Goths, as soon as one gets a direct glimpse into these unique perversions! And why cannot one go a step with this dreamer of dreams without dragging in the Higher Reality? To regard work as mad and beautiful as this as anything but individual Imagination, is to insult the mystery of personality.

El Greco re-creates the world, in pure, lonely, fantastic arbitrariness.

His art does not represent the secret Truth of the Universe, or the Everlasting Movement; it represents the humour of El Greco.

Every artist mesmerizes us into his personal vision.

A traveller, drinking wine in one of those cafes in the crowded Zocodover, his head full of these amazing fantasies, might well let the greater fantasy of the world slip by — a dream within a dream!

With El Greco for a companion, the gaunt waiter at the table takes the form of some incarcerated Don Quixote and the beggars at the window appear like gods in disguise.

This great painter, like the Russian Dostoivsky, has a mania for abandoned weakness. The nearer to God his heroic Degenerates get, the more feverishly enfeebled becomes their human will.

Their very faces — with those retreating chins, retroussé noses, loose lips, quivering nostrils and sloping brows — seem to express the abandonment of all human resolution or restraint, in the presence of the Beatific Vision. Like the creatures of Dostoievsky, they seem to plunge into the ocean of the Foolishness of God, so much wiser than the wisdom of men! — as divers plunge into a bath.

There is not much attempt among these ecstatics to hold on to the dignity of their reason or the reticence of their self-respect. Naked, they fling themselves into the arms of Nothingness.

This passionate “Movement of Life,” of which Mr. Bell, quoting Pater’s famous quotation from Heraclitus, makes so much, is, after all, only the rush of the wind through the garments of the World — Denier, as he plunges into Eternity.

Like St. John of the Cross, El Greco's visionaries pass from the Night of the Reason to the Night of the Senses; from the Night of the Senses to the Night of Soul; and if this final Night is nothing less than God Himself, the divine submersion does not bring back any mortal daylight.

Domenico's portraits have a character somewhat different from his visions. Here, into these elongated, bearded hermits, into these grave, intellectual maniacs, whose look is like the look of Workers in some unlit Mine, he puts what he knows and feels of his own identity.

They are diverse masks and mirrors, these portraits, surfaces of deep water in various lonely valleys, but from the depths of them rises up the shadow of the same lost soul, and they are all ruffled by the breath of the same midnight.

The Crucifixion in the Prado, and that other, which, by some freak of Providence, has found its way to Philadelphia, have backgrounds which carry our imagination very far. Is this primordial ice, with its livid steel-blue shadows, the stuff out of which the gods make other planets than ours — dead planets, without either sun or star? Are these the sheer precipices of Chaos, against which the Redeemer hangs, or the frozen edges of the grave of all life?

El Greco's magnificent contempt for material truth is a lesson to all artists. We are reminded of William Blake and Aubrey Beardsley. He seems to regard the human-frame as so much soft clay, upon which he can trace his ecstatic hieroglyphs, in defiance both of anatomy and nature.

El Greco is the true precursor of our present-day Matissists and Futurists. He, as they, has the courage to strip his imagination of all mechanical restrictions and let it go free to mould the world at its fancy.

What stray visitor to Madrid would guess the vastness of the intellectual sensation awaiting him in that quiet, rose-coloured building?

As you enter the Museum and pass those magnificent Titians crowded so close together — large and mellow spaces, from a more opulent world than ours; greener branches, bluer skies and a more luminous air; a world through which, naturally and at ease, the divine Christ may move, grand, majestic, health-giving, a veritable god; a world from whose grapes the blood of satyrs may be quickened, from whose corn the hearts of heroes may be made strong — and come bolt upon El Greco's glacial northern lights, you feel that no fixed objective Truth and no traditional Ideal has a right to put boundaries to the imagination of man.

Not less striking than any of these is the extraordinary portrait of "Le Roi Ferdinand" in the great gallery at the Louvre.

The artist has painted the king as one grown weary of his difference from other men. His moon-white armour and silvery crown show like the ornaments of the dead. Misty and wavering, the long shadows upon the high, strange brow seem thrown there by the passing of all mortal Illusions.

Phantom-like in his gleaming ornaments, a king of Lost Atlantis, he waits the hour of his release.

And not only is he the king of Shadows; he is also the king of Players, the Player-King.

El Greco has painted him holding two sceptres, one of which, resembling a Fool's Bauble, is tipped with the image of a naked hand — a dead, false hand — symbol of the illusion of Power. The very crown he wears, shimmering and unnaturally heavy, is like the crown a child might have made in play, out of shells and sea-weed.

The disenchanted irony upon the face of this figure; that look as of one who — as Plato would have us do with kings — has been dragged back from Contemplation to the vulgarity of ruling men; has been deliberately blent by a most delicate art with a queer sort of fantastic whimsicality.

“Le Roi Ferdinand” might almost be an enlarged reproduction of some little girl’s Doll-King, dressed up in silver tinsel and left out of doors, by mistake, some rainy evening.

Something about him, one fancies, would make an English child think of the “White Knight” in Alice Through the Looking Glass, so helpless and simple he looks, this poor “Revenant,” propped up by Youthful Imagination, and with the dews of night upon his armour.

You may leave these pictures far behind you as you re-cross the Channel, but you can never quite forget El Greco.

In the dreams of night the people of his queer realm will return and surround you, ebbing and flowing, these passionate shadows, stretching out vain arms after the infinite and crying aloud for the rest they cannot win.

Yes, in the land of dreams we know him, this proud despiser of earth!

From our safe inland retreat we watch the passing of his Dance of Death, and we know that what they seek, these wanderers upon the wind, is not our Ideal nor our Real, not our Earth or our Heaven, but a strange, fairy-like Nirvana, where, around the pools of Nothingness, the children of twilight gambol and play.

The suggestive power of genius plays us, indeed, strange tricks. I have sometimes fancied that the famished craving in the eyes and nostrils of El Greco’s saints was a queer survival of that tragic look which that earlier Greek, Scopas the Sculptor, took such pains to throw upon the eyelids of his half-human amphibiums.

It might even seem to us, dreaming over these pictures as the gusts of an English autumn blow the fir branches against the window, as though all that weird population of Domenico’s brain were tossing their wild, white arms out there and emitting thin, bat-like cries under the drifting moon.

The moon — one must admit that, at least — rather than the sun, was ever the mistress of El Greco’s genius. He will come more and more to represent for us those vague uneasy feelings that certain inanimate and elemental objects have the power of rousing. It is of him that one must think, when this or that rock-chasm cries aloud for its Demon, or this or that deserted roadway mutters of its unreturning dead.

There will always be certain great artists, and they are the most original of all who refuse to submit to any of our logical categories, whether scientific or ideal.

To give one’s self up to them is to be led by the hand into the country of Pure Imagination, into the Ultima Thule of impossible dreams.

Like Edgar Allan Poe, this great painter can make splendid use of the human probabilities of Religion and Science; but it is none of these things that one finally thinks, as one comes to follow him, but of things more subtle, more remote, more translunar, and far more imaginative.

One may walk the streets of Toledo to seek the impress of El Greco’s going and coming; but the soul of Domenico Theotocopoulos is not there.

It is with Faust, in the cave of the abysmal “Mothers.”

MILTON

It is outrageous, the way we modern world-children play with words. How we are betrayed by words! How we betray with words! We steal from one another and from the spirit of the hour; and with our phrases and formulas and talismans we obliterate all distinction. One sees the modern god as one who perpetually apologises and explains; and the modern devil as one who perpetually apologises and explains. Everything has its word-symbol, its word-mask, its word-garment, its word-disgrace. Nothing comes out clear into the open, unspeakable and inexplicable, and strikes us dumb!

That is what the great artists do — who laugh at our word-play. That is what Milton does, who, in the science and art of handling words, has never been equalled. Milton, indeed, remains, by a curious fate, the only one of the very great poets who has never been “interpreted” or “appreciated” or “re-created” by any critical modern. And they have left him alone; have been frightened of him; have not dared to slime their “words” over him, for the very reason that he is the supreme artist in words! He is so great an artist that his creations detach themselves from all dimness — from all such dimness as modern “appreciation” loves — and stand out clear and cold and “unsympathetic”; to be bowed down before and worshipped, or left unapproached.

Milton is a man’s poet. It would be a strange thing if women loved him. Modern criticism is a half-tipsy Hermaphrodite, in love only with what is on the point of turning into something else. Milton is always himself. His works of art are always themselves. He and they are made of the same marble, of the same metal. They are never likely to change into anything else! Milton is, like all the greatest artists, a man of action. He, so learned in words, in their history, in their weight, in their origin, in their evocations; he, the scholar of scholars, is a man, not of words, but of deeds. That is why the style of Milton is a thing that you can touch with your outstretched fingers. It has been hammered into shape by a hand that could grasp a sword; it has been moulded into form by a brain that could dominate a council-chamber. No wonder we word-maniacs fear to approach him. He repels us; he holds us back; he hides his work-shop from us; and his art smites us into silent hatred.

For Milton himself, though he is the artist of artists, art is not the first thing. It is only the first thing with us because we are life's slaves, and not its masters. Art is what we protect ourselves with — from life. For us it is a religion and a drug. To Milton it was a weapon and a plaything.

Milton was more interested in the struggle of ideas, in the struggle of races, in the struggle of immortal principles, in the struggle of gods, in the great creative struggle of life and death, than he was interested in the exquisite cadences of words or their laborious arrangement. A modern artist's heart's desire is to escape from the world to some "happy valley" and there, sitting cross-legged, like a Chinese Idol, between the myrtle-bushes and the Lotus, to make beautiful things in detachment forever, one by one, with no pause or pain. Milton's desire was to take the whole round world between his hands, with all the races and nations who dwell upon it, and mould that, and nothing less, into the likeness of what he believed. And in what did he believe, this Lord of Time and Space, this accomplice of Jehovah? He believed in Himself. He had the unquestioning, unphilosophical belief in himself which great men of action have; which the Caesars, Alexanders and Napoleons have, and which Shakespeare seems to have lacked.

Milton, though people have been misled into thinking of him as very different from that, was, in reality, the incarnation of the Nietzschean ideal. He was hard, he was cold, he was contemptuous, he was "magnanimous," he "remembered his whip" when he went with women, he loved war for its own sake, and he dwelt alone on the top of the mountains. To Milton the world presented itself as a place where the dominant power, and the dominant interest, was the wrestling of will with will. Why need we always fuss ourselves about logical names? Milton, in reality — in his temperament and his mood — was just as convinced of Will being the ultimate secret as Schopenhauer or Nietzsche or Bergson or the modern Pragmatist. Nothing seemed to him noble, or dramatic, or "true," that did not imply the struggle to the death of opposing wills.

Milton, in reality, is less of a Christian than any European writer, since the Gospel appeared. In his heart, like Nietzsche, he regarded the binding into one volume of those "Two Testaments" an insult to "the great style." He does, indeed, in a manner find a place for Christ, but it is the place of one demigod among many other demi-gods; the conqueror's place possibly, but still the place of one in a hierarchy, not of one alone. It is absurd to quarrel with Milton's deification of the Judaic Jehovah. Every man has his own God. The God he has a right to. And the Jewish Jehovah, after all, is no mean figure. He, like Milton, was a God of War. He, like Milton, found Will — human and divine Will — the central cosmic fact. He, like Milton, regarded Good and Evil, not as universal principles, but as arbitrary commands, issued by eternal personal antagonists! It is one of the absurd mistakes into which our conceptual and categorical minds so easily fall — this tendency to eliminate Milton's Theology as mere Puritanical convention, dull and uninteresting. Milton's Theology was the most personal creation that any great poet has ever dared to launch upon — more personal even than the Theology of Milton’s favourite Greek poet, Euripides.

Milton’s feeling for the more personal, more concrete aspects of “God” goes entirely well with the rest of his philosophy. At heart he was a savage Dualist, who lapsed occasionally into Pluralism. He was, above all, an Individualist of the most extreme kind — an Individualist so hard, so positive, so inflexible, that for him nothing in the world really mattered except the clash of definite, clear-cut Wills, contending against one another.

Milton is the least mystical, the least pantheistic, the least monistic, of all writers. That magical sense of the brooding Over-Soul which thrills us so in Goethe’s poetry never touches his pages. The Wordsworthian intimations of “something far more deeply interfused” never crossed his sensibility; and, as far as he is concerned, Plato might never have existed.

One feels, as one reads Milton, that his ultimate view of the universe is a great chaotic battlefield, amid the confused elements of which rise up the portentous figures of “Thrones, Dominations, Principalities, and Powers,” and in the struggle between these, the most arbitrary, the most tyrannical, the most despotic, conquers the rest, and, planting his creative Gonfalon further in the Abyss than any, becomes “God”; the God whose personal and unrestrained Caprice creates the Sun, the Moon and the Stars, out of Chaos; and Man out of the dust of the Earth. Thus it is brought about that what this God wills is “Good,” and what his strongest and most formidable antagonist wills is “Evil.” Between Good and Evil there is no eternal difference, except in the eternal difference between the conquering Personality of Jehovah and the conquered Personality of Lucifer. So, far from it being true that Milton is the dull transcriber of mere traditional Protestantism, a very little investigation reveals the astounding fact that the current popular Evangelical view of the origin of things and the drama of things is based, not upon the Bible at all, but upon Milton's poem. In this respect he is a true Classic Poet — a Maker of Mythology — a Delphic Demiurge.

One of the most difficult questions in the world to answer would be the question how far Milton "believed" simply and directly, in the God he thus half-created. Probably he did "believe" more than his daring, arbitrary "creations" would lead us to suppose. His nature demanded positive and concrete facts. Scepticism and mysticism were both abhorrent to him; and it is more likely than not that, in the depths of his strange cold, unapproachable heart, a terrible and passionate prayer went up, day and night, to the God of Isaac and Jacob that the Lord should not forget his Servant.

The grandeur and granite-like weight of Milton's learning was fed by the high traditions of Greece and Rome; but, in his heart of hearts, far deeper than anything that moved him in Aeschylus or Virgil, was the devotion he had for the religion of Israel, and the Fear of Him who "sitteth between the Cherubims." It is often forgotten, amid the welter of modern ethical ideals and modern mystical theosophies, how grand and unique a thing is this Religion of Israel — a religion whose God is at once Personal and Invisible. After all, what do we know? A Prince of Righteousness, a King of Sion, a Shepherd of his People — such a "Living God" as David cries out upon, with those dramatic cries that remain until today the most human and tragic of all our race's wrestling with the Unknown — is this not a Faith quite as "possible" and far more moving, than all the "Over-Souls" and "Immanent All's Fathers" and "Streams of Tendency" which have been substituted for it by unimaginative modern "breadth of mind"? It is time that it was made clear that the alternative at present for all noble souls is between the reign of "crass Casuality" and the reign of Him "who maketh the clouds His chariot and walketh upon the wings of the wind." Those who, "with Democritus, set the world upon Chance" have a right to worship their Jesus of Nazareth, and, in him, the Eternal Protest against the Cruelty of Life. But if Life is to be deified, if Life is to be "accepted," if Life is to be worshipped; if Courage, not Love, be the secret of the cosmic system, then let us call aloud upon it, under personal and palpable symbols, in the old imaginative, poetic way, rather than fool ourselves with thin mysticities, vague intuitions, and the "sounding brass" of "ethical ideals"!

The earlier poems of Milton are among the most lovely in the English language. Lycidas is, for those who understand what poetry means, the most lovely of all. There is nothing, anywhere, quite like this poem. The lingering, elaborate harmonies, interrupted in pause after pause, by lines of reverberating finality; and yet, sweetly, slowly leading on to a climax of such airy, lucid calm — it is one's "hope beyond hope" of what a poem should be.

The absence of vulgar sentiment, the classic reserve, the gentle melancholy, the delicate gaiety, the subtle interweaving of divine, rhythmic cadences, the ineffable lightness of touch, as of cunning fingers upon reluctant clay; is there anything in poetry to equal these things? One does not even regret the sudden devastating apparition of that "two-handed engine at the door." For one remembers how wickedly, how mercilessly, the beauty of life is even now being spoiled by these accursed "hirelings" — and now, as then, "nothing said."

The Nativity Hymn owes half the charm of its easy, natural grace to the fact that the victory of Mary's infant son over the rest is treated as if it were the victory of one pagan god over another — the final triumph being to him who is the most "gentle" and "beautiful" of all the gods. In the famous argument between the Lady and her Tempter, in Comus, we have an exquisite example of the sweet, grave refinement of virginal taste which shuns grossness as “a false note.” The doctrine of Comus — if so airy a thing can be supposed to have a doctrine — is not very different from the doctrine of Marius the Epicurean. One were foolish to follow the bestial enchanter; not so much because it is “wrong” to do so, as because, then, one would lose the finer edge of that heavenly music which turns the outward shape “to the soul’s essence.”

Milton’s Sonnets occupy a place by themselves in English Literature, and they may well be pondered upon by those who think that the relinquishing of the “old forms” makes it easier to express one’s personality. It makes it, as a matter of fact, much harder, just as the stripping from human beings of their characteristic “outer garments” makes them so dreadfully, so devastatingly, alike! Nothing could be more personal than a Miltonic Sonnet. The rigid principles of form, adhered to so scrupulously in the medium used, intensify, rather than detract from, his individualistic character. That Miltonic wit, so granite-like and mordant, how well it goes with the magical whispers that “syllable men’s names”!

All Milton’s personal prejudices may be found in the Sonnets, from his hatred of those frightful Scotch appellations that would “make Quintlian gasp” to his longing for Classic companionship and “Attic wine” and “immortal notes” and “Tuscan airs”! As one reads on, laughing gently at the folly of those who have so misunderstood him, one is conscious more and more of that high, cold, clear, lonely tenderness, which found so little satisfaction in the sentiment of the rabble and still less in the endearments of women! As in the case of “sad Electra’s poet,” his own favorite, it is easy to grow angry about his “Misogyny” and take Christian exception to his preference for mistresses over wives. It is true that Milton’s view of marriage is more than “heathen.” But one has to remember that in these matters of purely personal taste no public opinion has right to intervene.

When the well-married Brownings of our age succeed in writing poetry in the "grand style," it will be time — and, perhaps, not even then — to let the dogs of democratic domesticity loose upon this austere lover of the classic way.

What a retort was "Paradise Lost" to the lewd revellers who would have profaned his aristocratic isolation with howlings and brutalities and philistine uproar! Milton despised "priests and kings" from the heights of a pride loftier than their own — and he did not love the vulgar mob much better. In Paradise Lost he can "feel himself" into the sublime tyranny of God, as well as into the sublime revolt of Lucifer. Neither the one or other stoops to solicit "popular voices." The thing to avoid, as one reads this great poem, are the paraphrases from the book of Genesis. Here some odd scrupulousness of scholarly conscience seems to prevent him launching out into his native originality. But, putting this aside, what majestic Pandemoniums of terrific Imagination he has the power to call up! The opening Books are as sublime as the book of Job, and more arresting than Aeschylus. The basic secrets of his blank verse can never be revealed, but one is struck dumb with wonder in the presence of this Eagle of Poetry as we attempt to follow him, flight beyond flight, hovering beyond hovering, as he gets nearer and nearer to the Sun.

It is by single paragraphs, all the same, and by single lines, that I would myself prefer to see him judged. Long poems have been written before and will be written again, but no one will ever write — no one but Dante has ever written — such single lines as one reads in Milton. Curiously enough, some of the most staggering of these superb passages are interludes and allusions, rather than integral episodes in the story, and not only interludes, but interludes in the "pagan manner." Second only to those Luciferan defiances, which seem able to inspire even us poor worms with the right attitude towards Fate, I am tempted to place certain references to Astarte, Ashtoreth and Adonis.

> “Astarte, queen of Heaven, with crescent horns,
> To whose bright Image nightly, by the moon,
> Sidonian virgins paid their vows and songs.”

Or of Adonis:

> “Whose annual wound, in Lebanon, allured
> The Syrian damsels to lament his fate
> In amorous ditties all a Summer’s day—”

That single line, “Whose annual wound, in Lebanon, allured,” seems to me better than any other that could be quoted, to evoke the awe and the thrill and the seduction of all true poetry.

Then those great mysterious allusions to the planetary orbits and the fixed stars and the primeval spaces of land and sea; what a power they have of spreading wide before us the huge horizons of the world’s edge! Who can forget “the fleecy star that bears Andromeda far off Atlantic seas”? Or that phrase about the sailors “stemming mightly to the pole”? Or the sudden terror of that guarded Paradisic Gate— “with dreadful faces thronged and fiery arms”? The same extraordinary beauty of single passages may be found in “Paradise Regained,” a poem which is much finer than many guess. The descriptions there of the world-cities, Athens, Rome, Jerusalem, have the same classic thrill of reserved awe and infinite reverence that some of Dante’s lines possess — only, with Milton, the thing is longer drawn out and more grandiloquent. Satan’s speech about his own implacable fatality, “his harbour, and his ultimate repose,” and that allusion to Our Lord’s gentleness, like “the cool intermission of a summer’s cloud” are both in the manner we love.

It is only, however, when one comes to Samson Agonistes that the full power of Milton’s genius is felt. Written in a style which the devotees of “free verse” in our time would do well to analyse, it is the most complete expression of his own individual character that he ever attained. Here the Captain of Jehovah, here the champion of Light against Darkness, of Pride against Humility, of Man against Woman, finds his opportunity and his hour. Out of his blindness, out of his loneliness, out of the welter of hedonists and amorists and feminists and fantasists who crowded upon him, the great, terrible egoist strikes his last blow! No one can read Samson Agonistes without being moved, and those who look deepest into our present age may well be moved the most! One almost feels as if some great overpowering tide of all the brutalities and crudities and false sentiments and cunning hypocrisies, and evil voluptuousness, of all the Philistias that have ever been, is actually rushing to overwhelm us! Gath and Askalon in gross triumph — must this thing be? Will the Lord of Hosts lift no finger to help his own? And then the end comes; and the Euripidean “messenger” brings the great news! He is dead, our Champion; but in his death he slew more than in his life. “Nothing is here” for unworthy sorrow; “nothing” that need make us “knock the breast;”— “No weakness, no contempt, dispraise or blame — nothing but well and fair, and what may quiet us in a death so noble.”

And the end of Samson Agonistes is as the end of Milton’s own life. Awaited in calm dignity, as a Roman soldier might wait for Caesar’s word, Death has claimed its own. But let not the “daughters of the uncircumsized” triumph! Grandeur and nobility, beauty and heroism, live still; and while these live, what matter though our bravest and our fairest perish? It only remains to let the thunderbolt, when it does fall, find us prepared; find us in calm of mind, “all passion spent.”

CHARLES LAMB

CHARLES LAMB OCCUPIES a very curious position in English literature and a very enviable one. He is, perhaps, the most widely known, and widely spoken of, of any stylist we possess, and the least understood. It was his humour, while living, to create misunderstanding, and he creates it still. And yet he is recognized on all sides as a Classic of the unapproachable breed. Charles Lamb has among his admirers more uninteresting people than any great artist has ever had except Thackeray. He has more academic people in his train than anyone has ever had except Shakespeare. And more severe, elderly, pedantic persons profess to love him than love any other mortal writer.

These people all read Lamb, talk Lamb, quote Lamb, but they do not suggest Lamb; they do not “smack,” as our ancestors used to say, of the true Elia vein.

But the immense humour of the situation does not stop here. Not only has this evasive City Clerk succeeded in fooling the “good people;” he has fooled the “wicked ones.” I have myself in the circle of my acquaintance more than half a dozen charming people, of the type who enjoy Aubrey Beardsley, and have a mania for Oscar Wilde, and sometimes dip into Remy de Gourmont, and not one of them “can read” Charles Lamb. He has succeeded in fooling them; in making them suppose he is something quite different from what he is. He used to tell his friends that every day he felt himself growing more “official” and “moral.” He even swore he had been taken for a Verger or a Church warden. Well, our friends of the “enclosed gardens” still take him for a Verger. But he is a more remarkable Verger than they dream. As a matter of fact, there were some extremely daring and modern spirits in Elia's "entourage," spirits who went further in an antinomian direction than — I devoutly pray — my friends are ever likely to go, and these scandalous ones adored him. And for his part, he seems to have liked them — more than he ought.

It is, indeed, very curious and interesting, the literary fate of Charles Lamb. Jocular Bishops, archly toying Rural Deans, Rectors with a "penchant" for anecdote, scholarly Canons with a weakness for Rum Punch, are all inclined to speak as if in some odd way he was of their own very tribe. He had absolutely nothing in common with them, except a talent for giving false impressions! With regard to the devotion to him which certain gentle and old-fashioned ladies have — one's great-aunts, for instance — I am inclined to think that much more might be said. There is a quality, a super-refined, exquisite quality, and one with a pinch of true ironic salt in it, which the more thick-skinned among us sensationalists may easily miss.

It is all very well for us to talk of "burning with a hard gem-like flame," when, as a matter of fact, we move along, dull as cave-men, to some of the finest aesthetic effects in the world. Not to appreciate the humour of that rarest and sweetest of all human types, the mischievous-tongued Great-Aunt, is to be nothing short of a profane fool.

But Charles Lamb is a very different person from our Goldsmiths and Cowpers and Austens, and their modern representatives. It needs something else in a Great-Aunt than old-fashioned irony to appreciate him. It needs an imagination that is very nearly "Shakespearean" and it needs a passion for beautiful style of which a Flaubert or an Anatole France might be proud.

So here we have the old sly Elia, fooling people now as he fooled them in his lifetime, and a riddle both to the godly and the ungodly. The great Goethe, whose Walpurgis Night "He-Apes" made Elia put out his tongue, read, we learn, with no little pleasure some fantastic skit of this incorrigible one. Did he discern — the sublime Olympian — what a cunning flute player lurked under the queer mask? “Something between a Jew, a Gentleman and an Angel” he liked to fancy he looked; and one must confess that in the subtlest of all senses of that word, a gentleman he was.

Lamb’s “essays” were written at off hours, when he could escape from his office. Once completely freed from the necessity of office work, his writing lost its magic. His genius was of that peculiarly delicate texture which requires the stimulus of reaction. One cannot be too grateful that the incomparable Pater, after Lamb himself, perhaps, the greatest master of English prose, found it necessary to utter his appreciation. Pater, as usual, hits the mark with an infallible hand when he speaks of that overhanging Sophoclean tragedy which darkened Lamb’s earlier days and never quite left him.

It is, of course, this, the sense of one living always on the edge of a precipice, that gives such piquancy and charm to Elia’s mania for “little things.” Well might he turn to “little things,” when great things — his Sun and his Moon — had been turned for him to Blood! But, as Pater suggests, there is “Philosophy” in all this, and more Philosophy than many suppose. It is unfortunate that the unworldly Coleridge and the worldly Thackeray should have both pitched upon Lamb’s “saintliness” to make copy of. Nothing infuriated him more than such a tone towards himself. And he was right to be infuriated. His “unselfishness,” his “sweetness,” of which these good men make so much, were only one aspect of the Philosophy of his whole life. Lamb was, in his life, a great epicurean philosopher, as, in all probability, many other “saints” have been. The things in him that fretted Carlyle, his fits of intoxication, his outbursts of capricious impishness, his perversity and his irony, were just as much part of the whole scheme as were his celibacy and his relation to his sister.

What one can really gather from Lamb is nothing less than a very wise and very subtle "way of life," a way that, amid many outrageous experiences, will be found singularly lucky.

In the first place, let it be noted, Lamb deliberately cultivates the art of "transforming the commonplace." It is as absurd to deny the existence of this element — from which we all suffer — as it is to maintain that it cannot be changed. It can be changed. That is precisely what this kind of rare genius does. It is a miracle, of course, but everything in art is a miracle.

Nature tosses out indiscriminately her motley productions, and if you are born for such "universalism," you may swallow them wholesale. The danger of such a downright manner of going to work is that it blunts one's critical sense. If you swallow everything just as it is, you taste very little. But Charles Lamb is nothing if not "critical," nothing if not an Epicure, and his manner of dealing with the "commonplace" sharpens rather than blunts the edge of one's taste.

And what is this manner? It is nothing less than an indescribable blending of Christianity and Paganism. Heine, another of Carlyle's "blackguards," achieves the same synthesis. It is this spiritual achievement — at once a religious and an aesthetic triumph — that makes Elia, for all his weaknesses, such a really great man. The Wordsworths and Coleridges who patronized him were too self-opiniated and individualistic to be able to enter into either tradition.

Wordsworth is neither a Christian or a Pagan. He is a moral philosopher. Elia is an artist, who understands the importance of ritual in life — but of naturalness in ritual.

How difficult, whether as a thinker or a man, is it to be natural in one's loves and hates! How many quite authoritative Philistines never really let the world know how Bohemian at heart they are! And how much of our modern "artistic feeling" is a pure affectation! Now, whatever Elia was not, he was wantonly, wickedly, whimsically natural.

He never concealed his religious feelings, his superstitious feelings. He never concealed his fancies, his fads, his manias, his vices. He never concealed his emotion when he felt a thrill of passionate faith. He never concealed it when he felt a thrill of blasphemous doubt.

He accepted life's little pleasures as they appeared, and did not hesitate to make "cults" of the ones that appeared most appealing. If he had Philistine feelings, he indulged them without shame. If he had recondite and "artistic" feelings, he indulged them also without shame. He is one of the few great men not afraid to be un-original, and hence he is the most original of all. "I cannot," says he, "sit and think. Books think for me." Well, books did "think for him," for he managed to press the books of the great poets into his service, as no mortal writer has ever dared to do before. And he could do it without impairing his originality, because he was as original as the great poets he used. We say deliberately "poets," for, as Pater points out, to find Lamb's rivals in sheer imaginative genius, we have to leave the company of those who write prose.

Do the humorous ecclesiastics and scholarly tutors who profess to understand Elia ever peep into that Essay called "Witches," or that other Essay called "A Child-Angel"? There are things here that are written for a very different circle. Certain sentences in "Dream-children," too, have a beauty that takes a natural man's breath completely away. Touches of far-off romance, terrible and wistful as "anonymous ballads," alternate with gestures of Rabelaisian humour, such as generous souls love. Elia's style is the only thing in English prose that can be called absolutely perfect. Compared with the rich, capricious, wilful, lingering by the way of Lamb's manner, Pater's is precise, demure and over-grave, Wilde's fantastic and over-provocative, Ruskin's intolerably rhetorical.

Into what other prose style could the magic of Shakespeare's "little touches" be drawn, or the high melancholy of Milton's imagery be led, without producing a frightful sense of the incongruous? He can quote them both — or any other great old master — and if it were not for the "inverted commas" we should not be aware of the insertion.

Elia cannot say anything, not the simplest thing, without giving it a turn, a twist, a lift, a lightness, a grace, that would redeem the very grease-spots on a scullion's apron!

There is no style in the world like it. Germany, France, Italy, Russia have no Charles Lamb. Their Flauberts and D'Annunzios belong to a different tribe. Even Turgenieff, just because he has to "get on with his story" cannot do precisely this.

Every single one of the "essays" and most of the "letters" can be read over and over again, and their cadences caressed as if they were living people's features. And they are living. They are as living as those Japanese Prints so maddening to some among us, or as the drawings of Lionardo. They also — in their place — are "pure line" to use the ardent modern slang, and unpolluted "imaginative suggestion."

The mistake our "aesthetes" made, these lovers of Egyptian dancers and Babylonian masks, is that they suppose the simplicity of Lamb's subjects debar him from the rare effects. Ah! They little know! He can take the wistfulness of children, and the quaint gestures of dead Comedians, and the fantasies of old worm-eated folios, and the shadows of sundials upon cloistered lawns, and the heartbreaking evasions of such as "can never know love” and out of these things he can make a music as piteous and lovely as Ophelia’s songs. It is a curious indication of the lack of real poetic feeling in the feverish art-neophytes of our age that they should miss these things in Elia. One wonders if they have ever felt the remote translunar beauty that common faces and old, dim, pitiful things can wear sometimes. It would seem not. Like Herod the Tetrarch, they must have “Peacocks whose crying calls the rain, and the spreading of their tails brings down the Moon;” they must have “opals that burn with flame as cold as ice” and onyxes and amber and the tapestries of Tyre, The pansies that “are for thoughts” touch them not and the voices of the street-singers leave them cold.

It is precisely the lack of natural kindly humour in these people, who must always be clutching “cameos from Syracuse” between their fingers, which leads them, when the tension of the “gem-like flame” can be borne no more, into sheer garishness and brutality. One knows it so well, that particular tone; the tone of the jaded amorist, for whom “the unspeakable rural solitudes” and “the sweet security of streets” mean, both of them, boredom and desolation.

It is not their subtlety that makes them thus suffer; it is their lack of it. What? Is the poignant world-old play of poor mortal men and women, with their absurdities and excesses, their grotesque reserves and fantastic confessions, their advances and withdrawals, not interesting enough to serve? It serves sufficiently; it serves well enough, when genius takes it in hand. Perhaps, after all, it is that which is lacking.

Charles Lamb went through the world with many avoidances, but one thing he did not avoid — the innocence of unmitigated foolishness! He was able to give to the Simple Simons of this life that Rabelaisian touch of magnanimous understanding which makes even the leanest wits among us glow. He went through the world with strange timidities and no daring stride. He loitered in its by-alleys. He drifted through its Bazaars. He sat with the crowd in its Circuses. He lingered outside its churches. He ate his "pot of honey" among its graves. And as he went his way, irritable and freakish, wayward and arbitrary, he came, by chance, upon just those side-lights and intimations, those rumours and whispers, those figures traced on sand and dust and water, which, more than all the Law and the Prophets, draw near to the unuttered word.

DICKENS

IT IS ABSURD, of course, to think that it is necessary to "hold a brief" for Dickens. But sometimes, when one comes across charming and exquisite people who "cannot read him," one is tempted to give one's personal appreciation that kind of form.

Dickens is one of the great artists of the world, and he is so, in spite of the fact that in certain spheres, in the sphere of Sex, for instance, or the sphere of Philosophy, he is such a hopeless conventionalist. It is because we are at this hour so preoccupied with Sex, in our desire to readjust the conventions of Society and Morality towards it, that a great artist, who simply leaves it out altogether, or treats it with a mixture of the conventionality of the preacher and the worst foolishness of the crowd, is an artist whose appeal is seriously handicapped.

Yet, given this "lacuna," this amazing "gap" in his work, a deprivation much more serious than his want of "philosophy," Dickens is a writer of colossal genius, whose originality and vision puts all our modern "literateurs" to shame. One feels this directly one opens any volume of his. Only a great creative genius could so dominate, for instance, his mere "illustrators," as to mesmerize them completely into his manner. And certainly his illustrators are drugged with the Dickens atmosphere. Those hideous-lovely persons, whose legs and arms are so thin that it is impossible to suppose they ever removed their clothes; do they not strut and leer and ogle and grin and stagger and weep, in the very style of their author?

Remembering my "brief" and the sort of jury, among my friends, I have to persuade, I am not inclined in this sketch to launch out into panegyrics upon Mr. Micawber and Mrs. Gamp and Mr. Pecksniff and Betsy Trotwood and Bill Sikes and Dick Swiveller and Bob Sawyer and Sam Weller and Mark Tapley and Old Scrooge. The mere mention of these names, which, to some, would suggest the music of the spheres, to others would suggest forced merriment, horrible Early Victorian sentiment, and that sort of hackneyed "unction" of sly moral elders, which is youth's especial Hell. Much wiser were it, as it seems to me, to indicate what in Dickens — in his style, his method, his vision, his art — actually appeals to one particular mind. I think it is to be found in his childlike Imagination. Now, the modern cult for children has reached such fantastic limits that one has to be very careful when one uses that word. But Dickens is childlike, not as Oscar Wilde — that Uranian Baby — or as Paul Verlaine — that little "pet lamb" of God — felt themselves to be childlike, or as the artificial-minded Robert Louis Stevenson fooled his followers into thinking him. He is really and truly childlike. His imagination and vision are literally the imagination and vision of children. We have not all played at Pirates and Buccaneers. We have not all dreamed of Treasure-Islands and Marooned sailors. We have not all "believed in Fairies." These rather tiresome and over-rung-upon aspects of children's fancies are, after all, very often nothing more than middle-aged people's damned affectations. The children's cult at the present day plays strange tricks.

But Dickens, from beginning to end, has the real touch, the authentic reaction. How should actual and living children, persecuted by "New Educational Methods," glutted with toys, depraved by "understanding sympathy," and worn out by performances of "Peter Pan," believe — really and truly — in fairies any more? But, in spite of sentimental Child-worshippers, let us not hesitate to whisper: "It doesn't matter in the least if they don't!" The "enlightened" and cultivated mothers, who grow unhappy when they find their darlings cold to Titania and Oberon and to the more "poetic" modern fairies, with the funny names, may rest in peace. If the house they inhabit and the street they inhabit be not sanitarized and art-decorated beyond all human interest, they may let their little ones alone. They will dream their dreams. They will invent their games. They will talk to their shadows. They will blow kisses to the Moon. And all will go well with "the Child in the House," even if he has not so much as even heard of "the Blue Bird"!

If these uncomfortably "childlike" people read Dickens, they would know how a child really does regard life, and perhaps they would be a little shocked. For it is by no means only the "romantic" and "aesthetic" side of things that appeals to children. They have their nightmares, poor imps, and such devils follow them as older people never dream of. Dickens knew all that, and in his books the thrill of the supernatural, as it hovers over chairs and tables and pots and pans, is never far away. It lurks, that repelling-alluring Terror, in a thousand simple places. It moves in the darkness of very modern cupboards. It hides in the recesses of very modern cellars. It pounces out from the eaves of quite modern attics. It is there, halfway up the Staircase. It is there, halfway down the Passage. And God knows whither it comes or where it goes!

To endow the little every-day objects that surround us — a certain picture in a certain light, a certain clock or stove in a certain shadow, a certain corner of the curtain when the wind moves it — with the fetish-magic of natural "animism"; that is the real childlike trick, and that is what Dickens does. It is, of course, something not confined to people who are children in years. It is the old, sweet Witch-Hag, Mystery, that, sooner or later, has us all by the throat!

And that is why, to me, Dickens is so great a writer. Since men have come to live so much in cities; since houses and streets and rooms and passages and windows and basements have come to mean more to them than fields and woods, it is essential that “the Old Man covered with a Mantle,” the Ancient of Ancients, the Disturber of Rational Dreams, should move into the town, too, and mutter and murmur in its shadows!

How hard a thing is it, to put into words the strange attraction and the strange terror which the dwellings of mortal men have the power of exciting! To drift at nightfall into an unknown town, and wander through its less frequented ways, and peep into its dark, empty churches, and listen to the wind in the stunted trees that grow by its Prison, and watch some flickering particular light high up in some tall house — the light of a harlot, a priest, an artist, a murderer — surely there is no imaginative experience equal to this! Then, the things one sees, by chance, by accident, through half-open doors and shutter-chinks and behind lifted curtains! Verily the ways of men upon earth are past finding out, and their madness beyond interpretation!

It is not only children — and yet it is children most of all — who get the sense, in a weird, sudden flash, of the demonic life of inanimate things. Why are our houses so full of things that one had better not look at, things that, like the face of Salome, had better be seen in mirrors, and things that must be forbidden to look at us? The houses of mortal men are strange places. They are sepulchres and cemeteries. Dungeons are they, and prison cells. Not one of them but have murderous feet going up and down. Not one of them but have lavisher’s hands, fumbling, back and forth, along the walls. For the secret wishes, and starved desires, and mad cravings, and furious revolts, of the hearts of men and women, living together decently in their “homes,” grow by degrees palpable and real and gather to themselves strange shapes.

No writer who has ever lived can touch Dickens in indicating this sort of familiar sorcery and the secret of its terror. For it is children, more than any, who are conscious how “haunted” all manner of places and things are. And people themselves! The searching psychologists are led singularly astray. They peer and pry and repine, and all the while the real essence of the figure lies in its momentary expression — in its most superficial gesture.

Dickens’ world is a world of gnomes and hob-goblins, of ghouls and of laughing angels. The realist of the Thackeray School finds nothing but monstrous exaggeration here — and fantastic mummery. If he were right, par-dieu! If his sleek “reality” were all that there was— “alarum!” We were indeed “betrayed”! But no; the children are right. Dickens is right. Neither “realist” or “psychologist” hits the mark, when it comes to the true diablerie of living people. There is something more whimsical, more capricious, more unreal, than philosophers suppose about this human pantomime. People are actually — as every child knows — much worse and much better than they “ought” to be. And, as every child knows, too, they tune their souls up to the pitch of their “masks.” The surface of things is the heart of things; and the protruded goblin-tongue, the wagged head, the groping fingers, the shuffling step, are just as significant of the mad play-motif as any hidden thoughts. People think with their bodies, and their looks and gestures; nay! their very garments are words, tones, whispers, in their general Confession.

The world of Dickens’ fantastic creations is all the nearer to the truth of our life because it is so arbitrary and “impossible.” He seems to go backwards and forwards with a torch, throwing knobs, jags, wrinkles, corrugations, protuberancies, cavities, horns, and snouts into terrifying illumination. But we are like that! That is what we actually are. That is how the Pillar of Fire sees us. Then, again, are we to limit our interest, as these modern writers do, to the beautiful people or the interesting people or the gross, emphatic people. Dickens is never more childlike than when he draws us, wonderingly and confidingly, to the stark knees of a Mrs. Pipchin, or when he drives us away, in unaccountable panic-terror, from the rattling jet-beads of a Miss Murdstone.

Think of the vast, queer, dim-lighted world wherein live and move all those funny, dusty, attenuated, heart-breaking figures, of such as wear the form of women — and yet may never know “love”! It is wonderful — when you think of it — how much of absorbing interest is left in life, when you have eliminated “sex,” suppressed “psychology,” and left philosophy out! Then appear all those queer attractions and repulsions which are purely superficial, and even material, and yet which are so dominant. Mother of God! How unnecessary to bring in Fairies and Blue Birds, when the solemnity of some little seamstress and her sorceress hands, and the quaint knotting of her poor wisp of hair, would be enough to keep a child staring and dreaming for hours upon hours!

Life in a great city is like life in an enchanted forest. One never knows what hideous ogre or what exquisite hamadryad one may encounter. And the little ways of all one’s scrabbling and burrowing and chuckling and nodding and winking house-mates! To go through the world expecting adventures is to find them sooner or later. But one need only cross one’s threshold to find one adventure — the adventure of a new, unknown fellow-creature, full of suspicion, full of cloudy malice, full of secretive dreams, and yet ready to respond — poor devil — to a certain kind of signal!

Long reading of Dickens’ books, like long living with children, gives one a wholesome dread of cynicism and flippancy. Children’s games are more serious than young men’s love-affairs, and they must be treated so. It is not exactly that life is to be “taken seriously.” It is to be taken for what it is — an extraordinary Pantomime. The people who will not laugh with Pierrot because his jokes are so silly, and the people who will not cry with Columbine because her legs are so thin, may be shrewd psychologists and fastidious artists — but, God help them! they are not in the game.

The romance of city-life is one thing. The romance of a particular city leads us further. Dickens has managed to get the inner identity of London; what is permanent in it; what can be found nowhere else; as not even Balzac got hold of Paris. London is terrible and ghastly. One knows that; but the wretchedest of its “gamins” knows that it is something else also. More than any place on earth it seems to have that weight, that mass, that depth, that foursquare solidity, which reassures and comforts, in the midst of the illusions of life. It descends so far, with its huge human foundations, that it gives one the impression of a monstrous concrete Base, sunk into eternity, upon which, for all its accumulated litter and debris, man will be able to build, perhaps has begun already, to build, his Urbs Beata. And Dickens entered with dramatic clairvoyance into every secret of this Titanic mystery. He knew its wharfs, its bridges, its viaducts, its alleys, its dens, its parks, its squares, its churches, its morgues, its circuses, its prisons, its hospitals, and its mad-houses. And as the human atoms of that fantastic, gesticulating, weeping, grinning crowd of his dance their crazy “Carmagnole,” we cannot but feel that somehow we must gather strength and friendliness enough to applaud such a tremendous Performance.

Dickens was too great a genius to confine his demonic touch to the town alone. There are suggestions of his, relating to country roads and country Inns and country solitudes, like nothing else, except, perhaps, the Vignettes of Bewick. He carries the same “animism” into this also. And he notes and records sensations of the most evasive kind. The peculiar terror we feel, for instance, mixed with a sort of mad pity, when by chance we light upon some twisted root-trunk, to which the shadows have given outstretched arms. The vague feelings, too, so absolutely unaccountable, that the sight of a lonely gate, or weir, or park-railing, or sign-post, or ruined shed, or tumble-down sheep-fold, may suddenly arouse, when we feel that in some weird manner we are the accomplices of the Thing's tragedy, are feelings that Dickens alone among writers seems to understand. A road with no people upon it, and the wind alone sobbing there; with blind eyes and wrinkled forehead; a pool by the edge of a wide marsh-land — like the marsh-land in "Great Expectations" — with I know not what reflected in it, and waiting, always waiting, for something that does not come; a low, bent, knotted pine-tree, over which the ravens fly, one by one, shrieking; these are the things that to some people — to children, for instance — remain in the mind when all else of their country journey is forgotten.

There is no one but Dickens who has a style that can drag these things into light. His style shrieks sometimes like a ghoul tugging at the roots of a mandrake. At other times it wails like a lost soul. At other times it mutters, and whimpers, and pipes in its throat, like an old man blinking at the moon. At other times it roars and thunders like ten thousand drunken devils. At other times it breaks into wistful, tender, little-girl sobs — and catches the rhythm of poetry — as in the death of Nell. Sometimes a character in Dickens will say something so humorously pregnant, so directly from what we hear in street and tavern, that art itself "gives up," and applauds, speechless.

After all, it is meet and right that there should be one great author, undistracted by psychology — unseduced by eroticism. There remain a few quite important things to deal with, when these are removed! Birth, for instance — the mystery of birth — and the mystery of death. One never forgets death in reading Dickens. He has a thought, a pity, for those things that once were men and women, lying, with their six feet of earth upon them, in our English Churchyards, so horribly still, while the mask of their sorrow yields to the yet more terrible grin of our mortality's last jest.

And to the last he is — like all children — the lover of Players. Every poor dog of Public Entertainer, from the Barrel-Organ man to him who pulls the ropes for Punch and Judy, has his unqualified devotion. The modern Stage may see strange revolutions, some of them by no means suitable to children — but we need not be alarmed. There will always remain the larger Stage, the stage of man's own Exits and Entrances; and there, at any rate, while Dickens is their "Manager," Pierrot may weep and dance, and Pierrette dance and weep, knowing that they will not be long without their audience, or long without their applause!

He was a vulgar writer. Why not? England would not be England — and what would London be? — if we didn't have a touch, a smack, a sprinkling of that ingredient!

He was a shameless sentimentalist. Why not? It is better to cry than to comb one's hair all day with an ivory comb.

He was a monstrous melodramatist. Why not? To be born is a melodrama. To play "hide-and-seek" with Death is a melodrama. And some have found melodramatic satisfaction in letting themselves be caught. All the World's a Puppet-Show, and if the Big Showman jerks his wires so extravagantly, why should not the Little Showman do the same?

GOETHE

AS THE ENIGMATIC wisdom of Goethe been exhausted — after these years — and after the sudden transits across our sky of more flashing meteors? Ah! I deem not yet. Still he holds the entrance to the mysterious Gate, over the portals of which is written, not “Lasciate ogni speranza!” but “Think of Living!” A thunder-rifted heart he bears, but victory, not defeat, looks forth from his wide, outward-gazing eyes! One hand holds the skull, engraved with all the secret symbols of man’s ascent out of the bosom of Nature; engraved, yes! — by all the cunningest tools of Science and her unwearied research; but the other, raised aloft, noble and welcoming, carries the laurel crown of the triumph of Imagination!

So, between Truth and Poetry— “im ganzen guten, schonen,” — stands our Lord of Life!

Exhausted, the wisdom of Goethe? Ah, no! — hardly fathomed yet, in its uppermost levels! If it were really possible to put into words the whole complex world of impressions and visions, of secrets and methods, which that name suggests, one would be a wiser disciple than Eckermann. Fragment by fragment, morsel by morsel, the great Figure limns itself against the shadow of the years.

Is it too presumptuous a task to seek to evoke — taking first one impression of him and then another, first one reaction and then another — what this mysterious Name has come to mean for us? One hears the word “cosmic” whispered. It is whispered too often in these days. But “cosmic,” with its Whitmanesque, modern connotation, does not exactly fit Goethe. Goethe did not often abandon himself in Dionysian fury to the ultimate

Elements. When he did — in his earlier youth — before the hardening process of his Italian Journey had sealed his protection from such romantic lapses — it was not quite in the strained, desperate, modern manner. One feels certain, thinking of what he was, at Frankfurt, at Leipsig, at Strassburg, at Weimar, that he always kept a clear, cool, Apollonian head, mad and amorous though his escapades may seem!

I do not fancy that ever once did Goethe really “give himself away,” or lose the foursquare solidity of his balance in any wild staggering to left or right. No; the Goethean temper, the Goethean attitude, cannot be described as “cosmic,” while that word implies a certain complete yielding to a vague earth-worship. There was nothing vague about Goethe’s intimacy, if I may put it so, with the Earth. He and It seemed destined to understand one another most serenely, in a shrewd and deliberate conspiracy!

The Goethean attitude to the Universe is too self-poised and self-centered to be adequately rendered by any word that suggests complete abandonment. It is too — what shall I say? — too sly and demonic — too much inside the little secrets of the great Mother — to be summed up in a word that suggests a sort of Titanic whirlwind of embraces. And yet, on the other hand, it is quite as easy to exaggerate the Olympian aspect of Goethe. When this is carried too far, something in him, something extraordinarily characteristic, evaporates, like a thin stream of Parnassian smoke.

How shall I express what this is? Perhaps it is the German in him. For, in spite of all Nietzsche’s Mediterraneanizing of this Superman, Goethe was profoundly and inveterately German. The Rhine-Maidens rocked him in his cradle and, though he might journey to Rome or Troy or Carthage, it was to the Rhine-Maidens that he returned. Yes, I do not think that those understand him best who keep bowing to the ground and muttering “Olympian”!

Am I carrying this particular taper-light of discrimination too far when I say that there is, to the Celtic mind at least, something humorously naive and childlike in Goethe, mixed in, queerly enough, with all his rich, mellow, and even worldly, wisdom? One overtakes him, now and then, and catches him, as it were, off his guard, in little pathetic lapses into a curious simplicity — a simplicity grave-eyed, portentious and solemn — almost like that of some great Infant-Faun, trying very seriously to learn the difficult syllables of our human "Categorical Imperative"! World-child, as he was, the magic of the universe pouring through him, one sometimes feels a strange, dim hope with regard to that dubious general Issue, when we find him so confident about the presence of the mysterious Being he worshipped; and so transparently certain of his personal survival after Death!

There is no one, except Leonardo Da Vinci, in the whole history of our Planet, who gives us quite that sense of a person possessed of some secret illumination not granted to the rest of the world. There is much reassurance in this. More than has been, perhaps, realized. For it is probable that "in his caves of ice," Leonardo also felt himself indestructible by the Arch-Enemy. One thinks of those Cabalistic words of old Glanville, "Man does not yield himself to Death — save by the weakness of his mortal Will."

Goethe collecting fossils and crystals and specimens of rock-strata; Goethe visiting Botanical Gardens and pondering on the Metamorphosis of Plants; Goethe climbing Strassburg Cathedral-Spire; Goethe meeting the Phantom of Himself as he returned from the arms of Frederika; Goethe "experiencing the sensation" of crossing the "Firing-Line"; Goethe "announcing" to Eckermann that that worthy man had better avoid undertaking any "great" literary work; Goethe sending Frau von Stein sausages from his breakfast-table; Goethe consoling himself in the Storm by observing his birth-star Lucifer, and thinking of the Lake of Galilee, are pictures of noble and humorous memory which reconcile one to the Comedy of Living!

How vividly returns to me — your pardon, reader! — the first time I read “The Sorrows of Werter” in that little “Three-penny” edition published by Messrs. Cassell! It was in a Barge, towed by three Horses, on the River, between Langport and Bridgewater, in the County of Somerset! The majority of the company were as rowdy a set of good-humored Bean-Feasters as ever drank thin beer in a ramshackle tavern. But there was one of them — this is twenty-five years ago, reader! — a girl as fragile as a peeled Willow-wand — and teased by the rude badinage of our companions we sheltered — as the friendly mists rose — under a great Tarpaulin at the barge’s stern. Where is that girl now, I wonder? Is she alive? Will she ever blush with anger at being thus gently lifted up, from beneath the kind Somersetshire mists, into an hour’s publicity? Who can tell? We are all passing one another, in mist-darkened barges, swift or slow. She is a wraith, a shadow, a receding phantom; but I wave my hand to her over the years! I shall always associate her with Lotte; and I never smell the peculiar smell of Tarpaulin without thinking of “the Sorrows of Werter.”

“Werter” has certainly the very droop and bewilderment of youth’s first passion. It is good to plunge one’s hands, when one has grown cynical and old, into that innocent, if somewhat turbid, fountain. When we pass to “Wilhelm Meister,” we are in quite a different world. The earlier part of this book has the very stamp of the Goethean “truth and poetry.” One can read it side by side with the great “Autobiography” and find the shrewd insight and oracular wisdom quite equally convincing in the invention and the reality. What an unmistakable and unique character all these imaginary persons of Goethe’s stories have! They are so different from any other persons in fiction! Wherein does the difference lie? It is hard to say. In a sense, they are more life-like and real. In another sense, they are more fantastic. Sometimes they seem mere dolls — like the figures in his own puppet-show — and we can literally “see the puppets dallying.”

Jarno is a queer companion for a man to have. And what of the lady who, when she was asked whether she had ever loved, answered, “never or always”? Phillina is a very loving and an extremely vivacious wench. Goethe’s sublime unconsciousness of ordinary moral qualms is never better observed than in the story of this extravagant young minx. Then, in the midst of it all, the arresting, ambiguous little figure of poor Mignon! What does she do — a child of pure lyrical poetry — a thing out of the old ballads — in this queer, grave, indecent company? That elaborate description of Mignon’s funeral so carefully arranged by the Aesthetic “Uncle,” has it not all the curious qualities of the Goethean vein — its clairvoyant insight into the under-truth of Nature — its cold-blooded pre-occupation with “Art” — its gentle irony — its mania for exact detail? The “gentle irony” of which I speak has its opportunity in the account of the “Beautiful Soul” or “Fair Saint.” It reads, in places, like the tender dissection of a lovely corpse by a genial, elderly Doctor.

But the passage which, for me, is most precious is that Apprentice’s “Indenture.” I suppose in no other single paragraph of human prose is there so much concentrated wisdom. “To act is easy — to think is hard!” How extraordinarily true that is! But it is not the precise tune of the strenuous preachers of our time! The whole idea of the “Pedagogic Province,” ruled over by that admirable Abbé, is so exquisitely in Goethe’s most wise and yet most simple manner! The passage about the “Three Reverences” and the “Creed” is as good an instance of that sublime Spinozistic way of dealing with the current religion as that amazing remark he made once to Eckerman about his own faith: “When I want scientific unity, I am a Pantheist. When I desire poetical multifariousness, I am a Polytheist. And when my moral nature requires a Personal God — there is room for That also?”

When one comes to speak of Faust, it is necessary for us to remember the words the great man himself used to his follower in speaking of this masterpiece. Eckermann teased him for interpretations. “What,” said he to Goethe, “is the leading Idea in the Poem?” “Do you suppose,” answered the Sage, “that a thing into which I have put the Life-Blood of all my days is able to be summoned up in anything so narrow and limited as an Idea?”

Personally, I do not hesitate to say that I think Faust is the most permanently interesting of all the works that have proceeded from the human brain.

Its attitude to life is one which ultimately has more to strengthen and sustain and put courage — if not the Devil — into us than anything I know. When I meet a man who shall tell me that the Philosophy of his life is the Philosophy of Faust, I bow down humbly before him. I did meet such a man once. I think he was a Commercial Traveller from Buffalo.
